My warmth, I found, had lengthened this harangue beyond the rules of good-breeding; but the impatience of my entertainer, who often strove to interrupt it, could be restrained no longer. "What!" cried he, "then I have been all this while entertaining a Jesuit in parson's clothes; but, by all the coal-mines of Cornwall, out he shall pack, if my name be Wilkinson." I now found I had gone too far, and asked pardon for the warmth with which I had spoken. "Pardon!" returned he, in a fury; "I think such principles demand ten thousand pardons. What! give up liberty, property, and, as the Gazetteer says, lie down to be saddled with wooden shoes! Sir, I insist upon your marching out of this house immediately, to prevent worse consequences. Sir, I insist upon it!" I was going to repeat my remonstrances; but just then we heard a footman's rap at the door, and the two ladies cried out, "As sure as death there is our master and mistress come home!" It seems our entertainer all this while was only the butler, who, in his master's absence, had a mind to cut a figure, and be for a while the gentleman himself; and, to say the truth, he talked politics as well as most country gentlemen do. But nothing could now exceed my confusion upon seeing the gentleman and his lady enter; nor was their surprise, at finding such company and good cheer, less than ours. "Gentlemen," cried the real master of the house to me and my companion, "my wife and I are your most humble servants; but I protest this is so unexpected a favor that we almost sink under the obligation." However unexpected our company might be to them, theirs, I am sure, was still more so to us, and I was struck dumb with the apprehensions of my own absurdity, when whom should I next see enter the room but my dear Miss Arabella Wilmot, who was formerly designed to be married to my son George, but whose match was broken off, as already related. As soon as she saw me, she flew to my arms with the utmost joy. "My dear sir," cried she, "to what happy accident is it that we owe so unexpected a visit? I am sure my uncle and aunt will be in raptures when they find they have the good Doctor Primrose for their guest." Upon hearing my name, the old gentleman and lady very politely stepped up, and welcomed me with most cordial hospitality. Nor could they forbear smiling on being informed of the nature of my present visit; but the unfortunate butler, whom they at first seemed disposed to turn away, was, at my intercession, forgiven.

Mr. Arnold and his lady, to whom the house belonged, now insisted upon having the pleasure of my stay for some days; and as their niece, my charming pupil, whose mind, in some measure, had been formed under my own instructions, joined in their entreaties, I complied. That night I was shown to a magnificent chamber, and the next morning, early, Miss Wilmot desired to walk with me in the garden, which was decorated in the modern manner. After some time spent in pointing out the beauties of the place, she inquired, with seeming unconcern, when last I had heard from my son George. "Alas! madam," cried I, "he has now been nearly three years absent, without ever writing to his friends or me. Where he is, I know not; perhaps I shall never see him or happiness more. No, my dear madam, we shall nevermore see such pleasing hours as were once spent by our fireside at Wakefield. My little family are now dispersing very fast, and poverty has brought not only want but infamy upon us." The good-natured girl let fall a tear at this account; but, as I saw her possessed of too much sensibility, I forbore a more minute detail of our sufferings. It was, however, some consolation to me to find that time had made no alteration in her affections, and that she had rejected several offers that had been made her since our leaving her part of the country. She led me round all the extensive improvements of the place, pointing to the several walks and arbors, and at the same time catching from every object a hint for some new question relative to my son. In this manner we spent the forenoon, till the bell summoned us to dinner, where we found the manager of the strolling company that I mentioned before, who was come to dispose of tickets for the Fair Penitent, which was to be acted that evening: the part of Horatio by a young gentleman who had never appeared on any stage. He seemed to be very warm in the praise of the new performer, and averred that he never saw any one who bid so fair for excellence. Acting, he observed, was not learned in a day. "But this gentleman," continued he, "seems born to tread the stage. His voice, his figure and attitudes, are all admirable. We caught him up accidentally, in our journey down." This account in some measure excited our curiosity, and, at the entreaty of the ladies, I was prevailed upon to accompany them to the playhouse, which was no other than a barn. As the company with which I went was incontestably the chief of the place, we were received with the greatest respect, and placed in the front seat of the theatre; where we sat for some time with no small impatience to see Horatio make his appearance. The new performer advanced at last: and let parents think of my sensations by their own, when I found it was my unfortunate son! He was going to begin; when, turning his eyes upon the audience, he perceived Miss Wilmot and me, and stood at once speechless and immovable.

The actors behind the scenes, who ascribed this pause to his natural timidity, attempted to encourage him, but, instead of going on, he burst into a flood of tears, and retired off the stage. I don't know what were my feelings on this occasion; for they succeeded with too much rapidity for description; but I was soon awaked from this disagreeable revery by Miss Wilmot; who, pale, and with a trembling voice, desired me to conduct her back to her uncle's. When got home, Mr. Arnold, who was as yet a stranger to our extraordinary behavior, being informed that the new performer was my son, sent his coach and an invitation for him; and, as he persisted in his refusal to appear again on the stage, the players put another in his place; and we soon had him with us. Mr. Arnold gave him the kindest reception, and I received him with my usual transport, for I could never counterfeit a false resentment. Miss Wilmot's reception was mixed with seeming neglect, and yet I could perceive she acted a studied part. The tumult in her mind seemed not yet abated; she said twenty giddy things that looked like joy, and then laughed loud at her own want of meaning. At intervals she would take a sly peep at the glass, as if happy in the consciousness of irresistible beauty; and often would ask questions, without giving any manner of attention to the answers.

CHAPTER XX.

THE HISTORY OF A PHILOSOPHIC VAGABOND, PURSUING NOVELTY, BUT LOSING CONTENT.

After we had supped, Mrs. Arnold politely offered to send a couple of her footmen for my son's baggage, which he at first seemed to decline; but upon her pressing the request, he was obliged to inform her that a stick and a wallet were all the movable things upon this earth which he could boast of. "Why, ay, my son," cried I, "you left me but poor; and poor, I find, you are come back; and yet, I make no doubt you have seen a great deal of the world."—"Yes, sir," replied my son, "but travelling after Fortune is not the way to secure her; and, indeed, of late, I have desisted from the pursuit."—"I fancy, sir," cried Mrs. Arnold, "that the account of your adventures would be amusing; the first part of them I have often heard from my niece; but could the company prevail for the rest, it would be an additional obligation." — "Madam," replied my son, "I promise you the pleasure you have in hearing will not be half so great as my vanity in repeating them; and yet in the whole narrative I can scarcely promise you one adventure, as my account is rather of what I saw than what I did. The first misfortune of my life, which you all know, was great; but though it distressed, it could not sink me. No person ever had a better knack at hoping than I. The less kind I found Fortune at one time, the more I expected from her at another; and being now at the bottom of her wheel, every new revolution might lift, but could not depress me. I proceeded therefore toward London in a fine morning, no way uneasy about to-morrow, but cheerful as the birds that carolled by the road, and comforted myself with reflecting that London was the mart where abilities of every kind were sure of meeting distinction and reward.

"Upon my arrival in town, sir, my first care was to deliver your letter of recommendation to our cousin, who was himself in little better circumstances than I. My first scheme, you know, sir, was to be usher at an academy, and I asked his advice on the affair. Our cousin received the proposal with a true sardonic grin. 'Ay,' cried he, 'this is, indeed, a very pretty career that has been chalked out for you. I have been an usher at a boarding-school myself; and may I die by an anodyne necklace, but I had rather be an under-turnkey in Newgate! I was up early and late; I was browbeat by the master, hated for my ugly face by the mistress, worried by the boys within, and never permitted to stir out to meet civility abroad. But are you sure you are fit for a school? Let me examine you a little. Have you been bred apprentice to the business?' — 'No.' — 'Then you won't do for a school. Can you dress the boys' hair?' — 'No.' — 'Then you won't do for a school. Have you had the small-pox?' — 'No.' — 'Then you won't do for a school. Can you lie three in a bed?' — 'No.' — 'Then you will never do for a school. Have you got a good stomach?' — 'Yes.' — 'Then you will by no means do for a school. No, sir: if you are for a genteel, easy profession, bind yourself seven years as an apprentice to turn a cutler's wheel; but avoid a school by any means. Yet, come,' continued he, 'I see you are a lad of spirit and some learning; what do you think of commencing author, like me? You have read in books, no doubt, of men of genius starving at the trade; at present I'll show you forty very dull fellows about town that live by it in opulence, — all honest, jog-trot men, who go on smoothly and dully, and write history and politics, and are praised; men, sir, who, had they been bred cobblers, would all their lives have only mended shoes, but never made them.'

"Finding that there was no great degree of gentility affixed to the character of an usher, I resolved to accept his proposal; and having the highest respect for literature, hailed the Antiqua Mater of Grub Street with reverence. I thought it my glory to pursue a tract which Dryden and Otway trod before me. I considered the goddess of this region as the parent of excellence; and, however an intercourse with the world might give us good sense, the poverty she entailed I supposed to be the nurse of genius. Big with these reflections, I sat down, and finding that the best things remained to be said on the wrong side, I resolved to write a book that should be wholly new. I therefore dressed up three paradoxes with some ingenuity. They were false, indeed, but they were new. The jewels of truth have been so often imported by others, that nothing was left for me to import, but some splendid things that at a distance looked every bit as well. Witness, you powers, what fancied importance sat perched upon my quill while I was writing! The whole learned world, I made no doubt, would rise to oppose my systems; but then I was prepared to oppose the whole learned world. Like the porcupine, I sat self-collected, with a quill pointed against every opposer."

"Well said, my boy," cried I; "and what subject did you treat upon? I hope you did not pass over the importance of monogamy. But I interrupt: go on. You published your paradoxes; well, and what did the learned world say to your paradoxes?"

"Sir," replied my son, "the learned world said nothing to my paradoxes; nothing at all, sir. Every man of them was employed in praising his friends and himself, or condemning his enemies; and unfortunately, as I had neither, I suffered the cruelest mortification, — neglect.

As I was meditating one day, in a coffee-house, on the fate of my paradoxes, a little man happening to enter the room, placed himself in the box before me; and after some preliminary discourse, finding me to be a scholar, drew out a bundle of proposals, begging me to subscribe to a new edition he was going to give to the world of Propertius, with notes. This demand necessarily produced a reply that I had no money; and that concession led him to inquire into the nature of my expectations. Finding that my expectations were just as great as my purse, "I see,' cried he, 'you are unacquainted with the town. I'll teach you a part of it. Look at these proposals; upon these very proposals I have subsisted very comfortably for twelve years. The moment a nobleman returns from his travels, a Creolian arrives from Jamaica, or a dowager from her country-seat, I strike for a subscription. I first besiege their hearts with flattery, and then pour in my proposals at the breach. If they subscribe readily the first time, I renew my request to beg a dedication fee; if they let me have that, I smite them once more for engraving their coat of arms at the top. Thus,' continued he, 'I live by vanity, and laugh at it. But, between ourselves, I am now too well known; I should be glad to borrow your face a bit; a nobleman of distinction has just returned from Italy; my face is familiar to his porter; but if you bring this copy of verses, my life for it you succeed, and we divide the spoil."

"Bless us, George," cried I, "and is this the employment of poets now? Do men of their exalted talents thus stoop to beggary? Can they so far disgrace their calling, as to make a vile traffic of praise for bread?"

"O no, sir," returned he; "a true poet can never be so base; for wherever there is genius there is pride. The creatures I now describe are only beggars in rhyme. The real poet, as he braves every hardship for fame, so is he equally a coward to contempt; and none but those who are unworthy protection condescend to solicit it.

"Having a mind too proud to stoop to such indignities, and yet a fortune too humble to hazard a second attempt for fame, I was now obliged to take a middle course, and write for bread. But I was unqualified for a profession where mere industry alone was to insure success. I could not suppress my lurking passion for applause; but usually consumed that time in efforts after excellence, which takes up but little room, when it should have been more advantageously employed in the diffusive productions of fruitful mediocrity. My little piece would therefore come forth in the midst of periodical publications, unnoticed and unknown. The public were more importantly employed than to observe the easy simplicity of my style, or the harmony of my periods. Sheet after sheet was thrown off to oblivion. My essays were buried among the essays upon liberty, Eastern tales, and cures for the bite of a mad dog; while Philautus, Philalethes, Phileleutheros, and Philanthropos all wrote better, because they wrote faster, than I.

"Now, therefore, I began to associate with none but disappointed authors like myself, who praised, deplored, and despised each other. The satisfaction we found in every celebrated writer's attempts was inversely as their merits. I found that no genius in another could please me. My unfortunate paradoxes had entirely dried up that source of comfort. I could neither read nor write with satisfaction; for excellence in another was my aversion, and writing was my trade.

"In the midst of these gloomy reflections, as I was one day sitting on a bench in St. James's Park, a young gentleman of distinction, who had been my intimate acquaintance at the university, approached me. We saluted each other with some hesitation, — he almost ashamed of being known to one who made so shabby an appearance, and I afraid of a repulse. But my suspicions soon vanished; for Ned Thornhill was at the bottom a very good-natured fellow."

"What did you say, George?" interrupted I. — "Thornhill! was not that his name? It can certainly be no other than my landlord." — "Bless me!" cried Mrs. Arnold, "is Mr. Thornhill so near a neighbor of yours? He has long been a friend in our family, and we expect a visit from him shortly."

"My friend's first care," continued my son, "was to alter my appearance by a very fine suit of his own clothes, and then I was admitted to his table upon the footing of half friend, half underling. My business was to attend him at auctions, to put him in spirits when he sat for his picture, to take the left hand in his chariot when not filled by another, and to assist at tattering a kip, as the phrase was, when he had a mind for a frolic. Beside this, I had twenty other little employments in the family. I was to do many small things without bidding; to carry the corkscrew; to stand god-father to all the butler's children; to sing when I was bid; to be never out of humor; always to be humble; and, if I could, to be very happy.

"In this honorable post, however, I was not without a rival. A captain of marines, who was formed for the place by nature, opposed me in my patron's affections. His mother had been laundress to a man of quality, and thus he early acquired a taste for pimping and pedigree. As this gentleman made it the study of his life to be acquainted with lords, though he was dismissed from several for his stupidity, yet he found many of them, who were as dull as himself, that permitted his assiduities. As flattery was his trade, he practised it with the easiest address imaginable; but it came awkward and stiff from me; and as every day my patron's desire of flattery increased, so every hour, being better acquainted with his defects, I became more unwilling to give it. Thus I was once more fairly going to give up the field to the captain, when my friend found occasion for my assistance. This was nothing less than to fight a duel for him with a gentleman, whose sister it was pretended he had used ill. I readily complied with his request, and though I see you are displeased at my conduct, yet, as it was a debt indispensably due to friendship, I could not refuse. I undertook the affair, disarmed my antagonist, and soon after had the pleasure of finding that the lady was only a woman of the town, and the fellow her bully and a sharper. This piece of service was repaid with the warmest professions of gratitude; but as my friend was to leave town in a few days, he knew no other method of serving me but by recommending me to his uncle, Sir William Thornhill, and another nobleman of great distinction, who enjoyed a post under government. When he was gone, my first care was to carry his recommendatory letter to his uncle, a man whose character for every virtue was universal, yet just. I was received by his servants with the most hospitable smiles; for the looks of the domestics ever transmit their master's benevolence. Being shown into a grand apartment, where Sir William soon came to me, I delivered my message and letter, which he read, and after pausing some minutes, 'Pray, sir,' cried he, 'inform me what you have done for my kinsman, to deserve this warm recommendation. But I suppose, sir, I guess your merits; you have fought for him; and so you would expect a reward from me for being the instrument of his vices? I wish, sincerely wish, that my present refusal may be some punishment for your guilt; but still more that it may be some inducement to your repentance.' The severity of this rebuke I bore patiently, because I knew it was just. My whole expectations now, therefore, lay in my letter to the great man. As the doors of the nobility are almost ever beset with beggars, all ready to thrust in some sly petition, I found it no easy matter to gain admittance. However, after bribing the servants with half my worldly fortune, I was at last shown into a spacious apartment, my letter being previously sent up for his lordship's inspection. During this anxious interval, I had full time to look around me. Everything was grand, and of happy contrivance; the paintings, the furniture, the gildings, petrified me with awe, and raised my idea of the owner. Ah, thought I to myself, how very great must the possessor of all these things be, who carries in his head the business of the state, and whose house displays half the wealth of a kingdom; sure his genius must be unfathomable! During these awful reflections, I heard a step come heavily forward. Ah, this is the great man himself! No, it was only a chambermaid. Another foot was heard soon after. This must be he! No, it was only the great man's valet-de-chambre. At last his lordship actually made his appearance. 'Are you,' cried he, 'the bearer of this here letter?' I answered with a bow. 'I learn by this,' continued he, 'as how that—' But just at that instant a servant delivered him a card; and without taking further notice, he went out of the room, and left me to digest my own happiness at leisure. I saw no more of him, till told by a footman that his lordship was going to his coach at the door. Down I immediately followed, and joined my voice to that of three or four more, who came like me to petition for favors. His lordship, however, went too fast for us, and was gaining his chariot-door with large strides, when I halloed out to know if I was to have any reply. He was by this time got in, and muttered an answer, half of which I only heard, the other half was lost in the rattling of his chariot-wheels. I stood for some time with my neck stretched out, in the posture of one that was listening to catch the glorious sounds, till, looking round me, I found myself alone at his lordship's gate.

"My patience," continued my son, "was now quite exhausted. Stung with the thousand indignities I had met with, I was willing to cast myself away, and only wanted the gulf to receive me. I regarded myself as one of those vile things that Nature designed should be thrown by into her lumber-room, there to perish in obscurity. I had still, however, half a guinea left, and of that I thought Fortune herself should not deprive me; but, in order to be sure of this, I was resolved to go instantly and spend it while I had it, and then trust to occurrences for the rest. As I was going along with this resolution, it happened that Mr. Crispe's office seemed invitingly open to give me a welcome reception. In this office Mr. Crispe kindly offers all his Majesty's subjects a generous promise of £30 a year, for which promise all they give in return is their liberty for life, and permission to let him transport them to America as slaves. I was happy at finding a place where I could lose my fears in desperation, and entered this cell, for it had the appearance of one, with the devotion of a monastic. Here I found a number of poor creatures all in circumstances like myself, expecting the arrival of Mr. Crispe, presenting a true epitome of English impatience. Each untractable soul at variance with Fortune, wreaked her injuries on their own hearts; but Mr. Crispe at last came down, and all our murmurs were hushed. He deigned to regard me with an air of peculiar approbation, and indeed he was the first man who for a month past talked to me with smiles. After a few questions he found I was fit for everything in the world. He paused awhile upon the properest means of providing for me, and, slapping his forehead, as if he had found it, assured me that there was at that time an embassy talked of from the synod of Pennsylvania to the Chickasaw Indians, and that he would use his interest to get me made secretary. I knew in my own heart the fellow lied, and yet his promise gave me pleasure, there was something so magnificent in the sound. I fairly, therefore, divided my half-guinea, one half of which went to be added to his thirty thousand pounds, and with the other half I resolved to go to the next tavern, to be there more happy than he.

"As I was going out with that resolution, I was met at the door by the captain of a ship, with whom I had formerly some little acquaintance, and he agreed to be my companion over a bowl of punch. As I never chose to make a secret of my circumstances, he assured me that I was on the very point of ruin, in listening to the office-keeper's promises; for that he only designed to sell me to the plantations. 'But,' continued he, 'I fancy you might by a much shorter voyage be very easily put into a genteel way of bread. Take my advice. My ship sails to-morrow for Amsterdam; what if you go in her as a passenger? The moment you land, all you have to do is to teach the Dutchmen English, and I warrant you'll get pupils and money enough. I suppose you understand English,' added he, 'by this time, or the deuce is in it.' I confidently assured him of that, but expressed a doubt whether the Dutch would be willing to learn English. He affirmed, with an oath, that they were fond of it to distraction; and upon that affirmation I agreed with his proposal, and embarked the next day to teach the Dutch English in Holland. The wind was fair, our voyage short, and after having paid my passage with half my movables, I found myself, as fallen from the skies, a stranger in one of the principal streets of Amsterdam. In this situation I was unwilling to let any time pass unemployed in teaching. I addressed myself, therefore, to two or three of those I met, whose appearance seemed most promising; but it was impossible to make ourselves mutually understood. It was not till this very moment I recollected that in order to teach Dutchmen English, it was necessary that they should first teach me Dutch. How I came to overlook so obvious an objection is to me amazing; but certain it is I overlooked it.

"This scheme thus blown up, I had some thoughts of fairly shipping back to England again; but, dropping into company with an Irish student who was returning from Louvain, our conversation turned upon topics of literature (for, by the way, it may be observed that I always forgot the meanness of my circumstances when I could converse on such subjects); from him I learned that there were not two men in his whole university who understood Greek. This amazed me; I instantly resolved to travel to Louvain and there live by teaching Greek: and in this design I was heartened by my brother student, who threw out some hints that a fortune might be got by it.

"I set boldly forward the next morning. Every day lessened the burden of my movables, like Æsop and his basket of bread; for I paid them for my lodgings to the Dutch as I travelled on. When I came to Louvain, I was resolved not to go sneaking to the lower professors, but openly tendered my talents to the principal himself. I went, had admittance, and offered him my service as a master of the Greek language, which I had been told was a desideratum in his university. The principal seemed, at first, to doubt my abilities; but of these I offered to convince him, by turning a part of any Greek author he should fix upon into Latin. Finding me perfectly earnest in my proposal, he addressed me thus: 'You see me, young man; I never learned Greek, and I don't find that I have ever missed it. I have had doctor's cap and gown without Greek; I have ten thousand florins a year without Greek; I eat heartily without Greek; and, in short,' continued he, 'as I don't know Greek, I do not believe there is any good in it.'

"I was now too far from home to think of returning, so I resolved to go forward. I had some knowledge of music, with a tolerable voice; and I now turned what was once my amusement into a present means of subsistence. I passed among the harmless peasants of Flanders, and among such of the French as were poor enough to be very merry; for I ever found them sprightly in proportion to their wants. Whenever I approached a peasant's house toward nightfall, I played one of my most merry tunes, and that procured me not only a lodging, but subsistence for the next day. I once or twice attempted to play for people of fashion; but they always thought my performance odious, and never rewarded me even with a trifle. This was to me the more extraordinary, as, whenever I used in better days to play for company, when playing was my amusement, my music never failed to throw them into raptures, and the ladies especially; but, as it was now my only means, it was received with contempt,—a proof how ready the world is to underrate those talents by which a man is supported.

"In this manner I proceeded to Paris, with no design but just to look about me and then to go forward. The people of Paris are much fonder of strangers that have money than of those that have wit. As I could not boast much of either, I was no great favorite. After walking about the town for four or five days, and seeing the outsides of the best houses, I was preparing to leave this retreat of venal hospitality; when, passing through one of the principal streets, whom should I meet but our cousin, to whom you first recommended me! This meeting was very agreeable to me, and, I believe, not displeasing to him. He inquired into the nature of my journey to Paris, and informed me of his own business there, which was to collect pictures, medals, intaglios, and antiques of all kinds, for a gentleman in London, who had just stepped into taste and a large fortune. I was the more surprised at seeing our cousin pitched upon for this office, as he himself had often assured me he knew nothing of the matter. Upon asking how he had been taught the art of a connoscento so very suddenly, he assured me that nothing was more easy. The whole secret consisted in a strict adherence to two rules; the one, always to observe that the pictures might have been better if the painter had taken more pains; and the other, to praise the works of Pietro Perugino. 'But,' says he, 'as I once taught you how to be an author in London, I'll now undertake to instruct you in the art of picture-buying in Paris.'

"With this proposal I very readily closed, as it was living; and now all my ambition was to live. I went therefore to his lodgings, improving my dress by his assistance; and, after some time, accompanied him to auctions of pictures, where the English gentry were expected to be purchasers. I was not a little surprised with his intimacy with people of the best fashion, who referred themselves to his judgment upon every picture or medal, as an unerring standard of taste. He made very good use of my assistance upon these occasions; for, when asked his opinion, he would gravely take me aside and ask mine, shrug, look wise, return, and assure the company that he could give no opinion upon an affair of so much importance. Yet there was sometimes an occasion for a more supported assurance. I remember to have seen him, after giving his opinion that the coloring of a picture was not mellow enough, very deliberately take a brush with brown varnish that was accidentally by, and rub it over the piece with great composure before all the company, and then ask if he had not improved the tints.

"When he had finished his commission in Paris, he left me strongly recommended to several men of distinction as a person very proper for a travelling tutor; and after some time I was employed in that capacity by a gentleman who brought his ward to Paris, in order to set him forward on his tour through Europe. I was to be the young gentleman's governor, but with a proviso that he should always be permitted to govern himself. My pupil, in fact, understood the art of guiding in money concerns much better than I. He was heir to a fortune of about two hundred thousand pounds, left him by an uncle in the West Indies; and his guardians, to qualify him for the management of it, had bound him apprentice to an attorney. Thus avarice was his prevailing passion: all his questions on the road were, how much money might be saved; which was the least expensive course of travel; whether anything could be bought that would turn to account when disposed of again in London. Such curiosities on the way as could be seen for nothing he was ready enough to look at; but, if the sight of them was to be paid for, he usually asserted that he had been told they were not worth seeing. He never paid a bill that he would not observe how amazingly expensive travelling was; and all this, though he was not yet twenty-one. When arrived at Leghorn, as we took a walk to look at the port and shipping, he inquired the expense of the passage by sea home to England. This he was informed was but a trifle compared to his returning by land: he was therefore unable to withstand the temptation; so, paying me the small part of my salary that was due, he took leave, and embarked with only one attendant for London.

"I now therefore was left once more upon the world at large; but then it was a thing I was used to. However, my skill in music could avail me nothing in a country where every peasant was a better musician than I; but, by this time I had acquired another talent, which answered my purpose as well, and this was a skill in disputation. In all the foreign universities and convents there are, upon certain days, philosophical theses maintained against every adventitious disputant; for which, if the champion opposes with any dexterity, he can claim a gratuity in money, a dinner, and a bed for one night. In this manner, therefore, I fought my way toward England; walked along from city to city; examined mankind more nearly; and, if I may so express it, saw both sides of the picture. My remarks, however, are but few; I found that monarchy was the best government for the poor to live in, and commonwealths for the rich. I found that riches in general were in every country another name for freedom; and that no man is so fond of liberty himself as not to be desirous of subjecting the will of some individuals in society to his own.

"Upon my arrival in England, I resolved to pay my respects first to you, and then to enlist as a volunteer in the first expedition that was going forward; but, on my journey down, my resolutions were changed by meeting an old acquaintance, who, I found, belonged to a company of comedians that were going to make a summer campaign in the country. The company seemed not much to disapprove of me for an associate. They all, however, apprised me of the importance of the task at which I aimed; that the public was a many-headed monster, and that only such as had very good heads could please it; that acting was not to be learned in a day; and that without some traditional shrugs which had been on the stage, and only on the stage, these hundred years, I could never pretend to please. The next difficulty was in fitting me with parts, as almost every character was in keeping. I was driven for some time from one character to another, till at last Horatio was fixed upon, which the presence of the present company has happily hindered me from acting."

CHAPTER XXI.

THE SHORT CONTINUANCE OF FRIENDSHIP AMONG THE VICIOUS, WHICH IS COEVAL ONLY WITH MUTUAL SATISFACTION.

My son's account was too long to be delivered at once; the first part of it was begun that night, and he was concluding the rest after dinner the next day, when the appearance of Mr. Thornhill's equipage at the door seemed to make a pause in the general satisfaction. The butler, who was now become my friend in the family, informed me, with a whisper, that the squire had already made some overtures to Miss Wilmot, and that her aunt and uncle seemed highly to approve the match. Upon Mr. Thornhill's entering, he seemed, upon seeing my son and me, to start back; but I readily imputed that to surprise, and not displeasure. However, upon our advancing to salute him, he returned our greeting with the most apparent candor, and after a short time his presence seemed only to increase the general good-humor.

After tea he called me aside to inquire after my daughter; but upon my informing him that my inquiry was unsuccessful, he seemed greatly surprised, adding that he had been since frequently at my house, in order to comfort the rest of the family, whom he left perfectly well. He then asked if I had communicated her misfortune to Miss Wilmot or my son; and upon my replying that I had not told them as yet, he greatly approved my prudence and precaution, desiring me by all means to keep it a secret: "for at best," cried he, "it is but divulging one's own infamy; and perhaps Miss Livy may not be so guilty as we all imagine." We were here interrupted by a servant, who came to ask the squire in to stand up at country-dances; so that he left me quite pleased with the interest he seemed to take in my concerns. His addresses, however, to Miss Wilmot were too obvious to be mistaken; and yet she seemed not perfectly pleased, but bore them rather in compliance to the will of her aunt, than from real inclination. I had even the satisfaction to see her lavish some kind looks upon my unfortunate son, which the other could neither extort by his fortune nor assiduity. Mr. Thornhill's seeming composure, however, not a little surprised me. We had now continued here a week at the pressing instances of Mr. Arnold; but each day the more tenderness Miss Wilmot showed my son, Mr. Thornhill's friendship seemed proportionably to increase for him.

He had formerly made us the most kind assurances of using his interest to serve the family, but now his generosity was not confined to promises alone. The morning I designed for my departure Mr. Thornhill came to me with looks of real pleasure, to inform me of a piece of service he had done for his friend George. This was nothing less than his having procured him an ensign's commission in one of the regiments that were going to the West Indies, for which he had promised but one hundred pounds, his interest having been sufficient to get an abatement of the other two: "As for this trifling piece of service," continued the young gentleman, "I desire no other reward but the pleasure of having served my friend; and as for the hundred pounds to be paid, if you are unable to raise it yourselves, I will advance it, and you shall repay me at your leisure." This was a favor we wanted words to express our sense of: I readily, therefore, gave my bond for the money, and testified as much gratitude as if I never intended to pay.

George was to depart for town the next day to secure his commission, in pursuance of his generous patron's directions, who judged it highly expedient to use despatch, lest in the mean time another should step in with more advantageous proposals. The next morning, therefore, our young soldier was early prepared for his departure, and seemed the only person among us that was not affected by it. Neither the fatigues and dangers he was going to encounter, nor the friends and mistress (for Miss Wilmot actually loved him) he was leaving behind, any way damped his spirits. After he had taken leave of the rest of the company, I gave him all that I had, — my blessing: "And now, my boy," cried I, "thou art going to fight for thy country, remember how thy brave grandfather fought for his sacred king, when loyalty among Britons was a virtue.

Go, my boy, and imitate him in all but his misfortunes, if it was a misfortune to die with Lord Falkland. Go, my boy, and if you fall, though distant, exposed, and unwept by those that love you, the most precious tears are those with which Heaven bedews the unburied head of a soldier."

The next morning I took leave of the good family that had been kind enough to entertain me so long, not without several expressions of gratitude to Mr. Thornhill for his late bounty. I left them in the enjoyment of all that happiness which affluence and good-breeding procure, and returned toward home, despairing of ever finding my daughter more, but sending a sigh to Heaven to spare and forgive her. I was now come within about twenty miles of home, having hired a horse to carry me, as I was yet but weak, and comforted myself with the hopes of soon seeing all I held dearest upon earth. But the night coming on, I put up at a little public-house by the roadside, and asked for the landlord's company over a pint of wine. We sat beside his kitchen fire, which was the best room in the house, and chatted on politics and the news of the country. We happened, among other topics, to talk of young Squire Thornhill, who, the host assured me, was hated as much as his uncle, Sir William, who sometimes came down to the country, was loved. He went on to observe that he made it his whole study to betray the daughters of such as received him to their houses, and, after a fortnight or three weeks' possession, turned them out unrewarded and abandoned to the world. As we continued our discourse in this manner, his wife, who had been out to get change, returned. and perceiving that her husband was enjoying a pleasure in which she was not a sharer, she asked him in an angry tone what he did there; to which he only replied, in an ironical way, by drinking her health. "Mr. Symonds," cried she, "you use me very ill, and I'll bear it no longer. Here three parts of the business is left for me to do, and the fourth left unfinished, while you do nothing but soak with the guests all day long; whereas, if a spoonful of liquor were to cure me of a fever, I never touch a drop." I now found what she would be at, and immediately poured out a glass, which she received with a courtesy, and, drinking toward my good health,— "Sir," continued she, "it is not so much for the value of the liquor I am angry, but one cannot help it when the house is going out of the windows. If the customers or guests are to be dunned, all the burden lies upon my back; he'd as lief eat that glass as budge after them himself. There now, above stairs, we have a young woman who has come to take up her lodgings here, and I don't believe she has got any money, by her over-civility. I am certain she is very slow of payment, and I wish she were put in mind of it."— "What signifies minding her," cried the host; "if she be slow, she is sure."— "I don't know that," replied the wife; "but I know that I am sure she has been here a fortnight, and we have not yet seen the cross of her money."— "I suppose, my dear," cried he, "we shall have it all in a lump."— "In a lump!" cried the other, "I hope we may get it any way; and that I am resolved we will this very night, or out she tramps, bag and baggage."— "Consider, my dear," cried the husband, "she is a gentlewoman, and deserves more respect."— "As for the matter of that," returned the hostess, "gentle or simple, out she shall pack with a sassarara. Gentry may be good things where they take; but for my part I never saw much good of them at the sign of the Harrow." Thus saying, she ran up a narrow flight of stairs that went from the kitchen to a room overhead, and I soon perceived by the loudness of her voice and the bitterness of her reproaches that no money was to be had from her lodger. I could hear her remonstrances very distinctly: "Out, I say, pack out this moment! Tramp, thou infamous strumpet, or I'll give thee a mark thou won't be the better for these three months. What! you trumpery, to come and take up an honest house without cross or coin to bless yourself with, come along, I say!"— "O dear madam," cried the stranger, "pity me, pity a poor, abandoned creature for one night, and death will soon do the rest." I instantly knew the voice of my poor ruined child, Olivia. I flew to her rescue, while the woman was dragging her along by the hair, and I caught the dear, forlorn wretch in my arms. "Welcome, any way welcome, my dearest lost one, my treasure, to your poor old father's bosom. Though the vicious forsake thee, there is yet one in the world that will never forsake thee; though thou hast ten thousand crimes to answer for, he will forgive them all." — "O my own dear," — for minutes she could say no more, — "my own dearest, good papa! Could angels be kinder? How do I deserve so much? The villain, I hate him; and myself, to be a reproach to such goodness. You can't forgive me; I know you cannot." — "Yes, my child, from my heart I do forgive thee: only repent, and we both shall yet be happy. We shall see many pleasant days yet, my Olivia." — "Ah, never, sir, never! The rest of my wretched life must be infamy abroad and shame at home. But alas! papa, you look much paler than you used to do. Could such a thing as I am give you so much uneasiness? Surely, you have too much wisdom to take the miseries of my guilt upon yourself." — "Our wisdom, young woman," replied I, — "Ah, why so cold a name, papa?" cried she. "This is the first time you ever called me by so cold a name." — "I ask pardon, my darling," returned I; "but I was going to observe that wisdom makes but a slow defence against trouble, though at last a sure one."

The landlady now returned to know if we did not choose a more genteel apartment; to which assenting, we were shown to a room where we could converse more freely. After we had talked ourselves into some degree of tranquillity, I could not avoid desiring some account of the gradations that led to her present wretched situation. "That villain, sir," said she, "from the first day of our meeting, made me honorable, though private, proposals."

"Villain, indeed," cried I; "and yet it in some measure surprises me how a person of Mr. Burchell's good sense and seeming honor could be guilty of such deliberate baseness, and thus step into a family to undo it."

"My dear papa," returned my daughter, "you labor under a strange mistake. Mr. Burchell never attempted to deceive me. Instead of that, he took every opportunity of privately admonishing me against the artifices of Mr. Thornhill, who, I now find, was even worse than he represented him." — "Mr. Thornhill!" interrupted I, "can it be?" — "Yes, sir," returned she, "it was Mr. Thornhill who seduced me; who employed the two ladies, as he called them, but who, in fact, were abandoned women of the town, without breeding or pity, to decoy us up to London. Their artifices, you may remember, would have certainly succeeded but for Mr. Burchell's letter, who directed those reproaches at them which we all applied to ourselves. How he came to have so much influence as to defeat their intentions still remains a secret to me; but I am convinced he was ever our warmest, sincerest friend."

"You amaze me, my dear," cried I; "but now I find my first suspicions of Mr. Thornhill's baseness were too well grounded: but he can triumph in security; for he is rich, and we are poor. But tell me, my child; sure it was no small temptation that could thus obliterate all the impressions of such an education and so virtuous a disposition as thine."

"Indeed, sir," replied she, "he owes all his triumph to the desire I had of making him, and not myself, happy. I knew that the ceremony of our marriage, which was privately performed by a Popish priest, was no way binding, and that I had nothing to trust to but his honor!" — "What!" interrupted I, "and were you indeed married by a priest in orders?" — "Indeed, sir, we were," replied she, "though we were both sworn to conceal his name." — "Why, then, my child, come to my arms again; and now you are a thousand times more welcome than before; for you are his wife to all intents and purposes; nor can all the laws of man, though written upon tables of adamant, lessen the force of that sacred connection."

"Alas! papa," replied she, "you are but little acquainted with his villanies: he has been married already by the same priest to six or eight wives more, whom, like me, he has deceived and abandoned."

"Has he so?" cried I. "Then we must hang the priest, and you shall inform against him to-morrow." — "But, sir," returned she, "will that be right when I am sworn to secrecy?" — "My dear," I replied, "if you have made such a promise, I cannot, nor will I, tempt you to break it. Even though it may benefit the public, you must not inform against him. In all human institutions a smaller evil is allowed to procure a greater good; as, in politics, a province may be given away to secure a kingdom; in medicine, a limb may be lopped off to preserve the body. But in religion the law is written, and inflexible, never to do evil. And this law, my child, is right; for otherwise, if we commit a smaller evil to procure a greater good, certain guilt would be thus incurred in expectation of contingent advantage. And though the advantage should certainly follow, yet the interval between commission and advantage, which is allowed to be guilty, may be that in which we are called away to answer for the things we have done, and the volume of human actions is closed forever. But I interrupt you, my dear; go on."

"The very next morning," continued she, "I found what little expectation I was to have from his sincerity. That very morning he introduced me to two unhappy women more, whom, like me, he had deceived, but who lived in contented prostitution. I loved him too tenderly to bear such rivals in his affections, and strove to forget my infamy in a tumult of pleasures. With this view I danced, dressed, and talked; but still was unhappy. The gentlemen who visited me there told me every moment of the power of my charms, and this only contributed to increase my melancholy, as I had thrown all their power quite away. Thus each day I grew more pensive and he more insolent, till at last the monster had the assurance to offer me to a young baronet of his acquaintance. Need I describe, sir, how his ingratitude stung me? My answer to this proposal was almost madness. I desired to part. I was going; he offered me a purse, but I flung it at him with indignation, and burst from him in a rage that for a while kept me insensible of the miseries of my situation. But I soon looked round me and saw myself a vile, abject, guilty thing, without one friend in the world to apply to. Just at that interval, a stage-coach happening to pass by, I took a place, it being my only aim to be driven at a distance from a wretch I despised and detested. I was set down here, where, since my arrival, my own anxiety and this woman's unkindness have been my only companions. The hours of pleasure that I have passed with my mamma and sister now grow painful to me. Their sorrows are much, but mine are greater than theirs; for mine are mixed with guilt and infamy."

"Have patience, my child," cried I, "and I hope things will yet be better. Take some repose to-night, and to-morrow I'll carry you home to your mother and the rest of the family, from whom you will receive a kind reception. Poor woman! this has gone to her heart; but she loves you still, Olivia, and will forget it."

CHAPTER XXII.

OFFENCES ARE EASILY PARDONED WHERE THERE IS LOVE AT BOTTOM.

The next morning I took my daughter behind me, and set out on my return home. As we travelled along, I strove by every persuasion to calm her sorrows and fears, and to arm her with resolution to bear the presence of her offended mother. I took every opportunity, from the prospect of a fine country, through which we passed, to observe how much kinder Heaven was to us than we to each other; and that the misfortunes of nature's making were but very few. I assured her that she should never perceive any change in my affections, and that during my life, which yet might be long, she might depend upon a guardian and an instructor. I armed her against the censure of the world, showed her that books were sweet unreproaching companions to the miserable, and that if they could not bring us to enjoy life, they would at least teach us to endure it.

The hired horse that we rode was to be put up that night at an inn by the way, within about five miles from my house; and as I was willing to prepare my family for my daughter's reception, I determined to leave her that night at the inn, and to return for her, accompanied by my daughter Sophia, early the next morning. It was night before we reached our appointed stage: however, after seeing her provided with a decent apartment, and having ordered the hostess to prepare proper refreshments, I kissed her, and proceeded toward home. And now my heart caught new sensations of pleasure, the nearer I approached that peaceful mansion. As a bird that had been frightened from its nest, my affections outwent my haste, and hovered round my little fireside with all the rapture of expectation. I called up the many fond things I had to say, and anticipated the welcome I was to receive. I already felt my wife's tender embrace, and smiled at the joy of my little ones. As I walked but slowly, the night waned apace; the laborers of the day were all retired to rest; the lights were out in every cottage; no sounds were heard but of the shrilling cock, and the deep-mouthed watch-dog, at hollow distance. I approached my little abode of pleasure, and before I was within a furlong of the place, our honest mastiff came running to welcome me.

It was now near midnight that I came to knock at my door: all was still and silent, my heart dilated with unutterable happiness, when, to my amazement, I saw the house bursting out into a blaze of fire, and every aperture red with conflagration! I gave a loud, convulsive outcry, and fell upon the pavement insensible. This alarmed my son, who had, till this, been asleep, and he, perceiving the flames, instantly awaked my wife and daughter, and all running out, naked, and wild with apprehension, recalled me to life with their anguish. But it was only to objects of new terror, for the flames had by this time caught the roof of our dwelling, part after part continuing to fall in, while the family stood with silent agony looking on, as if they enjoyed the blaze. I gazed upon them and upon it by turns, and then looked around me for my two little ones; but they were not to be seen. "O misery! where," cried I, "where are my little ones?"—"They are burnt to death in the flames," said my wife, calmly, "and I will die with them." That moment I heard the cry of the babes within, who were just awaked by the fire, and nothing could have stopped me. "Where, where are my children?" cried I, rushing through the flames, and bursting the door of the chamber in which they were confined. "Where are my little ones?"—"Here, dear papa, here we are!" cried they together, while the flames were just catching the bed where they lay. I caught them both in my arms, and conveyed them through the fire as fast as possible, while, just as I was going out, the roof sunk in. "Now," cried I, holding up my children, "now let the flames burn on, and all my possessions perish; here they are,—I have saved my treasures: here, my dearest, here are our treasures, and we shall yet be happy." We kissed our little darlings a thousand times; they clasped us round the neck, and seemed to share our transports, while their mother laughed and wept by turns.

I now stood a calm spectator of the flames, and after some time began to perceive that my arm to the shoulder was scorched in a terrible manner. It was therefore out of my power to give my son any assistance, either in attempting to save our goods or preventing the flames spreading to our corn. By this time the neighbors were alarmed, and came running to our assistance; but all they could do was to stand, like us, spectators of the calamity. My goods, among which were the notes I had reserved for my daughters' fortunes, were entirely consumed, except a box with some papers that stood in the kitchen, and two or three things more of little consequence, which my son brought away in the beginning. The neighbors contributed, however, what they could to lighten our distress. They brought us clothes and furnished one of our out-houses with kitchen utensils; so that by daylight we had another, though a wretched dwelling, to retire to. My honest next neighbor and his children were not the least assiduous in providing us with everything necessary, and offering whatever consolation untutored benevolence could suggest.

When the fears of my family had subsided, curiosity to know the cause of my long stay began to take place; having, therefore, informed them of every particular, I proceeded to prepare them for the reception of our lost one; and though we had nothing but wretchedness now to impart, I was willing to procure her a welcome to what we had; this task would have been more difficult but for our recent calamity, which had humbled my wife's pride and blunted it by more poignant afflictions. Being unable to go for my poor child myself, as my arm grew very painful, I sent my son and daughter, who soon returned, supporting the wretched delinquent, who had not the courage to look up at her mother, whom no instructions of mine could persuade to a perfect reconciliation; for women have a much stronger sense of female error than men. "Ah, madam!" cried her mother, "this is but a poor place you have come to after so much finery. My daughter Sophy and I can afford but little entertainment to persons who have kept company only with people of distinction: yes, Miss Livy, your poor father and I have suffered very much of late; but I hope Heaven will forgive you." During this reception the unhappy victim stood pale and trembling, unable to weep or to reply; but I could not continue a silent spectator of her distress; wherefore, assuming a degree of severity in my voice and manner which was ever followed with instant submission. "I entreat, woman, that my words may be now marked once for all. I have here brought you back a poor deluded wanderer; her return to duty demands the revival of our tenderness. The real hardships of life are now coming fast upon us; let us not, therefore, increase them by dissensions among each other; if we live harmoniously together, we may yet be contented, as there are enough of us to shut out the censuring world and keep each other in countenance. The kindness of Heaven is promised to the penitent, and let ours be directed by the example. Heaven, we are assured, is much more pleased to view a repentant sinner than ninety-nine persons who have supported a course of undeviating rectitude. And this is right; for that single effort by which we stop short in the downhill path to perdition is of itself a greater exertion of virtue than a hundred acts of justice."

CHAPTER XXIII.

NONE BUT THE GUILTY CAN BE LONG AND COMPLETELY MISERABLE.

Some assiduity was now required to make our present abode as convenient as possible, and we were soon again qualified to enjoy our former serenity. Being disabled myself from assisting my son in our usual occupations, I read to my family from the few books that were saved, and particularly from such as, by amusing the imagination, contributed to ease the heart. Our good neighbors, too, came every day with the kindest condolence, and fixed a time in which they were all to assist in repairing my former dwelling. Honest Farmer Williams was not last among these visitors, but heartily offered his friendship. He would even have renewed his addresses to my daughter; but she rejected them in such a manner as totally repressed his future solicitations. Her grief seemed formed for continuing, and she was the only person in our little society that a week did not restore to cheerfulness. She now lost that unblushing innocence which once taught her to respect herself and to seek pleasure by pleasing. Anxiety had now taken strong possession of her mind; her beauty began to be impaired with her constitution, and neglect still more contributed to diminish it. Every tender epithet bestowed on her sister brought a pang to her heart and a tear to her eye; and, as one vice, though cured, ever plants others where it has been, so her former guilt, though driven out by repentance, left jealousy and envy behind. I strove a thousand ways to lessen her care, and even forgot my own pain in a concern for hers, collecting such amusing passages of history as a strong memory and some reading could suggest. "Our happiness, my dear," I would say, "is in the power of One who can bring it about a thousand unforeseen ways that mock our foresight. If example be necessary to prove this, I 'll give you a story, my child, told us by a grave, though sometimes a romancing historian.

"Matilda was married very young to a Neapolitan nobleman of the first quality, and found herself a widow and a mother at the age of fifteen. As she stood one day caressing her infant son in the open window of an apartment which hung over the river Volturna, the child, with a sudden spring, leaped from her arms into the flood below, and disappeared in a moment. The mother struck with instant surprise, and making an effort to save him, plunged in after; but, far from being able to assist the infant, she herself with great difficulty escaped to the opposite shore, just when some French soldiers were plundering the country on that side, who immediately made her their prisoner.

"As the war was then carried on between the French and Italians with the utmost inhumanity, they were going at once to perpetrate those two extremes suggested by appetite and cruelty. This base resolution, however, was opposed by a young officer, who, though his retreat required the utmost expedition, placed her behind him, and brought her in safety to his native city. Her beauty at first caught his eye; her merit, soon after, his heart. They were married; he rose to the highest posts; they lived long together, and were happy. But the felicity of a soldier can never be called permanent; after an interval of several years, the troops which he commanded having met with a repulse, he was obliged to take shelter in the city where he had lived with his wife. Here they suffered a siege, and the city at length was taken. Few histories can produce more various instances of cruelty than those which the French and Italians at that time exercised upon each other. It was resolved by the victors upon this occasion to put all the French prisoners to death; but particularly the husband of the unfortunate Matilda, as he was principally instrumental in protracting the siege. Their determinations were, in general, executed almost as soon as resolved upon. The captive soldier was led forth, and the executioner, with his sword, stood ready, while the spectators, in gloomy silence, awaited the fatal blow, which was only suspended till the general, who presided as judge, should give the signal. It was in this interval of anguish and expectation that Matilda came to take the last farewell of her husband and deliverer, deploring her wretched situation, and the cruelty of fate that had saved her from perishing by a premature death in the river Volturna, to be the spectator of still greater calamities. The general, who was a young man, was struck with surprise at her beauty and pity at her distress; but with still stronger emotions when he heard her mention her former dangers He was her son, the infant for whom she had encountered so much danger; he acknowledged her at once as his mother, and fell at her feet. The rest may be easily supposed; the captive was set free, and all the happiness that love, friendship, and duty could confer on earth were united."

In this manner I would attempt to amuse my daughter; but she listened with divided attention; for her own misfortunes engrossed all the pity she once had for those of another, and nothing gave her ease. In company she dreaded contempt, and in solitude she only found anxiety. Such was the color of her wretchedness, when we received certain information that Mr. Thornhill was going to be married to Miss Wilmot, for whom I always suspected he had a real passion, though he took every opportunity before me to express his contempt both of her person and fortune. This news served only to increase poor Olivia's affliction; for such a flagrant breach of fidelity was more than her courage could support. I was resolved, however, to get more certain information, and to defeat, if possible, the completion of his designs, by sending my son to old Wilmot's, with instructions to know the truth of the report, and to deliver Miss Wilmot a letter, intimating Mr. Thornhill's conduct in my family. My son went in pursuance of my directions, and in three days returned, assuring us of the truth of the account; but that he had found it impossible to deliver the letter, which he was therefore obliged to leave, as Mr. Thornhill and Miss Wilmot were visiting round the country. They were to be married, he said, in a few days, having appeared together at church the Sunday before he was there in great splendor, the bride attended by six young ladies and he by as many gentlemen. Their approaching nuptials filled the whole country with rejoicing, and they usually rode out together in the grandest equipage that had been seen in the country for many years. All the friends of both families, he said, were there, particularly the squire's uncle, Sir William, who bore so good a character. He added that nothing but mirth and feasting were going forward; that all the country praised the young bride's beauty and the bridegroom's fine person, and that they were immensely fond of each other; concluding, that he could not help thinking Mr. Thornhill one of the most happy men in the world.

"Why, let him, if he can," returned I; "but, my son, observe this bed of straw and unsheltering roof; those moulderng walls and humid floor; my wretched body, thus disabled by fire, and my children weeping round me for bread: you have come home, my child, to all this; yet here, even here, you see a man that would not for a thousand worlds exchange situations. O my children, if you could but learn to commune with your own hearts, and know what noble company you can make them, you would little regard the elegance and splendor of the worthless. Almost all men have been taught to call life a passage and themselves the travellers The similitude still may be improved, when we observe that the good are joyful and serene, like travellers that are going toward home, the wicked but by intervals happy, like travellers that are going into exile"

My compassion for my poor daughter, overpowered by this new disaster, interrupted what I had further to observe. I bade her mother support her, and after a short time she recovered She appeared from that time more calm, and I imagined had gained a new degree of resolution, but appearances deceived me, for her tranquillity was the languor of overwrought resentment. A supply of provisions, charitably sent us by my kind parishioners, seemed to diffuse new cheerfulness among the rest of my family, nor was I displeased at seeing them once more sprightly and at ease. It would have been unjust to damp their satisfaction, merely to condole with resolute melancholy, or to burden them with a sadness they did not feel Thus, once more, the tale went round and a song was demanded, and cheerfulness condescended to hover round our little habitation.

CHAPTER XXIV.

FRESH CALAMITIES.

THE next morning the sun arose with peculiar warmth for the season, so that we agreed to breakfast together on the honeysuckle bank, where, while we sat, my youngest daughter, at my request, joined her voice to the concert on the trees about us It was in this place my poor Olivia first met her seducer, and every object served to recall her sadness. But that melancholy which is excited by objects of pleasure or inspired by sounds of harmony soothes the heart instead of corroding it. Her mother, too, upon this occasion, felt a pleasing distress, and wept, and loved her daughter as before. "Do, my pretty Olivia," cried she, "let us have that little melancholy air your papa was so fond of; your sister Sophy has already obliged us. Do, child; it will please your old father." She complied in a manner so exquisitely pathetic as moved me.—

When lovely woman stoops to folly,
And finds, too late, that men betray,
What charm can soothe her melancholy?
What art can wash her guilt away?

The only art her guilt to cover,
To hide her shame from every eye,
To give repentance to her lover,
And wring his bosom, is — to die.

As she was concluding the last stanza, to which an interruption in her voice, from sorrow, gave peculiar softness, the appearance of Mr Thornhill's equipage at a distance alarmed us all, but particularly increased the uneasiness of my eldest daughter, who, desirous of shunning her betrayer, returned to the house with her sister In a few minutes he was alighted from his chariot, and making up to the place where I was still sitting, inquired after my health with his usual air of familiarity. "Sir," replied I, "your present assurance only serves to aggravate the baseness of your character; and there was a time when I would have chastised your insolence for presuming thus to appear before me. But now you are safe; for age has cooled my passions, and my calling restrains them"

"I vow, my dear sir," returned he, "I am amazed at all this, nor can I understand what it means! I hope you do not think your daughter's late excursion with me had anything criminal in it"

"Go," cried I, "thou art a wretch, a poor pitiful wretch, and every way a liar; but your meanness secures you from my anger! Yet, sir, I am descended from a family that would not have borne this! And so, thou vile thing, to gratify a momentary passion thou hast made one poor creature wretched for life, and polluted a family that had nothing but honor for their portion"

"If she or you," returned he, "are resolved to be miserable, I cannot help it. But you may still be happy, and whatever opinion you may have formed of me, you shall ever find me ready to contribute it. We can marry her to another in a short time, and, what is more, she may keep her lover beside, for I protest I shall ever continue to have a true regard for her."

I found all my passions alarmed at this new degrading proposal; for though the mind may often be calm under great injuries, little villany can at any time get within the soul and sting it into rage "Avoid my sight, thou reptile," cried I, "nor continue to insult me with thy presence Were my brave son at home he would not suffer this, but I am old and disabled, and every way undone"

"I find," cried he, "you are bent upon obliging me to talk in a harsher manner than I intended But, as I have shown you what may be hoped from my friendship, it may not be improper to represent what may be the consequence of my resentment My attorney, to whom your late bond has been transferred, threatens hard, nor do I know how to prevent the course of justice, except by paying the money myself, which, as I have been at some expenses lately previous to my intended marriage, is not so easy to be done And then my steward talks of driving for the rent, it is certain he knows his duty, for I never trouble myself with affairs of that nature Yet still I could wish to serve you, and even to have you and your daughter present at my marriage, which is shortly to be solemnized with Miss Wilmot, it is even the request of my charming Arabella herself, whom I hope you will not refuse"

"Mr. Thornhill," replied I, "hear me once for all as to your marriage with any but my daughter, that I never will consent to and though your friendship could raise me to a throne, or your resentment sink me to the grave, yet would I despise both Thou hast once wofully, irreparably deceived me I reposed my heart upon thine honor, and have found its baseness Nevermore, therefore, expect friendship from me Go, and possess what fortune has given thee, — beauty, riches, health, and pleasure Go, and leave me to want, infamy, disease, and sorrow Yet, humbled as I am, shall my heart still vindicate its dignity, and though thou hast my forgiveness, thou shalt ever have my contempt"

"If so," returned he, "depend upon it, you shall feel the effects of this insolence, and we shall shortly see which is the fittest object of scorn, you or me." Upon which he departed abruptly.

My wife and son, who were present at this interview, seemed terrified with apprehension My daughters, also, finding that he was gone, came out to be informed of the result of our conference, which, when known, alarmed them not less than the rest But as to myself, I disregarded the utmost stretch of his malevolence, he had already struck the blow, and I now stood prepared to repel every new effort, — like one of those instruments used in the art of war, which, however thrown, still presents a point to receive the enemy

We soon, however, found that he had not threatened in vain, for the very next morning his steward came to demand my annual rent, which, by the train of accidents already related, I was unable to pay The consequence of my incapacity was, his driving off my cattle that evening, and then being appraised and sold the next day for less than half their value My wife and children now, therefore, entreated me to comply upon any terms, rather than incur certain destruction. They even begged of me to admit his visits once more, and used all their little eloquence to paint the calamities I was going to endure, — the terrors of a prison in so rigorous a season as the present, with the danger that threatened my health from the late accident that happened by the fire But I continued inflexible.

"Why, my treasures," cried I, "why will you thus attempt to persuade me to the thing that is not right? My duty has taught me to forgive him, but my conscience will not permit me to approve Would you have me applaud to the world what my heart must internally condemn? Would you have me tamely sit down and flatter our infamous betrayer, and, to avoid a prison, continually suffer the more galling bonds of mental confinement? No, never If we are to be taken from this abode, only let us hold to the right, and wherever we are thrown, we can still retire to a charming apartment, where we can look round our own hearts with intrepidity and with pleasure"

In this manner we spent that evening Early the next morning, as the snow had fallen in great abundance in the night, my son was employed in clearing it away and opening a passage before the door He had not been thus engaged long, when he came running in, with looks all pale, to tell us that two strangers, whom he knew to be officers of justice, were making toward the house.

Just as he spoke, they came in, and, approaching the bed where I lay, after previously informing me of their employment and business, made me their prisoner, bidding me prepare to go with them to the county-jail, which was eleven miles off.

"My friends," said I, "this is severe weather in which you are come to take me to a prison; and it is particularly unfortunate at this time, as one of my arms has lately been burnt in a terrible manner, and it has thrown me into a slight fever, and I want clothes to cover me, and I am now too weak and old to walk far in such a deep snow; but if it must be so —"

I then turned to my wife and children, and directed them to get together what few things were left us, and to prepare immediately for leaving this place. I entreated them to be expeditious; and desired my son to assist his elder sister, who, from a consciousness that she was the cause of all our calamities, was fallen, and had lost anguish in insensibility. I encouraged my wife, who, pale and trembling, clasped our affrighted little ones in her arms, that clung to her bosom in silence, dreading to look round at the strangers. In the mean time my youngest daughter prepared for our departure, and as she received several hints to use despatch, in about an hour we were ready to depart.

CHAPTER XXV.

NO SITUATION, HOWEVER WRETCHED IT SEEMS, BUT HAS SOME SORT OF COMFORT ATTENDING IT.

We set forward from this peaceful neighborhood, and walked on slowly; my eldest daughter being enfeebled by a slow fever, which had begun for some days to undermine her constitution, one of the officers, who had a horse, kindly took her behind him: for even these men cannot entirely divest themselves of humanity. My son led one of the little ones by the hand, and my wife the other; while I leaned upon my youngest girl, whose tears fell not for her own, but my distresses.

We were now got from my late dwelling about two miles, when we saw a crowd running and shouting behind us, consisting of about fifty of my poorest parishioners. These, with dreadful imprecations, soon seized upon the two officers of justice, and swearing they would never see their minister go to a jail, while they had a drop of blood to shed in his defence, were going to use them with great severity. The consequences might have been fatal, had I not immediately interposed, and with some difficulty rescued the officers from the hands of the enraged multitude. My children, who looked upon my delivery now as certain, appeared transported with joy, and were incapable of containing their raptures. But they were soon undeceived, upon hearing me address the poor deluded people, who came, as they imagined, to do me service.

"What! my friends," cried I, "and is this the way you love me? Is this the manner you obey the instructions I have given you from the pulpit, thus to fly in the face of justice, and bring down ruin on yourselves and me? Which is your ringleader? Show me the man that has thus seduced you. As sure as he lives, he shall feel my resentment. Alas! my dear deluded flock, return back to the duty you owe to God, to your country, and to me. I shall yet, perhaps, one day see you in greater felicity here, and contribute to make your lives more happy. But let it at least be my comfort, when I pen my fold for immortality, that not one here shall be wanting."

They now seemed all repentance, and, melting into tears, came one after the other to bid me farewell. I shook each tenderly by the hand, and leaving them my blessing, proceeded forward without meeting any further interruption. Some hours before night we reached the town, or rather village; for it consisted but of a few mean houses, having lost all its former opulence, and containing no marks of its ancient superiority but the jail.

Upon entering we put up at an inn, where we had such refreshments as could most readily be procured, and I supped with my family with my usual cheerfulness. After seeing them properly accommodated for that night, I next attended the sheriff's officers to the prison, which had formerly been built for the purposes of war, and consisted of one large apartment, strongly grated, and paved with stone, common to both felons and debtors at certain hours in the four-and-twenty. Beside this, every prisoner had a separate cell, where he was locked in for the night.

I expected upon my entrance to find nothing but lamentations and various sounds of misery, but it was very different. The prisoners seemed all employed in one common design, that of forgetting thought in merriment or clamor. I was apprised of the usual perquisite required upon these occasions, and immediately complied with the demand, though the little money I had was very near being all exhausted. This was immediately sent away for liquor, and the whole prison was soon filled with riot, laughter, and profaneness.

"How!" cried I to myself, "shall men so very wicked be cheerful, and shall I be melancholy? I feel only the same confinement with them, and I think I have more reason to be happy."

With such reflections I labored to become cheerful; but cheerfulness was never yet produced by effort, which is itself painful. As I was sitting, therefore, in a corner of the jail, in a pensive posture, one of my fellow-prisoners came up, and sitting by me, entered into conversation. It was my constant rule in life never to avoid the conversation of any man who seemed to desire it; for if good, I might profit by his instructions; if bad, he might be assisted by mine. I found this to be a knowing man, of strong unlettered sense, but a thorough knowledge of the world, as it is called, or, more properly speaking, of human nature on the wrong side. He asked me if I had taken care to provide myself with a bed, which was a circumstance I had never once attended to.

"That's unfortunate," cried he, "as you are allowed nothing but straw, and your apartment is very large and cold. However, you seem to be something of a gentleman, and as I have been one myself in my time, part of my bedclothes are heartily at your service."

I thanked him, professing my surprise at finding such humanity in a jail, in misfortunes; adding, to let him see that I was a scholar, that the sage ancient seemed to understand the value of company in affliction, when he said, ton kosmon aire, ei dos ton etairon; and, in fact," continued I, "what is the world if it affords only solitude?"

"You talk of the world, sir," returned my fellow-prisoner; "the world is in its dotage, and yet the cosmogony or creation of the world has puzzled the philosophers of every age. What a medley of opinions have they not broached upon the creation of the world! Sanchoniathon, Manetho, Berosus, and Ocellus Lucanus have all attempted it in vain. The latter has these words: Anarchon ara kai atelution to pan, which implies—" "I ask pardon, sir," cried I, "for interrupting so much learning; but I think I have heard all this before. Have I not had the pleasure of once seeing you at Welbridge Fair, and is not your name Ephraim Jenkinson?" At this demand he only sighed. "I suppose you must recollect," resumed I, "one Dr. Primrose, from whom you bought a horse?"

He now at once recollected me, for the gloominess of the place and the approaching night had prevented his distinguishing my features before. "Yes, sir," returned Mr. Jenkinson, "I remember you perfectly well; I bought a horse, but forgot to pay for him. Your neighbor Flamborough is the only prosecutor I am any way afraid of at the next assizes: for he intends to swear positively against me as a coiner. I am heartily sorry, sir, I ever deceived you, or indeed any man; for you see," continued he, pointing to his shackles, "what my tricks have brought me to."

"Well, sir," replied I, "your kindness in offering me assistance, when you could expect no return, shall be repaid with my endeavors to soften or totally suppress Mr. Flamborough's evidence, and I will send my son to him for that purpose the first opportunity; nor do I in the least doubt but he will comply with my request; and as to my own evidence, you need be under no uneasiness about that."

"Well, sir," cried he, "all the return I can make shall be yours. You shall have more than half my bedclothes to-night, and I'll take care to stand your friend in the prison, where I think I have some influence."

I thanked him, and could not avoid being surprised at the present youthful change in his aspect; for at the time I had seen him before he appeared at least sixty. "Sir," answered he, "you are little acquainted with the world! I had at that time false hair, and have learned the art of counterfeiting every age from seventeen to seventy. Ah, sir, had I but bestowed half the pains in learning a trade that I have in learning to be a scoundrel, I might have been a rich man at this day. But, rogue as I am, still I may be your friend, and, that perhaps when you least expect it."

We were now prevented from further conversation by the arrival of the jailer's servants, who came to call over the prisoners' names and lock up for the night. A fellow also with a bundle of straw for my bed attended, who led me along a dark narrow passage into a room paved like the common prison, and in one corner of this I spread my bed, and the clothes given me by my fellow-prisoner; which done, my conductor, who was civil enough, bade me a good-night. After my usual meditations, and having praised my heavenly Corrector, I laid myself down, and slept with the utmost tranquillity till morning.

CHAPTER XXVI.

A REFORMATION IN THE JAIL. — TO MAKE LAWS COMPLETE, THEY SHOULD REWARD AS WELL AS PUNISH.

THE next morning early, I was awakened by my family, whom I found in tears at my bedside. The gloomy appearance of everything about us, it seems, had daunted them. I gently rebuked their sorrow, assuring them I had never slept with greater tranquillity, and next inquired after my eldest daughter, who was not among them. They informed me that yesterday's uneasiness and fatigue had increased her fever, and it was judged proper to leave her behind. My next care was to send my son to procure a room or two to lodge my family in, as near the prison as could conveniently be found. He obeyed, but could only find one apartment, which was hired at a small expense for his mother and sisters, the jailer with humanity consenting to let him and his two little brothers lie in the prison with me. A bed was therefore prepared for them in a corner of the room, which I thought answered very conveniently. I was willing, however, previously to know whether my little children chose to lie in a place which seemed to fright them upon entrance.

"Well," cried I, "my good boys, how do you like your bed? I hope you are not afraid to lie in this room, dark as it appears"

"No, papa," says Dick, "I am not afraid to lie anywhere where you are."

"And I," says Bill, who was yet but four years old, "love every place best that my papa is in."

After this, I allotted to each of the family what they were to do. My daughter was particularly directed to watch her declining sister's health; my wife was to attend me; my little boys were to read to me. "And as for you, my son," continued I, "it is by the labor of your hands we must all hope to be supported. Your wages, as a day-laborer, will be fully sufficient, with proper frugality, to maintain us all, and comfortably too. Thou 'rt now sixteen years old, and hast strength, and it was given thee, my son, for very useful purposes; for it must save from famine your helpless parents and family. Prepare then this evening to look out for work against to-morrow, and bring home every night what you earn for our support."

Having thus instructed him, and settled the rest, I walked down to the common prison, where I could enjoy more air and room. But I was not long there, when the execrations, lewdness, and brutality that invaded me on every side drove me back to my apartment again. Here I sat for some time pondering upon the strange infatuation of wretches, who, finding all mankind in open arms against them, were laboring to make themselves a future and more tremendous enemy.

Their insensibility excited my highest compassion and blotted my own uneasiness from my mind. It even appeared a duty incumbent upon me to attempt to reclaim them. I resolved, therefore, once more to return, and in spite of their contempt, to give them my advice, and conquer them by perseverance. Going therefore among them again, I informed Mr. Jenkinson of my design; at which he laughed heartily, but communicated it to the rest. The proposal was received with the greatest good-humor, as it promised to afford a new fund of entertainment to persons who had now no other resource for mirth but what could be derived from ridicule or debauchery.

I therefore read them a portion of the service with a loud unaffected voice, and found my audience perfectly merry upon the occasion. Lewd whispers, groans of contrition burlesqued, winking and coughing, alternately excited laughter. However, I continued with my natural solemnity to read on, sensible that what I did might amend some, but could itself receive no contamination from any.

After reading, I entered upon my exhortation, which was rather calculated at first to amuse them than to reprove. I previously observed that no other motive but their welfare could induce me to this; that I was their fellow-prisoner, and now got nothing by preaching. I was sorry, I said, to hear them so very profane, because they got nothing by it, and might lose a great deal. "For be assured, my friends," cried I, "(for you are my friends, however the world may disclaim your friendship), though you swore twelve thousand oaths in a day, it would not put one penny in your purse. Then what signifies calling every moment upon the Devil, and courting his friendship, since you find how scurvily he uses you? He has given you nothing here, you find, but a mouthful of oaths and an empty belly; and, by the best accounts I have of him, he will give you nothing that's good hereafter.

"If used ill in our dealings with one man, we naturally go elsewhere. Were it not worth your while, then, just to try how you may like the usage of another master, who gives you fair promises, at least, to come to him? Surely, my friends, of all stupidity in the world, his must be the greatest, who, after robbing a house, runs to the thief-takers for protection. And yet how are you more wise? You are all seeking comfort from one that has already betrayed you, applying to a more malicious being than any thief-taker of them all; for they only decoy and then hang you; but he decoys and hangs, and, what is worst of all, will not let you loose after the hangman has done."

When I had concluded, I received the compliments of my audience, some of whom came and shook me by the hand, swearing that I was a very honest fellow, and that they desired my further acquaintance. I therefore promised to repeat my lecture next day, and actually conceived some hopes of making a reformation here; for it had ever been my opinion that no man was past the hour of amendment, every heart lying open to the shafts of reproof, if the archer could but take the proper aim. When I had thus satisfied my mind, I went back to my apartment, where my wife prepared a frugal meal, while Mr. Jenkinson begged leave to add his dinner to ours, and partake of the pleasure, as he was kind enough to express it, of my conversation. He had not yet seen my family, for as they came to my apartment by a door in the narrow passage already described, by this means they avoided the common prison. Jenkinson at the first interview, therefore, seemed not a little struck with the beauty of my youngest daughter, which her pensive air contributed to heighten, and my little ones did not pass unnoticed.

"Alas, doctor," cried he, "these children are too handsome and too good for such a place as this!"

"Why, Mr. Jenkinson," replied I, "thank Heaven, my children are pretty tolerable in morals; and if they be good, it matters little for the rest."

"I fancy, sir," returned my fellow-prisoner, "that it must give you a great comfort to have this little family about you."

"A comfort, Mr. Jenkinson!" replied I, "yes, it is indeed a comfort, and I would not be without them for all the world; for they can make a dungeon seem a palace. There is but one way in this life of wounding my happiness, and that is by injuring them."

"I am afraid, then, sir," cried he, "that I am in some measure culpable; for I think I see here" (looking at my son Moses) "one that I have injured, and by whom I wish to be forgiven."

My son immediately recollected his voice and features, though he had before seen him in disguise, and taking him by the hand, with a smile, forgave him. "Yet," continued he, "I can't help wondering at what you could see in my face, to think me a proper mark for deception."

"My dear sir," returned the other, "it was not your face, but your white stockings and the black riband in your hair, that allured me. But, no disparagement to your parts, I have deceived wiser men than you in my time; and yet, with all my tricks, the blockheads have been too many for me at last."

"I suppose," cried my son, "that the narrative of such a life as yours must be extremely instructive and amusing."

"Not much of either," returned Mr. Jenkinson. "Those relations which describe the tricks and vices only of mankind, by increasing our suspicion in life, retard our success. The traveller that distrusts every person he meets, and turns back upon the appearance of every man that looks like a robber, seldom arrives in time at his journey's end.

"Indeed, I think, from my own experience, that the knowing one is the silliest fellow under the sun. I was thought cunning from my very childhood; when but seven years old, the ladies would say that I was a perfect little man; at fourteen I knew the world, cocked my hat, and loved the ladies; at twenty, though I was perfectly honest, yet every one thought me so cunning, that no one would trust me. Thus I was at last obliged to turn sharper in my own defence, and have lived ever since, my head throbbing with schemes to deceive, and my heart palpitating with fears of detection. I used often to laugh at your honest, simple neighbor Flamborough, and one way or another generally cheated him once a year. Yet still the honest man went forward without suspicion, and grew rich, while I continued tricksy and cunning, and was poor without the consolation of being honest. However," continued he, "let me know your case, and what has brought you here; perhaps, though I have not the skill to avoid a jail myself, I may extricate my friends."

In compliance with his curiosity, I informed him of the whole train of accidents and follies that had plunged me into my present troubles, and my utter inability to get free.

After hearing my story, and pausing some minutes, he slapped his forehead, as if he had hit upon something material, and took his leave, saying he would try what could be done.

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE next morning I communicated to my wife and children the scheme I had planned of reforming the prisoners, which they received with universal disapprobation, alleging the impossibility and impropriety of it; adding that my endeavors would no way contribute to their amendment, but might probably disgrace my calling.

"Excuse me," returned I; "these people, however fallen, are still men; and that is a very good title to my affections. Good counsel rejected returns to enrich the giver's bosom; and though the instruction I communicate may not mend them, yet it will assuredly mend myself. If these wretches, my children, were princes, there would be thousands ready to offer their ministry; but, in my opinion, the heart that is buried in a dungeon is as precious as that seated upon a throne. Yes, my treasures, if I can mend them I will; perhaps they will not all despise me; perhaps I may catch up even one from the gulf, and that will be great gain: for is there upon earth a gem so precious as the human soul?"

Thus saying, I left them and descended to the common prison, where I found the prisoners very merry, expecting my arrival, and each prepared with some jail-trick to play upon the doctor. Thus, as I was going to begin, one turned my wig away, as if by accident, and then asked my pardon. A second, who stood at some distance, had a knack of spitting through his teeth, which fell in showers upon my book. A third would cry "Amen!" in such an affected tone as gave the rest great delight. A fourth had slyly picked my pocket of my spectacles. But there was one whose trick gave more universal pleasure than all the rest; for, observing the manner in which I had disposed my books on the table before me, he very dexterously displaced one of them, and put an obscene jest-book of his own in the place. However, I took no notice of all this mischievous group of little beings could do, but went on, perfectly sensible that what was ridiculous in my attempt would excite mirth only the first or second time, while what was serious would be permanent. My design succeeded, and in less than six days some were penitent and all attentive.

It was now that I applauded my perseverance and address, at thus giving sensibility to wretches divested of every moral feeling, and now began to think of doing them temporal services also, by rendering their situation somewhat more comfortable. Their time had hitherto been divided between famine and excess, tumultuous riot and bitter repining. Their only employment was quarrelling among each other, playing at cribbage, and cutting tobacco-stoppers. From this last mode of idle industry I took the hint of setting such as chose to work at cutting pegs for tobacconists and shoemakers, the proper wood being bought by a general subscription, and, when manufactured, sold by my appointment; so that each earned something every day, — a trifle, indeed, but sufficient to maintain him.

I did not stop here, but instituted fines for the punishment of immorality and rewards for peculiar industry. Thus in less than a fortnight I had formed them into something social and humane, and had the pleasure of regarding myself as a legislator, who had brought men from their native ferocity into friendship and obedience.

And it were highly to be wished that legislative power would thus direct the law rather to reformation than severity; that it would be convinced that the work of eradicating crimes is not by making punishments familiar, but formidable. Then, instead of our present prisons, which find or make men guilty, which enclose wretches for the commission of one crime, and return them, if returned alive, fitted for the perpetration of thousands, — it were to be wished we had, as in other parts of Europe, places of penitence and solitude, where the accused might be attended by such as could give them repentance, if guilty, or new motives to virtue, if innocent. And this, but not the increasing punishments, is the way to mend a state; nor can I avoid even questioning the validity of that right, which social combinations have assumed, of capitally punishing offences of a slight nature. In cases of murder their right is obvious, as it is the duty of us all, from the law of self-defence, to cut off that man who has shown a disregard for the life of another. Against such, all nature rises in arms; but it is not so against him who steals my property. Natural law gives me no right to take away his life, as by that the horse he steals is as much his property as mine. If, then, I have any right, it must be from a compact made between us, that he who deprives the other of his horse shall die. But this is a false compact; because no man has a right to barter his life, any more than to take it away, as it is not his own. And, besides, the compact is inadequate, and would be set aside even in a court of modern equity, as there is a great penalty for a trifling inconvenience, since it is far better that two men should live than one man should ride. But a compact that is false between two men is equally so between a hundred or a hundred thousand; for as ten millions of circles can never make a square, so the united voice of myriads cannot lend the smallest foundation to falsehood. It is thus that reason speaks, and untutored nature says the same thing. Savages, that are directed by natural law alone, are very tender of the lives of each other; they seldom shed blood but to retaliate former cruelty.

Our Saxon ancestors, fierce as they were in war, had but few executions in times of peace; and in all commencing governments, that have the print of nature still strong upon them, scarcely any crime is held capital.

It is among the citizens of a refined community that penal laws, which are in the hands of the rich, are laid upon the poor. Government, while it grows older, seems to acquire the moroseness of age; and as if our property were become dearer in proportion as it increased, as if the more enormous our wealth the more extensive our fears, all our possessions are paled up with new edicts every day, and hung round with gibbets, to scare every invader.

I cannot tell whether it is from the number of our penal laws or the licentiousness of our people, that this country should show more convicts in a year than half the dominions of Europe united. Perhaps it is owing to both: for they mutually produce each other. When by indiscriminate penal laws a nation beholds the same punishment affixed to dissimilar degrees of guilt, from perceiving no distinction in the penalty the people are led to lose all sense of distinction in the crime, and this distinction is the bulwark of all morality: thus the multitude of laws produce new vices, and new vices call for fresh restraints.

It were to be wished, then, that power, instead of contriving new laws to punish vice, instead of drawing hard the cords of society till a convulsion came to burst them, instead of cutting away wretches as useless before we have tried their utility, instead of converting correction into vengeance, — it were to be wished that we tried the restrictive arts of government, and made law the protector, but not the tyrant of the people. We should then find that creatures whose souls are held as dross only wanted the hand of a refiner; we should then find that wretches, now stuck up for long tortures, lest luxury should feel a momentary pang, might, if properly treated, serve to sinew the state in times of danger; that as their faces are like ours, their hearts are so too; that few minds are so base as that perseverance cannot amend; that a man may see his last crime without dying for it; and that very little blood will serve to cement our security.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

HAPPINESS AND MISERY RATHER THE RESULT OF PRUDENCE THAN OF VIRTUE IN THIS LIFE; TEMPORAL EVILS OR FELICITIES BEING REGARDED BY HEAVEN AS THINGS MERELY IN THEMSELVES TRIFLING, AND UNWORTHY ITS CARE IN THE DISTRIBUTION.

I HAD now been confined more than a fortnight, but had not since my arrival been visited by my dear Olivia, and I greatly longed to see her. Having communicated my wishes to my wife, the next morning the poor girl entered my apartment, leaning on her sister's arm. The change which I saw in her countenance struck me. The numberless graces that once resided there were now fled, and the hand of death seemed to have moulded every feature to alarm me. Her temples were sunk, her forehead was tense, and a fatal paleness sat upon her cheek.

"I am glad to see thee, my dear," cried I; "but why this dejection, Livy? I hope, my love, you have too great a regard for me to permit disappointment thus to undermine a life which I prize as my own. Be cheerful, my child, and we may yet see happier days."

"You have ever, sir," replied she, "been kind to me, and it adds to my pain that I shall never have an opportunity of sharing that happiness you promise. Happiness, I fear, is no longer reserved for me here, and I long to be rid of a place where I have only found distress. Indeed, sir, I wish you would make a proper submission to Mr. Thornhill: it may in some measure induce him to pity you, and it will give me relief in dying."

"Never, child," replied I, "never will I be brought to acknowledge my daughter as a prostitute; for, though the world may look upon your offence with scorn, let it be mine to regard it as a mark of credulity, not of guilt. My dear, I am no way miserable in this place, however dismal it may seem; and be assured that while you continue to bless me by living, he shall never have my consent to make you more wretched by marrying another."

After the departure of my daughter, my fellow-prisoner, who was by at this interview, sensibly enough expostulated upon my obstinacy in refusing a submission which promised to give me freedom. He observed that the rest of my family were not to be sacrificed to the peace of one child alone, and she the only one who had offended me. "Besides," added he, "I don't know if it be just thus to obstruct the union of man and wife, which you do at present, by refusing to consent to a match which you cannot hinder, but may render unhappy."

"Sir," replied I, "you are unacquainted with the man that oppresses us. I am very sensible that no submission I can make could procure me liberty even for an hour. I am told that even in this very room a debtor of his, no later than last year, died for want. But, though my submission and approbation could transfer me hence to the most beautiful apartment he is possessed of, yet I would grant neither, as something whispers me that it would be giving a sanction to adultery. While my daughter lives, no other marriage of his shall ever be legal in my eye. Were she removed, indeed, I should be the basest of men, from any resentment of my own, to attempt putting asunder those who wish for a union. No, villain as he is, I should even wish him married, to prevent the consequences of his future debaucheries. But now should I not be the most cruel of all fathers to sign an instrument which must send my child to the grave merely to avoid a prison myself; and thus, to escape one pang, break my child's heart with a thousand?" He acquiesced in the justice of this answer, but could not avoid observing that he feared my daughter's life was already too much wasted to keep me long a prisoner. "However," continued he, "though you refuse to submit to the nephew, I hope you have no objection to laying your case before the uncle, who has the first character in the kingdom for everything that is just and good. I would advise you to send him a letter by the post, intimating all his nephew's ill usage, and, my life for it, that in three days you shall have an answer." I thanked him for the hint, and instantly set about complying; but I wanted paper, and, unluckily, all our money had been laid out that morning in provisions; however, he supplied me.

For the three ensuing days I was in a state of anxiety to know what reception my letter might meet with; but, in the mean time, was frequently solicited by my wife to submit to any conditions rather than remain here, and every hour received repeated accounts of the decline of my daughter's health. The third day and the fourth arrived, but I received no answer to my letter; the complaints of a stranger against a favorite nephew were no way likely to succeed; so that these hopes soon vanished, like all my former. My mind, however, still supported itself, though confinement and bad air began to make a visible alteration in my health, and my arm that had suffered in the fire grew worse. My children, however, sat by me, and, while I was stretched on my straw, read to me by turns, or listened and wept at my instructions. But my daughter's health declining faster than mine, every message from her contributed to increase my apprehensions and pain. The fifth morning after I had written the letter which was sent Sir William Thornhill, I was alarmed with an account that she was speechless. Now it was that confinement was truly painful to me; my soul was bursting from its prison to be near the pillow of my child, to comfort, to strengthen her, to receive her last wishes, and teach her soul the way to heaven. Another account came,—she was expiring, and yet I was debarred the small comfort of weeping by her. My fellow-prisoner, some time after, came with the last account. He bade me be patient,—she was dead! The next morning he returned and found me with my two little ones, now my only companions, who were using all their innocent efforts to comfort me. They entreated to read to me, and bade me not cry, for I was now too old to weep. "And is not my sister an angel now, papa?" cried the eldest, "and why then are you sorry for her? I wish I were an angel, out of this frightful place, if my papa were with me?"—"Yes," added my youngest darling, "heaven, where my sister is, is a finer place than this, and there are none but good people there, and the people here are very bad."

Mr. Jenkinson interrupted their harmless prattle by observing that, now my daughter was no more, I should seriously think of the rest of my family, and attempt to save my own life, which was every day declining for want of necessaries and wholesome air. He added that it was now incumbent on me to sacrifice any pride or resentment of my own to the welfare of those who depended on me for support; and that I was now, both by reason and justice, obliged to try to reconcile my landlord.

"Heaven be praised," replied I, "there is no pride left me now. I should detest my own heart if I saw either pride or resentment lurking there. On the contrary, as my oppressor has been once my parishioner, I hope one day to present him an unpolluted soul at the eternal tribunal. No, sir, I have no resentment now; and though he has taken from me what I held dearer than all his treasures, though he has wrung my heart,—for I am sick almost to fainting, very sick, my fellow-prisoner,—yet that shall never inspire me with vengeance. I am now willing to approve his marriage, and, if this submission can do him any pleasure, let him know that if I have done him any injury I am sorry for it." Mr. Jenkinson took pen and ink and wrote down my submission nearly as I have expressed it, to which I signed my name. My son was employed to carry the letter to Mr. Thornhill, who was then at his seat in the country. He went, and in about six hours returned with a verbal answer. He had some difficulty, he said, to get a sight of his landlord, as the servants were insolent and suspicious; but he accidentally saw him as he was going out upon business, preparing for his marriage, which was to be in three days. He continued to inform us that he stepped up in the humblest manner, and delivered the letter, which when Mr. Thornhill had read, he said that all submission was now too late and unnecessary; that he had heard of our application to his uncle, which met with the contempt it deserved; and, as for the rest, that all future applications should be directed to his attorney, not to him. He observed, however, that as he had a very good opinion of the discretion of the two young ladies, they might have been the most agreeable intercessors.

"Well, sir," said I to my fellow-prisoner, "you now discover the temper of the man who oppresses me. He can at once be facetious and cruel; but let him use me as he will, I shall soon be free in spite of all his bolts to restrain me. I am now drawing toward an abode that looks brighter as I approach it; this expectation cheers my afflictions, and though I leave a helpless family of orphans behind me, yet they will not be utterly forsaken; some friend perhaps will be found to assist them for the sake of their poor father, and some may charitably relieve them for the sake of their Heavenly Father."

Just as I spoke, my wife, whom I had not seen that day before, appeared with looks of terror, and making efforts, but unable to speak. "Why, my love," cried I, "why will you thus increase my afflictions by your own? What though no submission can turn our severe master, though he has doomed me to die in this place of wretchedness, and though we have lost a darling child, yet still you will find comfort in your other children when I shall be no more."—"We have indeed lost," returned she, "a darling child! My Sophia, my dearest, is gone, snatched from us, carried off by ruffians!"

"How, madam!" cried my fellow-prisoner: "Miss Sophia carried off by villains! Sure, it cannot be?"

She could only answer with a fixed look and a flood of tears. But one of the prisoners' wives, who was present and came in with her, gave us a more distinct account. She informed us that, as my wife, my daughter, and herself were taking a walk together on the great road, a little way out of the village, a post-chaise and pair drove up to them, and instantly stopped. Upon which a well-dressed man, but not Mr. Thornhill, stepping out, clasped my daughter round the waist, and, forcing her in, bid the postilion drive on, so that they were out of sight in a moment.

"Now," cried I, "the sum of my miseries is made up, nor is it in the power of anything on earth to give me another pang. What! not one left! not leave me one! the monster! The child that was next my heart! She had the beauty of an angel, and almost the wisdom of an angel. But support that woman, nor let her fall. Not to leave me one!"—"Alas, my husband!" said my wife, "you seem to want comfort even more than I. Our distresses are great, but I could bear this and more, if I saw you but easy. They may take away my children and all the world, if they leave me but you"

My son, who was present, endeavored to moderate our grief; he bade us take comfort, for he hoped that we might still have reason to be thankful.—"My child," cried I, "look round the world and see if there be any happiness left me now. Is not every ray of comfort shut out, while all our bright prospects only lie beyond the grave?"—"My dear father," returned he, "I hope there is still something that will give you an interval of satisfaction, for I have a letter from my brother George."—"What of him, my child?" interrupted I. "Does he know our misery? I hope my boy is exempt from any part of what his wretched family suffers."—"Yes, sir," returned he, "he is perfectly gay, cheerful, and happy. His letter brings nothing but good news; he is the favorite of his colonel, who promises to procure him the very next lieutenancy that becomes vacant."

"But are you sure of all this?" cried my wife. "Are you sure that nothing ill has befallen my boy?"—"Nothing indeed, madam," returned my son; "you shall see the letter, which will give you the highest pleasure; and if anything can procure you comfort, I am sure that will."—"But are you sure," still repeated she, "that the letter is from himself, and that he is really so happy?"—"Yes, madam," replied he, "it is certainly his, and he will one day be the credit and the support of our family."—"Then I thank Providence," cried she, "that my last letter to him has miscarried. Yes, my dear," continued she, turning to me, "I will now confess that, though the hand of Heaven is sore upon us in other instances, it has been favorable here. By the last letter I wrote my son, which was in the bitterness of anger, I desired him, upon his mother's blessing, and if he had the heart of a man, to see justice done his father and sister, and avenge our cause. But thanks be to Him who directs all things, — it has miscarried, and I am at rest." — "Woman," cried I, "thou hast done very ill, and at another time my reproaches might have been more severe. O, what a tremendous gulf hast thou escaped, that would have buried both thee and him in endless ruin! Providence indeed has here been kinder to us than we to ourselves. It has been reserved that son to be the father and protector of my children when I shall be away. How unjustly did I complain of being stripped of every comfort, when still I hear that he is happy and insensible of our afflictions, still kept in reserve to support his widowed mother and to protect his brothers and sisters! But what sisters has he left? He has no sisters now! They are all gone, robbed from me, and I am undone!" — "Father," interrupted my son, "I beg you will give me leave to read this letter; I know it will please you." Upon which, with my permission, he read as follows. —

"HONORED SIR: I have called off my imagination a few moments from the pleasures that surround me, to fix it upon objects that are still more pleasing, the dear little fireside at home. My fancy draws that harmless group as listening to every line of this with great composure. I view those faces with delight which never felt the deforming hand of ambition or distress. But whatever your happiness may be at home, I am sure it will be some addition to it to hear that I am perfectly pleased with my situation, and every way happy here.

"Our regiment is countermanded, and is not to leave the kingdom; the colonel, who professes himself my friend, takes me with him to all companies where he is acquainted, and, after my first visit, I generally find myself received with increased respect upon repeating it. I danced last night with Lady G——, and, could I forget you know whom, I might be perhaps successful. But it is my fate still to remember others, while I am myself forgotten by most of my absent friends; and in this number, I fear, sir, that I must consider you, for I have long expected the pleasure of a letter from home to no purpose. Olivia and Sophia, too, promised to write, but seem to have forgotten me. Tell them that they are two arrant little baggages, and that I am this moment in a most violent passion with them; yet still, I know not how, though I want to bluster a little, my heart is respondent only to softer emotions. Then tell them, sir, that, after all, I love them affectionately; and be assured of my ever remaining your dutiful son."

"In all our miseries," cried I, "what thanks have we not to return that one at least of our family is exempted from what we suffer! Heaven be his guard and keep my boy thus happy to be the support of his widowed mother and the father of these two babes, which is all the patrimony I can now bequeath him! May he keep their innocence from the temptation of want, and be their conductor in the paths of honor!" I had scarcely said these words, when a noise like that of a tumult seemed to proceed from the prison below; it died away soon after, and a clanking of fetters was heard along the passage that led to my apartment The keeper of the prison entered, holding a man all bloody, wounded, and fettered with the heaviest irons. I looked with compassion upon the wretch as he approached me, but with horror when I found it was my own son! "My George! my George! and do I behold thee thus? wounded! fettered! Is this thy happiness? Is this the manner you return to me? O that this sight would break my heart at once and let me die!"

"Where, sir, is your fortitude?" returned my son, with an intrepid voice; "I must suffer, my life is forfeited, and let them take it. It is my last happiness that I have committed no murder, though I have lost all hopes of pardon."

I tried to restrain my passion for a few minutes in silence, but I thought I should have died with the effort. "O my boy, my heart weeps to behold thee thus, and I cannot, cannot help it! In the moment I thought thee blest, and prayed for thy safety, to behold thee thus again, chained, wounded! And yet the death of the youthful is happy. But I am old, a very old man, and have lived to see this day; to see my children all untimely falling about me, while I continue a wretched survivor in the midst of ruin! May all the curses that ever sunk a soul fall heavy upon the murderer of my children! May he live, like me, to see—"

"Hold, sir," replied my son, "or I shall blush for thee. "How, sir! forgetful of your age, your holy calling, thus to arrogate the justice of heaven, and fling those curses upward that must soon descend to crush thy own gray head with destruction! No, sir, let it be your care now to fit me for that vile death I must shortly suffer, to arm me with hope and resolution, to give me courage to drink of that bitterness which must shortly be my portion."

"My child, you must not die! I am sure no offence of thine can deserve so vile a punishment. My George could never be guilty of any crime to make his ancestors ashamed of him."

"Mine, sir," returned my son, "is, I fear, an unpardonable one. When I received my mother's letter from home, I immediately came down, determined to punish the betrayer of our honor, and sent him an order to meet me, which he answered, not in person but by despatching four of his domestics to seize me. I wounded one who first assailed me, and, I fear, desperately; but the rest made me their prisoner. The coward is determined to put the law in execution against me; the proofs are undeniable; I have sent a challenge, and as I am the first aggressor upon the statute, I see no hopes of pardon. But you have often charmed me with your lessons of fortitude; let me now, sir, find them in your example."

"And, my son, you shall find them. I am now raised above this world and all the pleasures it can produce. From this moment I break from my heart all the ties that held it down to earth, and will prepare to fit us both for eternity. Yes, my son, I will point out the way, and my soul shall guide yours in the ascent, for we will take our flight together. I now see and am convinced you can expect no pardon here, and I can only exhort you to seek it at that greater tribunal where we both shall shortly answer. But let us not be niggardly in our exhortations, but let all our fellow-prisoners have a share. Good jailer, let them be permitted to stand here, while I attempt to approve them." Thus saying, I made an effort to rise from the straw, but wanted strength, and was able only to recline against the wall. The prisoners assembled according to my directions, for they loved to hear my counsel; my son and his mother supported me on either side; I looked and saw that none were wanting, and then addressed them with the following exhortation.

CHAPTER XXIX.

THE EQUAL DEALINGS OF PROVIDENCE DEMONSTRATED WITH REGARD TO THE HAPPY AND THE MISERABLE HERE BELOW. THAT, FROM THE NATURE OF PLEASURE AND PAIN, THE WRETCHED MUST BE REPAID THE BALANCE OF THEIR SUFFERINGS IN THE LIFE HEREAFTER.

"My friends, my children, and fellow-sufferers, when I reflect on the distribution of good and evil here below, I find that much has been given man to enjoy, yet still more to suffer. Though we should examine the whole world, we shall not find one man so happy as to have nothing left to wish for; but we daily see thousands who by suicide show us they have nothing left to hope. In this life, then, it appears that we cannot be entirely blest; but yet we may be completely miserable.

"Why man should thus feel pain; why our wretchedness should be requisite in the formation of universal felicity; why, when all other systems are made perfect by the perfection of their subordinate parts, the great system should require for its perfection parts that are not only subordinate to others, but imperfect in themselves,—these are questions that never can be explained, and might be useless if known. On this subject Providence has thought fit to elude our curiosity, satisfied with granting us motives to consolation.

"In this situation, man has called in the friendly assistance of philosophy; and Heaven, seeing the incapacity of that to console him, has given him the aid of religion. The consolations of philosophy are very amusing, but often fallacious. It tells us that life is filled with comforts, if we will but enjoy them; and, on the other hand, that though we unavoidably have miseries here, life is short, and they will soon be over. Thus do these consolations destroy each other: for if life is a place of comfort, its shortness must be misery; and if it be long, our griefs are protracted. Thus philosophy is weak; but religion comforts in a higher strain. Man is here, it tells us, fitting up his mind and preparing it for another abode. When the good man leaves the body and is all a glorious mind, he will find he has been making himself a heaven of happiness here, while the wretch that has been maimed and contaminated by his vices shrinks from his body with terror, and finds that he has anticipated the vengeance of Heaven. To religion, then, we must hold, in every circumstance of life, for our truest comfort; for if already we are happy, it is a pleasure to think that we can make that happiness unending; and if we are miserable, it is very consoling to think that there is a place of rest Thus to the fortunate religion holds out a continuance of bliss; to the wretched, a change from pain.

"But though religion is very kind to all men, it has promised peculiar rewards to the unhappy; the sick, the naked, the houseless, the heavy-laden, and the prisoner have ever most frequent promises in our sacred law. The Author of our religion everywhere professes himself the wretch's friend; and, unlike the false ones of this world, bestows all his caresses upon the forlorn. The unthinking have censured this as partiality, as a preference without merit to deserve it. But they never reflect that it is not in the power even of Heaven itself to make the offer of unceasing felicity as great a gift to the happy as to the miserable. To the first, eternity is but a single blessing, since, at most, it but increases what they already possess. To the latter, it is a double advantage; for it diminishes their pain here, and rewards them with heavenly bliss hereafter.

"But Providence is in another respect kinder to the poor than to the rich; for as it thus makes the life after death more desirable, so it smooths the passage there. The wretched have had a long familiarity with every face of terror. The man of sorrow lays himself quietly down, with no possessions to regret, and but few ties to stop his departure; he feels only nature's pang in the final separation, and this is no way greater than he has often fainted under before; for after a certain degree of pain, every new breach that death opens in the constitution nature kindly covers with insensibility.

"Thus Providence has given to the wretched two advantages over the happy in this life, — greater felicity in dying, and in heaven all that superiority of pleasure which arises from contrasted enjoyment. And this superiority, my friends, is no small advantage, and seems to be one of the pleasures of the poor man in the parable; for though he was already in heaven, and felt all the raptures it could give, yet it was mentioned, as an addition to his happiness, that he had once been wretched and now was comforted; that he had known what it was to be miserable, and now felt what it was to be happy.

"Thus, my friends, you see religion does what philosophy could never do; it shows the equal dealings of Heaven to the happy and the unhappy, and levels all human enjoyments to nearly the same standard. It gives to both rich and poor the same happiness hereafter, and equal hopes to aspire after it; but if the rich have the advantage of enjoying pleasure here, the poor have the endless satisfaction of knowing what it was once to be miserable, when crowned with endless felicity hereafter; and even though this should be called a small advantage, yet, being an eternal one, it must make up, by duration, what the temporal happiness of the great may have exceeded by intenseness.

"These are, therefore, the consolations which the wretched have peculiar to themselves, and in which they are above the rest of mankind; in other respects they are below them. They who would know the miseries of the poor must see life and endure it. To declaim on the temporal advantages they enjoy is only repeating what none either believe or practise. The men who have the necessaries of living are not poor; and they who want them must be miserable. Yes, my friends, we must be miserable. No vain efforts of a refined imagination can soothe the wants of nature, can give elastic sweetness to the dark vapor of a dungeon, or ease to the throbbings of a broken heart. Let the philosopher from his couch of softness tell us we can resist all these. Alas! the effort by which we resist them is still the greatest pain. Death is slight, and any man may sustain it; but torments are dreadful, and these no man can endure.

"To us then, my friends, the promises of happiness in heaven should be peculiarly

dear, for if our reward be in this life alone, we are, indeed, of all men the most miserable. When I look round these gloomy walls, made to terrify as well as to confine us; this light, that only serves to show the horrors of the place; those shackles, that tyranny has imposed or crime made necessary; when I survey these emaciated looks, and hear those groans, — O my friends, what a glorious exchange would heaven be for these! To fly through regions unconfined as air, to bask in the sunshine of eternal bliss, to carol over endless hymns of praise, to have no master to threaten or insult us, but the form of Goodness himself forever in our eyes, — when I think of these things, death becomes the messenger of very glad tidings; when I think of these things, his sharpest arrow becomes the staff of my support; when I think of these things, what is there in life worth having? when I think of these things, what is there that should not be spurned away? Kings in their palaces should groan for such advantages, but we, humbled as we are, should yearn for them.

"And shall these things be ours? Ours they will certainly be, if we but try for them; and, what is a comfort, we are shut out from many temptations that would retard our pursuit. Only let us try for them, and they will certainly be ours; and, what is still a comfort, shortly too; for if we look back on a past life, it appears but a very short span, and whatever we may think of the rest of life, it will yet be found of less duration; as we grow older, the days seem to grow shorter, and our intimacy with time ever lessens the perception of his stay. Then let us take comfort now, for we shall soon be at our journey's end; we shall soon lay down the heavy burden laid by Heaven upon us; and though death, the only friend of the wretched, for a little while mocks the weary traveller with the view, and, like the horizon, still flies before him, yet the time will certainly and shortly come, when we shall cease from our toil; when the luxuriant great ones of the world shall no more tread us to the earth, when we shall think with pleasure of our sufferings below; when we shall be surrounded with all our friends, or such as deserved our friendship; when our bliss shall be unutterable, and still, to crown all, unending."

CHAPTER XXX.

HAPPIER PROSPECTS BEGIN TO APPEAR. LET US BE INFLEXIBLE, AND FORTUNE WILL AT LAST CHANGE IN OUR FAVOR.

When I had thus finished, and my audience was retired, the jailer, who was one of the most humane of his profession, hoped I would not be displeased, as what he did was but his duty; observing, that he must be obliged to remove my son into a stronger cell, but he should be permitted to visit me every morning. I thanked him for his clemency, and, grasping my boy's hand, bade him farewell, and be mindful of the great duty that was before him.

I again therefore laid me down, and one of my little ones sat by my bedside reading, when Mr. Jenkinson entering, informed me that there was news of my daughter; for that she was seen by a person about two hours before in a strange gentleman's company, and that they had stopped at a neighboring village for refreshment, and seemed as if returning to town. He had scarce delivered this news, when the jailer came with looks of haste and pleasure, to inform me that my daughter was found! Moses came running in a moment after, crying out that his sister Sophy was below, and coming up with our old friend Mr. Burchell.

Just as he delivered this news, my dearest girl entered, and, with looks almost wild with pleasure, ran to kiss me in a transport of affection. Her mother's tears and silence also showed her pleasure.

"Here, papa," cried the charming girl, "here is the brave man to whom I owe my delivery; to this gentleman's intrepidity I am indebted for my happiness and safety." A kiss from Mr. Burchell, whose pleasure seemed even greater than hers, interrupted what she was going to add.

"Ah, Mr. Burchell," cried I, "this is but a wretched habitation you find us in; and we are now very different from what you last saw us. You were ever our friend: we have long discovered our errors with regard to you, and repented of our ingratitude. After the vile usage you then received at my hands, I am almost ashamed to behold your face; yet I hope you 'll forgive me, as I was deceived by a base, ungenerous wretch, who, under the mask of friendship, has undone me."

"It is impossible," replied Mr. Burchell, "that I should forgive you, as you never deserved my resentment. I partly saw your delusion then, and as it was out of my power to restrain, I could only pity it."

"It was ever my conjecture," cried I, "that your mind was noble; but now I find it so. But tell me, my dear child, how hast thou been relieved, or who were the ruffians that carried thee away?"

"Indeed, sir," replied she, "as to the villain who carried me off, I am yet ignorant. For as my mamma and I were walking out, he came behind us, and, almost before I could call for help, forced me into the post-chaise, and in an instant the horses drove away. I met several on the road to whom I cried out for assistance; but they disregarded my entreaties. In the mean time the ruffian himself used every art to hinder me from crying out: he flattered and threatened me by turns, and swore that if I continued but silent he intended no harm. In the mean time I had broken the canvas that he had drawn up, and whom should I perceive at some distance, but your old friend Mr. Burchell, walking along with his usual swiftness, with the great stick for which we used so much to ridicule him! As soon as we came within hearing, I called out to him by name, and entreated his help. I repeated my exclamations several times, upon which, with a very loud voice, he bid the postilion stop; but the boy took no notice, but drove on with still greater speed. I now thought he could never overtake us, when in less than a minute I saw Mr. Burchell come running up by the side of the horses, and with one blow knocked the postilion to the ground. The horses, when he was fallen, soon stopped of themselves, and the ruffian stepping out, with oaths and menaces, drew his sword, and ordered him at his peril to retire; but Mr. Burchell, running up, shivered his sword to pieces, and then pursued him for near a quarter of a mile; but he made his escape. I was at this time come out myself, willing to assist my deliverer; but he soon returned to me in triumph. The postilion, who was recovered, was going to make his escape too; but Mr. Burchell ordered him at his peril to mount again, and drive back to town. Finding it impossible to resist, he reluctantly complied, though the wound he had received seemed to me, at least, to be dangerous. He continued to complain of the pain as we drove along, so that he at last excited Mr. Burchell's compassion; who, at my request, exchanged him for another at an inn where we called on our return."

"Welcome, then," cried I, "my child, and thou her gallant deliverer, a thousand welcomes. Though our cheer is but wretched, yet our hearts are ready to receive you. And now, Mr. Burchell, as you have delivered my girl, if you think her a recompense, she is yours; if you can stoop to an alliance with a family so poor as mine, take her, obtain her consent, as I know you have her heart, and you have mine. And let me tell you, sir, that I give you no small treasure; she has been celebrated for beauty, it is true, but that is not my meaning; I give you a treasure in her mind."

"But I suppose, sir," cried Mr. Burchell "that you are apprised of my circumstances, and of my incapacity to support her as she deserves?"

"If your present objection," replied I, "be meant as an evasion of my offer, I desist; but I know no man so worthy to deserve her as you; and if I could give her thousands, and thousands sought her from me, yet my honest, brave Burchell should be my dearest choice."

To all this his silence seemed to give a mortifying refusal; and without the least reply to my offer, he demanded if we could not be furnished with refreshments from the next inn; to which, being answered in the affirmative, he ordered them to send in the best dinner that could be provided upon such short notice. He bespoke also a dozen of their best wine, and some cordials for me; adding, with a smile, that he would stretch a little for once; and, though in a prison, asserted he was never more disposed to be merry. The waiter soon made his appearance with preparations for dinner; a table was lent us by the jailer, who seemed remarkably assiduous; the wine was disposed in order, and two very well dressed dishes were brought in.

My daughter had not yet heard of her poor brother's melancholy situation, and we all seemed unwilling to damp her cheerfulness by the relation. But it was in vain that I attempted to appear cheerful; the circumstances of my unfortunate son broke through all efforts to dissemble; so that I was at last obliged to damp our mirth by relating his misfortunes, and wishing he might be permitted to share with us in this little interval of satisfaction. After my guests were recovered from the consternation my account had produced, I requested also that Mr. Jenkinson, a fellow-prisoner, might be admitted, and the jailer granted my request with an air of unusual submission. The clanking of my son's irons was no sooner heard along the passage than his sister ran impatiently to meet him; while Mr. Burchell, in the mean time, asked me if my son's name was George; to which replying in the affirmative, he still continued silent. As soon as my boy entered the room, I could perceive he regarded Mr. Burchell with a look of astonishment and reverence. "Come on," cried I, "my son; though we are fallen very low, yet Providence has been pleased to grant us some small relaxation from pain. Thy sister is restored to us, and there is her deliverer; to that brave man it is that I am indebted for yet having a daughter; give him, my boy, the hand of friendship; he deserves our warmest gratitude."

My son seemed all this while regardless of what I said, and still continued fixed at a respectful distance. "My dear brother," cried his sister, "why don't you thank my good deliverer? The brave should ever love each other."

He still continued his silence and astonishment, till our guest at last perceived himself to be known, and, assuming all his native dignity, desired my son to come forward. Never before had I seen anything so truly majestic as the air he assumed upon this occasion. The greatest object in the universe, says a certain philosopher, is a good man struggling with adversity; yet there is still a greater, which is the good man that comes to relieve it. After he had regarded my son for some time with a superior air, "I again find," said he, "unthinking boy, that the same crime —" But here he was interrupted by one of the jailer's servants, who came to inform us that a person of distinction, who had driven into town with a chariot and several attendants, sent his respects to the gentleman that was with us, and begged to know when he should think proper to be waited upon. "Bid the fellow wait," cried our guest, "till I shall have leisure to receive him"; and then, turning to my son, "I again find, sir," proceeded he, "that you are guilty of the same offence for which you once had my reproof, and for which the law is now preparing its justest punishments. You imagine, perhaps, that a contempt of your own life gives you a right to take that of another; but where, sir, is the difference between a duellist, who hazards a life of no value, and the murderer who acts with greater security? Is it any diminution of the gamester's fraud when he alleges that he staked a counter?"

"Alas, sir!" cried I, "whoever you are, pity the poor misguided creature; for what he has done was in obedience to a deluded mother, who, in the bitterness of her resentment, required him, upon her blessing, to avenge her quarrel. Here, sir, is the letter, which will serve to convince you of her imprudence and diminish his guilt."

He took the letter, and hastily read it over. "This," says he, "though not a perfect excuse, is such a palliation of his fault as induces me to forgive him. And now, sir," continued he, kindly taking my son by the hand, "I see you are surprised at finding me here; but I have often visited prisons upon occasions less interesting. I am now come to see justice done a worthy man, for whom I have the most sincere esteem. I have long been a disguised spectator of thy father's benevolence. I have at his little dwelling enjoyed respect uncontaminated by flattery, and have received that happiness that courts could not give, from the amusing simplicity round his fireside. My nephew has been apprised of my intentions of coming here, and I find he is arrived; it would be wronging him and you to condemn him without examination; if there be injury, there shall be redress; and this I may say without boasting, that none have ever taxed the injustice of Sir William Thornhill."

We now found that the personage whom we had so long entertained as a harmless, amusing companion, was no other than the celebrated Sir William Thornhill, to whose virtues and singularities scarce any were strangers. The poor Mr. Burchell was in reality a man of large fortune and great interest, to whom senates listened with applause, and whom party heard with conviction; who was the friend of his country, but loyal to his king. My poor wife, recollecting her former familiarity, seemed to shrink with apprehension; but Sophia, who a few moments before thought him her own, now perceiving the immense distance to which he was removed by fortune, was unable to conceal her tears.

"Ah, sir," cried my wife, with a piteous aspect, "how is it possible that I can ever have your forgiveness! the slights you received from me the last time I had the honor of seeing you at our house, and the jokes which I audaciously threw out, — these, sir, I fear can never be forgiven."

"My dear good lady," returned he with a smile, "if you had your joke I had my answer. I'll leave it to all the company if mine were not as good as yours. To say the truth, I know nobody whom I am disposed to be angry with at present but the fellow who so frightened my little girl here. I had not even time to examine the rascal's person so as to describe him in an advertisement. Can you tell me, Sophia, my dear, whether you should know him again?"

"Indeed, sir," replied she, "I cannot be positive; yet now I recollect he had a large mark over one of his eyebrows." — "I ask pardon, madam," interrupted Jenkinson, who was by, "but be so good as to inform me if the fellow wore his own red hair?" — "Yes, I think so," cried Sophia. "And did your honor," continued he, turning to Sir William, "observe the length of his legs?" — "I can't be sure of their length," cried the baronet; "but I am convinced of their swiftness; for he outran me, which is what I thought few men in the kingdom could have done." — "Please your honor," cried Jenkinson, "I know the man; it is certainly the same; the best runner in England. He has beaten Pinwire of Newcastle; Timothy Baxter is his name: I know him perfectly, and the very place of his retreat this moment. If your honor will bid Mr. Jailer let two of his men go with me, I'll engage to produce him to you in an hour at furthest." Upon this the jailer was called, who instantly appearing, Sir William demanded if he knew him. "Yes, please your honor," replied the jailer, "I know Sir William Thornhill well; and everybody that knows anything of him will desire to know more of him." — "Well, then," said the baronet, "my request is that you will permit this man and two of your servants to go upon a message by my authority, and, as I am in the commission of the peace, I undertake to secure you." — "Your promise is sufficient," replied the other; "and you may, at a minute's warning, send them over England whenever your honor thinks fit."

In pursuance of the jailer's compliance, Jenkinson was despatched in pursuit of Timothy Baxter, while we were amused with the assiduity of our youngest boy Bill, who had just come in and climbed up to Sir William's neck in order to kiss him. His mother was immediately going to chastise his familiarity, but the worthy man prevented her, and taking the child, all ragged as he was, upon his knee, — "What, Bill, you chubby rogue!" cried he, "do you remember your old friend Burchell? And Dick, too, my honest veteran, are you here? you shall find I have not forgot you." So saying, he gave each a large piece of gingerbread, which the poor fellows ate very heartily, as they had got that morning but a very scanty breakfast.

We now sat down to dinner, which was almost cold; but previously, my arm still continuing painful, Sir William wrote a prescription, for he had made the study of physic his amusement, and was more than moderately skilled in the profession this being sent to an apothecary who lived in the place, my arm was dressed, and I found almost instantaneous relief. We were waited upon at dinner by the jailer himself, who was willing to do our guest all the honor in his power. But before we had well dined, another message was brought from his nephew, desiring permission to appear in order to vindicate his innocence and honor; with which request the baronet complied, and desired Mr. Thornhill to be introduced.

CHAPTER XXXI.

FORMER BENEVOLENCE NOW REPAID WITH UNEXPECTED INTEREST.

MR. THORNHILL made his entrance with a smile, which he seldom wanted, and was going to embrace his uncle, which the other repulsed with an air of disdain "No fawning, sir, at present," cried the baronet, with a look of severity, "the only way to my heart is by the road of honor, but here I only see complicated instances of falsehood, cowardice, and oppression How is it, sir, that this poor man, for whom I know you professed a friendship, is used thus hardly, his daughter vilely seduced as a recompense for his hospitality, and he himself thrown into a prison, perhaps but for resenting the insult, his son, too, whom you feared to face as a man —"

"Is it possible, sir," interrupted his nephew, "that my uncle could object that as a crime which his repeated instructions alone have persuaded me to avoid?"

"Your rebuke," cried Sir William, "is just, you have acted in this instance prudently and well, though not quite as your father would have done my brother, indeed, was the soul of honor, but thou — yes, you have acted in this instance perfectly right, and it has my warmest approbation"

"And I hope," said his nephew, "that the rest of my conduct will not be found to deserve censure I appeared, sir, with this gentleman's daughter at some places of public amusement, thus, what was levity, scandal called by a harsher name, and it was reported that I had debauched her I waited on her father in person, willing to clear the thing to his satisfaction, and he received me only with insult and abuse As for the rest, with regard to his being here my attorney and steward can best inform you, as I commit the management of business entirely to them. If he has contracted debts, and is unwilling or even unable to pay them, it is their business to proceed in this manner, and I see no hardship or injustice in pursuing the most legal means of redress"

"If this," cried Sir William, "be as you have stated it, there is nothing unpardonable in your offences; and, though your conduct might have been more generous, in not suffering this gentleman to be oppressed by subordinate tyranny, yet it has been at least equitable."

"He cannot contradict a single particular," replied the squire; "I defy him to do so, and several of my servants are ready to attest what I say. Thus, sir," continued he, finding that I was silent, for in fact I could not contradict him, — "thus, sir, my own innocence is vindicated but though, at your entreaty, I am ready to forgive this gentleman every other offence, yet his attempts to lessen me in your esteem excite a resentment that I cannot govern, and this, too, at a time when his son was actually preparing to take away my life, — this, I say, was such guilt that I am determined to let the law take its course I have here the challenge that was sent me, and two witnesses to prove it; one of my servants has been wounded dangerously, and even though my uncle himself should dissuade me, which I know he will not, yet I will see public justice done, and he shall suffer for it"

"Thou monster!" cried my wife, "hast thou not had vengeance enough already, but must my poor boy feel thy cruelty? I hope that good Sir William will protect us, for my son is as innocent as a child, I am sure he is, and never did harm to man"

"Madam," replied the good man, "your wishes for his safety are not greater than mine, but I am sorry to find his guilt too plain, and if my nephew persists —" But the appearance of Jenkinson and the jailer's two servants now called off our attention, who entered hauling in a tall man, very genteelly dressed, and answering the description already given of the ruffian who had carried off my daughter "Here," cried Jenkinson, pulling him in, "here we have him, and if ever there was a candidate for Tyburn, this is one"

The moment Mr Thornhill perceived the prisoner and Jenkinson, who had him in custody, he seemed to shrink back with terror His face became pale with conscious guilt, and he would have withdrawn, but Jenkinson, who perceived his design, stopped him "What, squire," cried he, "are you ashamed of your two old acquaintances, Jenkinson and Baxter? But this is the way that all great men forget their friends, though I am resolved we will not forget you Our prisoner, please your honor," continued he, turning to Sir William, "has already confessed all This is the gentleman reported to be so dangerously wounded, he declares that it was Mr. Thornhill who first put him upon this affair; that he gave him the clothes he now wears, to appear like a gentleman, and furnished him with a post-chaise. The plan was laid between them that he should carry off the young lady to a place of safety, and that there he should threaten and terrify her; but Mr. Thornhill was to come in in the mean time, as if by accident, to her rescue, and that they should fight awhile, and then he was to run off, by which Mr. Thornhill would have the better opportunity of gaining her affections himself, under the character of her defender."

Sir William remembered the coat to have been frequently worn by his nephew, and all the rest the prisoner himself confirmed by a more circumstantial account, concluding that Mr. Thornhill had often declared to him that he was in love with both sisters at the same time.

"Heavens!" cried Sir William; "what a viper have I been fostering in my bosom! And so fond of public justice, too, as he seemed to be! But he shall have it — secure him, Mr. Jailer — yet hold, I fear there is no legal evidence to detain him."

Upon this, Mr. Thornhill, with the utmost humility, entreated that two such abandoned wretches might not be admitted as evidence against him, but that his servants should be examined. "Your servants!" replied Sir William; "wretch, call them yours no longer; but come, let us hear what those fellows have to say; let his butler be called."

When the butler was introduced, he soon perceived, by his former master's looks, that all his power was now over. "Tell me," cried Sir William, sternly, "have you ever seen your master and that fellow dressed up in his clothes in company together?" — "Yes, please your honor," cried the butler, "a thousand times; he was the man that always brought him his ladies." — "How!" interrupted young Mr. Thornhill, "this to my face?" — "Yes," replied the butler, "or to any man's face. To tell you a truth, Master Thornhill, I never either loved you or liked you, and I don't care if I tell you now a piece of my mind." — "Now, then," cried Jenkinson, "tell his honor whether you know anything of me." — "I can't say," replied the butler, "that I know much good of you. The night that gentleman's daughter was deluded to our house, you was one of them." — "So, then," cried Sir William, "I find you have brought a very fine witness to prove your innocence; thou stain to humanity! to associate with such wretches! But," continuing his examination, "you tell me, Mr. Butler, that this was the person who brought him this old gentleman's daughter?" — "No, please your honor," replied the butler; "he did not bring her, for the squire himself undertook that business: but he brought the priest that pretended to marry them." — "It is but too true," cried Jenkinson, "I cannot deny it; that was the employment assigned to me; and I confess it to my confusion."

"Good heavens!" exclaimed the worthy baronet; "how every new discovery of his villany alarms me! All his guilt is now too plain, and I find his present prosecution was dictated by tyranny, cowardice, and revenge; at my request, Mr. Jailer, set this young officer, now your prisoner, free, and trust to me for the consequences. I'll make it my business to set the affair in a proper light to my friend, the magistrate who has committed him. But where is the unfortunate young lady herself? let her appear to confront this wretch; I long to know by what arts he has seduced her. Entreat her to come in; where is she?"

"Ah, sir," said I, "that question stings me to the heart; I was once indeed happy in a daughter, but her miseries —" Another interruption here prevented me; for who should make her appearance but Miss Arabella Wilmot, who was the next day to have been married to Mr. Thornhill. Nothing could equal her surprise at seeing Sir William and his nephew here before her; for her arrival was quite accidental. It happened that she and the old gentleman, her father, were passing through the town, on their way to her aunt's, who had insisted that her nuptials with Mr. Thornhill should be consummated at her house; but, stopping for refreshment, they put up at an inn at the other end of the town. It was there, from the window, that the young lady happened to observe one of my little boys playing in the street, and instantly sending a footman to bring the child to her, she learned from him some account of our misfortunes, but was still kept ignorant of young Mr. Thornhill's being the cause. Though her father made several remonstrances on the impropriety of her going to a prison to visit us, yet they were ineffectual; she desired the child to conduct her, which he did; and it was thus she surprised us at a juncture so unexpected.

Nor can I go on without a reflection on those accidental meetings which, though they happen every day, seldom excite our surprise but upon some extraordinary occasion. To what a fortuitous concurrence do we not owe every pleasure and convenience of our lives! How many seeming accidents must unite before we can be clothed or fed! The peasant must be disposed to labor; the shower must fall, the wind fill the merchant's sail, or numbers must want the usual supply.

We all continued silent for some moments, while my charming pupil, which was the name I generally gave this young lady, united in her looks compassion and astonishment, which gave new finishings to her beauty. "Indeed, my dear Mr. Thornhill," cried she, to the squire, who she supposed was come here to succor, and not to oppress us, "I take it a little unkindly that you should come here without me, or never inform me of the situation of a family so dear to us both; you know I should take as much pleasure in contributing to the relief of my reverend old master here, whom I shall ever esteem, as you can. But I find that, like your uncle, you take a pleasure in doing good in secret."

"He find pleasure in doing good!" cried Sir William, interrupting her; "no, my dear, his pleasures are as base as he is. You see in him, madam, as complete a villain as ever disgraced humanity. A wretch who, after having deluded this poor man's daughter, after plotting against the innocence of her sister, has thrown the father into prison, and the eldest son into fetters because he had the courage to face his betrayer! And give me leave, madam, now to congratulate you upon an escape from the embraces of such a monster."

"O goodness!" cried the lovely girl; "how have I been deceived! Mr. Thornhill informed me, for certain, that this gentleman's eldest son, Captain Primrose, was gone off to America with his new-married lady."

"My sweetest miss," cried my wife, "he has told you nothing but falsehoods. My son George never left the kingdom, nor ever was married. Though you have forsaken him, he has always loved you too well to think of anybody else; and I have heard him say he would die a bachelor for your sake." She then proceeded to expatiate upon the sincerity of her son's passion; she set his duel with Mr. Thornhill in a proper light; thence she made a rapid digression to the squire's debaucheries, his pretended marriages, and ended with a most insulting picture of his cowardice.

"Good heavens!" cried Miss Wilmot; "how very near have I been to the brink of ruin: but how great is my pleasure to have escaped it! Ten thousand falsehoods has this gentleman told me! He had at last art enough to persuade me that my promise to the only man I esteemed was no longer binding, since he had been unfaithful. By his falsehoods I was taught to detest one equally brave and generous."

But by this time my son was freed from the encumbrances of justice, as the person supposed to be wounded was detected to be an impostor. Mr. Jenkinson, also, who had acted as his valet-de-chambre, had dressed up his hair, and furnished him with whatever was necessary to make a genteel appearance. He now therefore entered, handsomely dressed in his regimentals, and, without vanity (for I am above it), he appeared as handsome a fellow as ever wore a military dress. As he entered, he made Miss Wilmot a modest and distant bow, for he was not as yet acquainted with the change which the eloquence of his mother had wrought in his favor. But no decorums could restrain the impatience of his blushing mistress to be forgiven. Her tears, her looks, all contributed to discover the real sensations of her heart for having forgotten her former promise, and having suffered herself to be deluded by an impostor. My son appeared amazed at her condescension, and could scarcely believe it real. "Sure, madam," cried he, "this is but delusion! I can never have merited this! To be blessed thus is to be too happy!" — "No, sir," replied she. "I have been deceived, basely deceived; else nothing could have ever made me unjust to my promise. You know my friendship, you have long known it; but forget what I have done, and as you once had my warmest vows of constancy, you shall now have them repeated; and be assured that if your Arabella cannot be yours, she shall never be another's." — "And no other's you shall be," cried Sir William, "if I have any influence with your father."

This hint was sufficient for my son Moses, who immediately flew to the inn where the old gentleman was, to inform him of every circumstance that had happened. But in the mean time the squire, perceiving that he was on every side undone, now finding that no hopes were left from flattery or dissimulation, concluded that his wisest way would be to turn and face his pursuers. Thus laying aside all shame, he appeared the open and hardy villain. "I find, then," cried he, "that I am to expect no justice here; but I am resolved it shall be done me. You shall know, sir," turning to Sir William, "I am no longer a poor dependant upon your favors. I scorn them. Nothing can keep Miss Wilmot's fortune from me, which, I thank her father's assiduity, is pretty large. The articles, and a bond for her fortune, are signed and safe in my possession. It was her fortune, not her person, that induced me to wish for this match; and possessed of the one, let who will take the other."

This was an alarming blow; Sir William was sensible of the justness of his claims, for he had been instrumental in drawing up the marriage articles himself. Miss Wilmot, therefore, perceiving that her fortune was irretrievably lost, turning to my son, she asked if the loss of fortune could lessen her value to him. "Though fortune," said she, "is out of my power, at least I have my hand to give."

"And that, madam," cried her real lover, "was indeed all that you ever had to give; at least, all that I ever thought worth the acceptance. And now I protest, my Arabella, by all that 's happy, your want of fortune this moment increases my pleasure, as it serves to convince my sweet girl of my sincerity."

Mr. Wilmot now entering, he seemed not a little pleased at the danger his daughter had just escaped, and readily consented to a dissolution of the match. But, finding that her fortune, which was secured to Mr. Thornhill by bond, would not be given up, nothing could exceed his disappointment. He now saw that his money must all go to enrich one who had no fortune of his own. He could bear his being a rascal, but to want an equivalent to his daughter's fortune was wormwood. He sat, therefore, for some minutes, employed in the most mortifying speculations, till Sir William attempted to lessen his anxiety. "I must confess, sir," cried he, "that your present disappointment does not entirely displease me. Your immoderate passion for wealth is now justly punished. But though the young lady cannot be rich, she has still a competence sufficient to give content. Here you see an honest young soldier, who is willing to take her without fortune; they have long loved each other, and, for the friendship I bear his father, my interest shall not be wanting in his promotion. Leave, then, that ambition which disappoints you, and for once admit that happiness which courts your acceptance."

"Sir William," replied the old gentleman, "be assured I never yet forced her inclination, nor will I now. If she still continues to love this young gentleman, let her have him with all my heart. There is still, thank Heaven, some fortune left, and your promise will make it something more. Only let my old friend here," meaning me, "give me a promise of settling six thousand pounds upon my girl, if ever he should come to his fortune, and I am ready this night to be the first to join them together."

As it now remained with me to make the young couple happy, I readily gave a promise of making the settlement he required; which, to one who had such little expectations as I, was no great favor. We had now, therefore, the satisfaction of seeing them fly into each other's arms in a transport. "After all my misfortunes," cried my son George, "to be thus rewarded! Sure this is more than I could ever have presumed to hope for. To be possessed of all that 's good, and after such an interval of pain! my warmest wishes could never rise so high!" — "Yes, my George," returned his lovely bride, "now let the wretch take my fortune; since you are happy without it, so am I. O, what an exchange have I made from the basest of men to the dearest, best! Let him enjoy our fortune; I now can be happy even in indigence." — "And I promise you," cried the squire, with a malicious grin, "that I shall be very happy with what you despise." — "Hold, hold, sir," cried Jenkinson, "there are two words to that bargain. As for that lady's fortune, sir, you shall never touch a single stiver of it. Pray, your honor," continued he to Sir William, "can the squire have this lady's fortune if he be married to another?" — "How can you make such a simple demand?" replied the baronet; "undoubtedly he cannot." — "I am sorry for that," cried Jenkinson; "for as this gentleman and I have been old fellow-sporters, I have a friendship for him. But I must declare, well as I love him, that his contract is not worth a tobacco-stopper, for he is married already." — "You lie like a rascal," returned the squire, who seemed roused by this insult; "I never was legally married to any woman." — "Indeed, begging your honor's pardon," replied the other, "you were; and I hope you will show a proper return of friendship to your own honest Jenkinson, who brings you a wife; and if the company restrain their curiosity a few minutes, they shall see her." So saying, he went off with his usual celerity, and left us all unable to form any probable conjecture as to his design. "Ay, let him go," cried the squire, "whatever else I may have done, I defy him there. I am too old now to be frightened with squibs."

"I am surprised," said the baronet, "what the fellow can intend by this. Some low piece of humor, I suppose" — "Perhaps, sir," replied I, "he may have a more serious meaning. For when we reflect on the various schemes this gentleman has laid to seduce innocence, perhaps some one, more artful than the rest, has been found able to deceive him. When we consider what numbers he has ruined, how many parents now feel with anguish the infamy and the contamination which he has brought into their families, it would not surprise me if some of them — Amazement! Do I see my lost daughter? Do I hold her? It is, my life, my happiness! I thought thee lost, my Olivia, yet still I hold thee, and still thou shalt live to bless me!" The warmest transports of the fondest lover were not greater than mine, when I saw him introduce my child, and held my daughter in my arms, whose silence only spoke her raptures. "And art thou returned to me, my darling," cried I, "to be my comfort in age?" — "That she is," cried Jenkinson, "and make much of her, for she is your own honorable child, and as honest a woman as any in the whole room, let the other be who she will. And as for you, squire, as sure as you stand there, this young lady is your lawfully wedded wife: and to convince you that I speak nothing but the truth, here is the license by which you were married together." So saying, he put the license into the baronet's hand, who read it, and found it perfect in every respect. "And now, gentlemen," continued he, "I find you are surprised at all this; but a very few words will explain the difficulty. That there squire of renown, for whom I have a great friendship, — but that 's between ourselves, — has often employed me in doing odd little things for him. Among the rest, he commissioned me to procure him a false license and a false priest, in order to deceive this young lady. But as I was very much his friend, what did I do but went and got a true license and a true priest, and married them both as fast as the cloth could make them? Perhaps you 'll think it was generosity made me do all this. But no. To my shame I confess it, my only design was to keep the license, and let the squire know that I could prove it upon him whenever I thought proper, and so make him come down whenever I wanted money." A burst of pleasure now seemed to fill the whole apartment; our joy even reached the common room, where the prisoners themselves sympathized,

"And shook their chains
In transport and rude harmony."

Happiness was expanded upon every face, and even Olivia's cheeks seemed flushed with pleasure. To be thus restored to reputation, to friends and fortune at once, was a rapture sufficient to stop the progress of decay, and restore former health and vivacity. But perhaps among all there was not one who felt sincerer pleasure than I. Still holding the dear loved child in my arms, I asked my heart if these transports were not delusion. "How could you," cried I, turning to Jenkinson,—"how could you add to my miseries by the story of her death? But it matters not; my pleasure at finding her again is more than a recompense for the pain."

"As to your question," replied Jenkinson, "that is easily answered. I thought the only probable means of freeing you from prison was by submitting to the squire, and consenting to his marriage with the other young lady. But these you had vowed never to grant while your daughter was living; there was, therefore, no other method to bring things to bear, but by persuading you that she was dead. I prevailed on your wife to join in the deceit, and we have not had a fit opportunity of undeceiving you till now."

In the whole assembly there now appeared only two faces that did not glow with transport. Mr. Thornhill's assurance had entirely forsaken him; he now saw the gulf of infamy and want before him, and trembled to take the plunge. He therefore fell on his knees before his uncle, and in a voice of piercing misery implored compassion. Sir William was going to spurn him away, but at my request he raised him, and, after pausing a few moments, — "Thy vices, crimes, and ingratitude," cried he, "deserve no tenderness, yet thou shalt not be entirely forsaken; a bare competence shall be supplied to support the wants of life, but not its follies. This young lady, thy wife, shall be put in possession of a third part of that fortune which once was thine; and from her tenderness alone thou art to expect any extraordinary supplies for the future." He was going to express his gratitude for such kindness in a set speech; but the baronet prevented him, by bidding him not aggravate his meanness, which was already but too apparent. He ordered him at the same time to be gone, and from all his former domestics to choose one, and such as he should think proper, which was all that should be granted to attend him.

As soon as he had left us, Sir William very politely stepped up to his new niece with a smile, and wished her joy. His example was followed by Miss Wilmot and her father: my wife, too, kissed her daughter with much affection, as, to use her own expression, she was now made an honest woman of. Sophia and Moses followed in turn, and even our benefactor Jenkinson desired to be admitted to that honor. Our satisfaction seemed scarcely capable of increase. Sir William, whose greatest pleasure was in doing good, now looked round, with a countenance open as the sun, and saw nothing but joy in the looks of all except that of my daughter Sophia, who, for some reasons we could not comprehend, did not seem perfectly satisfied. "I think now," cried he, with a smile, "that all the company, except one or two, seem perfectly happy. There only remains an act of justice for me to do. You are sensible, sir," continued he, turning to me, "of the obligations we both owe to Mr. Jenkinson; and it is but just we should both reward him for it. Miss Sophia will, I am sure, make him very happy, and he shall have from me five hundred pounds as her fortune; and upon this I am sure they can live very comfortably together. Come, Miss Sophia, what say you to this match of my making? — will you have him?" My poor girl seemed almost sinking into her mother's arms at the hideous proposal. "Have him, sir!" cried she, faintly, "no, sir, never!" — "What!" cried he again, "not have Mr. Jenkinson, your benefactor; a handsome young fellow, with five hundred pounds, and good expectations!" — "I beg, sir," returned she, scarcely able to speak, "that you'll desist, and not make me so very wretched." — "Was ever such obstinacy known," cried he again, "to refuse the man whom the family has such infinite obligations to, who has preserved your sister, and who has five hundred pounds? What, not have him!" — "No, sir, never," replied she, angrily; "I'd sooner die first!" — "If that be the case, then," cried he, "if you will not have him, — I think I must have you myself." And so saying he caught her to his breast with ardor. "My loveliest, my most sensible of girls," cried he, "how could you ever think your own Burchell could deceive you, or that Sir William Thornhill could ever cease to admire a mistress that loved him for himself alone? I have for some years sought for a woman who, a stranger to my fortune, could think I had merit as a man. After having tried in vain, even among the pert and the ugly, how great at last must be my rapture to have made a conquest over such sense and such heavenly beauty!" Then, turning to Jenkinson, — "As I cannot, sir, part with this young lady myself, for she hath taken a fancy to the cut of my face, all the recompense I can make is to give you her fortune; and you may call upon my steward to-morrow for five hundred pounds." Thus we had all our compliments to repeat, and Lady Thornhill underwent the same round of ceremony that her sister had done before. In the mean time Sir William's gentleman appeared, to tell us that the equipages were ready to carry us to the inn, where everything was prepared for our reception. My wife and I led the van, and left those gloomy mansions of sorrow. The generous baronet ordered forty pounds to be distributed among the prisoners, and Mr. Wilmot, induced by his example, gave half that sum. We were received below by the shouts of the villagers, and I saw and shook by the hand two or three of my honest parishioners, who were among the number. They attended us to our inn, where a sumptuous entertainment was provided, and coarser provisions distributed in great quantities among the populace.

After supper, as my spirits were exhausted by the alternation of pleasure and pain which they had sustained during the day, I asked permission to withdraw; and leaving the company in the midst of their mirth, as soon as I found myself alone I poured out my heart in gratitude to the Giver of joy as well as of sorrow, and then slept undisturbed till morning.

CHAPTER XXXII.

THE CONCLUSION.

THE next morning, as soon as I awaked, I found my eldest son sitting at my bedside, who came to increase my joy with another turn of fortune in my favor. First, having released me from the settlement that I had made the day before in his favor, he let me know that my merchant, who had failed in town, was arrested at Antwerp, and there had given up effects to a much greater amount than what was due to his creditors. My boy's generosity pleased me almost as much as this unlooked-for good fortune. But I had some doubt whether I ought in justice to accept this offer. While I was pondering upon this Sir William entered the room, to whom I communicated my doubts. His opinion was that as my son was already possessed of a very affluent fortune by his marriage, I might accept his offer without hesitation. His business, however, was to inform me that, as he had the night before sent for the licenses, and expected them every hour, he hoped that I would not refuse my assistance in making all the company happy that morning.

A footman entered while we were speaking, to tell us that the messenger was returned; and as I was by this time ready, I went down, where I found the whole company as merry as affluence and innocence could make them. However, as they were now preparing for a very solemn ceremony, their laughter entirely displeased me. I told them of the grave, becoming, and sublime deportment they should assume upon this mystical occasion, and read them two homilies and a thesis of my own composing in order to prepare them. Yet they still seemed perfectly refractory and ungovernable. Even as we were going along to church, to which I led the way, all gravity had quite forsaken them, and I was often tempted to turn back in indignation. In church a new dilemma arose, which promised no easy solution. This was, which couple should be married first; my son's bride warmly insisted that Lady Thornhill (that was to be) should take the lead; but this the other refused with equal ardor, protesting she would not be guilty of such rudeness for the world. The argument was supported for some time between both with equal obstinacy and good-breeding. But as as I stood all this time with my book ready, I was at last quite tired of the contest, and, shutting it, "I perceive," cried I, "that none of you have a mind to be married, and I think we had as good go back again; for I suppose there will be no business done here to-day." This at once reduced them to reason. The baronet and his lady were first married, and then my son and his lovely partner.

I had previously that morning given orders that a coach should be sent for my honest neighbor Flamborough and his family, by which means, upon our return to the inn, we had the pleasure of finding the two Miss Flamboroughs alighted before us. Mr. Jenkinson gave his hand to the eldest, and my son Moses led up the other; and I have since found that he has taken a real liking to the girl, and my consent and bounty he shall have whenever he thinks proper to demand them. We were no sooner returned to the inn, but numbers of my parishioners, hearing of my success, came to congratulate me; but among the rest were those who rose to rescue me, and whom I formerly rebuked with such sharpness. I told the story to Sir William, my son-in-law, who went out and reproved them with great severity; but finding them quite disheartened by this harsh reproof, he gave them half a guinea apiece to drink his health and raise their dejected spirits.

Soon after this we were called to a very genteel entertainment, which was dressed by Mr. Thornhill's cook. And it may not be improper to observe, with respect to that gentleman, that he now resides in quality of companion at a relation's house, being very well liked, and seldom sitting at the side-table, except when there is no room at the other, for they make no stranger of him. His time is pretty much taken up in keeping his relation, who is a little melancholy, in spirits, and in learning to blow the French horn. My eldest daughter, however, still remembers him with regret; and she has even told me, though I make a great secret of it, that when he reforms she may be brought to relent. But, to return, for I am apt to digress thus: when we were to sit down to dinner, our ceremonies were going to be renewed. The question was, whether my eldest daughter, as being a matron, should not sit above the two young brides; but the debate was cut short by my son George, who proposed that the company should sit indiscriminately, every gentleman by his lady. This was received with great approbation by all, excepting my wife, who, I could perceive, was not perfectly satisfied, as she expected to have had the pleasure of sitting at the head of the table and carving the meat for all the company. But, notwithstanding this, it is impossible to describe our good-humor. I cannot say whether we had more wit among us now than usual, but I am certain we had more laughing, which answered the end as well. One jest I particularly remember: old Mr. Wilmot drinking to Moses, whose head was turned another way, my son replied, "Madam, I thank you." Upon which the old gentleman, winking upon the rest of the company, observed that he was thinking of his mistress. At which jest I thought the two Miss Flamboroughs would have died with laughing. As soon as dinner was over, according to my old custom, I requested that the table might be taken away, to have the pleasure of seeing all my family assembled once more by a cheerful fireside. My two little ones sat upon each knee, the rest of the company by their partners. I had nothing now on this side of the grave to wish for; all my cares were over; my pleasure was unspeakable. It now only remained that my gratitude in good fortune should exceed my former submission in adversity.

INTRODUCTION.

JONATHAN SWIFT, the Dean of St. Patrick's, Dublin, was descended from the younger branch of the family of the Swifts, in Yorkshire. He was born in Dublin, November 30, 1667, being St. Andrew's Day; the house is still pointed out.

At the age of six Swift was sent to the school of Kilkenny, and at fourteen admitted into the University of Dublin. While he was at the University, he appears to have disliked and neglected the line of study which was at that time cultivated, and a proficiency in which was necessary for the attainment of his degree. Instead of mastering the intricacies of the old Treatises on Logic, written by those great men, Smeglesius, Kechermanus, and Burgesdicius, he passed his time more agreeably in reading poetry and history, and he told his tutor that he could reason without the assistance of the artificial rules of logic. There is a proof, however, that though he turned aside from the path of academic study, his voluntary reading was extensive and various, for he had drawn up a rough sketch of the "Tale of a Tub," which he communicated to his friend, Mr. Waryng. The first time he sat for his degree it was refused him; and so pertinaciously did he adhere to his determination not to attend to the necessary line of studies, that when he went up a second time he succeeded only through the interest of his friends. He remained in the college nearly three years after this, not through choice, but necessity. Little known or regarded by scholars, he was esteemed a blockhead; and as his poverty would not allow him to keep company of an equal rank with himself, or on an equal footing, he scorned to take up with those of a lower class, or to be obliged to those of a higher. He lived therefore much alone, and his time was employed in pursuing his course of reading in history and poetry, then very unfashionable studies for an academic, or in gloomy meditations on his own unhappy circumstances.

On the breaking out of the war in Ireland, Swift left that country to visit his mother at Leicester, in England, and to consult with her on his future plans and prospects of life. He was now in his one-and-twentieth year, not qualified by particular study for any profession, except, perhaps, for the Church; his academical reputation was not advantageous to him; the recluseness of his life had rendered him little known, and the spleen and severity of his temper had not attracted many friends.

Without any letter of recommendation to introduce him in England, and without any acquaintance who could assist him, by the recommendation of his mother he went to see Sir William Temple, whose lady was a distant relation of hers, and communicate to him his depressed situation and gloomy prospects. When he arrived at Shene, the residence of the retired statesman, his story was listened to with compassionate attention; he was cheerfully received into his house, and treated with kindness and generosity. Although he was not admitted to much personal familiarity with his illustrious kinsman, yet he found in his house what was of invaluable advantage, — sound advice with regard to the prosecution of his studies, and a secure and elegant retirement, where he could pursue them undisturbed.

For eight years he followed a system of study, according to his own account, of not less than eight hours a day. In 1692 he went to Oxford, to take his Master's degree, to which he was admitted on the 5th of July, 1692. From Oxford he paid a visit to his mother, and then returned to Moor Park. Two years later he procured a slight recommendation to Lord Capel, then lord deputy of Ireland, and was ordained in September, 1694, and appointed to a small country living, being then almost twenty-seven years old; but soon tiring of his obscure position, he returned to Moor Park.

Sir William Temple died in the year 1699, leaving Swift a legacy, and the advantage to be derived from publishing his posthumous writings. He also obtained from King William a promise of a stall at Canterbury or Westminster for him. How much Swift esteemed him may be seen in a part of the register which he kept of Sir William's illness, where he concludes: "He died at one o'clock in the morning, and with him all that was great and good among men."

Swift then removed to London, and his first care was to discharge the trust reposed on him of publishing a full and correct edition of his patron's works. This he dedicated to the king. After waiting some time for the fulfilment of the promise made for his advancement in the Church, he addressed a memorial to the monarch; but getting no encouragement, he relinquished his hopes of preferment and accepted the offer made to him by Lord Berkeley, of attending him to Ireland as his private secretary and chaplain. When they arrived at Dublin he found himself supplanted in his former office by a person of the name of Bush, who had ingratiated himself into his lordship's favor, and was obliged to take a small living at Laracor. After this he restlessly changed his residence between England and Ireland every few years, and entered actively into the literary pursuit of politics.

In 1704 the celebrated "Tale of a Tub" was published. Though it appeared without a name, yet it had been often shown in manuscript, at Sir William Temple's, to his relatives and friends. Swift, with singular indifference to fame, had kept this piece by him for eight years after it had been completely finished. There can be no doubt but that the offence given by this work proved to be the real bar which prevented his ever attaining an eminent situation in the Church. After its publication he wrote nothing of consequence for three or four years. He formed, however, a very close connection with Addison, which ripened into a sincere and lasting friendship. Swift considered his conversation to be the most agreeable he ever met with; and Addison appears to have thought most highly of the genius of Swift.

After many difficulties and much procrastination, in April, 1713, the Deanery of St. Patrick was obtained for him, worth about seven hundred a year, which he professed to consider only as an honorable exile. Swift was anxious for preferment in England, but it could not be obtained; and in June he set out, in no very good humor, for Ireland, to be installed. Here he made himself active in his duties, and gained great popularity and influence, but kept up his political writing both in Ireland and England.

In November of 1727 "Gulliver's Travels" made their public appearance, after having been privately seen and admired by Swift's friends in England.

The plan of this entertaining and delightful satire varies, as Scott observes, in its different parts. The voyage to Lilliput refers chiefly to the court and politics of England. Walpole is plainly intimated under the character of Mr. Premier Flimnap; the factions of high and low heels express the Tories and the Whigs; the Small-endians and Big-endians the religious divisions of Papist and Protestant; and when the heir-apparent was described as wearing one heel high and one low, the Prince of Wales, who at that time divided his favor between the two leading political parties of England, laughed heartily at the comparison. The scandal which Gulliver gave to the empress by his mode of extinguishing the flames in the Royal Palace seems to intimate the author's own disgrace with Queen Anne, founded on the indecorum of the "Tale of a Tub," which was remembered against him as a crime, while the service which it had rendered the cause of the High Church was forgotten.

In the voyage to Brobdingnag the satire is of a more general character; nor is it easy to trace any particular reference to the political events or statesmen of the time. It seems intended to show in the most forcible manner the vanity of our desires and the insignificance of our pursuits, by exhibiting the opinions formed of them by beings of superior power and more philosophical thought, and more cool and less passionate temperaments. The two other parts, the Voyage to Laputa and the Voyage to the Land of the Houyhnhnms, are of less interest, and being somewhat gross have fallen into neglect. They are not reproduced here.

While in Ireland, Swift gave much attention to local public affairs; in a variety of publications relating to Ireland he laid open the causes of her distress and poverty, and pointed out the means by which they might be alleviated: and he also directed his attention to some of the best-planned charities that were ever supported from a private purse. He gave very largely in proportion to his fortune. After his settlement at the Deanery, and when he was out of debt, he divided his income into three parts: one he appropriated to his own support and his domestic expenses; the second he laid up as a provision against the accidents of life, and ultimately with a view to a charitable foundation after his death; and the third he disposed of in charities to the poor and distressed. He lent to poor industrious tradesmen small sums of five and ten pounds, to be repaid, with interest, weekly; and he always demanded good security for the repayment. Sheridan says that he has been well assured that many families in Dublin, now living in great credit, owed the foundation of their fortunes to the sums first borrowed from this source. His reputation for wisdom and integrity was so great that he was consulted by several corporations in matters of trade; and he was not seldom chosen umpire in their decisions. By his integrity, his patriotism, by the superiority of his talents, and his endeavors to serve the public, he obtained a remarkable ascendency over the people of Ireland, and he was known over the whole kingdom as the Dean. In a letter which Lord Carteret, the chief governor of Ireland, wrote to him in 1732, he says, "I know by experience how much the city of Dublin thinks itself under your protection, and how strictly they obeyed all orders fulminated from the sovereignty of St. Patrick's"; and in the postscript to another of March 24, 1736, he says, "When people asked me how I governed Ireland, I say that I pleased Dr. Swift."

Swift had now relinquished all expectations of further preferment. Walpole was exasperated against him on account of some severe poems which he had written, and some forged letters in favor of Mr. Barber, bearing the Dean's signature, had excited the displeasure of the queen.

About the year 1736 his memory was greatly impaired, and the general powers of the intellect showed marks of decay. He always entertained apprehensions that he should outlive his understanding. Dr. Young has recorded an instance of this, where he relates that, walking out with Swift and some others about a mile from Dublin, he suddenly missed Mr. Dean, who had stayed behind the rest of the company. He turned back in order to know the occasion of it, and found Swift at some distance, gazing intensely at the top of a lofty elm whose head had been blasted. Upon Young's approach he pointed to it, saying, "I shall be like that tree; I shall die first at the top."

Not long after this time his understanding failed to such a degree that it was found necessary to have legal guardians appointed to take care of his present estate. This was followed by a fit of lunacy which continued some months, and then he sank into a state of idiocy which lasted to his death. He died October 19, 1745. When the death of the Dean, so beloved and admired in Ireland as he was, was announced, the citizens of Dublin gathered from all quarters, and forced their way in crowds into the house, to pay the last tribute of grief to their departed benefactor. Nothing but lamentations was heard round all the quarter where he lived; and happy were they who first got into the chamber where he lay, to procure locks of his hair, —

> "Bequeathing it as a rich legacy > Unto their issue."

So eager, says Sheridan, were numbers to obtain at any price this precious memorial, that in less than an hour his head was stripped of all its silver ornaments, so that not a hair remained. He was buried in the most private manner, according to the directions of his will, in the great aisle of St. Patrick's Cathedral; and, by way of monument, a slab of black marble was placed against the wall, on which was engraved a Latin epitaph, written by himself.

Swift was in person tall, strong, and well made; of a dark complexion, but with blue eyes, black and bushy eyebrows, nose somewhat aquiline, and features which expressed the boldness and confidence of his mind; he never was known to laugh; and, according to Scott, the description of Cassius, in Shakespeare, might be applied to him: —

"He reads much;
He is a great observer, and he looks
Quite through the deeds of men. —
Seldom he smiles; and smiles in such a sort
As if he mocked himself, and scorned his spirit
That could be moved to smile at anything"

His features have been preserved in many busts, prints, and medals. In youth he was reckoned handsome. Pope says that his eyes were as azure as the heavens, and had an unusual expression of acuteness. In old age his countenance was dignified and expressive. He spoke in public with facility and force; and had he been on the bench of bishops, he would have been of great assistance to the ministry in the House of Lords. "The government of Ireland," says Scott, "dreaded his eloquence as much as his pen." His manners in society were free, lively, and engaging: and even when age and infirmities had impaired his spirits and his temper, his conversation was still valued for the richness of the anecdotes, the acquaintance which it displayed with mankind, the liveliness of his repartees, and shrewdness and satire of the wit.

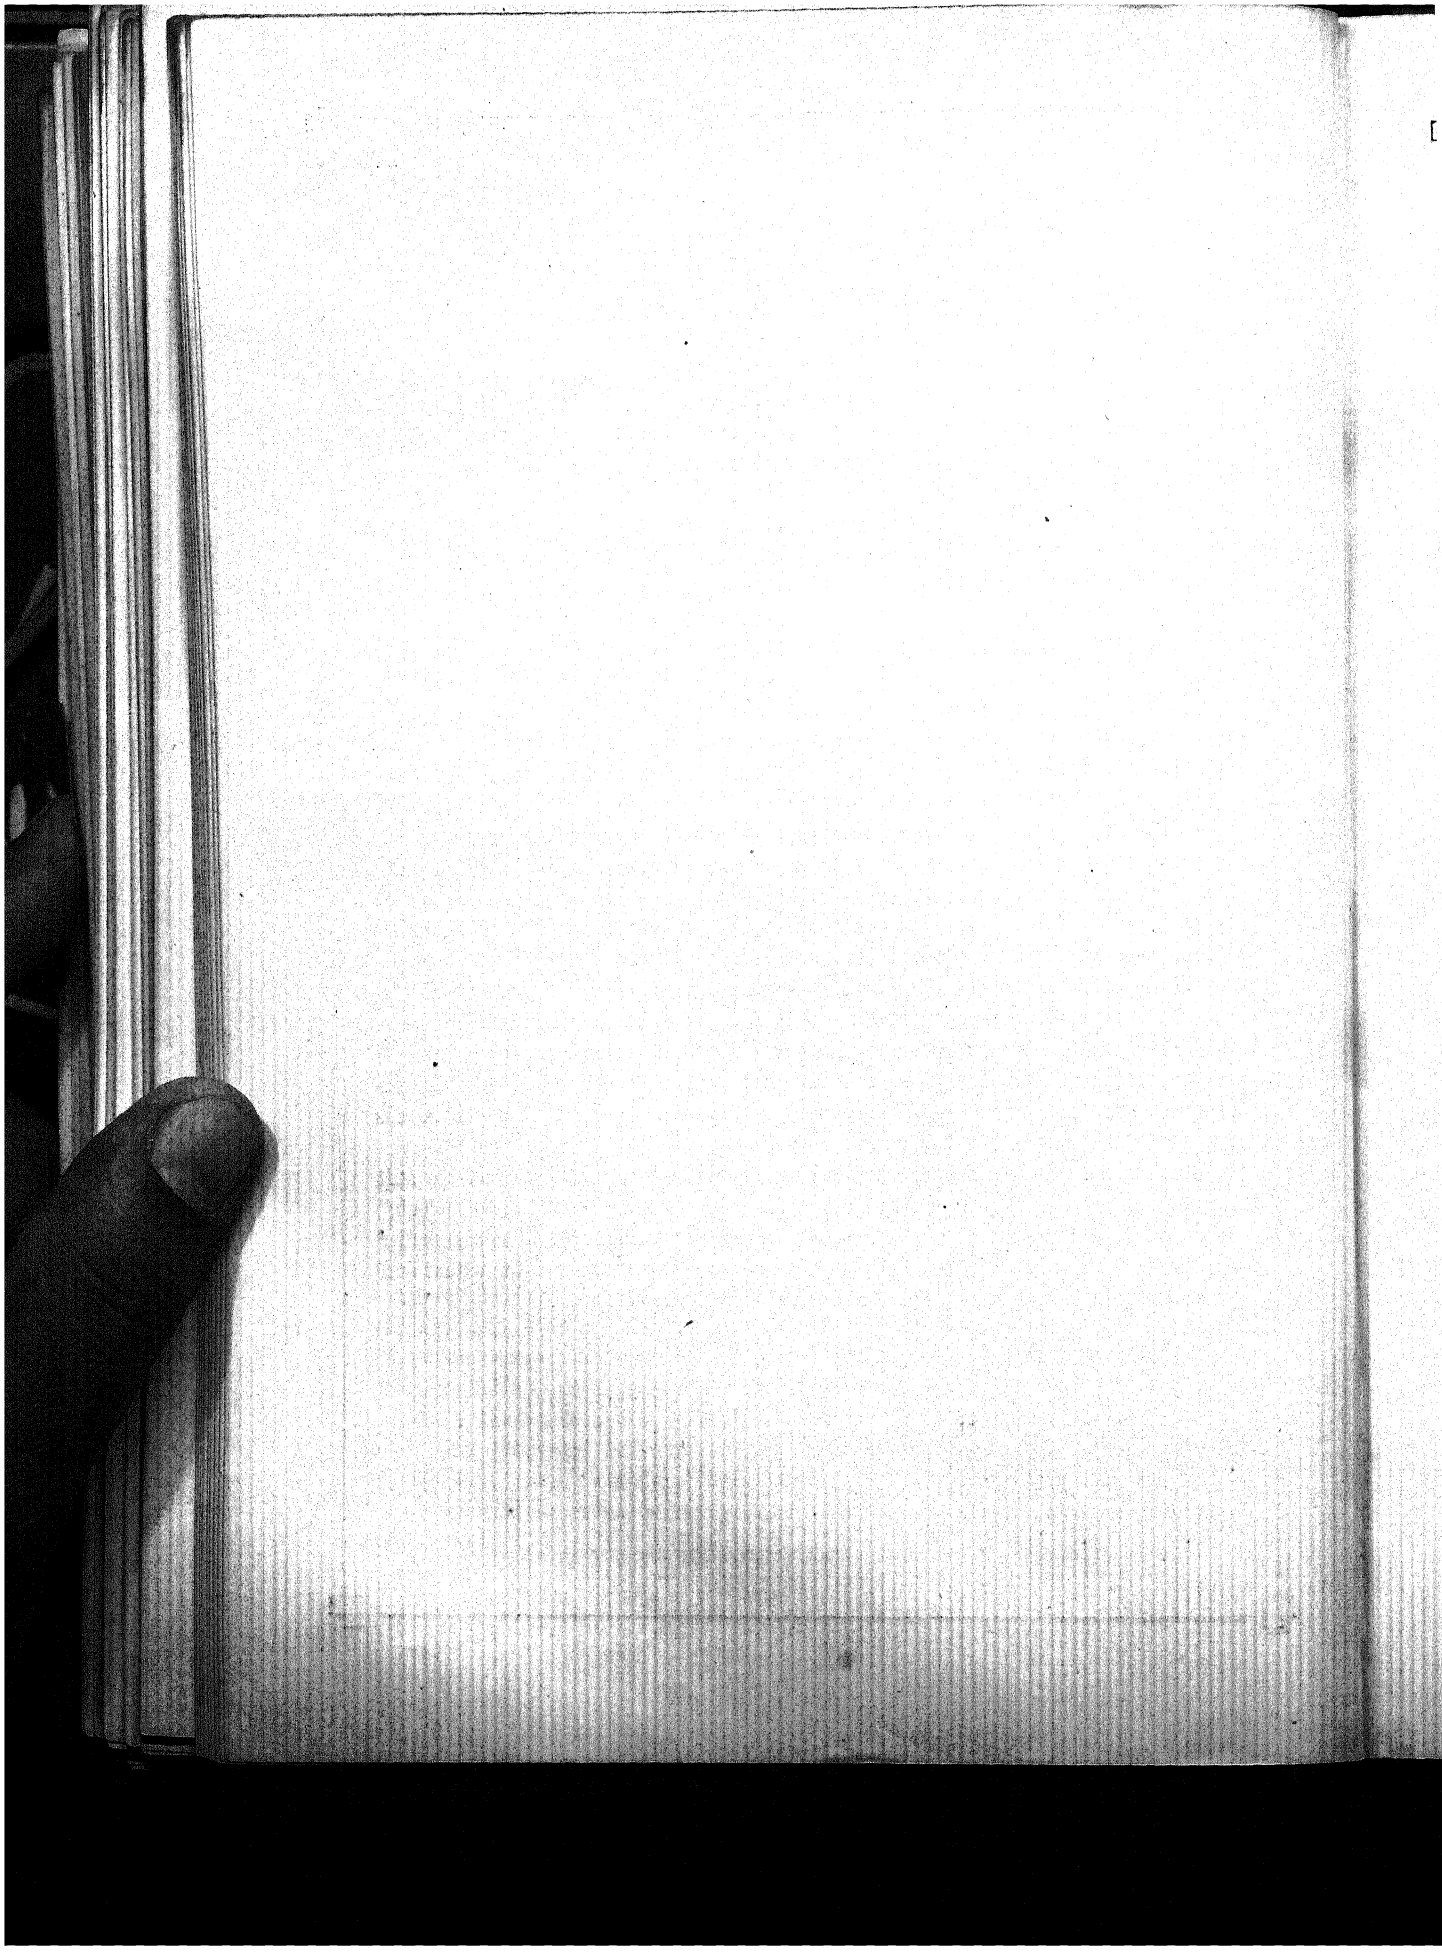
In his personal habits he was scrupulously neat. In his latter days he was an early riser, and fond of exercise; though at one period of his life he was said to lie in bed and think of wit for the day. Of his learning, it must be said that it was not that of a professed scholar.

Sir Walter Scott says that, as an author, there are three peculiarities remarkable in the character of Swift: the first is, the brilliant attribute of originality, and it cannot be refused to him by the most severe critic. Even Johnson has allowed that no author can be found who has borrowed so little, or who has well maintained his claim to be considered original.

The second peculiarity is, his total indifference to literary fame. Swift executed his various and numerous works solely in order to render them fit for accomplishing a certain purpose, beyond which they were of no value in his eyes.

The third characteristic mark of his literary character is, that with the exception of history, he has never attempted a style of composition in which he has not obtained a distinguished pitch of excellence.

But although his political treatises raised his fame when published, and are still read as excellent models of that species of composition, it is to his "Tale of a Tub," to the "Battle of the Books," to his moral romance of "Gulliver," and to his smaller but not less exquisite satire on "Men and Manners," that Swift owes the extent and permanency of his popularity as an English classic of the first rank.



GULLIVER'S TRAVELS.

A VOYAGE TO LILLIPUT.*

CHAPTER I.

THE AUTHOR GIVES SOME ACCOUNT OF HIMSELF AND FAMILY. — HIS FIRST INDUCEMENTS TO TRAVEL. — HE IS SHIPWRECKED, AND SWIMS FOR HIS LIFE. — GETS SAFE ON SHORE IN THE COUNTRY OF LILLIPUT. — IS MADE A PRISONER, AND CARRIED UP THE COUNTRY.

MY father had a small estate in Nottinghamshire; I was the third of five sons. He sent me to Emanuel College, in Cambridge, at fourteen years old, where I resided three years, and applied myself close to my studies; but the charge of maintaining me, although I had a very scanty allowance, being too great for a narrow fortune, I was bound apprentice to Mr. James Bates, an eminent surgeon in London, with whom I continued four years; and my father now and then sending me small sums of money, I laid them out in learning navigation and other parts of the mathematics useful to those who intend to travel, as I always believed it would be, some time or other, my fortune to do. When I left Mr. Bates, I went down to my father; where, by the advice of him and my uncle John and

* Gulliver's Travels were originally designed to form part of a satire on the Abuse of Human Learning, projected by Pope, Swift, and Arbuthnot. In their joint publication, the "Memoirs of Martinus Scriblerus," the sketch of the work is thus given by Pope.

"It was in the year 1699 that Martin set out on his travels. Thou wilt certainly be very curious to know what they were. It is not yet time to inform thee; but what hints I am at liberty to give I will.

"Thou shalt know, then, that in his first voyage he was carried by a prosperous storm to a discovery of the ancient Pygmean empire.

"That, in his second, he was happily shipwrecked on the land of the Giants, the most humane people in the world.

"That, in his third, he discovered a whole kingdom of philosophers, who govern by the mathematics; with whose admirable schemes and projects he returned to benefit his own dear country; but, had the misfortune to find them rejected by the envious ministers of Queen Anne, and himself sent treacherously away.

"And hence it is that in his fourth voyage he discovers a vein of melancholy, proceeding almost to a disgust of his species; but, above all, a mortal detestation of the whole flagitious race of ministers, and a final resolution not to give in any memorial to the Secretary of State, in order to subject the lands he discovered to the crown of Great Britain.

"Now, if by these hints the reader can help himself to a further discovery of the nature and contents of these travels, he is welcome to as much light as they afford him; I am obliged, by all the ties of honor, not to speak more openly."

Pope, however, appears to have been displeased at the substitution of Lemuel Gulliver for Martinus Scriblerus; he adds, rather ill-naturedly: —

"But if any man shall see such very extraordinary voyages, which manifest the most distinguishing marks of a philosopher, a politician, and a legislator, and can imagine them to belong to a surgeon of a ship or a captain of a merchantman, let him remain in his ignorance."

Swift himself thus announces the approaching appearance of the work in a letter to Pope, dated Dublin, September 29, 1725: "I have employed my time (besides ditching) in finishing, correcting, amending, and transcribing my travels, in four parts complete, newly augumented, and intended for the press when the world shall deserve them, or rather when a printer shall be found bold enough to venture his ears."

The existence of a nation of pygmies was firmly believed in ancient times. The diminutive race is mentioned by Herodotus, Aristotle, Pliny, and even some other relations, I got forty pounds, and a promise of thirty pounds a year to maintain me at Leyden; there I studied physic two years and seven months, knowing it would be useful to me in long voyages. Soon after my return from Leyden I was recommended by my good master, Mr. Bates, to be surgeon to the Swallow, Captain Abraham Pannell commander; with whom I continued three years and a half, making a voyage or two into the Levant and some other parts. When I came back I resolved to settle in London; to which Mr. Bates, my master, encouraged me, and by him I was recommended to several patients. I took part of a small house in the Old Jewry; and being advised to alter my condition, I married Miss Mary Burton, second daughter to Mr. Edmund Burton, hosier in Newgate Street, with whom I received four hundred pounds for a portion.*

But my good master Bates dying in two years after, and I having few friends, my business began to fail; for my conscience would not suffer me to imitate the bad practice of too many among my brethren. Having, therefore, consulted with my wife and some of my acquaintance, I determined to go again to sea. I was surgeon successively in two ships, and made several voyages, for six years, to the East and West Indies, by which I got some addition to my fortune. My hours of leisure I spent in reading the best authors, ancient and modern, being always provided with a good number of books; and when I was ashore, in observing the manners and dispositions of the people, as well as learning their language; wherein I had a great facility, by the strength of my memory.

The last of these voyages not proving very fortunate, I grew weary of the sea, and intended to stay at home with my wife and family. I removed from the Old Jewry to Fetter Lane, and from thence to Wapping, by some of the earlier modern travellers. The following account is from Ctesias, who was contemporary with Xenophon. "In the middle of India there are black men called pygmies, using the same language as the other Indians; they are very little, the tallest of them being but two cubits, and most of them but a cubit and a half high. They have very long hair, reaching down to their knees and lower, and a beard larger than any man's. After their beards are grown long they wear no clothes, but the hair of their head falls behind a great deal below their hams, and that of their beard before comes down to their feet; then, laying their hair thick all about their body, they afterwards gird themselves, making use of their hair for clothes. They are flat-nosed and ill-favored. Their sheep are like lambs, and their oxen and asses scarce as big as rams, and their horses and mules, and all their other cattle, not bigger. Three thousand of these pygmies are household troops in the service of the King of India. They are good archers. They are very just, and use the same laws as the Indians do."

Some of the old commentators on the Bible translated the word Gammachia pygmies, and it is so rendered in the Vulgate. "This circumstance," as Sir Thomas Browne remarks in his "Enquiries into Vulgar Errors," "tended greatly to confirm the popular belief in the existence of this fabulous race." Viewed as a mere fiction, the account of Lilliput did not appear so extravagant in Swift's days as it does in ours. Every one has heard the story of the Irish bishop, a very learned man, who, having read the voyage to Lilliput, said that "there were some things in it which he could not believe."

After the publication of the Travels, Swift was much amused to find that Gulliver was a real name, and that a Mr. Jonathan Gulliver was a member of the House of Representatives in Boston. An American writer adds, that this Jonathan deemed it necessary to disclaim publicly all connection with Lemuel.

* Swift and De Foe are unrivalled in the art of introducing trifling and minute circumstances, which give an air of reality to their fictitious narratives. In Gulliver's early history, as in that of Crusoe, persons are casually mentioned of whom we hear nothing more. Gulliver's uncle, like Crusoe's brother, only comes on the stage to disappear again forever. This is quite contrary to the usual course of romance writers, who rarely introduce a personage or an incident that does not in some way aid the development of the plot. Sir Walter Scott suggests that Swift probably imitated De Foe in this particular, but the ideal character of Gulliver naturally led the Dean to introduce these petty particulars. He designed to portray Gulliver as a kind of second Dampier, uniting the homely sense and prejudices of a true-born Englishman to the acquired wisdom of a life of adventures. There is a sailor's bluntness and frankness in everything that Gulliver tells us of himself and family; the occasional minuteness, and even coarseness, of the personal details, are faithfully taken from the journals of the early English voyagers, whose accounts of their discoveries are strangely blended with the most trifling particulars respecting their food, clothing, etc. The character of Gulliver is that of a thorough English sailor; his education at Leyden did not raise him too high above the rude tars with whom he mingled, and we always find his learning brought forward with difficulty, and by an effort, while his mother-wit and sailor's courage are present in every emergency.

hoping to get business among the sailors, but it would not turn to account. After three years' expectation that things would mend, I accepted an advantageous offer from Captain William Prichard, master of the Antelope, who was making a voyage to the South Sea. We set sail from Bristol, May 4, 1699, and our voyage at first was very prosperous.

It would not be proper, for some reasons, to trouble the reader with the particulars of our adventures in those seas; let it suffice to inform him that in our passage from thence to the East Indies we were driven by a violent storm to the northwest of Van Diemen's Land.* By an observation, we found ourselves in the latitude of 30 degrees 2 minutes south. Twelve of our crew were dead by immoderate labor and ill food; the rest were in a very weak condition. On the 5th of November, which was the beginning of summer in those parts, the weather being very hazy, the seamen spied a rock within half a cable's length of the ship; but the wind was so strong that we were driven directly upon it, and immediately split. Six of the crew, of whom I was one, having let down the boat into the sea, made a shift to get clear of the ship and the rock. We rowed, by my computation, about three leagues, till we were able to work no longer, being already spent with labor while we were in the ship. We therefore trusted ourselves to the mercy of the waves, and in about half an hour the boat was overset by a sudden flurry from the north. What became of my companions in the boat, as well as of those who escaped on the rock, or were left in the vessel, I cannot tell; but conclude they were all lost. For my own part, I swam as fortune directed me, and was pushed forward by wind and tide. I often let my legs drop, and could feel no bottom; but when I was almost gone, and able to struggle no longer, I found myself within my depth; and by this time the storm was much abated. The declivity was so small that I walked near a mile before I got to the shore, which I conjectured was about eight o'clock in the evening. I then advanced forward near half a mile, but could not discover any sign of houses or inhabitants; at least, I was in so weak a condition that I did not observe them. I was extremely tired, and with that and the heat of the weather, and about half a pint of brandy that I drank as I left the ship, I found myself much inclined to sleep. I lay down on the grass, which was very short and soft, where I slept sounder than ever I remembered to have done in my life, and, as I reckoned, about nine hours; for when I awaked it was just daylight. I attempted to rise, but was not able to stir; for, as I happened to lie on my back, I found my arms and legs were strongly fastened on each side to the ground; and my hair, which was long and thick, tied down in the same manner. I likewise felt several slender ligatures across my body from my armpits to my thighs. I could only look upwards; the sun began to grow hot, and the light offended my eyes. I heard a confused noise about me, but in the posture I lay could see nothing except the sky. In a little time I felt something alive moving on my left leg, which, advancing gently forward over my breast, came almost up to my chin; when, bending my eyes downward as much as I could, I perceived it to be a human creature not six inches high, with a bow and arrow in his hands and a quiver at his back.* In the mean time I felt at least forty more of the same kind (as I conjectured) following the first. I was in the utmost astonishment, and roared so loud that they all ran back in a

* This island was first discovered, A. D. 1633, by Abel Janson Tasman, a Dutch navigator, who called it Van Diemen's Land after the governor of Batavia, by whom he had been sent to examine the Southern Ocean. Tasman's narrative was very loose and inaccurate, so that Swift might people the seas which that navigator traversed with any creatures he pleased.

* This incident is taken from Philostratus (Icon. lib. ii. p. 817). "The pygmies," he says, "were anxious to revenge the death of Antæus, and having found Hercules napping in Libya, they mustered up all their forces against him. One phalanx assaulted his left hand; but against his right hand, that being the stronger, two phalanxes were appointed. The archers and slingers besieged his feet, admiring the hugeness of his thighs; but against his head, as the arsenal, they raised batteries, the king himself taking his post there. They set fire to his hair, put reaping-hooks in his eyes, and, that he might not breathe, fixed doors to his mouth and nostrils. But all the execution that they could do was only to awake him; and when this was done, deriding their folly, he gathered them all up into his lion's skin and carried them (Philostratus thinks) to Euristnenes.

fright, and some of them, as I was afterwards told, were hurt by the falls they got by leaping from my sides upon the ground. However, they soon returned, and one of them who ventured so far as to get a full sight of my face, lifting up his hands and eyes by way of admiration, cried out in a shrill but distinct voice, Hekinah degul! the others repeated the same words several times, but I then knew not what they meant.

I lay all this while, as the reader may believe, in great uneasiness; at length, struggling to get loose, I had the fortune to break the strings and wrench out the pegs that fastened my left arm to the ground; for, by lifting it up to my face, I discovered the methods they had taken to bind me, and at the same time, with a violent pull which gave me excessive pain, I a little loosened the strings that tied down my hair on the left side, so that I was just able to turn my head about two inches. But the creatures ran off a second time before I could seize them; whereupon there was a great shout in a very shrill accent, and, after it had ceased, I heard one of them cry aloud, Tolgo phonac; when, in an instant, I felt above a hundred arrows discharged on my left hand, which pricked me like so many needles; and besides they shot another flight into the air, as we do bombs in Europe, whereof many, I suppose, fell on my body (though I felt them not) and some on my face, which I immediately covered with my left hand. When this shower of arrows was over, I fell a groaning with grief and pain, and then, striving again to get loose, they discharged another volley larger than the first, and some of them attempted with spears to stick me in the sides; but, by good luck, I had on me a buff jerkin, which they could not pierce. I thought it the most prudent method to lie still, and my design was to continue so till night, when, my left hand being already loose, I could easily free myself: and as for the inhabitants, I had reason to believe I might be a match for the greatest army they could bring against me, if they were all of the same size with him that I saw. But fortune disposed otherwise of me. When the people observed I was quiet, they discharged no more arrows; but, by the noise I heard, I knew their numbers increased; and about four yards from me, over against my right ear, I heard a knocking for above an hour, like that of people at work; when, turning my head that way as well as the pegs and strings would permit me, I saw a stage erected about a foot and a half from the ground, capable of holding four of the inhabitants, with two or three ladders to mount it, from whence one of them, who seemed to be a person of quality, made me a long speech, whereof I understood not one syllable.* But I should have mentioned that, before the principal person began his oration, he cried out three times, Langro dehul san (these words and the former were afterwards repeated and explained to me). Whereupon immediately about fifty of the inhabitants came and cut the string that fastened the left side of my head, which gave me the liberty of turning it to the right, and of observing the person and gesture of him that was to speak. He appeared to be of middle age and taller than any of the other three who attended him, whereof one was a page that held up his train, and seemed to be somewhat longer than my middle finger; the other two stood one on each side to support him. He acted every part of an orator, and I could observe many periods of threatenings, and others of promises, pity, and kindness.† I answered

* Moore has made a very amusing use of this incident in an ode to Sir Hudson Lowe, which is too good to be passed over with a mere reference.

"Sir Hudson Lowe, Sir Hudson Low
(By name and, ah! by nature so),
As thou art fond of persecutions,
Perhaps thou 'st read or heard repeated
How Captain Gulliver was treated,
When thrown among the Lilliputians

"They tied him down,—these little men did,—
And having valiantly ascended
Upon the mighty man's protuberance,
They did so strut! Upon my soul,
It must have been extremely droll,
To see their pygmy pride's exuberance!

"And how the doughty manikins
Amused themselves with sticking pins
And needles in the great man's breeches;
And how some very little things,
That pass'd for lords, on scaffoldings
Got up and worried him with speeches.

"Alas! alas! that it should happen
To mighty men to be caught napping;
Though different, too, these persecutions;
For Gulliver there took the nap,
While here the Nap—ah, sad mishap!—
Is taken by the Lilliputians"

† In the excitement that followed the Revolution, public speaking became more common in England than it had ever had been before, and several in a few words, but in the most submissive manner, lifting up my left hand and both my eyes to the sun, as calling him for a witness; and being almost famished with hunger, not having eaten a morsel for some hours before I left the ship, I found the demands of nature so strong upon me that I could not forbear showing my impatience (perhaps against the strict rules of decency) by putting my finger frequently to my mouth to signify that I wanted food. The hurgo (for so they call a great lord, as I afterwards learnt) understood me very well. He descended from the stage, and commanded that several ladders should be applied to my sides, on which above a hundred of the inhabitants mounted and walked towards my mouth, laden with baskets full of meat, which had been provided and sent thither by the king's orders, upon the first intelligence he received of me. I observed there was the flesh of several animals, but could not distinguish them by the taste. There were shoulders, legs, and loins shaped like those of mutton, and very well dressed, but smaller than the wings of a lark. I ate them by two and three at a mouthful, and took three loaves at a time, about the bigness of musket-bullets. They supplied me as fast as they could, showing a thousand marks of wonder and astonishment at my bulk and appetite.

I then made another sign that I wanted drink. They found by my eating that a small quantity would not suffice me, and, being a most ingenious people, they slung up, with great dexterity, one of their largest hogsheads, then rolled it towards my hand, and beat out the top. I drank it off at a draught, which I might well do, for it did not hold half a pint, and tasted like a small wine of Burgundy, but much more delicious. They brought me a second hogshead, which I drank in the same manner, and made signs for more, but they had none to give me. When I had performed these wonders, they shouted for joy and danced upon my breast, repeating several times, as they did at first, Hekinah degul. They made me a sign that I should throw down the two hogsheads, but first warning the people below to stand out of the way, crying aloud, Borach mevolah; and when they saw the vessels in the air, there was a universal shout of Hekinah degul. I confess I was often tempted, while they were passing backwards and forwards on my body, to seize forty or fifty of the first that came in my reach, and dash them against the ground. But the remembrance of what I had felt, which probably might not be the worst they could do, and the promise of honor I made them, — for so I interpreted my submissive behavior, — soon drove out these imaginations. Besides, I now considered myself as bound by the laws of hospitality to a people who had treated me with so much expense and magnificence. However, in my thoughts I could not sufficiently wonder at the intrepidity of these diminutive mortals, who durst venture to mount and walk upon my body while one of my hands was at liberty, without trembling at the very sight of so prodigious a creature as I must appear to them. After some time, when they observed that I made no more demands for meat, there appeared before me a person of high rank, from his imperial majesty. His excellency, having mounted on the small of my right leg, advanced forwards up to my face, with about a dozen of his retinue, and producing his credentials under the signet royal, which he applied close to my eyes, spoke about ten minutes without any signs of anger, but with a kind of determinate resolution, often pointing forwards, which, as I afterwards found, was towards the capital city, about half a mile distant, whither it was agreed by his majesty in council that I must be conveyed. I answered in few words, but to no purpose, and made a sign with my hand that was loose, putting it to the other (but over his excellency's head for fear of hurting him or his train), and then to my own head and body, to signify that I desired my liberty.

It appeared that he understood me well enough, for he shook his head by way of disapprobation, and held his hands in a posture to show that I must be carried as a prisoner. However, he made other signs to let me understand that I should have meat and drink enough, and very good treatment. Whereupon I once more thought of attempting to break my bonds; but again, when I felt the smart of their arrows upon my face and hands, which were all in blisters, and many of the darts still sticking in them, and observing likewise that the number of my enemies increased, I gave tokens to let them know that they might do with me what they pleased. Upon this, the hurgo and his train withdrew, with much civility and cheerful countenances. Soon after I heard a general shout, with frequent repetitions of the words Peplom selan, and I felt great numbers of people on my left side relaxing the cords to such a degree that I was able to turn upon my right, and to ease myself by resting on the other side, which I did, to the great astonishment of the people, who, conjecturing by my motion what I was going to do, immediately opened to the right and left on that side, to avoid the danger of being crushed by my great bulk and weight. But, before this, they had daubed my face and both my hands with a sort of ointment, very pleasant to the smell, which, in a few minutes, removed all the smart of their arrows. These circumstances, added to the refreshment I had received by their victuals and drink, which were very nourishing, disposed me to sleep. I slept about eight hours, as I was afterwards assured: and it was no wonder, for the physicians, by the emperor's order, had mingled a sleepy potion in the hogsheads of wine.

It seems that upon the first moment I was discovered sleeping on the ground, after my landing, the emperor had early notice of it by an express, and determined in council that I should be tied in the manner I have related (which was done in the night while I slept), that plenty of meat and drink should be sent me, and a machine prepared to carry me to the capital city. This resolution, perhaps, may appear very bold and dangerous, and I am confident would not be imitated by any prince in Europe on the like occasion. However, in my opinion, it was extremely prudent, as well as generous; for, supposing these people had endeavored to kill me with their spears and arrows while I was asleep, I should certainly have awaked with the first sense of smart, which might so far have aroused my rage and strength as to have enabled me to break the strings wherewith I was tied; after which, as they were not able to make resistance, so they could expect no mercy.

These people are most excellent mathematicians, and arrived to a great perfection in mechanics by the countenance and encouragement of the emperor, who is a renowned patron of learning. This prince has several machines fixed on wheels for the carriage of trees and other great weights. He often builds his largest men-of-war, whereof some are nine feet long, in the woods where the timber grows, and has them carried on these engines three or four hundred yards to the sea. Five hundred carpenters and engineers were immediately set at work to prepare the greatest engine they had. It was a frame of wood raised three inches from the ground, about seven feet long and four wide, moving upon twenty-two wheels. The shout I heard was upon the arrival of this engine, which, it seems, set out in four hours after my landing. It was brought parallel to me, as I lay. But the principal difficulty was to raise and place me in this vehicle. Eighty poles, each of one foot high, were erected for this purpose, and very strong cords of the bigness of packthread were fastened by hooks to many bandages which the workmen had girt round my neck, my hands, my body, and my legs. Nine hundred of the strongest men were employed to draw up these cords, by many pulleys fastened on the poles, and thus, in less than three hours, I was raised and slung into the engine, and there tied fast.* All this I was told; for, while the operation was performing, I lay in a profound sleep, by the force of that soporiferous medicine infused into my liquor. Fifteen hundred of the emperor's largest horses, each about four inches and a half high, were employed to draw me towards the metropolis, which, as I said, was half a mile distant.

About four hours after we began our journey I awaked by a very ridiculous accident; for the carriage being stopped awhile to adjust something that was out of order, two or three of the young natives had the curiosity to see how I looked when I was asleep; they climbed up into the engine, and advanced very softly to my face; one of them, an officer in the guards, put the sharp end of his half-pike a good way up into my left nostril, which tickled my nose like a straw, and made me sneeze violently, whereupon they stole off unperceived, and it was three weeks before I knew the cause of my waking so suddenly. We made a long march the remaining part of the day, and rested at night with five hundred guards on each side of me, half with torches, and half with bows and arrows, ready to shoot me if I should offer to stir. The next morning at sunrise we continued our march, and arrived within two hundred yards of the city gates about noon. The emperor and all his court came out to meet us, but his great officers would by no means suffer his majesty to endanger his person by mounting on my body.

At the place where the carriage stopped, there stood an ancient temple, esteemed to be the largest in the kingdom; which, having been polluted some years before by an unnatural murder, was, according to the zeal of those people, looked upon as profane, and therefore had been applied to common use, and all the ornaments and furniture carried away. In this edifice it was determined I should lodge. The great gate fronting to the north was about four feet high, and almost two feet wide, through which I could easily creep. On each side of the gate was a small window, not above six inches from the ground; into that on the left side the king's smith conveyed fourscore and eleven chains like those that hang to a lady's watch in Europe, and almost as large, which were locked to my left leg with six-and-thirty padlocks. Over against this temple, on the other side of the great highway, at twenty feet distance, there was a turret at least five feet high. Here the emperor ascended, with many principal lords of his court, to have an opportunity of viewing me, as I was told, for I could not see them. It was reckoned that above a hundred thousand inhabitants came out of the town upon the same errand; and, in spite of my guards, I believe there could not be fewer than ten thousand, at several times, who mounted my body by the help of ladders. But a proclamation was soon issued to forbid it upon pain of death. When the workmen found it was impossible for me to break loose, they cut all the strings that bound me; whereupon I rose up, with as melancholy a disposition as ever I had in my life. But the noise and astonishment of the people, at seeing me rise and walk, are not to be expressed. The chains that held my left leg were about two yards long, and gave me not only the liberty of walking backwards and forwards in a semicircle, but, being fixed within four inches of the gate, allowed me to creep in and lie at my full length in the temple.

CHAPTER II.

THE EMPEROR OF LILLIPUT, ATTENDED BY SEVERAL OF THE NOBILITY, COMES TO SEE THE AUTHOR IN HIS CONFINEMENT. — THE EMPEROR'S PERSON AND HABIT DESCRIBED. — LEARNED MEN APPOINTED TO TEACH THE AUTHOR THEIR LANGUAGE. — HE GAINS FAVORS BY HIS MILD DISPOSITION. — HIS POCKETS ARE SEARCHED, AND HIS SWORD AND PISTOLS TAKEN FROM HIM.

QUIETLY as I had endured my tedious confinement to one posture, it was with great pleasure that I found myself again upon my feet. I looked about me, and must confess that I never beheld a more entertaining prospect. The country around appeared like a continued garden, and the enclosed fields, which were generally forty feet square, resembled so many beds of flowers. These fields were intermingled with woods of half a stang * and the tallest trees, as I could judge, appeared to be seven feet high. I viewed the town on my left hand, which looked like the painted scene of a city in a theatre.

Having gone into my house for a while, I soon came out, having occasion for fresh air. The emperor was already descended from the tower, and advancing on horseback towards me, which had like to have cost him dear; for the beast, though very well trained, yet wholly unused to such a sight, which appeared as if a mountain moved before him, reared up on his hinder feet: but that prince, who is an excellent horseman, kept his seat, till his attendants ran in, and held the bridle, while his majesty had time to dismount.*

When he alighted, he surveyed me round with great admiration, but kept beyond the length of my chain. He ordered his cooks and butlers, who were already prepared, to give me victuals and drink, which they pushed forward in a sort of vehicles upon wheels, till I could reach them. I took these vehicles, and soon emptied them all: twenty of them were filled with meat and ten with liquor; each of the former afforded me two or three good mouthfuls; and I emptied the liquor of ten vessels, which was contained in earthen phials, into one vehicle, drinking it off at a draught; and so I did with the rest. The empress and young princes of the blood of both sexes, attended by many ladies, sat at some distance in their chairs; but upon the accident that happened to the emperor's horse, they alighted, and came near his person, which I am now going to describe. He is taller, by almost the breadth of my nail, than any of his court, which alone is enough to strike an awe into the beholders. His features are strong and masculine, with an Austrian lip, and arched nose; his complexion olive, his countenance erect, his body and limbs well proportioned, all his motions graceful, and his deportment majestic. He was then past his prime, being twenty-eight years and three quarters old, of which he had reigned about seven in great felicity, and generally victorious. For the better convenience of beholding him, I lay on my side, so that my face was parallel to his, and he stood but three yards off: however, I have had him since many times in my hand, and therefore cannot be deceived in the description. His dress was very plain and simple, and the fashion of it between the Asiatic and the European; but he had on his head a light helmet of gold, adorned with jewels, and a plume on the crest. He held his sword drawn in his hand to defend himself, if I should happen to break loose: it was almost three inches long; the hilt and scabbard were gold, enriched with diamonds. His voice was shrill, but very clear and articulate; and I could distinctly hear it when I stood up. The ladies and courtiers were all most magnificently clad; so that the spot they stood upon seemed to resemble a petticoat spread on the ground, embroidered with figures of gold and silver. His imperial majesty spoke often to me, and I returned answers; but neither of us could understand a syllable. There were several of his priests and lawyers present (as I conjectured by their habits), who were commanded to address themselves to me; and I spoke to them in as many languages as I had the least smattering of, which were High and Low Dutch, Latin, French, Spanish, Italian, and Lingua Franca; but all to no purpose. After about two hours the court retired, and I was left with a strong guard, to prevent the impertinence and probably the malice of the rabble, who were very impatient to crowd about me as near as they durst; and some of them had the impudence to shoot their arrows at me as I sat on the ground by the door of my house, whereof one very narrowly missed my left eye. But the colonel ordered six of the ringleaders to be seized, and thought no punishment so proper as to deliver them bound into my hands; which some of his soldiers accordingly did, pushing them forwards with the but-ends of their pikes into my reach. I took them all in my right hand, put five of them into my coat-pocket, and, as to the sixth, I made a countenance as if I would eat him alive. The poor man squalled terribly, and the colonel and his officers were in much pain, especially when they saw me take out my penknife: but I soon put them out of fear; for, looking mildly, and immediately cutting the strings he was bound with, I set him gently on the ground, and away he ran. I treated the rest in the same manner, taking them one by one out of my pocket; and I observed both the soldiers and people were highly delighted at this mark of my clemency, which was represented very much to my advantage at court.*

* There can be little room for doubting that, in the description of the emperor of Lilliput, Swift dimly shadowed forth some leading traits in the character of George I. The points of direct resemblance, however, for obvious reasons, are very few; it is only by collecting all the incidents recorded of the Lilliputian emperor, that we find out his general similarity to the first monarch of the house of Brunswick. The following account of George I. will enable the reader to discover the most prominent points of identity in the two portraits: "George I. ascended the English throne in his fifty-fifth year, when men are usually more disposed to acquiesce in the settled routine than venture on novel and perhaps troublesome experiments. Moreover, the natural disposition and understanding of the king were not of a kind, at any period of his life, to carry him out of the established orbit. He was a person of as simple tastes as appearance; in England he was a stranger, his home being Hanover. He naturally inclined to the seclusion of a private station, being shy and reserved in public, but easy and facetious among his intimates. During the fourteen years of his government of the electorate he had acquired the reputation of a just and circumspect prince, who well understood and steadily pursued his own interests, and would have been well content to end his days in the petty sovereignty of his ancestors, had not the ambition of others been greater than his own. Punctual in business, he was more dull than indolent; and the plain honesty of his temper, joined with the narrow notions of a low education, made him look upon his acceptance of the crown as an act of usurpation, which was always uneasy to him. He had no taste for literature or the arts, and was very parsimonious." — Wade's British History, p. 334.

Compare also the following passage from Thackeray's "Four Georges," pp. 12, 23: "In his father's lifetime, and at the head of the Hanover forces of eight or ten thousand men, George served the Emperor on the Danube against the Turks, at the siege of Vienna, in Italy, and on the Rhine. When he succeeded to the electorate, he handled its affairs with great prudence and dexterity. He was very much liked by his people of Hanover. He did not show his feelings much, but he cried heartily on leaving them, as they cried for joy when he came back. He showed an uncommon prudence and coolness of behavior when he came into his kingdom [of England], exhibiting no elation, reasonably doubtful whether he should not be turned out some day; looking upon himself only as a lodger, and making the most of his brief tenure of St. James's and Hampton Court; plundering, it is true, somewhat, and dividing among his German followers, — but what could be expected of a sovereign who at home could sell his subjects at so many ducats per head, and make no scruple in so disposing of them? I fancy a considerable shrewdness, prudence, and even moderation, in his ways. The German Protestant was a cheaper and better and kinder king than the Catholic Stuart in whose chair he sat, and so far loyal to England that he let England govern herself. . . . . The king we had selected, the courtiers who came in his train, the English nobles who came to welcome him, and on many of whom the shrewd old cynic turned his back, — I protest it is a wonderful satirical picture."

Towards night I got with some difficulty into my house, where I lay on the ground, and continued to do so about a fortnight; during which time the emperor gave orders to have a bed prepared for me. Six hundred beds† of the common measure were brought in carriages and worked up in my house; a hundred and fifty of their beds, sewn together, made up the breadth and length; and these were four double; which, however, kept me but very indifferently from the hardness of the floor, that was of smooth stone. By the same computation they provided me with sheets, blankets, and coverlets, tolerable enough for one who had been so long inured to hardships.

As the news of my arrival spread through the kingdom, it brought prodigious numbers of rich, idle, and curious people to see me, so that the villages were almost emptied; and great neglect of tillage and household affairs must have ensued, if his imperial majesty had not provided, by several proclamations and orders of state, against this inconveniency. He directed that those who had already beheld me should return home, and not presume to come within fifty yards of my house without license from the court; whereby the secretaries of state got considerable fees.

In the mean time the emperor held frequent councils, to debate what course should be

* Gulliver's history, as a courtier at Lilliput, is obviously designed to represent the administration of Harley and Bolingbroke at the close of Anne's reign. Whatever were the other demerits of that cabinet, it must be confessed that they showed more tenderness to the party by which they were opposed, and greater clemency to political delinquents, than their successors. This forbearance, especially in the case of libellers, is very ingeniously intimated by Gulliver's granting pardon to the malicious archers. Swift used frequently to remark that Anne was the only sovereign during whose entire reign no one suffered the penalties of high treason.

taken with me; and I was afterwards assured by a particular friend, a person of great quality, who was as much in the secret as any, that the court was under many difficulties concerning me. They apprehended my breaking loose; that my diet would be very expensive, and might cause a famine.* Sometimes they determined to starve me, or at least to shoot me in the face and hands with poisoned arrows, which would soon despatch me; but again they considered that the stench of so large a carcass might produce a plague in the metropolis, and probably spread through the whole kingdom. In the midst of these consultations, several officers of the army went to the door of the great council-chamber, and two of them being admitted, gave an account of my behavior to the six criminals above mentioned; which made so favorable an impression in the breast of his majesty and the whole board, in my behalf, that an imperial commission was issued out, obliging all the villages, nine hundred yards round the city, to deliver in every morning six beeves, forty sheep, and other victuals for my sustenance; together with a proportionable quantity of bread and wine and other liquors; for the due payment of which his majesty gave assignments upon his treasury: for this prince lives chiefly upon his own demesnes; seldom, except upon great occasions, raising any subsidies upon his subjects, who are bound to attend him in his wars at their own expense. An establishment was also made of six hundred persons to be my domestics, who had board wages allowed for their maintenance, and tents built for them very conveniently on each side of my door. It was likewise ordered that three hundred tailors should make me a suit of clothes, after the fashion of the country; that six of his majesty's greatest scholars should be employed to instruct me in their language; and, lastly, that the emperor's horses, and those of the nobility and troops of guards, should be frequently exercised in my sight, to accustom themselves to me. All these orders were duly put in execution; and in about three weeks I made a great progress in learning their language: during which time the emperor frequently honored me with his visits, and was pleased to assist my masters in teaching me. We began already to converse together in some sort; and the first words I learnt were to express my desire "that he would be pleased to give me my liberty"; which I every day repeated on my knees. His answer, as I could apprehend it, was, "that this must be a work of time, not to be thought on without the advice of his council, and that first I must lumos kelmin pesso desmar lon emposo"; that is, swear a peace with him and his kingdom: however, that I should be used with all kindness; and he advised me "to acquire, by my patience and discreet behavior, the good opinion of himself and his subjects." He desired "I would not take it ill if he gave orders to certain proper officers to search me; for probably I might carry about me several weapons, which must needs be dangerous things if they answered the bulk of so prodigious a person." I said, "His majesty should be satisfied; for I was ready to strip myself, and turn up my pockets before him." This I delivered part in words and part in signs. He replied "that, by the laws of the kingdom, I must be searched by two of his officers; that he knew this could not be done without my consent and assistance; and he had so good an opinion of my generosity and justice, as to trust their persons in my hands; that whatever they took from me should be returned when I left the country, or paid for at the rate which I would set upon them." I took up the two officers in my hands, put them first into my coat-pockets, and then into every other pocket about me, except my two fobs and another secret pocket, which I had no mind should be searched, wherein I had some little necessaries that were of no consequence to any but myself. In one of my fobs there was a silver watch, and in the other a small quantity of gold in a purse. These gentlemen, having pen, ink, and paper about them, made an exact inventory of everything they saw; and when they had done, desired I would set them down, that they might deliver it to the emperor. This inventory I afterwards translated into English, and is word for word as follows:*—

* The parsimony of George I. has been already noticed; "avarice was so predominant in him that he would raise no troops to secure the succession."—Wade's British History, p. 334.

* This inventory is designed to ridicule the reports of the several committees of secrecy appointed by Walpole to investigate the presumed designs of

"Imprimis, In the right coat-pocket of the great Man-mountain (for so I interpret the words quinbus flestrin), after the strictest search, we found only one great piece of coarse cloth, large enough to be a foot-cloth for your majesty's chief room of state. In the left pocket we saw a huge silver chest, with a cover of the same metal, which, we, the searchers, were not able to lift. We desired it should be opened, and one of us stepping into it, found himself up to the midleg in a sort of dust, some part whereof flying up to our faces, set us both a-sneezing for several times together. In his right waistcoat-pocket we found a prodigious bundle of white, thin substances, folded one over another, about the bigness of three men, tied with a strong cable, and marked with black figures; which we humbly conceive to be writings, every letter almost half as large as the palm of our hands. In the left there was a sort of engine, from the back of which were extended twenty long poles, resembling the palisadoes before your majesty's court; wherewith we conjecture the man-mountain combs his head, for we did not always trouble him with questions, because we found it a great difficulty to make him understand us. In the large pocket on the right side of his middle cover (so I translate the word ranfulo, by which they meant my breeches), we saw a hollow pillar of iron, about the length of a man, fastened to a strong piece of timber, larger than the pillar; and upon one side of the pillar were huge pieces of iron sticking out, cut into strange figures, which we know not what to make of. In the left pocket another engine of the same kind. In the smaller pocket, on the right side, were several round flat pieces of white and red metal of different bulk; some of the white, which seemed to be silver, were so large and heavy that my comrade and I could hardly lift them. In the left pocket were two black pillars irregularly shaped; we could not without difficulty reach the top of them, as we stood at the bottom of his pocket. One of them was covered, and seemed all of a piece; but up at the upper end of the other there appeared a white, round substance, about twice the bigness of our heads. Within each of these was enclosed a prodigious plate of steel; which, by our orders, we obliged him to show us, because we apprehended they might be dangerous engines. He took them out of their cases, and told us that in his own country his practice was to shave his beard with one of these, and cut his meat with the other. There were two pockets which we could not enter; these he called his fobs; they were two large slits cut into the top of his middle cover, but squeezed close by the pressure of his belly. Out of the right fob hung a great silver chain, with a wonderful kind of engine at the bottom. We directed him to draw out whatever was at the end of that chain, which appeared to be a globe, half silver and half of some transparent metal; for, on the transparent side we saw certain strange figures circularly drawn, and thought that we could touch them, till we found our fingers stopped by that lucid substance. He put this engine to our ears, which made an incessant noise, like that of a water-mill; and we conjecture it is either some unknown animal, or the god that he worships; but we are more inclined to the latter opinion, because he assured us (if we understood him right, for he expressed himself very imperfectly) that he seldom did anything without consulting it. He called it his oracle, and said it pointed out the time for every action of his life. From the left fob he took out a net almost large enough for a fisherman, but contrived to open and shut like a purse, and which served him for the same use; we found therein several massy pieces of yellow metal, which, if they be real gold, must be of immense value.

"Having thus, in obedience to your majesty's commands, diligently searched all his pockets, we observed a girdle about his waist, made of the hide of some prodigious animal, from which, on the left side, hung a sword of the length of five men, and on the right a bag or pouch, divided into two cells, each cell capable of holding three of your majesty's subjects. In one of these cells were several globes, or balls, of a most ponderous metal, about the bigness of our heads, and required a strong hand to lift them; the other cell contained a heap of certain black grains, but of no great bulk or weight, for we could hold above fifty of them in the palms of our hands.

"This is an exact inventory of what we found about the body of the man-mountain, who used us with great civility, and due respect to your majesty's commission. Signed and sealed on the fourth day of the eighty-ninth moon of your majesty's auspicious reign:

Flessen Frelock.

Marsi Frelock.

When this inventory was read over to the emperor, he directed me, although in very gentle terms, to deliver up the several particulars.* He first called for my scimitar, which I took out, scabbard and all. In the mean time he ordered three thousand of his choicest troops (who then attended him) to surround me at a distance, with their bows and arrows just ready to discharge; but I did not observe it, for mine eyes were wholly fixed upon his majesty.† He then desired me to draw my scimitar, which, although it had got some rust by the sea-water, was, in most parts, exceeding bright. I did so, and immediately all the troops gave a shout between terror and surprise; for the sun shone clear, and the reflection dazzled their eyes, as I waved the scimitar to and fro in my hand. His majesty, who is a most magnanimous prince, was less daunted than I could expect: he ordered me to return it into the scabbard, and cast it on the ground, as gently as I could, about six feet from the end of my chain. The next thing he demanded was one of the hollow iron pillars; by which he meant my pocket pistols. I drew it out, and, at his desire, as well as I could, expressed to him the use of it; and, charging it only with powder, which, by the closeness of my pouch, happened to escape wetting in the sea (an inconvenience against which all prudent mariners take special care to provide), I first cautioned the emperor not to be afraid, and then I let it off in the air. The astonishment here was much greater than at sight of the scimitar. Hundreds fell down as if they had been struck dead; and even the emperor, although he stood his ground, could not recover himself for some time.

I delivered up both my pistols in the same manner as I had done my scimitar, and then my pouch of powder and bullets, begging him that the former might be kept from fire, for it would kindle with the smallest spark, and blow up his imperial palace into the air. I likewise delivered up my watch, which the emperor was very curious to see, and commanded two of his tallest yeomen of the guards to bear it on a pole upon their shoulders, as draymen in England do a barrel of ale. He was amazed at the continual noise it made, and the motion of the minute-hand, which he could easily discern, for their sight is much more acute than ours: he asked the opinions of his learned men about it, which were various and remote, as the reader may imagine without my repeating, although,

* The searches made by the Whigs in the houses of persons suspected of Jacobitism and Popery are scarcely caricatured in this whimsical account of the examination of Gulliver's pockets. Sir Walter Scott has given a similar description in his Peveril of the Peak, where the emissaries of the House of Commons, puzzled by the ordinary habits of life in the higher ranks, were disposed to find treason in a laced waistcoat and Popery in a hooped petticoat. Writing in Ireland, Swift was likely to find an ample supply of searchers and alarmists, for the Cromwellian settlers, deriving their title to their estates from no better source than the English suspicion and hatred of Popery, were anxious to keep alive such feelings; and catalogues of suspicious articles, even more ludicrous than those in the text, may be found in the records of Dublin Castle.

One of the objects of suspicion in those days, wearied out by constant requisitions to surrender his fire-arms, and by the repeated annoyances which he had experienced, sent his poker, tongs, and shovel to the arsenal, and took a regular receipt for them from the officer in command.

† There is exquisite humor in these formal preparations for security, which escaped the notice of the persons they were intended to intimidate. The satire is directed against the precautions taken by the Whig ministers on receiving information of real or pretended plots of the Jacobites, particularly in May, 1722, when "orders were issued to all military officers to repair to their respective commands. General Macartney was despatched to Ireland, to bring over some troops into the west of England. Messengers were sent to Scotland to secure some suspected persons; and the States of Holland were directed to keep in readiness the guaranty troops, to be sent to England in case of need." — Wade, 369. At the same time a proclamation was issued commanding all Papists to depart from London and Westminster, and for confining Papists to their habitations.

indeed, I could not very perfectly understand them. I then gave up my silver and copper money, my purse, with nine large pieces of gold and some smaller ones, my knife and razor, my comb and silver snuff-box, my handkerchief and journal-book. My scimitar, pistols, and pouch were conveyed in carriages to his majesty's stores; but the rest of my goods were returned me.

I had, as I before observed, one private pocket, which escaped their search, wherein there was a pair of spectacles (which I sometimes use for the weakness of mine eyes), a pocket perspective, and some other little conveniences, which, being of no consequence to the emperor, I did not think myself bound in honor to discover, and I apprehended they might be lost or spoiled if I ventured them out of my possession.

CHAPTER III.

THE AUTHOR DIVERTS THE EMPEROR, AND HIS NOBILITY OF BOTH SEXES, IN A VERY UNCOMMON MANNER. — THE DIVERSIONS OF THE COURT OF LILLIPUT DESCRIBED. — THE AUTHOR HAS HIS LIBERTY GRANTED HIM UPON CERTAIN CONDITIONS.

My gentleness and good behavior had gained so far on the emperor and his court, and indeed upon the army and people in general, that I began to conceive hopes of getting my liberty in a short time. I took all possible methods to cultivate this favorable disposition. The natives came by degrees to be less apprehensive of any danger from me. I would sometimes lie down and let five or six of them dance on my hand; and at last the boys and girls would venture to come and play at hide-and-seek in my hair. I had now made a good progress in understanding and speaking the language. The emperor had a mind one day to entertain me with several of the country shows, wherein they exceeded all nations I have known, both for dexterity and magnificence. I was diverted with none so much as that of the rope-dancers, performed upon a slender white thread, extended about two feet and twelve inches from the ground. Upon which I shall desire liberty, with the reader's patience, to enlarge a little.

This diversion is only practised by those persons who are candidates for great employments and high favor at court. They are trained in this art from their youth, and are not always of noble birth or liberal education. When a great office is vacant, either by death or disgrace (which often happens), five or six of those candidates petition the emperor to entertain his majesty and the court with a dance on the rope; and whoever jumps the highest without falling succeeds in the office. Very often the chief ministers themselves are commanded to show their skill, and to convince the emperor that they have not lost their faculty. Flimnap, the treasurer, is allowed to cut a caper on the straight rope, at least an inch higher than any other lord in the whole empire. I have seen him do the summerset* several times together upon a trencher fixed on a rope which is no thicker than a common packthread in England.† My friend Rel-

* Summerset or summersault, a gambol of a tumbler in which he springs up, turns heels over head in the air, and comes down upon his feet. — Orig.

† Flimnap is intended for Sir Robert Walpole, from whom Swift at first had some expectations of promotion; when these were disappointed the Dean became the bitter enemy of the minister, and his hatred was aggravated by the zeal with which Walpole persecuted Swift's great favorites, Lord Bolingbroke and Dr. Atterbury, bishop of Rochester. In an epistle to the poet Gay the Dean gives the following bitter description of Walpole: —

"And first to make my observation right,
I place a statesman full before my sight,
A bloated minister in all his geer,
With shameless visage and perfidious leer;
Two rows of teeth arm each devouring jaw,
And ostrich-like his all-digesting maw
My fancy drags this monster to my view,
To show the world his chief reverse in you.
Of loud unmeaning sounds a rapid flood
Rolls from his mouth in plenteous streams of mud;
With these the court and senate-house he plies,
Made up of noise and impudence and lies."

And again, alluding to Walpole's continuance in office under George II., and Sir Spencer Compton's refusal to form an administration: —

"I knew a brazen minister of state,
Who bore for twice ten years the public hate;
In every mouth the question most in vogue
Was, "When will they turn out this odious rogue?"
A juncture happened, in his highest pride:
While he went robbing on, old master died.
We thought there now remained no room to doubt,
His work is done, the minister must out.
The court invited more than one or two;
Will you, Sir Spencer? or will you? or you?
But not a soul his office durst accept;
The subtle knave had all the plunder swept;

dresal, principal secretary for private affairs, is in my opinion, if I am not partial, the second after the treasurer;* the rest of the great officers are much upon a par.

These diversions are often attended with fatal accidents, whereof great numbers are on record. I myself have seen two or three candidates break a limb. But the danger is much greater when the ministers themselves are commanded to show their dexterity! for, by contending to excel themselves and their fellows, they strain so far that there is hardly one of them who has not received a fall, and some of them two or three. I was assured that, a year or two before my arrival, Flimnap would infallibly have broke his neck if one of the king's cushions that accidentally lay on the ground had not weakened the force of his fall.†

There is likewise another diversion, which is only shown before the emperor and empress and the first minister, upon particular occasions. The emperor lays on the table three fine silken threads of six inches long; one is blue, the other red, and the third green. These threads are proposed as prizes for those persons whom the emperor has a mind to distinguish by a peculiar mark of his favor. The ceremony is performed in his majesty's great chamber of state, where the candidates are to undergo a trial of dexterity very different from the former, and such as I have not observed the least resemblance of in any country of the New or Old World. The emperor holds a stick in his hands, both ends parallel to the horizon, while the candidates, advancing one by one, sometimes leap over the stick, sometimes creep under it, backward and forward, several times, according as the stick is advanced or depressed. Sometimes the emperor holds one end of the stick and the first minister the other; sometimes the minister has it entirely to himself. Whoever performs his part with the most agility, and holds out the longest in leaping and creeping, is rewarded with the blue-colored silk; the red is given to the next, and the green to the third, which they all wear girt twice around about the middle; and you see few great persons about this court who are not adorned with one of these girdles.*

The horses of the army and those of the royal stables, having been daily led before me, were no longer shy, but would come up to my very feet without starting. The riders would leap them over my hand, as I held it on the ground; and one of the emperor's huntsmen, upon a large courser, took my foot, shoe and all, which was indeed a prodigious leap. I had the good fortune to divert the emperor one day after a very extraordinary manner. I desired he would order several sticks of two feet high, and the thickness of an ordinary cane, to be brought me; whereupon his majesty commanded the master of his woods to give directions accordingly; and the next morning six woodmen arrived, with as many carriages, drawn by eight horses to each. I took nine of these sticks, and fixing them firmly in the ground in a quadrangular figure, two feet and a half square, I took four other sticks and tied them parallel at each corner, about two feet from the ground; then I fastened my handkerchief to the nine sticks that stood erect, and extended it on all sides, till it was tight as the top of a drum; and the four parallel sticks, rising about five inches higher than

And such was then the temper of the times;
He owed his preservation to his crimes
The candidates observed his duty paws,
Nor found it difficult to guess the cause,
But when they smelt such foul corruptions round him, Away they fled, and left him as they found him"

* Mr. Secretary Stanhope was most probably intended by Reldresal; he supplanted Walpole in 1717, and adopted a more temperate and conciliatory course towards the Tories and Jacobites, with whom Swift was connected.

† Walpole was compelled to resign his office of state through the intrigues of Lord Sunderland and Mr Secretary Stanhope, who, following the king to Hanover, sought and found a favorable opportunity of supplanting Walpole and Townshend in the royal favor. After an exclusion of four years, which seemed, politically, "to have broken his neck," he was restored by his interest with the Duchess of Kendal, the favorite mistress of George I.; and this was "the king's cushion that lay accidentally on the ground, and weakened the force of the fall."

* The revival of the Order of the Bath by Sir Robert Walpole in 1726, as a cheap means of gratifying his political adherents, was fair game to a satirist like Swift. Walpole was distinguished, not only by the Order of the Bath, but by that of the Garter, which was conferred on him in 1726. — Coxe's Life of Walpole.

It is scarcely necessary to mention that blue is the cognizance of the Garter, red of the Bath, and green of the Thistle.

the handkerchief, served as ledges on each side When I had finished my work, I desired the emperor to let a troop of the best horse, twenty four in number, come and exercise upon this plain His majesty approved of the proposal, and I took them up, one by one, in my hands, ready mounted and armed, with the proper officers to exercise them As soon as they got into order, they divided into two parties, performed mock skirmishes, discharged blunt arrows, drew their swords, fled and pursued, attacked and retired, and, in short, discovered the best military discipline I ever beheld The parallel sticks secured them and their horses from falling over the stage, and the emperor was so much delighted, that he ordered this entertainment to be repeated several days, and once was pleased to be lifted up, and give the word of command, and with great difficulty persuaded even the empress herself to let me hold her in her close chair within two yards of the stage, when she was able to take a full view of the whole performance It was my good fortune that no ill accident happened in these entertainments, only once a fiery horse, that belonged to one of the captains, pawing with his hoof, struck a hole in my handkerchief, and his foot slipping, he overthrew his rider and himself, but I immediately relieved them both, and, covering the hole with one hand, I set down the troop with the other, in the same manner as I took them up The horse that fell was strained in the left shoulder, but the rider got no hurt, and I repaired my handkerchief as well as I could, however, I would not trust to the strength of it any more in such dangerous enterprises

About two or three days before I was set at liberty, as I was entertaining the court with this kind of feats, there arrived an express to inform his majesty that some of his subjects, riding near the place where I was first taken up, had seen a great black substance lying on the ground, very oddly shaped, extending its edges round as wide as his majesty's bedchamber, and rising up in the middle as high as a man, that it was no living creature, as they at first apprehended, for it lay on the grass without motion, and some of them had walked round it several times, that, by mounting upon each other's shoulders, they had got to the top, which was flat and even, and, stamping upon it, they found that it was hollow within, that they humbly conceived it might be something belonging to the man mountain, and if his majesty pleased, they would undertake to bring it with only five horses I presently knew what they meant, and was glad at heart to receive this intelligence It seems, upon my first reaching the shore after our shipwreck, I was in such confusion that, before I came to the place where I went to sleep, my hat, which I had fastened with a string to my head while I was rowing, and had stuck on all the time I was swimming, fell off after I came to land, the string, as I conjecture, breaking by some accident, which I never observed, but thought my hat had been lost at sea I entreated his imperial majesty to give orders it might be brought to me as soon as possible, describing to him the use and the nature of it, and the next day the wagoners arrived with it, but not in a very good condition, they had bored two holes in the brim, within an inch and a half of the edge, and fastened two hooks in the holes, these hooks were tied by a long cord to the harness, and thus my hat was dragged along for above half an English mile, but the ground in that country being extremely smooth and level, it received less damage than I expected

Two days after this adventure, the emperor, having ordered that part of his army which quarters in and about his metropolis to be in readiness, took a fancy of diverting himself in a very singular manner He desired I would stand like a colossus, with my legs as far asunder as I conveniently could He then commanded his general (who was an old experienced leader, and a great patron of mine) to draw up the troops in close order and march them under me, the foot by twenty-four abreast, and the horse by sixteen, with drums beating, colors flying, and pikes advanced This body consisted of three thousand foot and a thousand horse His majesty gave orders, upon pain of death, that every soldier in his march should observe the strictest politeness as to my appearance, which, however, could not prevent some of the younger officers from turning up their eyes, as they passed under me, and, to confess the truth, my clothes were at that time in so ill a condition that they afforded some opportunities for laughter and admiration.*

I had sent so many memorials and petitions for my liberty, that his majesty at length mentioned the matter, first in the cabinet and then in a full council; where it was opposed by none except Skyresh Bolgolam, who was pleased, without any provocation, to be my mortal enemy.† But it was carried against him by the whole board, and confirmed by the emperor. That minister was galbet, or admiral of the realm, very much in his master's confidence, and a person well versed in affairs, but of a morose and sour complexion. However, he was at length persuaded to comply; but prevailed that the articles and conditions upon which I should be set free, and to which I must swear, should be drawn up by himself. These articles were brought to me by Skyresh Bolgolam in person, attended by two under-secretaries and several persons of distinction. After they were read, I was demanded to swear to the performance of them; first, in the manner of my own country, and afterward in the method prescribed by their laws, which was, to hold my right foot in my left hand, and to place the middle finger of my right hand on the crown of my head, and my thumb on the tip of my right ear. But, because the reader may be curious to have some idea of the style and manner of expression peculiar to that people, as well as to know the articles upon which I recovered my liberty, I have made a translation of the whole instrument, word for word, as near as I was able, which I here offer to the public.*

GOLBASTO MOMAREM EVLAME GURDILO SHEFIN MULLY ULLY GUE, most mighty emperor of Lilliput, delight and terror of the universe, whose dominions extend five thousand blustrugs (about twelve miles in circumference) to the extremities of the globe; monarch of all monarchs, taller than the sons of men; whose feet press down to the centre, and whose head strikes against the sun; at whose nod the princes of the earth shake their knees; pleasant as the spring, comfortable as the summer, fruitful as autumn, dreadful as winter. His most sublime Majesty proposes to the Man-mountain, lately arrived at our celestial dominions, the following articles, which, by a solemn oath, he shall be obliged to perform:—

I. The Man-mountain shall not depart from our dominions without our license under our great seal.

II. He shall not presume to come into our metropolis without our express order; at which time the inhabitants shall have two hours' warning to keep within doors.

III. The said Man-mountain shall confine his walks to our principal high roads, and not offer to walk or lie down in a meadow or field of corn.

IV. As he walks the said roads he shall take the utmost care not to trample upon the bodies of any of our loving subjects, their horses or carriages, nor take any of our subjects into his hands without their own consent.

V. If an express requires extraordinary despatch, the Man-mountain shall be obliged to carry, in his pocket, the messenger and horse a six days' journey once in every moon, and return the said messenger back (if so required) safe to our imperial presence.

* The author probably intends to ridicule the partiality of George I. for reviews and military pageantry. Hogarth's celebrated picture of the "March of the Guards to Finchly" belongs to a much later period, but its satiric touches would probably have been as applicable in the reign of the first as of the second George.

† Skyresh Bolgolam is most probably the Duke of Argyle, who was greatly incensed at Swift's attacks on the Scottish nation, in his "Public Spirit of the Whigs." In an unfinished poem on himself, the Dean alludes to the proclamation offering three hundred pounds for the discovery of the author of this pamphlet, which was issued at the demand rather than the request of the Duke of Argyle, he conducted all the Scotch lords in a body to demand an audience of the queen and seek reparation.

"The queen incensed, his services forgot,
Leaves him a victim to the vengeful Scot;
Now through the realm a proclamation spread,
To fix a price on his devoted head;
While, innocent, he scorns ignoble flight;
His watchful friends preserve him by a sleight."

See also the character given of Argyle in Swift's notes on Macky, Appendix to Lilliput I.

* In his description of Lilliput, in the following Articles, Gulliver seems to have had England more immediately in view. In his description of Blefuscu, he seems to intend the people and kingdom of France. — Orrery.

It is perhaps in order to qualify this parallel that Swift has changed the relative description of the two countries, and made Lilliput the continent, Blefuscu the island. — Sir Walter Scott.

VI. He shall be our ally against our enemies in the island of Blefuscu, and do his utmost to destroy their fleet, which is now preparing to invade us.

VII. That the said Man-mountain shall, at his time of leisure, be aiding and assisting to our workmen, in helping to raise certain great stones towards covering the wall of the principal park, and other our royal buildings.

VIII. That the said Man-mountain shall in two moons' time, deliver in an exact survey of the circumference of our dominions, by a computation of his own paces round the coast.

Lastly, That upon his solemn oath to observe all the above articles, the said Man-mountain shall have a daily allowance of meat and drink sufficient for the support of 1724 of our subjects, with free access to our royal person, and other marks of our favor. Given at our palace at Belfaborac, the twelfth day of the ninety-first moon of our reign.

I swore and subscribed to these articles with great cheerfulness and content, although some of them were not so honorable as I could have wished; which proceeded wholly from the malice of Skyresh Bolgolam, the high admiral; whereupon my chains were immediately unlocked, and I was at full liberty. The emperor himself, in person, did me the honor to be by at the whole ceremony. I made my acknowledgments by prostrating myself at his majesty's feet: but he commanded me to rise; and after many gracious expressions, which to avoid the censure of vanity I shall not repeat, he added "that he hoped I should prove a useful servant, and well deserve all the favors he had already conferred upon me, or might do for the future."

The reader may please to observe, that in the last article of the recovery of my liberty the emperor stipulates to allow me a quantity of meat and drink sufficient for the support of 1724 Lilliputians. Some time after, asking a friend at court how they came to fix on that determined number, he told me that his majesty's mathematicians, having taken the height of my body by the help of a quadrant, and finding it to exceed theirs in the proportion of twelve to one, they concluded, from the similarity of their bodies, that mine must contain at least 1724 of theirs, and consequently would require as much food as was necessary to support that number of Lilliputians. By which the reader may conceive an idea of the ingenuity of that people, as well as the prudent and exact economy of so great a prince.

CHAPTER IV.

MILDENDO, THE METROPOLIS OF LILLIPUT, DESCRIBED, TOGETHER WITH THE EMPEROR'S PALACE. — A CONVERSATION BETWEEN THE AUTHOR AND A PRINCIPAL SECRETARY, CONCERNING THE AFFAIRS OF THAT EMPIRE — THE AUTHOR OFFERS TO SERVE THE EMPEROR IN HIS WARS.

Liberty having been granted me, my first request was for permission to see Mildendo, the metropolis; which the emperor readily allowed me, but with a special charge to do no hurt either to the inhabitants or their houses. The people had notice, by proclamation, of my design to visit the town. The wall which encompassed it is two feet and a half high, and at least eleven inches broad, so that a coach and horses may be driven very safely round it; and it is flanked with strong towers at ten feet distance. I stepped over the great western gate, and passed very gently and sidelong through the two principal streets only in my short waistcoat, for fear of damaging the roofs and eaves of the houses with the skirts of my coat. I walked with the utmost circumspection, to avoid treading on any stragglers who might remain in the streets; although the orders were very strict, that all people should keep in their houses at their own peril. The garret windows and tops of houses were so crowded with spectators, that I thought in all my travels I had not seen a more populous place. The city is an exact square, each side of the wall being five hundred feet long. The two great streets, which run across and divide it into four quarters, are five feet wide. The lanes and alleys, which I could not enter, but only viewed them as I passed, are from twelve to eighteen inches. The town is capable of holding five hundred thousand souls; the houses are from three to five stories; the shops and markets well provided.

The emperor's palace is in the centre of the city, where the two great streets meet. It is enclosed by a wall of two feet high, and twenty feet distance from the buildings. I had his majesty's permission to step over this wall; and the space being so wide between that and the palace, I could easily view it on every side. The outward court is a square of forty feet, and includes two other courts. in the inmost are the royal apartments, which I was very desirous to see, but found it extremely difficult; for the great gates, from one square into another, were but eighteen inches high and seven inches wide. Now the buildings of the outer court were at least five feet high, and it was impossible for me to stride over them without infinite damage to the pile, though the walls were strongly built of hewn stone, and four inches thick. At the same time the emperor had a great desire that I should see the magnificence of his palace; but this I was not able to do till three days after, which I spent in cutting down with my knife some of the largest trees in the royal park, about a hundred yards distance from the city. Of these trees I made two stools, each about three feet high, and strong enough to bear my weight. The people having received notice a second time, I went again through the city to the palace with my two stools in my hands. When I came to the side of the outer court, I stood upon one stool and took the other in my hand; this I lifted over the roof, and gently set it down on the space between the first and second court, which was eight feet wide. I then stepped over the building very conveniently from one stool to the other, and drew up the first after me with a hooked stick. By this contrivance I got into the inmost court; and, lying down upon my side, I applied my face to the windows of the middle stories, which were left open on purpose, and discovered the most splendid apartments that can be imagined.

There I saw the empress and the young princes, in their several lodgings, with their chief attendants about them. Her imperial majesty was pleased to smile very graciously upon me, and gave me out of the window her hand to kiss.*

* The character of the empress is manifestly taken from that of Queen Anne, — good-natured, but easily duped.

But I shall not anticipate the reader with further descriptions of this kind, because I reserve them for a greater work, which is now almost ready for the press, containing a general description of this empire, from its first erection, through a long series of princes; with a particular account of their wars and politics, laws, learning, and religion; their plants and animals; their peculiar manners and customs, with other matters very curious and useful: my chief design at present being only to relate such events and transactions as happened to the public or to myself during a residence of about nine months in that empire.

One morning, about a fortnight after I had obtained my liberty, Reldresal, principal secretary (as they style him) for private affairs, came to my house attended only by one servant. He ordered his coach to wait at a distance, and desired I would give him an hour's audience; which I readily consented to, on account of his quality and personal merits, as well as of the many good offices he had done me during my solicitations at court. I offered to lie down, that he might the more conveniently reach my ear; but he chose rather to let me hold him in my hand during our conversation. He began with compliments on my liberty; said "he might pretend to some merit in it"; but, however, added, "that if it had not been for the present situation of things at court, perhaps I might not have obtained it so soon. For," said he, "as flourishing condition as we may appear to be in to foreigners, we labor under two mighty evils, — a violent faction at home; and the danger of an invasion, by a most potent enemy, from abroad. As to the first, you are to understand that for above seventy moons past there have been two struggling parties in this empire, under the names of Tramecksan and Slamecksan,* from the high and low heels of their shoes, by which they distinguish themselves. It is alleged, indeed, that the high-heels are most agreeable to our ancient constitution; but, however this be, his majesty has determined to make use only of low-heels in the administration of the government, and all offices in the gift of the crown, as you cannot but observe: and particularly that his majesty's imperial heels are lower at least by a drurr than any of his court (drurr is a measure about the fourteenth part of an inch). The animosities between these two parties run so high, that they will neither eat nor drink nor talk with each other. We compute the Tramecksan, or high-heels, to exceed us in number; but the power is wholly on our side. We apprehend his imperial highness, the heir to the crown, to have some tendency towards the high-heels; at least, we can plainly discover that one of his heels is higher than the other, which gives him a hobble in his gait.* Now, in the midst of these intestine disquiets, we are threatened with an invasion from the island of Blefuscu, which is the other great empire of the universe, almost as large and powerful as this of his majesty. For as to what we have heard you affirm, that there are other kingdoms and states in the world inhabited by human creatures as large as yourself, our philosophers are in much doubt, and would rather conjecture that you dropped from the moon or one of the stars; because it is certain that a hundred mortals of your bulk would in a short time destroy all the fruits and cattle of his majesty's dominions: besides, our histories of six thousand moons make no mention of any other regions than the two great empires of Lilliput and Blefuscu. Which two mighty powers have, as I was going to tell you, been engaged in a most obstinate war for six-and-thirty moons past. It began upon the following occasion: it is allowed on all hands, that the primitive way of breaking eggs, before we eat them, was upon the larger end; but his present majesty's grandfather, while he was a boy, going to eat an egg, and breaking it according to the ancient practice, happened to cut one of his fingers; whereupon the emperor, his father, published an edict commanding all his subjects, upon great penalties, to break the smaller end of their eggs.* The people so highly resented this law, that our histories tell us there have been six rebellions raised on that account, wherein one emperor lost his life,† and another his crown.‡ These civil commotions were constantly fomented by the monarchs of Blefuscu; and when they were quelled, the exiles always fled for refuge to that empire. It is computed that eleven thousand persons have at several times suffered death, rather than submit to break their eggs at the smaller end. Many hundred large volumes have been published upon this controversy: but the books of the Big-endians have been long forbidden, and the whole party rendered incapable by law of holding employments. During the course of these troubles, the emperors of Blefuscu did frequently expostulate by their ambassadors, accusing us of making a schism in religion by offending against a fundamental doctrine of our great prophet Lustrog, in the fifty-fourth chapter of the Blundecral, which is their Alcoran. This, however, is thought to be a mere strain upon the text; for the words are these: that all true believers break their eggs at the convenient end; and which is the convenient end seems, in my humble opinion, to be left to every man's conscience, or at least in the power of the chief magistrate to determine.§

* George, Prince of Wales, afterwards George II., was at this time vehement in his hostility to his father's ministers, like all heirs-apparent since the accession of the house of Brunswick, he chose his political friends among the parties most opposed to the court, calling around him both the discontented Whigs and the displeased Tories We learn from a letter of Mrs. Howard that the prince was greatly amused at this description of his hobbling between the two political parties. On his accession to the throne, which took place shortly after the publication of Gulliver, he was easily induced by Queen Caroline to continue Sir Robert Walpole at the head of affairs; an unexpected change, which greatly disappointed Swift and his friends.

* The controversy respecting the sacraments between the Romish and Anglican churches is humorously portrayed in the dispute about the proper end of breaking the egg The emperor who cut his fingers is manifestly Henry VIII, who was so sadly perplexed by the sacrament of marriage and the difficulty of divorce.

† Charles I. ‡ James II.

§ Swift appears to intimate that the great point at issue between the Romish and English churches, the sacrament of the eucharist, has been decided too positively by the theologians on both sides; he intimates that the question of transubstantiation should be left open to the faith of the receiver, in accordance with the memorable lines of Queen Elizabeth,—

"Christ was the word that spake it,
He took the bread, and brake it,
And what that word did make it;
That I believe and take it."

"Now the Big-endian exiles have found so much credit in the emperor of Blefuscu's court, and so much private assistance and encouragement from their party here at home, that a bloody war has been carried on between the two empires for six-and-thirty moons, with various success; during which time we have lost forty capital ships, and a much greater number of smaller vessels, together with thirty thousand of our best seamen and soldiers; and the damage received by the enemy is reckoned to be somewhat greater than ours.* However, they have now equipped a numerous fleet, and are just preparing to make a descent upon us; and his imperial majesty, placing great confidence in your valor and strength, has commanded me to lay this account of his affairs before you."

I desired the secretary to present my humble duty to the emperor, and let him know "that I thought it would not become me, who was a foreigner, to interfere with parties; but I was ready, with the hazard of my life, to defend his person and state against all invaders."†

CHAPTER V.

THE AUTHOR, BY AN EXTRAORDINARY STRATAGEM, PREVENTS AN INVASION. — A HIGH TITLE OF HONOR IS CONFERRED UPON HIM. — AMBASSADORS ARRIVE FROM THE EMPEROR OF BLEFUSCU, AND SUE FOR PEACE. — THE EMPRESS'S APARTMENTS ON FIRE BY ACCIDENT; THE AUTHOR INSTRUMENTAL IN SAVING THE REST OF THE PALACE.

Lilliput is part of the continent, but the empire of Blefuscu is an island situated to the northeast of the mainland, from which it is parted only by a channel of eight hundred yards wide. I had not yet seen it, and upon this notice of an intended invasion, I avoided appearing on that side of the coast, for fear of being discovered by some of the enemy's ships, who had received no intelligence of me, all intercourse between the two empires having been strictly forbidden during the war, upon pain of death, and an embargo laid by our emperor upon all vessels whatsoever. I communicated to his majesty a project I had formed of seizing the enemy's whole fleet, which, as our scouts assured us, lay at anchor in the harbor, ready to sail with the first fair wind. I consulted the most experienced seamen upon the depth of the channel, which they had often plumbed; who told me that in the middle, at high water, it was seventy glumgluffs deep, which is about six feet of European measure, and the rest of it fifty glumgluffs at most. I walked towards the northeast coast, over against Blefuscu, where, lying down behind a hillock, I took out my small perspective-glass, and viewed the enemy's fleet at anchor, consisting of about fifty men-of-war and a great number of transports. I then came back to my house, and gave orders (for which I had a warrant) for a great quantity of the strongest cable and bars of iron. The cable was about as thick as packthread, and the bars of the length and size of a knitting-needle. I trebled the cable to make it stronger, and, for the same reason, I twisted three of the iron bars together, bending the extremities into a hook. Having thus fixed fifty hooks to as many cables, I went back to the northeast coast, and, putting off my coat, shoes, and stockings, walked into the sea in my leathern jerkin, about half an hour before high water. I waded with what haste I could, and swam in the middle about thirty yards, till I felt ground. I arrived at the fleet in less than half an hour. The enemy were so frighted when they saw me, that they escaped out of their ships and swam to shore, where there could not be fewer than thirty thousand souls. I then took my tackling, and, fastening a hook to the hole at the prow of each, I tied all the cords together at the end. While I was thus employed, the enemy discharged several thousand arrows, many of which stuck in my hands and face, and, besides the excessive smart, gave me much disturbance in my work. My greatest apprehension was for mine eyes, which I should have infallibly lost if I had not suddenly thought of an expedient. I kept, among other little necessaries, a pair of spectacles in a private pocket, which, as I observed before, had escaped the emperor's searchers. These I took out and fastened as strongly as I could upon my nose, and, thus armed, went on boldly with my work, in spite of the enemy's arrows, many of which struck against the glasses of my spectacles, but without any other effect further than a little to discompose them. I had now fastened all the hooks, and, taking the knot in my hand, began to pull; but not a ship would stir, for they were all too fast held by their anchors, so that the boldest part of my enterprise remained. I therefore let go the cord, and, leaving the hooks fixed to the ships, I resolutely cut with my knife the cables that fastened the anchors, receiving about two hundred arrows in my face and hands; then I took up the knotted end of the cables, to which my hooks were tied, and with great ease drew fifty of the enemy's largest men-of-war after me.

* This description of the Big-endian war is designed for the wars of the revolution, which were terminated by the peace of Utrecht, and the enumeration of the losses and slaughter occasioned by the war is intended to vindicate Harley and Bolingbroke for bringing it to a conclusion.

The Blefuscudians, who had not the least imagination of what I intended, were at first confounded with astonishment. They had seen me cut the cables, and thought my design was only to let the ships run adrift, or fall foul on each other; but when they perceived the whole fleet moving in order, and saw me pulling at the end, they set up such a scream of grief and despair as it is almost impossible to describe or conceive.* When I had got out of danger, I stopped awhile to pick out the arrows that stuck in my hands and face, and rubbed on some of the same ointment that was given me at my first arrival, as I have formerly mentioned. I then took off my spectacles, and waiting about an hour till the tide was a little fallen, I waded through the middle with my cargo, and arrived safe at the royal port of Lilliput.

The emperor and his whole court stood on the shore, expecting the issue of this great adventure. They saw the ships move forward in a large half-moon, but could not discern me, who was up to my breast in water. When I advanced to the middle of the channel, they were yet more in pain, because I was under water to my neck. The emperor concluded me to be drowned, and that the enemy's fleet was approaching in a hostile manner; but he was soon eased of his fears; for the channel growing shallower every step I made, I came in a short time within hearing, and holding up the end of the cable, by which the fleet was fastened, I cried, in a loud voice, "Long live the most puissant king of Lilliput!" This great prince received me at my landing with all possible encomiums, and created me a nardac upon the spot, which is the highest title of honor among them.*

His majesty desired I would take some other opportunity of bringing all the rest of his enemy's ships into his ports. And so unmeasurable is the ambition of princes that he seemed to think of nothing less than reducing the whole empire of Blefuscu into a province, and governing it by a viceroy; of destroying the Big-endian exiles, and compelling that people to break the smaller end of their eggs, by which he would remain the sole monarch of the whole world. But I endeavored to divert him from this design by many arguments drawn from the topics

* The capture of the Blefuscudian fleet is intended to represent the efforts made by the Tory ministry to secure the naval supremacy of England in the negotiations at Utrecht, and particularly their success in procuring the demolition of Dunkirk and the cession of several French colonies.

* The treaty at Utrecht was at first very popular with the English people; and it was regarded by Queen Anne as a blessing to England and to Europe. The promised demolition of Dunkirk, and its surrender as a guaranty to General Hill, were regarded not only by the court, but by the nation, as an advantage scarcely inferior to what the capture of the Blefuscudian fleet would have been to the emperor of Lilliput. Swift wrote a song on the event, which was very popular. The following are the concluding stanzas: —

"Our merchant ships may cut the line,
And not be snapped by privateers;
And commoners who love good wine
Will drink it now as well as peers:
Landed men shall have their rent,
Yet our stocks rise cent per cent;
The Dutch from hence shall no more millions drain;
We'll bring on us no more debts,
Nor with bankrupts fill gazettes;
And the queen shall enjoy her own again.

The towns we took ne'er did us good:
What signified the French to beat?
We spent our money and our blood
To make the Dutchmen proud and great:
But the lord of Oxford swears
Dunkirk never shall be theirs;
The Dutch-hearted Whigs may rail and complain;
But true Englishmen may fill
A health to General Hill,
For the queen now enjoys her own again."

of policy as well as justice; and I plainly protested "that I would never be an instrument of bringing a free and brave people into slavery"; and when the matter was debated in council, the wisest part of the ministry were of my opinion.*

This open, bold declaration of mine was so opposite to the schemes and politics of his imperial majesty, that he could never forgive me. He mentioned it in a very artful manner at council, where I was told that some of the wisest appeared, at least by their silence, to be of my opinion; but others, who were my secret enemies, could not forbear some expressions which by a side wind reflected on me; and from this time began an intrigue between his majesty and a junto of ministers maliciously bent against me, which broke out in less than two months, and had like to have ended in my utter destruction. Of so little weight are the greatest services to princes, when put into the balance with a refusal to gratify their passions.

About three weeks after this exploit there arrived a solemn embassy from Blefuscu with humble offers of a peace, which was soon concluded upon conditions very advantageous to our emperor, wherewith I shall not trouble the reader. There were six ambassadors with a train of about five hundred persons; and their entry was very magnificent, suitable to the grandeur of their master and the importance of their business. When their treaty was finished, wherein I did them several good offices by the credit I now had, or at least appeared to have, at court, their excellencies, who were privately told how much I had been their friend, made me a visit in form. They began with many compliments upon my valor and generosity, invited me to that kingdom in the emperor their master's name, and desired me to show them some proofs of my prodigious strength, of which they had heard so many wonders; wherein I readily obliged them, but shall not trouble the reader with the particulars.

When I had for some time entertained their excellencies, to their infinite satisfaction and surprise, I desired they would do me the honor to present my most humble respects to the emperor their master, the renown of whose virtues had so justly filled the whole world with admiration, and whose royal person I resolved to attend before I returned to my own country. Accordingly, the next time I had the honor to see our emperor, I desired his general license to wait on the Blefuscudian monarch, which he was pleased to grant me, as I could perceive, in a very cold manner; but could not guess the reason till I had a whisper from a certain person, "that Flimnap and Bolgolam had represented my intercourse with those ambassadors as a mark of disaffection"; from which, I am sure, my heart was wholly free. And this was the first time I began to conceive some imperfect idea of courts and ministers.*

It is to be observed that these ambassadors spoke to me by an interpreter, the languages of both empires differing as much from each other as any two in Europe, and each nation priding itself upon the antiquity, beauty, and energy of their own tongue, with an avowed contempt for that of their neighbor; yet our emperor, standing upon the advantage he had got by the seizure of their fleet, obliged them to deliver their credentials and make their speech in the Lilliputian tongue. And it must be confessed that, from the great intercourse of trade and commerce between both realms, from the continual reception of exiles which is mutual among them, and from the custom in each empire to send their young nobility and richer gentry to the other in order to polish themselves by seeing the world and understanding men and manners,

* The conquest of France was seriously believed feasible by many friends of the Duke of Marlborough; but when the siege of such a petty fortress as Boucham occupied the greater part of one campaign, the best English statesmen saw there was little chance of such a consummation. Mesnager, if the memoirs published in his name be not a forgery, declares that the Tories used to annoy the Whigs by asking, "How long will it take to conquer France at the rate of a Bouchain per summer?" In the debates on the Treaty of Utrecht (A. D. 1713), the advocates for peace had decidedly the best of the argument, so that Gulliver is justified in saying that "the wisest were of his opinion."

* The charge raised against Gulliver for his innocent intercourse with the ambassadors from Blefuscu alludes to the chief accusation brought against Bolingbroke (A. D. 1715), which was his treasonable intimacy with the French ministers during the negotiations of the peace at Utrecht. Bolingbroke's journey to France to negotiate a separate peace, and his clandestine intercourse with the agents of Louis, were, however, of such a suspicious nature that he did not think it prudent to wait for his trial.

— there are few persons of distinction, or merchants, or seamen, who dwell in the maritime parts, but what can hold conversation in both tongues ; as I found some weeks after, when I went to pay my respects to the Emperor of Blefuscu, which, in the midst of great misfortunes, through the malice of my enemies, proved a very happy adventure to me, as I shall relate in its proper place.

The reader may remember, that when I signed those articles upon which I recovered my liberty, there were some which I disliked upon account of their being too servile ; neither could anything but an extreme necessity have forced me to submit. But being now a nardac of the highest rank in that empire, such offices were looked upon as below my dignity, and the emperor (to do him justice) never once mentioned them to me. However, it was not long before I had an opportunity of doing his majesty, at least as I then thought, a most signal service. I was alarmed at midnight with the cries of many hundred people at my door ; by which, being suddenly awaked, I was in some kind of terror. I heard the word burglum repeated incessantly : several of the emperor's court, making their way through the crowd, entreated me to come immediately to the palace, where her imperial majesty's apartment was on fire by the carelessness of a maid of honor, who fell asleep while she was reading a romance. I got up in an instant ; and, orders being given to clear the way before me, and it being likewise a moonshine night, I made a shift to get to the palace without trampling on any of the people. I found they had already applied ladders to the walls of the apartment, and were well provided with buckets, but the water was at some distance. These buckets were about the size of a large thimble, and the poor people supplied me with them as fast as they could ; but the flame was so violent that they did little good. I might easily have stifled it with my coat ; which I unfortunately left behind me for haste, and came away only in my leathern jerkin. The case seemed wholly desperate and deplorable ; and this magnificent palace would have infallibly been burnt down to the ground, if, by a presence of mind unusual to me, I had not suddenly thought of an expedient. In three minutes the fire was wholly extinguished, and the rest of that noble pile, which had cost so many ages in erecting, preserved from destruction.

It was now daylight, and I returned to my house without waiting to congratulate with the emperor ; because, although I had done a very eminent piece of service, yet I could not tell how his majesty might resent the manner by which I had performed it : for, by the fundamental laws of the realm, it is capital in any person, of what quality soever, to desecrate so far the precincts of the palace. But I was a little comforted by a message from his majesty "that he would give orders to the grand justiciary for passing my pardon in form" ; which, however, I could not obtain ; and I was privately assured that the empress, conceiving the greatest abhorrence of what I had done, removed to the most distant side of the court, firmly resolved that those buildings should never be repaired for her use ; and, in the presence of her chief confidants, could not forbear vowing revenge.*

* Swift, in this description of the empress's hostility on account of his indecency and her forgetfulness of the essential service which he had rendered, alludes to the prejudices of Queen Anne, who was more indignant at the immorality of his writings than grateful for his support of her favorite ministry. It must be admitted that the character and influence of the "Tale of a Tub" are not inaptly described by this allegory of the fire in the palace, and the violation of propriety which Gulliver committed in extinguishing it. Nor will the reader of the "Tale of a Tub" be surprised at the indignant feeling of the queen. So great are its irreverence and coarseness, that, although written in defence of the Church, it was recommended by Voltaire, "because the ludicrous combinations which are formed in the mind by the perusal tend to lower the respect due to revelation." The queen had actually nominated Swift to an English bishopric, when Dr. Sharp, Archbishop of York, went to her, showed her the "Tale of a Tub," and declared that the author of such a work could not be made a prelate without bringing disgrace on the Church. Hence Swift, in the lines on himself, complains that he is

> "By an old —— pursued,
> A crazy prelate and a royal prude."

And again,

> "York is from Lambeth sent to show the Queen
> A dangerous treatise writ against the spleen,
> Which, by the style, the matter, and the drift,
> 'T is thought could be the work of none but Swift."

The Archbishop was eagerly seconded by the Duchess of Somerset, whom Swift had bitterly lampooned. The Queen could never afterwards be

CHAPTER VI.*

OF THE INHABITANTS OF LILLIPUT; THEIR LEARNING, LAWS, AND CUSTOMS; THE MANNER OF EDUCATING THEIR CHILDREN. — THE AUTHOR'S WAY OF LIVING IN THAT COUNTRY. — HIS VINDICATION OF A GREAT LADY.

QUARRELS and intrigues are so common in courts that I need not dwell on the calumnies devised by the envious to prejudice the mind of the empress still further against me, and I shall therefore turn to a different subject. Although I intend to leave the description of this empire to a particular treatise, yet in the mean time I am content to gratify the curious reader with some general ideas. As the common size of the natives is somewhat under six inches high, so there is an exact proportion in all other animals, as well as plants and trees; for instance, the tallest horses and oxen are between four and five inches in height, the sheep an inch and half, more or less; their geese about the bigness of a sparrow, and so the several gradations downwards till you come to the smallest, which to my sight were almost invisible: but nature has adapted the eyes of the Lilliputians to all objects proper for their view; they see with great exactness, but at no great distance. And to show the sharpness of their sight towards objects that are near, I have been much pleased with a cook pulling a lark, which was not so large as a common fly; and a young girl threading an invisible needle with invisible silk.

Their tallest trees are about seven feet high, — I mean some of those in the great royal park, the tops whereof I could but just reach with my fist clenched. The other vegetables are in the same proportion; but this I leave to the reader's imagination.

I shall say but little at present of their learning, which for many ages has flourished in all its branches among them; but their manner of writing is very peculiar, being neither from the left to the right, like the Europeans, —

Inimitable, Incomparable;

حبج لضشص شجلق ننكخ جكس

nor from up to down, like the Chinese, —

算	天
才	風

but aslant, from one corner of the paper to the other, like ladies in England.

They bury their dead with their heads directly downward, because they hold an opinion that in eleven thousand moons they are all to rise again; in which period the earth (which they conceive to be flat) will turn upside down, and by this means they shall, at their resurrection, be found ready standing on their feet. The learned among them confess the absurdity of this doctrine; but the practice still continues in compliance to the vulgar.

There are some laws and customs in this empire very peculiar; and if they were not so directly contrary to those of my own dear country, I should be tempted to say a little in their justification. It is only to be wished they were as well executed. The first I shall mention relates to informers. All crimes against the state are punished here with the utmost severity; but if the person accused makes his innocence plainly to appear upon his trial, the accuser is immediately put to an ignominious death; and out of his goods or lands the innocent person is quadruply recompensed for the loss of his time, for the danger he underwent, for the hardship of his imprisonment, and for all the charges he has been at in making his defence; or if persuaded to revoke her determination, and Swift thenceforth always spoke of her in terms of contempt.

* In a German critique on Gulliver's Travels, this chapter has been rather severely censured, because the author has neglected to give any particulars of the Lilliputian climate and its effects; a source from which the review avers that many circumstances might have been deduced which would give an additional plausibility to the narrative. It must be observed, however, in Swift's justification, that this neglect of observing climate and its peculiarities is common to all the early narratives of voyagers, and also that for the purposes of his satire it was necessary to identify the Lilliputian climate with that of England.

that fund be deficient, it is largely supplied by the crown. The emperor also confers on him some public mark of his favor, and proclamation is made of his innocence through the whole city.

They look upon fraud as a greater crime than theft, and therefore seldom fail to punish it with death; for they allege that care and vigilance, with a very common understanding, may preserve a man's goods from thieves, but honesty has no fence against superior cunning; and, since it is necessary that there should be a perpetual intercourse of buying and selling, and dealing upon credit, where fraud is permitted and connived at, or has no law to punish it, the honest dealer is always undone, and the knave gets the advantage. I remember when I was once interceding with the king for a criminal who had wronged his master of a great sum of money, which he received by order and ran away with, and happening to tell his majesty, by way of extenuation, that it was only a breach of trust, the emperor thought it monstrous in me to offer as a defence the greatest aggravation of the crime; and truly I had little to say in return, further than the common answer that different nations had different customs; for I confess I was heartily ashamed.*

Although we call rewards and punishments the two hinges upon which all government turns, yet I could never observe this maxim to be put in practice by any nation except that of Lilliput. Whoever can there bring sufficient proof that he has strictly observed the laws of his country for seventy-three moons has a claim to certain privileges, according to his quality and condition of life, with a proportionable sum of money out of a fund appropriated for that use; he likewise acquires the title of snilpall, or legal, which is added to his name, but does not descend to his posterity. And these people thought it a prodigious defect of policy among us, when I told them that our laws were enforced only by penalties, without any mention of reward. It is upon this account that the image of Justice, in their courts of judicature, is formed with six eyes; two before, as many behind, and on each side one, to signify circumspection; with a bag of gold open in her right hand, and a sword sheathed in her left, to show that she is more disposed to reward than to punish.

In choosing persons for all employments, they have more regard to good morals than to great abilities; for, since government is necessary to mankind, they believe that the common size of human understanding is fitted to some station or other; and that Providence never intended to make the management of public affairs a mystery to be comprehended only by a few persons of sublime genius, of which there seldom are three born in an age: but they suppose truth, justice, temperance, and the like to be in every man's power; the practice of which virtues, assisted by experience and a good intention, would qualify any man for the service of his country, except where a course of study is required. But they thought the want of moral virtues was so far from being supplied by superior endowments of the mind, that employments could never be put into such dangerous hands as those of persons so qualified; and, at least that the mistakes committed by ignorance, in a virtuous disposition, would never be of such fatal consequence to the public weal as the practices of a man whose inclinations led him to be corrupt, and who had great abilities to manage, to multiply, and defend, his corruptions.

In like manner, the disbelief of a Divine Providence renders a man incapable of holding any public station; for since kings avow themselves to be the deputies of Providence, the Lilliputians think nothing can be more absurd than for a prince to employ such men as disown the authority under which he acts.

In relating these and the following laws, I would only be understood to mean the original institutions, and not the most scandalous corruptions into which these people are fallen by the degenerate nature of man. For, as to that infamous practice of acquiring great employments by dancing on ropes, or badges of favor and distinction by leaping over sticks and creeping under them, the reader is to observe that they were first introduced by the grandfather of the emperor now reigning, and grew to the present height by the gradual increase of party and faction.*

* An act of Parliament has since been passed, by which some breaches of trust have been made capital. — Orig.

* The author alludes to the prostitution of hon-

Ingratitude is among them a capital crime, as we read it to have been in some other countries: for they reason thus; that whoever makes ill returns to his benefactor must needs be a common enemy to the rest of mankind, from whom he has received no obligation, and therefore such a man is not fit to live.

Their notions relating to the duties of parents and children differ extremely from ours. For since the conjunction of male and female is founded upon the great law of nature, in order to propagate and continue the species, the Lilliputians will needs have it that men and women are joined together, like other animals, by the motives of their passions; and that their tenderness towards their young proceeds from the like natural principle; for which reason they will never allow that a child is under any obligation to his father for begetting him, or to his mother for bringing him into the world, which, considering the miseries of human life, was neither a benefit in itself nor intended so by the parents, on the child's behalf.* Upon these, and the like reasonings, their opinion is that parents are the last of all others to be trusted with the education of their own children; and therefore they have in every town public nurseries, where all parents, except cottagers and laborers, are obliged to send their infants of both sexes to be reared and educated, when they come to the age of twenty moons, at which time they are supposed to have some rudiments of docility. These schools are of several kinds, suited to different qualities and both sexes. They have certain professors well skilled in preparing children for such a condition of life as befits the rank of their parents and their own capacities, as well as inclinations. I shall first say something of the male nurseries, and then of the female.

The nurseries for males of noble or eminent birth are provided with grave and learned professors and their several deputies. The clothes and food of the children are plain and simple. They are bred up in the principles of honor, justice, courage, modesty, clemency, religion, and love of their country; they are always employed in some business, except in the times of eating and sleeping, which are very short, and two hours for diversions, consisting of bodily exercises. They are dressed by men till four years of age, and then are obliged to dress themselves, although their quality be ever so great; and the women attendants, who are aged proportionably to ours at fifty, perform only the most menial offices. They are never suffered to converse with servants, but go together in smaller or greater numbers, to take their diversions, and always in the presence of a professor or one of his deputies; whereby they avoid those early bad impressions of folly and vice to which our children are subject. Their parents are suffered to see them only twice a year; the visit is to last but an hour; they are allowed to kiss the child at meeting and parting; but a professor, who always stands by on those occasions, will not suffer them to whisper, or use any fondling expressions, or bring any presents of toys, sweetmeats, and the like.

The pension from each family for the education and entertainment of a child, upon failure of due payment, is levied by the emperor's officers.

The nurseries for children of ordinary gentlemen, merchants, traders, and handicrafts are managed proportionably after the same manner, only those designed for trades are put out apprentices at eleven years old, whereas those of persons of quality continue in their exercises till fifteen, which answers to twenty-one with us; but the confinement is gradually lessened for the last three years.

In the female nurseries the young girls of quality are educated much like the males, only they are dressed by orderly servants of their own sex, but always in the presence of a professor or deputy till they come to dress themselves, which is at five years old. And if it be found that these nurses ever presume to entertain the girls with frightful or foolish stories, or the common follies practised by chambermaids among us, they are publicly whipped thrice about the city, imprisoned for a year, and banished for life to the most desolate part of the country. Thus the ors and the lavish distribution of titles in the reign of James I.

* Sir Walter Scott is of opinion that this idea is borrowed from Cyrano Bergerac's Voyage to the Moon, where he finds a people with whom it was the rule that parents should obey their children It has been a favorite with modern humorists.

young ladies there are as much ashamed of being cowards and fools as the men, and despise all personal ornaments beyond decency and cleanliness; neither did I perceive any difference in their education made by their difference of sex, only that the exercises of the females were not altogether so robust, and that some rules were given them relating to domestic life, and a smaller compass of learning was enjoined them: for their maxim is, that among people of quality a wife should be always a reasonable and agreeable companion, because she cannot always be young. When the girls are twelve years old, which among them is the marriageable age, their parents or guardians take them home, with great expressions of gratitude to the professors, and seldom without the tears of the young lady and her companions.

In the nurseries of females of the meaner sort the children are instructed in all kinds of work proper for their sex and their several degrees; those intended for apprentices are dismissed at seven years old, the rest are kept until eleven.

The meaner families who have children at these nurseries are obliged, beside their annual pension, which is as low as possible, to return to the steward of the nursery a small monthly share of their gettings, to be a portion for the child, and therefore all parents are limited in their expenses by the law. For the Lilliputians think nothing can be more unjust than for people, in subservience to their own appetites, to bring children into the world and leave the burden of supporting them on the public. As to persons of quality, they give security to appropriate a certain sum for each child, suitable to their condition; and these funds are always managed with good husbandry and the most exact justice.

The cottagers and laborers keep their children at home, their business being only to till and cultivate the earth, and therefore their education is of little consequence to the public; but the old and diseased among them are supported by hospitals, for begging is a trade unknown in this empire.

And here it may, perhaps, divert the curious reader to give some account of my domestics, and my manner of living in this country, during a residence of nine months and thirteen days. Having a head mechanically turned, and being likewise forced by necessity, I had made for myself a table and chair convenient enough, out of the largest trees in the royal park. Two hundred sempstresses were employed to make me shirts and linen for my bed and table, all of the strongest and coarsest kind they could get, which, however, they were forced to quilt together in several folds, for the thickest was some degrees finer than lawn. Their linen is usually three inches wide, and three feet make a piece. The sempstresses took my measure as I lay on the ground, one standing at my neck and another at my mid-leg, with a strong cord extended, that each held by the end, while a third measured the length of the cord with a rule of an inch long. Then they measured my right thumb, and desired no more; for by a mathematical computation, that twice round the thumb is once round the wrist, and so on to the neck and the waist, and by the help of my old shirt, which I displayed on the ground before them for a pattern, they fitted me exactly. Three hundred tailors were employed in the same manner to make me clothes; but they had another contrivance for taking my measure. I kneeled down, and they raised a ladder from the ground to my neck; upon this ladder one of them mounted and let fall a plumb-line from my collar to the floor, which just answered the length of my coat; but my waist and arms I measured myself. When my clothes were finished, which was done in my house (for the largest of theirs would not have been able to hold them), they looked like the patchwork made by the ladies in England, only that mine were all of a color.

I had three hundred cooks to dress my victuals, in little convenient huts built about my house, where they and their families lived, and prepared me two dishes apiece. I took up twenty waiters in my hand, and placed them on the table; a hundred more attended below on the ground, some with dishes of meat, and some with barrels of wine and other liquors slung on their shoulders, all which the waiters above drew up, as I wanted, in a very ingenious manner, by certain cords, as we draw the bucket up a well in Europe. A dish of their meat was a good mouthful, and a barrel of their liquor a reasonable draught. Their mutton yields to ours, but their beef is excellent. I have had a sirloin so large that I have been forced to make three bites of it; but this is rare. My servants were astonished to see me eat it, bones and all, as in our country we do the leg of a lark. Their geese and turkeys I usually ate at a mouthful, and I confess they far exceed ours. Of their smaller fowl I could take up twenty or thirty at the end of my knife.

One day his imperial majesty, being informed of my way of living, desired "that himself and his royal consort, with the young princes of the blood of both sexes, might have the happiness," as he was pleased to call it, "of dining with me." They came, accordingly, and I placed them in chairs of state upon my table, just over against me, with their guards about them. Flimnap, the lord high-treasurer, attended there likewise, with his white staff, and I observed he often looked on me with a sour countenance, which I would not seem to regard, but ate more than usual, in honor to my dear country, as well as to fill the court with admiration. I have some private reasons to believe that this visit from his majesty gave Flimnap an opportunity of doing me ill offices to his master. That minister had always been my secret enemy, though he outwardly caressed me more than was usual to the moroseness of his nature. He represented to the emperor "the low condition of his treasury, that he was forced to take up money at a great discount, that exchequer bills would not circulate under nine per cent below par, that I had cost his majesty above a million and a half of sprugs (their greatest gold coin, about the bigness of a spangle), and, upon the whole, that it would be advisable in the emperor to take the first fair occasion of dismissing me." *

I am here obliged to vindicate the reputation of an excellent lady, who was an innocent sufferer on my account. The treasurer took a fancy to be jealous of his wife, from the malice of some evil tongues, who informed him that her Grace had taken a violent affection for my person; and the court scandal ran for some time, that she once came privately to my lodging. This I solemnly declare to be a most infamous falsehood, without any grounds, further than that her Grace was pleased to treat me with all innocent marks of freedom and friendship. I own she came often to my house, but always publicly, nor ever without three more in the coach, who were usually her sister and young daughter, and some particular acquaintance; but this was common to many other ladies of the court; and I still appeal to my servants round whether they at any time saw a coach at my door without knowing what persons were in it. On those occasions, when a servant had given me notice, my custom was to go immediately to the door; and, after paying my respects, to take up the coach and two horses very carefully in my hands (for if there were six horses, the postilion always unharnessed four), and place them on a table, where I had fixed a movable rim quite round, of five inches high, to prevent accidents; and I have often had four coaches and horses at once on my table, full of company, while I sat in my chair, leaning my face towards them; and when I was engaged with one set, the coachmen would gently drive the others round my table. I have spent many an afternoon very agreeably in these conversations. But I defy the treasurer, or his two informers (I will name them, and let them make the best of it), Clustril and Drunlo, to prove that any person ever came to me incognito, except the secretary Reldresal, who was sent by express command of his imperial majesty, as I have before related. I should not have dwelt so long upon this particular, if it had not been a point wherein the reputation of a great lady is so nearly concerned,* to say nothing of my own; though I then had the honor to be a nardac, which the treasurer himself is not; for all the world knows that he is only a glumglum, a title inferior by one degree, as that of a marquis is to a duke in England; yet I allow he preceded me in right of his post. These false informations, which I afterwards came to the knowledge of by an accident not proper to mention, made the treasurer show his lady for some time an ill countenance and me a worse; and although he was at last undeceived and reconciled to her, yet I lost all credit with him, and found my interest decline very fast with the emperor himself, who was, indeed, too much governed by that favorite.

* Sir Robert Walpole was often reproached with false economy, — no uncommon topic of railing against the Whigs. The parsimonious disposition of George I. has been already noticed.

* The Dean probably alludes to the inquiries made into Bolingbroke's intrigues by the committee of 1715, and particularly that which he was suspected of having formed with Madame Tencin. There are few passages in this work which can compete for grave and quiet humor with Gulliver's earnest defence of the lady's character.

CHAPTER VII.

THE AUTHOR, BEING INFORMED OF A DESIGN TO ACCUSE HIM OF HIGH TREASON, MAKES HIS ESCAPE TO BLEFUSCU. — HIS RECEPTION THERE.

An account of my leaving this kingdom may properly be prefaced by some particulars of a private intrigue which had been for two months forming against me. I had been hitherto, all my life, a stranger to courts, for which I was unqualified by the meanness of my condition. I had indeed heard and read enough of the dispositions of great princes and ministers; but never expected to have found such terrible effects of them in so remote a country, governed, as I thought, by very different maxims from those in Europe.

When I was just preparing to pay my attendance on the emperor of Blefuscu, a considerable person at court (to whom I had been very serviceable, at a time when he lay under the highest displeasure of his imperial majesty) came to my house very privately at night, in a close chair, and, without sending his name, desired admittance. The chairmen were dismissed, I put the chair, with his lordship in it, into my coat pocket; and giving orders to a trusty servant to say I was indisposed and gone to sleep, I fastened the door of my house, placed the chair on the table, according to my usual custom, and sat down by it. After the common salutations were over, observing his lordship's countenance full of concern, and inquiring into the reason, he desired "I would hear him with patience in a matter that highly concerned my honor and my life." His speech was to the following effect, for I took notes of it as soon as he left me: —

"You are to know," said he, "that several committees of council have been lately called, in the most private manner, on your account; and it is but two days since his majesty came to a full resolution.

"You are very sensible that Skyresh Bolgolam (galbet, or high admiral) has been your mortal enemy almost ever since your arrival. His original reasons I know not; but his hatred is increased since your great success against Blefuscu, by which his glory as admiral is much obscured. This lord, in conjunction with Flimnap the high treasurer, whose enmity against you is notorious on account of his lady, Limtoc the general, Lalcon the chamberlain, and Balmuff the grand justiciary, have prepared articles of impeachment against you, for treason and other capital crimes."

This preface made me so impatient, being conscious of my own merits and innocence, that I was going to interrupt him; when he entreated me to be silent, and thus proceeded: —

"Out of gratitude for the favors you have done me, I procured information of the whole proceedings, and a copy of the articles;* wherein I venture my head for your service.

ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT

AGAINST

QUINBUS FLESTRIN, THE MAN-MOUNTAIN.

ART. I.

Whereas, by a statute made in the reign of his imperial majesty Calin Deffar Plune, it is enacted, that whosoever shall make water within the precincts of the royal palace shall be liable to the pains and penalties of high treason; notwithstanding, the said Quinbus Flestrin, in open breach of the said law, under color of extinguishing the fire kindled in the apartment of his majesty's most dear imperial consort, did maliciously, traitorously, and devilishly, by discharge of his urine, put out the said fire kindled in the said apartment, lying and being within the precincts of the said royal palace, against the statute in that case provided, etc., against the duty, etc.

* These articles are designed to ridicule the articles of impeachment against Oxford, Ormond, and Bolingbroke, in 1715.

There are many who believed that, in consequence of the numerous victories obtained by the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene it would have been possible for the Allies to have marched to Paris and compelled Louis XIV. to purchase peace by the sacrifice of a large portion of his dominion. Swift so far yields to popular prejudice as not to contest the possibility of such an exploit (here typified by the complete conquest of Blefuscu); he takes the higher ground of national justice, and insinuates that if the Allies had violated the integrity of France, they would have been guilty of the very crime which furnished a pretext for their inveterate hostility to Louis XIV. The frivolous and vexatious character of some of the articles of Gulliver's impeachment is scarcely an exaggeration of the trivial nature of many of the charges brought against Queen Anne's last cabinet by the Walpole administration.

ART. II.

That the said Quinbus Flestrin having brought the imperial fleet of Blefuscu into the royal port, and being afterwards commanded by his imperial majesty to seize all the other ships of the said empire of Blefuscu, and reduce that empire to a province, to be governed by a viceroy from hence, and to destroy and put to death not only all the Big-endian exiles, but likewise all the people of that empire who would not immediately forsake the Big-endian heresy; he, the said Flestrin, like a false traitor against this most auspicious, serene, imperial majesty, did petition to be excused from the said service, upon pretence of unwillingness to force the consciences or destroy the liberties and lives of an innocent people.*

ART. III.

That whereas certain ambassdors arrived from the court of Blefuscu, to sue for peace in his majesty's court; he, the said Flestrin, did, like a false traitor, aid, abet, comfort, and divert the said ambassadors, although he knew them to be servants of a prince who was lately an open enemy to his imperial majesty, and in an open war against his said majesty.

ART. IV.

That the said Quinbus Flestrin, contrary to the duty of a faithful subject, is now preparing to make a voyage to the court and empire of Blefuscu, for which he has received only verbal license from his imperial majesty, and, under color of the said license, does falsely and traitorously intend to take the said voyage, and thereby to aid, comfort, and abet the emperor of Blefuscu, so lately an enemy, and in open war with his imperial majesty aforesaid.

"There are some other articles; but these are the most important, of which I have read you an abstract.

"In the several debates upon this impeachment, it must be confessed that his majesty gave many marks of his great lenity; often urging the services you had done him, and endeavoring to extenuate your crimes. The treasurer and admiral insisted that you should be put to the most painful and ignominious death, by setting fire to your house at night; and the general was to attend with twenty thousand men, armed with poisoned arrows, to shoot you on the face and hands. Some of your servants were to have private orders to strew a poisonous juice on your shirts and sheets, which would soon make you tear your own flesh, and die in the utmost torture. The general came into the same opinion; so that for a long time there was a majority against you; but his majesty resolving, if possible, to spare your life, at last brought off the chamberlain.

"Upon this incident, Reldresal, principal secretary for private affairs, who always approved himself your true friend, was commanded by the emperor to deliver his opinion, which he accordingly did; and therein justified the good thoughts you have of him. He allowed your crimes to be great, but that still there was room for mercy, the most commendable virtue in a prince, and for which his majesty was so justly celebrated. He said the friendship between you and him was so well known to the world, that perhaps the most honorable board might think him partial; however, in obedience to the command he had received, he would freely offer his sentiments. That if his majesty, in consideration of your services and pursuant to his own merciful disposition, would please to spare your life, and only give orders to put out both of your eyes, he humbly conceived that, by this expedient, justice might in some measure be satisfied, and all the world would applaud the lenity of the emperor, as well as the fair and generous proceedings of those who have the honor to be his counsellors. That the loss of your eyes would be no impediment to your bodily strength, by which you might still be useful to his majesty; that blindness is an addition to courage, by concealing dangers from us; that the fear you had for your eyes was the greatest difficulty in bringing over the enemy's fleet; and it would be sufficient for you to see by the eyes of the ministers, since the greatest princes do no more.*

"This proposal was received with the utmost disapprobation by the whole board. Bolgolam, the admiral, could not preserve his temper; but, rising up in a fury, said, he wondered how the secretary durst presume to give his opinion for preserving the life of a traitor: that the services you had performed were, by all true reasons of state, the great aggravation of your crimes; that you, who was able to extinguish the fire by discharge of urine in her majesty's apartment (which he mentioned with horror), might, at another time, raise an inundation by the same means, to drown the whole palace; and the same strength which enabled you to bring over the enemy's fleet might serve, upon the first discontent, to carry it back; that he had good reason to think you were a Big-endian in your heart; and, as treason begins in the heart before it appears in overt acts, so he accused you as a traitor on that account, and therefore insisted you should be put to death.

"The treasurer was of the same opinion: he showed to what straits his majesty's revenue was reduced by the charge of maintaining you, which would soon grow insupportable; that the secretary's expedient of putting out your eyes was so far from being a remedy against this evil, that it would probably increase it, as is manifest from the common practice of blinding some kind of fowls, after which they fed the faster and grew sooner fat; that his sacred majesty and the council, who are your judges, were, in their own consciences, fully convinced of your guilt, which was a sufficient argument to condemn you to death without the formal proofs required by the strict letter of the law.*

"But his imperial majesty, fully determined against capital punishment, was graciously pleased to say, that since the council thought the loss of your eyes too easy a censure, some other may be inflicted hereafter.† And your friend the secretary, humbly desiring to be heard again, in answer to what the treasurer had objected, concerning the great charge his majesty was at in maintaining you, said that his excellency, who had the sole disposal of the emperor's revenue, might easily provide against that evil by gradually lessening your establishment; by which, for want of sufficient food, you will grow weak and faint, and lose your appetite, and consume in a few months; neither would the stench of your carcass be then so dangerous, when it should become more than half diminished; and immediately upon your death five or six thousand of his majesty's subjects might, in two or three days, cut your flesh from your bones, take it away by cartloads, and bury it in distant parts, to prevent infection, leaving the skeleton as a monument of admiration to posterity.

"Thus by the great friendship of the secretary the whole affair was compromised. It was strictly enjoined that the project of starving you by degrees should be kept a secret; but the sentence of putting out your eyes was entered on the books; none dissenting, except Bolgolam, the admiral, who, being a creature of the empress, was perpetually instigated by her majesty to insist upon

* The pretended merciful counsel of Reldresal, who proposed a commutation of punishment which, however, was worse than death, appears to be a satire on those Whigs who proposed that the Earl of Oxford and Lord Bolingbroke, instead of being impeached for high treason and thus brought in peril of life, should only be accused of high misdemeanors, which would justify their being deprived of title and estate, and sentenced to civil death.

* There is something so odious in whatever is wrong, that even those whom it does not subject to punishment endeavor to color it with an appearance of right; but the attempt is always unsuccessful, and only betrays a consciousness of deformity by showing a desire to hide it. Thus the Lilliputian court pretended a right to dispense with the strict letter of the law to put Gulliver to death, though by the strict letter of the law only he could be convicted of a crime; the intention of the statute not being to suffer the palace rather to be burnt than so to be extinguished. — Hawksworth.

† This appears to be directed against the partial pardon which was granted to Lord Bolingbroke. George I. could never be persuaded to restore him to his rights as a peer, though Bolingbroke bribed the Duchess of Kendal to use her powerful intercession, and actually induced her to place his memorial in the king's own hand.

your death, she having borne perpetual malice against you on account of that infamous and illegal method you took to extinguish the fire in her apartment.

"In three days your friend the secretary will be directed to come to your house and read before you the articles of impeachment; and then to signify the great lenity and favor of his majesty and council, whereby you are only condemned to the loss of your eyes, which his majesty does not question you will gratefully and humbly submit to; and twenty of his majesty's surgeons will attend, in order to see the operation well performed, by discharging very sharp-pointed arrows into the balls of your eyes, as you lie on the ground.

"I leave to your prudence what measures you will take; and, to avoid suspicion, I must immediately return in as private a manner as I came."

His lordship did so; and I remained alone, under many doubts and perplexities of mind.

It was a custom introduced by this prince and his ministry (very different, as I have been assured, from the practice of former times), that after the court had decreed any cruel execution, either to gratify the monarch's resentment or the malice of a favorite, the emperor always made a speech to his whole council, expressing his great lenity and tenderness as qualities known and confessed by all the world. This speech was immediately published throughout the kingdom;* nor did anything terrify the people so much as those encomiums on his majesty's mercy; because it was observed that the more these praises were enlarged and insisted on, the more inhuman was the punishment, and the sufferer more innocent. Yet, as to myself, I must confess, having never been designed for a courtier, either by my birth or education, I was so ill a judge of things that I could not discover the lenity and favor of this sentence, but conceived it (perhaps erroneously) rather to be rigorous than gentle. I sometimes thought of standing my trial; for, although I could not deny the facts alleged in the several articles, yet I hoped they would admit of some extenuation. But having in my life perused many state trials, which I ever observed to terminate as the judges thought fit to direct, I durst not rely on so dangerous a decision in so critical a juncture and against such powerful enemies. Once I was strongly bent upon resistance: for, while I had liberty, the whole strength of that empire could hardly subdue me, and I might easily with stones pelt the metropolis to pieces; but I soon rejected that project with horror by remembering the oath I had made to the emperor, the favors I received from him, and the high title of nardac he conferred upon me. Neither had I so soon learned the gratitude of courtiers, to persuade myself that his majesty's present severities acquitted me of all past obligations.*

At last I fixed upon a resolution, for which it is probable I may incur some censure, and not unjustly; for I confess I owe the preserving of mine eyes, and consequently my liberty, to my own great rashness and want of experience; because, if I had then known the nature of princes and ministers, which I have since observed in many other courts, and their methods of treating criminals less obnoxious than myself, I should, with great alacrity and readiness, have submitted to so easy a punishment.† But, hurried on by the precipitancy of youth, and having his imperial majesty's license to pay my attendance

* Sir Walter Scott supposes that a sarcasm is intended here against the royal proclamations issued after the rebellion of 1715, but Swift more probably alludes to the king's speech at the opening of Parliament, October 11, 1722, wherein he informed both Houses of the conspiracy to restore the Pretender, in which Atterbury was involved.

* Gulliver's defence of himself for escaping to Blefuscu is a covert apology for Bolingbroke's flight to France in 1715; a circumstance which was frequently quoted as decisive proof of his guilt, and censured as an act of imprudence by many who believed in his innocence. The Dean insinuates that it was, like that of Gulliver, rendered necessary by the malice of the ministers of the day, and it must be confessed that the mode in which the articles of impeachment were urged forward gave too much reason to believe that Bolingbroke's death was predetermined by his accusers.

† This bitter stroke of irony is directed against the acts of Parliament by which Ormond, Bolingbroke, and the Bishop of Rochester were attainted. Swift gave rather a perilous proof of his belief in the innocence of the Duke of Ormond, when, after that nobleman's attainder, the heralds from the Irish College of Arms went to remove his escutcheon from St. Patrick's Cathedral, Swift refused them admittance, and persevered in keeping the duke's coat-of-arms in its ancient place of honor.

upon the emperor of Blefuscu, I took this opportunity, before the three days were elapsed, to send a letter to my friend the secretary, signifying my resolution of setting out that morning for Blefuscu, pursuant to the leave I had got; and, without waiting for an answer, I went to that side of the island where our fleet lay. I seized a large man-of-war, tied a cable to the prow, and lifting up the anchors, I stripped myself, put my clothes (together with my coverlet, which I carried under my arm) into the vessel, and drawing it after me, between wading and swimming, arrived at the royal port of Blefuscu, where the people had long expected me; they lent me two guides to direct me to the capital city, which is of the same name. I held them in my hands till I came within two hundred yards of the gate, and desired them "to signify my arrival to one of the secretaries, and let him know I there waited his majesty's command." I had an answer in about an hour, "that his majesty, attended by the royal family, and great officers of the court, was coming out to receive me." I advanced a hundred yards. The emperor and his train alighted from their horses, the empress and ladies from their coaches, and I did not perceive they were in any fright or concern. I lay on the ground to kiss his majesty's and the empress's hands. I told his majesty, "that I was come according to my promise, and with the license of the emperor my master, to have the honor of seeing so mighty a monarch, and to offer him any service in my power consistent with my duty to my own prince"; not mentioning a word of my disgrace, because I had hitherto no regular information of it, and might suppose myself wholly ignorant of any such design; neither could I reasonably conceive that the emperor would discover the secret while I was out of his power; wherein, however, it soon appeared I was deceived.

I shall not trouble the reader with the particular account of my reception at this court, which was suitable to the generosity of so great a prince, nor of the difficulties I was in for want of a house and bed, being forced to lie on the ground, wrapped up in my coverlet. *

* The author probably alludes to the severe hardships endured by many of the Jacobite exiles in France.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE AUTHOR, BY A LUCKY ACCIDENT, FINDS MEANS TO LEAVE BLEFUSCU; AND, AFTER SOME DIFFICULTIES, RETURNS SAFE TO HIS NATIVE COUNTRY.

THREE days after my arrival, walking out of curiosity to the northeast coast of the island, I observed, about half a league off in the sea, somewhat that looked like a boat overturned. I pulled off my shoes and stockings, and wading two or three hundred yards I found the object to approach nearer by force of the tide, and then plainly saw it to be a real boat, which I supposed might by some tempest have been driven from a ship; whereupon I returned immediately towards the city, and desired his imperial majesty to lend me twenty of the tallest vessels he had left, after the loss of his fleet, and three thousand seamen, under the command of his vice-admiral. This fleet sailed round, while I went back the shortest way to the coast where I first discovered the boat. I found the tide had driven it still nearer. The seamen were all provided with cordage, which I had beforehand twisted to a sufficient strength. When the ships came up, I stripped myself, and waded till I came within a hundred yards of the boat, after which I was forced to swim till I got up to it. The seamen threw me the end of the cord, which I fastened to a hole in the forepart of the boat, and the other end to a man-of-war; but I found all my labor to little purpose; for, being out of my depth, I was not able to work. In this necessity I was forced to swim behind, and push the boat forward, as often as I could, with one of my hands; and the tide favoring me, I advanced so far that I could just hold up my chin and feel the ground. I rested two or three minutes and then gave the boat another shove, and so on, till the sea was no higher than my arm-pits; and now, the most laborious part being over, I took out my other cables, which were stowed in one of the ships, and fastened them first to the boat and then to nine of the vessels which attended me; the wind being favorable, the seamen towed, and I shoved, until we arrived within forty yards of the shore, and, waiting till the tide was out, I got dry to the boat, and by the assistance of two thousand men with ropes and engines I made a shift to turn it on its bottom, and found it was but little damaged.

I shall not trouble the reader with the difficulties I was under, by the help of certain paddles, which cost me ten days making, to get my boat to the royal port of Blefuscu, where a mighty concourse of people appeared upon my arrival, full of wonder at the sight of so prodigious a vessel. I told the emperor "that my good fortune had thrown this boat in my way, to carry me to some place whence I might return into my native country; and begged his majesty's orders for getting materials to fit it up, together with his license to depart"; which, after some kind expostulations, he was pleased to grant.

I did very much wonder, in all this time, not to have heard * of any express relating to me from our emperor to the court of Blefuscu. But I was afterwards given privately to understand, that his imperial majesty, never imagining I had the least notice of his designs, believed I was only gone to Blefuscu in performance of my promise, according to the license he had given me, which was well known at our court, and would return in a few days, when the ceremony was ended. But he was at last in pain at my long absence; and after consulting with the treasurer and the rest of that cabal, a person of quality was despatched with a copy of the articles against me. This envoy had instructions to represent to the monarch of Blefuscu "the great lenity of his master, who was content to punish me no further than with the loss of mine eyes; that I had fled from justice; and if I did not return in two hours, I should be deprived of my title of nardac, and declared a traitor." The envoy further added "that, in order to maintain the peace and amity between both empires, his master expected that his brother of Blefuscu would give orders to have me sent back to Lilliput, bound hand and foot, to be punished as a traitor." †

The emperor of Blefuscu, having taken three days to consult, returned an answer consisting of many civilities and excuses. He said, "that, as for sending me bound, his brother knew it was impossible; that although I had deprived him of his fleet, yet he owed great obligations to me for many good offices I had done him in making peace. That, however, both their majesties would soon be made easy; for I had found a prodigious vessel on the shore able to carry me on the sea, which he had given orders to fit up, with my own assistance and direction; and he hoped, in a few weeks, both empires would be freed from so insupportable an incumbrance."

With this answer the envoy returned to Lilliput, and the monarch of Blefuscu related to me all that had passed; offering me at the same time (but under the strictest confidence) his gracious protection, if I would continue in his service; wherein although I believed him sincere, yet I resolved nevermore to put any confidence in princes or ministers, where I could possibly avoid it; and therefore, with all due acknowledgments for his favorable intentions, I humbly begged to be excused. I told him that, "since fortune, whether good or evil, had thrown a vessel in my way, I was resolved to venture myself on the ocean, rather than be an occasion of difference between two such mighty monarchs." Neither did I find the emperor at all displeased; and I discovered by a certain accident that he was very glad of my resolution and so were most of his ministers. *

* "I did very much wonder not to have heard," etc. This sentence is ungrammatical; it should have been, "I did very much wonder, in all this time, at not having heard of any express," etc. — Sheridan

† This embassy from Lilliput is designed to satirize the frequent remonstrances made to the French court by the English ministers in consequence of the protection granted to the Jacobites.

* This irony is directed against the jealousy with which Bolingbroke, during his exile, was regarded by the French ministers. His restless spirit of intrigue rendered him scarcely less formidable at Versailles than he had been at St. James's. During his exile Bolingbroke entered into the Pretender's service, but soon quarrelled with his master, and was formally attainted at the mock-court of St. James's. It was a singular fortune to be secretary to and attainted by both governments. Swift has invariably eulogized Bolingbroke as a pure patriot; but he was far from deserving that character. "His life," says a recent writer, "was chiefly spent in retirement, and although not highly exemplary of practical wisdom, he was looked up to with oracular veneration by contemporary wits and politicians. He was a fine speaker and highly accomplished man; of great energy and decision of character; but unscrupulous, and lacked the integrity of principle and singleness of purpose which inspire confidence and lead to unquestioned excellence. He was am-

These considerations moved me to hasten my departure somewhat sooner than I intended; to which the court, impatient to have me gone, very readily contributed. Five hundred workmen were employed to make two sails to my boat, according to my directions, by quilting thirteen folds of their strongest linen together. I was at the pains of making ropes and cables by twisting ten, twenty, or thirty of the thickest and strongest of theirs. A great stone that I happened to find, after a long search, by the sea-shore, served me for an anchor. I had the tallow of three hundred cows for greasing my boat and other uses. I was at incredible pains in cutting down some of the largest timber trees for oars and masts, wherein I was, however, much assisted by his majesty's ship-carpenters, who helped me in smoothing them, after I had done the rough work.

In about a month, when all was prepared, I sent to receive his majesty's commands and to take my leave. The emperor and royal family came out of the palace; I lay down on my face to kiss his hand, which he very graciously gave me; so did the empress and young princes of the blood. His majesty presented me with fifty purses of two hundred sprugs apiece, together with his picture at full length, which I put immediately into one of my gloves, to keep it from being hurt. The ceremonies at my departure were too many to trouble the reader with at this time.

I stored the boat with the carcasses of a hundred oxen and three hundred sheep, with bread and drink proportionable, and as much meat ready dressed as four hundred cooks could provide. I took with me six cows and two bulls alive, with as many ewes and rams, intending to carry them into my own country and propagate the breed; and to feed them on board I had a good bundle of hay and a bag of corn. I would gladly have taken a dozen of the natives, but this was a thing the emperor would by no means permit; and, besides a diligent search into my pockets, his majesty engaged my honor "not to carry away any of his subjects, although with their own consent and desire."

Having thus prepared all things as well as I was able, I set sail, on the 24th day of September, 1701, at six in the morning; and, when I had gone about four leagues to the northward, the wind being at southeast, at six in the evening I descried a small island about half a league to the northwest. I advanced forward and cast anchor on the lee side of the island, which seemed to be uninhabited. I then took some refreshment, and went to my rest. I slept well, and, as I conjecture, at least six hours, for I found the day broke in two hours after I awaked. It was a clear night. I ate my breakfast before the sun was up; and, heaving anchor, the wind being favorable, I steered the same course that I had done the day before, wherein I was directed by my pocket-compass. My intention was to reach, if possible, one of those islands which I had reason to believe lay to the northeast of Van Diemen's Land. I discovered nothing all that day; but upon the next, about three in the afternoon, when I had, by my computation, made twenty-four leagues from Blefuscu, I descried a sail steering to the southeast; my course was due east. I hailed her, but could get no answer; yet I found I gained upon her, for the wind slackened. I made all the sail I could, and in half an hour she spied me, then hung out her ancient, and discharged a gun. It is not easy to express the joy I was in upon the unexpected hope of once more seeing my beloved country and the dear pledges I left in it. The ship slackened her sails, and I came up with her between five and six in the evening, September 26; but my heart leaped within me to see her English colors. I put my cows and sheep into my coat-pockets, and got on board with all my little cargo of provisions. The vessel was an English merchantman, returning from Japan by the North and South Seas; the captain, Mr. John Biddel of Deptford, a very civil man and an excellent sailor. We were now in the latitude of 30 degrees south; there were about fifty men in the ship; and here I met an old comrade of mine, one Peter Williams, who gave me a good character to the captain. This gentleman treated me with kindness, and desired I would let him know what place I came from last, and whither I was bound; which I did in a few words, but he thought I was raving, and that the dangers I had underwent* had disturbed

my head; whereupon I took my black cattle and sheep out of my pocket, which, after great astonishment, clearly convinced him of my veracity. I then showed him the gold given me by the emperor of Blefuscu, together with his majesty's picture at full length, and some other rarities of that country. I gave him two purses of two hundred sprugs each, and promised, when we arrived in England, to make him a present of a cow and a sheep big with young.

I shall not trouble the reader with a particular account of this voyage, which was very prosperous for the most part. We arrived in the Downs on the 13th of April, 1702. I had only one misfortune, that the rats on board carried away one of my sheep: I found her bones in a hole, picked clean from the flesh. The rest of my cattle I got safe ashore, and set them a grazing on a bowling-green at Greenwich, where the fineness of the grass made them feed very heartily, though I had always feared the contrary; neither could I possibly have preserved them in so long a voyage if the captain had not allowed me some of his best biscuit, which, rubbed to powder and mingled with water, was their constant food. The short time I continued in England I made a considerable profit by showing my cattle to many persons of quality and others; and before I began my second voyage I sold them for six hundred pounds. Since my last return I find the breed is considerably increased, especially the sheep, which I hope will prove much to the advantage of the woollen manufacture, by the fineness of the fleeces.*

I stayed but two months with my wife and family, for my insatiable desire of seeing foreign countries would suffer me to continue no longer. I left fifteen hundred pounds with my wife, and fixed her in a good house at Redriff. My remaining stock I carried with me, part in money and part in goods, in hopes to improve my fortunes. My eldest uncle John had left me an estate in land near Epping of about thirty pounds a year, and I had a long lease of the Black Bull in Fetter Lane, which yielded me as much more; so that I was not in any danger of leaving my family upon the parish. My son Johnny, named so after his uncle, was at the grammar school, and a towardly child. My daughter Betty (who is now well married and has children) was then at her needlework. I took leave of my wife and boy and girl, with tears on both sides, and went on board the Adventure, a merchant ship of three hundred tons, bound for Surat, Captain John Nicholas, of Liverpool, commander. But my account of this voyage must be referred to the Second Part of my Travels.

* This is a passing sarcasm on the numerous acts of Parliament for encouraging the woollen manufactures, and the various schemes proposed in Swift's time for improving the growth and fineness of wool. There is probably no other subject on which greater blunders have been made in commercial legislation than the English woollen trade, nor any which more clearly shows the futility of protecting duties and direct encouragement from Parliament. Swift provoked the indignation of the party in power, by protesting earnestly against the commercial jealousy which annihilated the woollen manufactures of Ireland, under pretence of their interfering with the staple manufacture of England; but wool was the favorite hobby of his day, and projects for extending the trade formed no small part of the bubbles of 1720.

TO QUINBUS FLESTRIN, THE MAN-MOUNTAIN.

AN ODE.

By Titty Tit, Esq.
POET LAUREATE TO HIS MAJESTY OF LILLIPUT.

Translated into English.

In amaze,
Lost, I gaze!
Can our eyes
Reach thy size?
May my lays
Swell with praise!
Worthy thee!
Worthy me!
Muse inspire
All thy fire.
Bards of old
Of him told,
When they said
Atlas' head
Propped the skies:
See, and believe your eyes.

See him stride
Valleys wide:
Over woods,
Over floods,
When he treads,
Mountains' heads
Groan and shake;

Armies quake,
Lest his spurn
Overturn
Man and steed:
Troops take heed.
Speed your flight,
Lest an host
Beneath his foot be lost.

Turned aside,
From his hide,
Safe from wound
Darts rebound;

From his nose
Clouds he blows;
When he speaks,
Thunder breaks!
When he eats,
Famine threats;
When he drinks,
Neptune shrinks!
Nigh thy ear
In mid air,
On thy hand
Let me stand,
So shall I,
Lofty poet, touch the sky.

GULLIVER'S TRAVELS.

A VOYAGE TO BROBDINGNAG.*

CHAPTER I.

A GREAT STORM DESCRIED ; THE LONG-BOAT SENT TO FETCH WATER, THE AUTHOR GOES WITH IT TO DISCOVER THE COUNTRY. — HE IS LEFT ON SHORE, IS SEIZED BY ONE OF THE NATIVES, AND CARRIED TO A FARMER'S HOUSE. — HIS RECEPTION, WITH SEVERAL ACCIDENTS THAT HAPPENED THERE. — A DESCRIPTION OF THE INHABITANTS.

AN active and restless life having been assigned me by nature and fortune, in two months after my return I again left my native country, and took shipping in the Downs, on the 20th day of June, 1702, in the Adventure, Captain John Nicholas, a Cornishman, commander, bound for Surat. We had a very prosperous gale till we arrived at the Cape of Good Hope, where we landed for fresh water ; but discovering a leak, we unshipped our goods and wintered there ; for the captain falling sick of an ague, we could not leave the Cape till the end of March. We then set sail, and had a good voyage till we passed the Straits of Madagascar ; but, having got northward of that island, and to about five degrees south latitude, the winds, which in those seas are observed to blow a constant equal gale between the north and west, from the beginning

* The existence of giants as a distinct race, superior in strength and stature to the rest of mankind, was long maintained as an article of faith, not merely by the ignorant and vulgar, but by men of learning. According to the Rabbins, Adam was not only the first but the largest of mankind : they affirm that when he was created his stature was so great that his head reached the heavens. This so annoyed the angels that they remonstrated with the Creator, upon which God placed his hand on Adam's head and he instantly shrank into one thousand cubits. When the Garden of Eden was disjoined from the rest of the world, after the Fall, by the interposition of the ocean, they assert that Adam waded through the depths to his new habitation, and that Eve accompanied him without fear of drowning, which she might well do, if, as the Mohammedan doctors tell us, when her head lay on a hill near Mecca her knees rested on two others in the plain, more than two bow-shots asunder.

Not only Jewish but Christian writers have maintained that a gigantic antediluvian race was produced by the intercourse between "the sons of God" and "the daughters of men." (Gen. vi. 5.) And they aver that these giants were destroyed by the universal deluge. Hence the Douay version renders Job xxvi. 5 : "Behold the giants groan under the waters, and they that dwell with them. Hell is naked before them, and there is no cover for perdition." To this sublime version the following comment is added : "Giants were not able to wade in Noah's flood, but were drowned with the rest." The Rabbins, however, make an exception in favor of Og, king of Basan, compared to whom, according to their legends, all other giants were mere Lilliputians. The waters of the deluge, they say, only reached to his knees, and he was alive at the time of Exodus, when God destroyed him by the hand of Moses. For Og, perceiving the advance of the Israelites, whose army covered a space of nine miles, cut a stone out of a mountain, so wide that it would have covered the whole army, and he put it on his head that he might throw it upon them. But God sent a lapwing which pecked a hole through the stone, so that it slipped over Og's head and hung around his neck like a necklace. The weight bore him to the ground on his face, and in this condition he was attacked by Moses. Moses was ten cubits in stature, and he took a spear ten cubits long and threw it ten cubits high, and yet it only reached Og's heels. Moses, however, succeeded in slaying him ; and when he was dead his body lay for a whole year, reaching as far as the river Nile in Egypt.

The feats of the giants who warred against the gods are sufficiently known, and they may be of December to the beginning of May, on the 19th of April began to blow with much greater violence, and more westerly than usual, continuing so for twenty days together, during which time we were driven a little to the east of the Molucca Islands, and about three degrees northward of the line, as our captain found by an observation he took the 2d of May, at which time the wind ceased and it was a perfect calm; whereat I was not a little rejoiced. But he, being a man well experienced in the navigation of those seas, bid us all prepare against a storm, which accordingly happened on the day following; for the southern wind, called the southern monsoon, began to set in.

Finding it was likely to overblow,* we took in our spritsail, and stood by to hand the foresail; but, making foul weather, we looked that the guns were all fast, and handed the mizen. The ship lay very broad off, so we thought it better spooning before the sea than trying or hulling. We reefed the foresail and set him, and hauled aft the foresheet; the helm was hard-a-weather. The ship wore bravely. We belayed the fore down-haul; but the sail was split, and we hauled down the yard, and got the sail into the ship, and unbound all the things clear of it. It was a very fierce storm; the sea broke strange and dangerous. We hauled off upon the laniard of the whipstaff, and helped the man at the helm. We would not get down our topmast, but let all stand, because she scudded before the sea very well, and we knew that, the topmast being aloft, the ship was the wholesomer, and made better way through the sea, seeing we had sea-room. When the storm was over, we set foresail and mainsail, and brought the ship passed over as purely mythological. But grave historians have recorded that Scandinavia was originally inhabited by giants, one of whom, according to Olaus Magnus, was an eminent poet, and, unlike the rest of the tuneful brotherhood, wrote against indulgence in love and wine. Britain, if we may trust Grafton's Chronicle, was similarly tenanted. "Brute with his companie after his first landing in the island at Totnesse, searched and travailed throughout all the land, and found the same to be marvellous ryche and plentifull of wood and pasture, and garnished with most goodly and pleasant ryvers and stremes; and as he passed he was encountered in sundry places with a great number of mightie and strong gyants, which at that time did inhabite the same."

A belief in the existence of whole nations of giants is only now beginning to fade away before the gradual progress of geographical discovery. The ancients supposed that giants possessed the interior of Africa. In the time of Purchas (A. D. 1614) the Indians of Virginia were supposed to belong to the race of Anak, for he gives the following account of a Virginian tribe, on the authority of Alexander Whitaker, an early traveller in these regions: "The Sasquesahanockes are a giantly people, strange in proportion, behavior, and attire, their voice sounding from them as out of a cave, their attire of bears' skins hanged with bears' paws, the head of a wolf, and such like jewels, and (if any would have a spoone to eat with the divele) their tobacco-pipes were three quarters of a yard long, carved at the great end with a bird, beare, or other device, sufficient to beat out the braines of a horse, (and how many asses' braines are beat out, or rather men's braines smoked out and asses' braines haled in, by our lesse pipes at home?) the rest of their furniture was suitable The calf of one of their legges was measured three quarters of a yard about, the rest of his limbs proportionable." The exaggerated accounts of the Patagonians published by Magellan and Le Maire had not been refuted in Swift's time; so late as 1764 Commodore Byron declared that their stature filled him with astonishment. Hence Brobdingnag, considered merely as a fiction, did not seem so extravagant in the early part of the eighteenth as it does in the nineteenth century.

Lucian in his True History, and Bishop Godwin in his whimsical account of Domingo Gonsales's journey to the moon, have introduced gigantic races into their fictions. It is very probable that Swift took his first hint of the Brobdingnaggians from the latter; for, like the Bishop, he associates mildness and gentleness with enormous stature. "Many of the lunarians," says the author of the World in the Moon, "live wonderful long, even beyond belief, affirming to me that some survived thirty thousand moons, which is above a thousand years; and, this is generally noted, that the taller people are of stature the more excellent are their endowments of mind and the longer time they live; for their stature is very different, great numbers not much exceeding ours, who seldom live above a thousand moons, which is fourscore of our years. These they account base, unworthy creatures, but one degree above brute beasts, and employ them in mean and servile offices, calling them bastards, counterfeits, or changelings. Those whom they account true natural lunars, or moon-men, exceed ours generally thirty times, both in quantity of body and length of life, proportionable to the quality of the day in both worlds, theirs containing almost thirty of our days."

to. Then we set the mizen, maintopsail, and the foretopsail. Our course was east-northeast, the wind was at southwest. We got the starboard tacks aboard, we cast off our weather braces and lifts; we set in the lee-braces, and hauled forward by the weather-bowlings, and hauled them tight, and belayed them, and hauled over the mizzen tack to windward, and kept her full and by as near as she would lie. During this storm, which was followed by a strong wind west-southwest, we were carried, by my computation, about five hundred leagues to the east, so that the oldest sailor on board could not tell in what part of the world we were. Our provisions held out well, our ship was stanch, and our crew all in good health; but we lay in the utmost distress for water. We thought it best to hold on the same course, rather than turn more northerly, which might have brought us to the north-west part of Great Tartary, and into the Frozen Sea.

On the 16th day of June, 1703, a boy on the topmast discovered land. On the 17th we came in full view of a great island, or continent (for we knew not whether), on the south side whereof was a small neck of land jutting out into the sea, and a creek too shallow to hold a ship of above one hundred tons. We cast anchor within a league of this creek, and our captain sent a dozen of his men, well armed, in the long-boat, with vessels for water, if any could be found. I desired his leave to go with them, that I might see the country and make what discoveries I could. When we came to land we saw no river or spring nor any sign of inhabitants. Our men, therefore, wandered on the shore to find some fresh water near the sea, and I walked alone about a mile on the other side, where I observed the country all barren and rocky. I now began to be weary, and, seeing nothing to entertain my curiosity, I returned gently down towards the creek, and the sea being full in my view I saw our men already got into the boat, and rowing for life to the ship. I was going to holla after them, although it had been to little purpose, when I observed a huge creature walking after them in the sea as fast as he could; he waded not much deeper than his knees, and took prodigious strides; but our men had the start of him half a league, and the sea thereabouts being full of sharp-pointed rocks, the monster was not able to overtake the boat. This I was afterwards told, for I durst not stay to see the issue of the adventure, but ran as fast as I could the way I first went, and then climbed up a steep hill, which gave me some prospect of the country. I found it fully cultivated; but that which first surprised me was the length of the grass, which, in those grounds that seemed to be kept for hay, was about twenty feet high.

I fell into a high road, for so I took it to be, though it served to the inhabitants only as a footpath through a field of barley. Here I walked on for some time, but could see little on either side, it being now near harvest, and the corn rising at least forty feet. I was an hour walking to the end of this field, which was fenced in with a hedge of at least one hundred and twenty feet high, and the trees so lofty that I could make no computation of their altitude. There was a stile to pass from this field into the next. It had four steps, and a stone to cross over when you come to the uppermost. It was impossible for me to climb this stile, because every step was six feet high, and the upper stone about twenty. I was endeavoring to find some gap in the hedge, when I discovered one of the inhabitants in the next field advancing towards the stile, of the same size with him whom I saw in the sea pursuing our boat. He appeared as tall as an ordinary spire steeple, and took about ten yards at every stride, as near as I could guess. I was struck with the utmost fear and astonishment, and ran to hide myself in the corn, whence I saw him at the top of the stile, looking back into the next field on the right hand, and heard him call in a voice many degrees louder than a speaking-trumpet; but the noise was so high in the air that at first I certainly thought it was thunder. Whereupon seven monsters, like himself, came towards him, with reaping-hooks in their hands, each hook about the largeness of six scythes. These people were not so well clad as the first, whose servants or laborers they seemed to be, for, upon some words he spoke, they went to reap the corn in the field where I lay. I kept from them at as great a distance as I could, but was forced to move with extreme difficulty, for the stalks of the corn were sometimes not above a foot distant, so that I could hardly squeeze my body betwixt them. However, I made a shift to go forward, till I came to a part of the field where the corn had been laid by the rain and wind. Here it was impossible for me to advance a step; for the stalks were so interwoven that I could not creep through, and the beards of the fallen ears so strong and pointed that they pierced through my clothes into my flesh. At the same time I heard the reapers not above a hundred yards behind me. Being quite dispirited with toil, and wholly overcome by grief and despair, I lay down between two ridges, and heartily wished I might there end my days. I bemoaned my desolate widow and fatherless children. I lamented my own folly and wilfulness in attempting a second voyage against the advice of all my friends and relations. In this terrible agitation of mind I could not forbear thinking of Lilliput, whose inhabitants looked upon me as the greatest prodigy that ever appeared in the world, where I was able to draw an imperial fleet in my hand, and perform those other actions, which will be recorded forever in the chronicles of that empire, while posterity shall hardly believe them, although attested by millions. I reflected what a mortification it must prove to me to appear as inconsiderable in this nation as one single Lilliputian would be among us. But this I conceived was to be the least of my misfortunes; for, as human creatures are observed to be more savage and cruel in proportion to their bulk, what could I expect but to be a morsel in the mouth of the first among these enormous barbarians that should happen to seize me? Undoubtedly, philosophers are in the right when they tell us that nothing is great or little otherwise than by comparison. It might have pleased fortune to have let the Lilliputians find some nation where the people were as diminutive with respect to them as they were to me. And who knows but that even this prodigious race of mortals might be equally overmatched in some distant part of the world, whereof we have yet no discovery?*

Scared and confounded as I was, I could not forbear going on with these reflections, when one of the reapers, approaching within ten yards of the ridge where I lay, made me apprehend that with the next step I should be squashed to death under his foot, or cut in two with his reaping hook. And, therefore, when he was again about to move, I screamed as loud as fear could make me; whereupon the huge creature trod short, and, looking round about under him for some time, at last espied me as I lay on the ground. He considered awhile, with the caution of one who endeavors to lay hold on a small, dangerous animal in such a manner that it shall not be able either to scratch or bite him, as I myself have sometimes done with a weasel in England. At length he ventured to take me behind, by the middle, between his forefinger and thumb, and brought me within three yards of his eyes, that he might behold my shape more perfectly. I guessed his meaning, and my good fortune gave me so much presence of mind, that I resolved not to struggle in the least as he held me in the air above sixty feet from the ground, although he grievously pinched my sides, for fear I should slip through his fingers. All I ventured was to raise mine eyes towards the sun, and place my hands together in a supplicating posture, and to speak some words in a humble, melancholy tone, suitable to the condition I then was in; for I apprehended every moment that he would dash me against the ground, as we usually do any little hateful animal which we have a mind to destroy. But my good star would have it that he appeared pleased with my voice and gestures, and began to look upon me as a curiosity, much wondering to hear me pronounce articulate words, although he could not understand them. In the mean time I was not able to forbear groaning and shedding tears, and turning my head towards my sides, letting him know, as well as I could, how cruelly I was hurt by the pressure of his thumb and finger. He seemed to apprehend my meaning; for, lifting up the lappet of his coat, he put me gently into it, and immediately ran along with me to his master, who was a substantial farmer, and the same person I had first seen in the field.

The farmer, having (as I suppose, by their talk) received such an account of me as his servant could give him, took a piece of a small straw, about the size of a walking-staff, and therewith lifted up the lappets of my coat; which, it seems, he thought to be some kind of covering that nature had given me. He blew my hair aside to take a better view of my face. He called his hinds about him, and asked them, as I afterwards learned, "Whether they had ever seen in the fields any little creature that resembled me?" He then placed me softly on the ground on all fours, but I immediately got up, and walked slowly backward and forward, to let those people see I had no intent to run away. They all sat down in a circle about me, the better to observe my motions. I pulled off my hat, and made a low bow towards the farmer. I fell on my knees, and lifted up my hands and eyes, and spoke several words as loud as I could; I took a purse of gold out of my pocket, and humbly presented it to him. He received it on the palm of his hand, and then applied it close to his eye to see what it was, and afterwards turned it several times with the point of a pin (which he took out of his sleeve), but could make nothing of it. Whereupon I made a sign that he should place his hand on the ground. I then took the purse, and, opening it, poured all the gold into his palm. There were six Spanish pieces of four pistoles each, besides twenty or thirty smaller coins. I saw him wet the tip of his little finger upon his tongue, and take up one of my largest pieces, and then another; but he seemed to be wholly ignorant what they were. He made me a sign to put them again into my purse, and the purse again into my pocket, which, after offering it to him several times, I thought it best to do.

The farmer, by this time, was convinced I must be a rational creature. He spoke often to me; but the sound of his voice pierced my ears like that of a water-mill, yet his words were articulate enough. I answered as loud as I could in several languages, and he often laid his ear within two yards of me; but all in vain, for we were wholly unintelligible to each other. He then sent his servants to their work, and taking his handkerchief out of his pocket, he doubled and spread it on his left hand, which he placed flat on the ground with the palm upward, making me a sign to step into it, as I could easily do, for it was not above a foot in thickness. I thought it my part to obey, and, for fear of falling, laid myself at full length upon the handkerchief, with the remainder of which he lapped me up to the head for further security, and in this manner carried me home to his house. There he called his wife, and showed me to her; but she screamed and ran back, as women in England do at the sight of a toad or a spider. However, when she had awhile seen my behavior, and how well I observed the signs her husband made, she was soon reconciled, and by degrees grew extremely tender of me.

It was about twelve at noon, and a servant brought in dinner. It was only one substantial dish of meat (fit for the plain condition of a husbandman), in a dish of about four-and-twenty feet diameter. The company were the farmer and his wife, three children, and an old grandmother. When they were sat down, the farmer placed me at some distance from him on the table, which was thirty feet high from the floor. I was in a terrible fright, and kept as far as I could from the edge, for fear of falling. The wife minced a bit of meat, then crumbled some bread on a trencher, and placed it before me. I made her a low bow, took out my knife and fork, and fell to eat, which gave them exceeding delight. The mistress sent her maid for a small dram-cup, which held about two gallons, and filled it with drink; I took up the vessel with much difficulty in both hands, and in a most respectful manner drank to her ladyship's health, expressing the words as loud as I could in English, which made the company laugh so heartily that I was almost deafened with the noise. This liquor tasted like a small cider, and was not unpleasant. Then the master made me a sign to come to his trencher side; but as I walked on the table, being at great surprise all the time, as the indulgent reader will easily conceive and excuse, I happened to stumble against a crust, and fell flat on my face, but received no hurt. I got up immediately, and observing the good people to be in much concern, I took my hat (which I held under my arm out of good manners), and waving it over my head gave three huzzas, to show I had got no mischief by my fall. But advancing forwards towards my master (as I shall henceforth call him), his youngest son, who sat next to him, an arch boy of about ten years old, took me up by the legs, and held me so high in the air that I trembled every limb; but his father snatched me from him, and at the same time gave him such a box on the left ear as would have felled a European troop of horse to the earth, ordering him to be taken from the table. But being afraid the boy might owe me a spite, and well remembering how mischievous all children among us naturally are to sparrows, rabbits, young kittens, and puppy dogs, I fell on my knees, and pointing to the boy, made my master to understand, as well as I could, that I desired his son might be pardoned. The father complied, and the lad took his seat again, whereupon I went to him, and kissed his hand, which my master took, and made him stroke me gently with it.

In the midst of dinner, my mistress's favorite cat leaped into her lap.

I heard a noise behind me like that of a dozen stocking-weavers at work; and turning my head, I found it proceeded from the purring of that animal, who seemed to be three times larger than an ox, as I computed by the view of her head and one of her paws, while her mistress was feeding and stroking her. The fierceness of this creature's countenance altogether discomposed me; though I stood at the farther end of the table, above fifty feet off, and though my mistress held her fast, for fear she might give a spring and seize me in her talons. But it happened there was no danger, for the cat took not the least notice of me, when my master placed me within three yards of her. And as I have been always told, and found true by experience in my travels, that flying or discovering fear before a fierce animal is a certain way to make it pursue or attack you, so I resolved, in this dangerous juncture, to show no manner of concern. I walked with intrepidity five or six times before the very head of the cat, and came within half a yard of her; whereupon she drew herself back, as if she were more afraid of me. I had less apprehension concerning the dogs, whereof three or four came into the room, as it is usual in farmers' houses; one of which was a mastiff, equal in bulk to four elephants, and a greyhound somewhat taller than the mastiff, but not so large.

When dinner was almost done, the nurse came in with a child of a year old in her arms, who immediately spied me, and began a squall that you might have heard from London Bridge to Chelsea, after the usual oratory of infants, to get me for a plaything. The mother out of pure indulgence took me up and put me towards the child, who presently seized me by the middle, and got my head into his mouth, where I roared so loud that the urchin was frightened, and let me drop, and I should infallibly have broke my neck if the mother had not held her apron under me. The nurse, to quiet her babe, made use of a rattle, which was a kind of hollow vessel filled with great stones, and fastened by a cable to the child's waist; but all in vain; so that she was forced to apply the last remedy by giving it suck. I must confess no object ever disgusted me so much as the sight of her monstrous breast, which I cannot tell what to compare with, so as to give the curious reader an idea of its bulk, shape, and color. This made me reflect upon the fair skins of our English ladies, who appear so beautiful to us only because they are of our own size, and their defects not to be seen but through a magnifying-glass; where we find, by experiment, that the smoothest and whitest skins look rough and coarse and ill-colored.*

I remember when I was at Lilliput the complexions of those diminutive people appeared to me the fairest in the world; and talking upon the subject with a person of learning there, who was an intimate friend of mine, he said that my face appeared much fairer and smoother when he looked on me from the ground than it did upon a nearer view, when I took him up in my hand and brought him close, which he confessed was at first a very shocking sight. He said "he could discover great holes in my skin; that the stumps of my beard were ten times stronger than the bristles of a boar, and my complexion made up of several colors, altogether disagreeable"; although I must beg leave to say for myself that I am as fair as most of my sex and country, and very little sunburnt by all my travels. On the other side, discoursing of the ladies in that emperor's court, he used to tell me "one had freckles, another too wide a mouth, a third too large a nose"; nothing of which I was able to distinguish. I confess this reflection was obvious enough; which, however, I could not forbear, lest the reader might think those vast creatures were actually deformed: for I must do them the justice to say they are a comely race of people; and particularly the features of my master's countenance, although he were but a farmer, when I beheld him from the height of sixty feet, appeared very well proportioned.

* The bitterness of Swift's satire stops at nothing, certainly not at any ordinary barrier of courtesy. The two women who loved him, and to whose friendship he owed the purest emotions of pleasure his stormy life was blessed with, were no arguments in his mind why he should not vent his sarcastic spleen against the ladies of the court, who, from the queen down, were nearly all his enemies, and lost no occasion of showing it.

When dinner was done, my master went out to his laborers, and, as I could discover by his voice and gesture, gave his wife a strict charge to take care of me. I was very much tired and disposed to sleep, which my mistress perceiving, she put me on her own bed and covered me with a clean white handkerchief, but larger and coarser than the mainsail of a man-of-war.

I slept about two hours, and dreamt I was at home with my wife and children, which aggravated my sorrows when I awaked,* and found myself alone in a vast room between two and three hundred feet wide and about two hundred high, lying in a bed twenty yards wide. My mistress was gone about her household affairs, and had locked me in. The bed was eight yards from the floor. The very impossibility made me long to get down. I durst not presume to call; and if I had, it would have been in vain, with such a voice as mine, at so great a distance as from the room where I lay to the kitchen, where the family kept. While I was under these circumstances, two rats crept up the curtains, and ran smelling backwards and forwards on the bed. One of them came up almost to my face, whereupon I rose in a fright, and drew out my hanger to defend myself. These horrible animals had the boldness to attack me on both sides, and one of them held his fore-feet at my collar; but I had the good fortune to rip up his belly before he could do me any mischief. He fell down at my feet, and the other, seeing the fate of his comrade, made his escape, but not without one good wound on the back, which I gave him as he fled, and made the blood run trickling from him. After this exploit I walked gently to and fro on the bed, to recover my breath and loss of spirits. These creatures were of the size of a large mastiff, but infinitely more nimble and fierce; so that if I had taken off my belt before I went to sleep, I must have infallibly been torn to pieces and devoured. I measured the tail of the dead rat, and found it to be two yards long, wanting an inch; but it went against my stomach to draw the carcass off the bed, where it lay still bleeding. I observed it had yet some life, but, with a strong slash across the neck, I thoroughly despatched it.

Soon after my mistress came into the room, who, seeing me all bloody, ran and took me up in her hand. I pointed to the dead rat, smiling and making other signs to show I was not hurt; whereat she was extremely rejoiced, calling the maid to take up the dead rat with a pair of tongs and throw it out of the window. Then she set me on a table, where I showed her my hanger all bloody, and, wiping it on the lappet of my coat, returned it to the scabbard.

I hope the gentle reader will excuse me for dwelling on these and the like particulars,* which, however insignificant they may appear to grovelling, vulgar minds, yet will certainly help a philosopher to enlarge his thoughts and imagination, and apply them to the benefit of public as well as private life, which was my sole design in presenting this and other accounts of my travels to the world; wherein I have been chiefly studious of truth, without affecting any ornaments of learning or of style. But the whole scene of this voyage made so strong an impression on my mind, and is so deeply fixed in my memory, that in committing it to paper I did not omit one material circumstance; however, upon a strict review, I blotted out several passages of less moment, which were in my first copy, for fear of being censured as tedious and trifling, whereof travellers are often, perhaps not without justice, accused.

CHAPTER II.

A DESCRIPTION OF THE FARMER'S DAUGHTER. — THE AUTHOR CARRIED TO A MARKET-TOWN AND THEN TO THE METROPOLIS. — THE PARTICULARS OF HIS JOURNEY.

My mistress had a daughter of nine years old, a child of towardly parts for her age, very dexterous at her needle, and skilful in dressing her baby. Her mother and she contrived to fit up the baby's cradle for me against night: the cradle was put into a small drawer of a cabinet, and the drawer placed upon a hanging shelf for fear of the rats. This was my bed all the time I stayed with those people, though made more convenient by degrees, as I began to learn their language and make my wants known. This young girl was so handy, that after I had once or twice pulled off my clothes before her, she was able to dress and undress me, though I never gave her that trouble when she would let me do either myself. She made me seven shirts, and some other linen, of as fine cloth as could be got, which indeed was coarser than sackcloth; and these she constantly washed for me with her own hands. She was likewise my schoolmistress, to teach me the language; when I pointed to anything, she told me the name of it in her own tongue, so that in a few days I was able to call for whatever I had a mind to. She was very good-natured, and not above forty feet high, being little for her age. She gave me the name of Grildrig, which the family took up, and afterwards the whole kingdom. The word imports what the Latins call nanunculus, the Italians homunceletino, and the English mannikin. To her I chiefly owe my preservation in that country; we never parted while I was there; I called her my Glumdalclitch, or little nurse, and should be guilty of great ingratitude if I omitted this honorable mention of her care and affection towards me, which I heartily wish it lay in my power to requite as she deserves, instead of being the innocent but unhappy instrument of her disgrace, as I have too much reason to fear.

It now began to be known and talked of in the neighborhood, that my master had found a strange animal in the field, about the bigness of a splacnuck, but exactly shaped in every part like a human creature; which it also imitated in all its actions, seemed to speak in a little language of its own, had already learned several words of theirs, went erect upon two legs, was tame and gentle, would come when it was called, do whatever it was bid, had the finest limbs in the world, and a complexion fairer than a nobleman's daughter of three years old. Another farmer, who lived hard by and was a particular friend of my master, came on a visit on purpose to inquire into the truth of this story. I was immediately produced, and placed upon a table, where I walked as I was commanded, drew my hanger, put it up again, made my reverence to my master's guest, asked him in his own language how he did, and told him he was welcome, just as my little nurse had instructed me. This man, who was old and dim-sighted, put on his spectacles to behold me better; at which I could not forbear laughing very heartily, for his eyes appeared like the full moon shining into a chamber at two windows. Our people, who discovered the cause of my mirth, bore me company in laughing, at which the old fellow was fool enough to be angry and out of countenance. He had the character of a great miser; and, to my misfortune, he well deserved it, by the cursed advice he gave my master, to show me as a sight upon a market-day in the next town, which was half an hour's riding, about two-and-twenty miles from our house. I guessed there was some mischief contriving when I observed my master and his friend whispering long together, sometimes pointing at me; and my fears made me fancy that I overheard and understood some of their words. But the next morning Glumdalclitch, my little nurse, told me the whole matter, which she had cunningly picked out from her mother. The poor girl laid me on her bosom, and fell a-weeping with shame and grief. She apprehended some mischief would happen to me from rude vulgar folks, who might squeeze me to death or break one of my limbs by taking me in their hands. She had also observed how modest I was in my nature, how nicely I regarded my honor, and what an indignity I should conceive it to be exposed for money as a public spectacle to the meanest of the people. She said, her papa and mamma had promised that Grildrig should be hers; but now she found they meant to serve her as they did last year, when they pretended to give her a lamb, and yet, as soon as it was fat, sold it to a butcher. For my own part, I may truly affirm that I was less concerned than my nurse. I had a strong hope, which never left me, that I should one day recover my liberty; and as to the ignominy of being carried about for a monster, I considered myself to be a perfect stranger in the country, and that such a misfortune could never be charged upon me as a reproach, if ever I should return to England, since the king of Great Britain himself, in my condition, must have undergone the same distress.

My master, pursuant to the advice of his friend, carried me in a box the next market-day to the neighboring town, and took along with him his little daughter, my nurse, upon a pillion behind him. The box was close on every side, with a little door for me to go in and out, and a few gimlet-holes to let in air. The girl had been so careful as to put the quilt of her baby's bed into it for me to lie down on. However, I was terribly shaken and discomposed in this journey, though it were* but of half an hour; for the horse went about forty feet at every step, and trotted so high that the agitation was equal to the rising and falling of a ship in a great storm, but much more frequent. Our journey was somewhat farther than from London to St. Albans. My master alighted at an inn which he used to frequent; and after consulting awhile with the innkeeper, and making some necessary preparations, he hired the grultrud, or crier, to give notice through the town of a strange creature to be seen at the sign of the Green Eagle, not so big as a splacnuck (an animal in that country very finely shaped, about six feet long), and in every part of the body resembling a human creature, could speak several words, and perform a hundred diverting tricks.

I was placed upon a table in the largest room of the inn, which might be near three hundred feet square. My little nurse stood on a low stool close to the table, to take care of me, and direct what I should do. My master, to avoid a crowd, would suffer only thirty people at a time to see me. I walked about on the table as the girl commanded: she asked me questions, as far as she knew my understanding of the language reached, and I answered them as loud as I could. I turned about several times to the company, paid my humble respects, said they were welcome, and used some other speeches I had been taught. I took up a thimble filled with liquor which Glumdalclitch had given me for a cup, and drank their health. I drew out my hanger, and flourished with it after the manner of fencers in England. My nurse gave me a part of a straw, which I exercised as a pike, having learnt the art in my youth. I was that day shown to twelve sets of company, and as often forced to act over again the same fopperies, till I was half dead with weariness and vexation; for those who had seen me made such wonderful reports, that the people were ready to break down the doors to come in.* My master, for his own interest, would not suffer any one to touch me except my nurse; and to prevent danger benches were set round the table at such a distance as to put me out of everybody's reach. However, an unlucky school-boy aimed a hazel-nut directly at my head, which very narrowly missed me; otherwise it came with so much violence that it would have infallibly knocked out my brains, for it was almost as large as a small pumpion; but I had the satisfaction to see the young rogue well beaten and turned out of the room.

My master gave public notice that he would show me again the next market-day; and in the mean time he prepared a more convenient vehicle for me, which he had reason enough to do; for I was so tired with my first journey and with entertaining company for eight hours together, that I could hardly stand upon my legs, or speak a word. It was at least three days before I recovered my strength; and that I might have no rest at home, all the neighboring gentlemen from a hundred miles round, hearing of my fame, came to see me at my master's own house. There could not be fewer than thirty persons, with their wives and children (for the country is very populous); and my master demanded the rate of a full room whenever he showed me at home, although it were only to a single family; so that for some time I had but little ease every day of the week (except Wednesday, which is their Sabbath), although I was not carried to the town.

My master, finding how profitable I was likely to be, resolved to carry me to the most considerable cities of the kingdom. Having, therefore, provided himself with all things necessary for a long journey, and settled his affairs at home, he took leave of his wife, and upon the 17th of August, 1703, about two months after my arrival, we set out for the metropolis, situate near the middle of that empire, and about three thousand miles' distance from our house. My master made his daughter Glumdalclitch ride behind him. She carried me on her lap, in a box tied about her waist. The girl had lined it on all sides with the softest cloth she could get, well quilted underneath, furnished it with her baby's bed, provided me with linen and other necessaries, and made everything as convenient as she could. We had no other company but a boy of the house, who rode after us with the luggage.

My master's design was to show me in all the towns by the way, and to step out of the road, for fifty or a hundred miles, to any village or person of quality's house, where he might expect custom. We made easy journeys, of not above seven or eight score miles a day, for Glumdalclitch, on purpose to spare me, complained she was tired with the trotting of the horse. She often took me out of my box, at my own desire, to give me air and show me the country, but always held me fast by a leading-string. We passed over five or six rivers, many degrees broader and deeper than the Nile or the Ganges; and there was hardly a rivulet so small as the Thames at London Bridge. We were ten weeks in our journey, and I was shown in eighteen large towns, besides many villages and private families.

On the 26th day of October we arrived at the metropolis, called in their language Lorbrulgrud, or Pride of the Universe. My master took a lodging in the principal street of the city, not far from the royal palace, and put out bills in the usual form, containing an exact description of my person and parts. He hired a large room between three and four hundred feet wide. He provided a table sixty feet in diameter, upon which I was to act my part, and palisadoed it round three feet from the edge, and as many high, to prevent my falling over. I was shown ten times a day, to the wonder and satisfaction of all people. I could now speak the language tolerably well, and perfectly understood every word that was spoken to me. Besides, I had learnt their alphabet, and could make shift to explain a sentence here and there; for Glumdalclitch had been my instructor while we were at home, and at leisure hours during our journey. She carried a little book in her pocket, not much larger than a Sanson's Atlas; it was a common treatise for the use of young girls, giving a short account of their religion; out of this she taught me my letters, and interpreted the words.

CHAPTER III.

THE AUTHOR SENT FOR TO COURT. — THE QUEEN BUYS HIM OF HIS MASTER, THE FARMER, AND PRESENTS HIM TO THE KING. — HE DISPUTES WITH HIS MAJESTY'S

GREAT SCHOLARS. — AN APARTMENT AT COURT PROVIDED FOR THE AUTHOR. — HE IS IN HIGH FAVOR WITH THE QUEEN. — HE STANDS UP FOR THE HONOR OF HIS OWN COUNTRY. — HIS QUARRELS WITH THE QUEEN'S DWARF.

LABORS such as I underwent every day made, in a few weeks, a very considerable change in my health; the more my master got by me, the more insatiable he grew. I had quite lost my stomach, and was almost reduced to a skeleton. The farmer observed it, and, concluding I must soon die, resolved to make as good a hand of me as he could. While he was thus reasoning and resolving with himself, a sardral, or gentleman-usher, came from court, commanding my master to carry me immediately thither for the diversion of the queen and her ladies. Some of the latter had already been to see me, and reported strange things of my beauty, behavior, and good sense. Her majesty and those who attended her were beyond measure delighted with my demeanor. I fell on my knees, and begged the honor of kissing her imperial foot; but this gracious princess held out her little finger towards me, after I was set on the table, which I embraced in both my arms, and put the tip of it with the utmost respect to my lip. She made me some general questions about my country and my travels, which I answered as distinctly and in as few words as I could. She asked "whether I would be content to live at court." I bowed down to the board of the table, and humbly answered "that I was my master's slave; but if I were at my own disposal, I should be proud to devote my life to her majesty's service." She then asked my master "whether he was willing to sell me at a good price." He, who apprehended I could not live a month, was ready enough to part with me, and demanded a thousand pieces of gold, which were ordered him on the spot, each piece being about the bigness of eight hundred moidores; but allowing for the proportion of all things between that country and Europe, and the high price of gold among them, was hardly so great a sum as a thousand guineas would be in England. I then said to the queen, "since I was now her majesty's most humble creature and vassal, I must beg the favor that Glumdalclitch, who had always tended me with so much care and kindness, and understood to do it so well, might be admitted into her service, and continue to be my nurse and instructor."

Her majesty agreed to my petition, and easily got the farmer's consent, who was glad enough to have his daughter preferred at court, and the poor girl herself was not able to hide her joy. My late master withdrew, bidding me farewell, and saying he had left me in a good service; to which I replied not a word, only making him a slight bow.

The queen observed my coldness, and when the farmer was gone out of the apartment asked me the reason. I made bold to tell her majesty "that I owed no other obligation to my late master than his not dashing out the brains of a poor harmless creature found by chance in his fields, which obligation was amply recompensed by the gain he had made in showing me through half the kingdom and the price he had now sold me for. That the life I had since led was laborious enough to kill an animal of ten times my strength. That my health was much impaired by the continual drudgery of entertaining the rabble every hour of the day; and that, if my master had not thought my life in danger, her majesty would not have go so cheap a bargain. But as I was out of all fear of being ill treated, under the protection of so great and good an empress, the ornament of nature, the darling of the world, the delight of her subjects, the phœnix of the creation, so I hoped my late master's apprehensions would appear to be groundless; for I already found my spirits revive by the influence of her most august presence."

This was the sum of my speech, delivered with great improprieties and hesitation. The latter part was altogether framed in the style peculiar to that people, whereof I learned some phrases from Glumdalclitch, while she was carrying me to court.

The queen, giving great allowance for my defectiveness in speaking, was, however, surprised at so much wit and good sense in so diminutive an animal. She took me in her own hand and carried me to the king, who was then retired to his cabinet. His majesty, a prince of much gravity and austere countenance, not observing my shape at first view, asked the queen, after a cold manner, "how long it was since she grew fond of a splacnuch?" for such it seems he took me to be as I lay upon my breast in her majesty's hand. But this princess, who has an infinite deal of wit and humor, set me gently on my feet upon the scrutoire and commanded me to give his majesty an account of myself, which I did in a very few words, and Glumdalclitch, who attended at the cabinet door, and could not endure I should be out of her sight, being admitted, confirmed all that had passed from my arrival at her father's house.

The king, although he be as learned a person as any in his dominions, had been educated in the study of philosophy, and particularly mathematics; yet when he observed my shape exactly, and saw me walk erect, before I began to speak, conceived I might be a piece of clock-work (which is in that country arrived to a very great perfection) contrived by some ingenious artist. But when he heard my voice, and found what I delivered to be regular and rational, he could not conceal his astonishment. He was by no means satisfied with the relation I gave him of the manner I came into his kingdom, but thought it a story concerted between Glumdalclitch and her father, who had taught me a set of words to make me sell at a better price. Upon this imagination he put several other questions to me, and still received rational answers, no otherwise defective than by a foreign accent and an imperfect knowledge in the language, with some rustic phrases which I had learned at the farmer's house, and did not suit the polite style of a court.

His majesty sent for three great scholars, who were then in the weekly waiting, according to the custom of that country. These gentlemen, after they had awhile examined my shape with much nicety, were of different opinions concerning me. They all agreed that I could not be produced according to the regular laws of nature, because I was not framed with a capacity of preserving my life, either by swiftness or climbing of trees or digging holes in the earth. They observed by my teeth, which they viewed with great exactness, that I was a carnivorous animal; yet most quadrupeds being an overmatch for me, and field-mice, with some others, too nimble, they could not imagine how I should be able to support myself, unless I fed upon snails and other insects; which they offered, by many learned arguments,* to evince that I could not possibly do. One of these virtuosi seemed to think that I might be an embryo, or abortive birth. But this opinion was rejected by the other two, who observed my limbs to be perfect and finished, and that I had lived several years, as it was manifest from my beard, the stumps whereof they plainly discovered through a magnifying-glass. They would not allow me to be a dwarf, because my littleness was beyond all degrees of comparison; for the queen's favorite dwarf, the smallest ever known in that kingdom, was near thirty feet high. After much debate they concluded unanimously that I was only relplum scalclath, which is interpreted literally lusus naturæ; a determination exactly agreeable to the modern philosophy of Europe, whose professors, disdaining the old evasion of occult causes, whereby the followers of Aristotle endeavored in vain to disguise their ignorance, have invented this wonderful solution of all difficulties, to the unspeakable advancement of human knowledge.

After this decisive conclusion, I entreated to be heard a word or two. I applied myself to the king, and assured his majesty, "that I came from a country which abounded with several millions of both sexes and of my own stature; where the animals, trees, and houses were all in proportion, and where, by consequence, I might be as able to defend myself and to find sustenance as any of his majesty's subjects could do here; which I took for a full answer to those gentlemen's arguments." To this they only replied with a smile of contempt, saying "that the farmer had instructed me very well in my lesson." † The king, who had a much better understanding, dismissing his learned men, sent for the farmer, who, by good fortune, was not yet gone out of town.* Having therefore first examined him privately, and then confronted him with me and the young girl, his majesty began to think that what we told him might possibly be true. He desired the queen to order that a particular care should be taken of me; and was of opinion that Glumdalclitch should still continue in her office of tending me, because he observed we had a great affection for each other. A convenient apartment was provided for her at court; she had a sort of governess appointed to take care of her education, a maid to dress her, and two other servants for menial offices; but the care of me was wholly appropriated to herself. The queen commanded her own cabinet-maker to contrive a box that might serve me for a bedchamber, after the model that Glumdalclitch and I should agree upon. This man was a most ingenious artist, and, according to my direction, in three weeks finished for me a wooden chamber of sixteen feet square and twelve high, with sash windows, a door, and two closets, like a London bedchamber. The board that made the ceiling was to be lifted up and down by two hinges, to put in a bed ready furnished by her majesty's upholsterer, which Glumdalclitch took out every day to air, made it with her own hands, and, letting it down at night, locked up the roof over me. A nice workman, who was famous for little curiosities, undertook to make me two chairs, with backs and frames, of a substance not unlike ivory, and two tables, with a cabinet to put my things in. The room was quilted on all sides, as well as the floor and the ceiling, to prevent any accident from the carelessness of those who carried me, and to break the force of a jolt when I went in a coach. I desired a lock for my door, to prevent rats and mice from coming in. The smith, after several attempts, made the smallest that ever was seen among them, for I have known a larger at the gate of a gentleman's house in England.† I made a shift to keep the key in a pocket of my own, fearing Glumdalclitch might lose it. The queen likewise ordered the thinnest silks that could be gotten, to make me clothes, not much thicker than an English blanket, very cumbersome till I was accustomed to them. They were after the fashion of the kingdom, partly resembling the Persian, and partly the Chinese, and are a very grave and decent habit.

* By this reasoning the author probably intended to ridicule the pride of those philosophers who have thought fit to arraign the wisdom of Providence in the creation and government of the world; whose cavils are specious, like those of the Brobdingnagian sages, only in proportion to the ignorance of those to whom they are proposed. — Hawksworth

The queen became so fond of my company that she could not dine without me. I had a table placed upon the same at which her majesty ate, just at her elbow, and a chair to sit on. Glumdalclitch stood on a stool on the floor near my table, to assist and take care of me. I had an entire set of silver dishes and plates and other necessaries, which, in proportion to those of the queen, were not much bigger than what I have seen in a London toy-shop, for the furniture of a baby-house: these my little nurse kept in her pocket in a silver box, and gave me at meals as I wanted them, always cleaning them herself. No person dined with the queen but the two princesses royal, the elder sixteen years old, and the younger at that time thirteen and a month. Her majesty used to put a bit of meat upon one of my dishes, out of which I carved for myself, and her diversion was to see me eat in miniature; for the queen (who had indeed but a weak stomach) took up at one mouthful as much as a dozen English farmers could eat at a meal, which to me was for some time a very nauseous sight. She would craunch the wing of a lark, bones and all, between her teeth, although it were nine times as large as that of a full-grown turkey; and put a bit of bread in her mouth as big as two twelvepenny loaves. She drank out of a golden cup above a hogshead at a draught. Her knives were twice as long as a scythe, set straight upon the handle. The spoons, forks, and other instruments were all in the same proportion. I remember when Glumdalclitch carried me, out of curiosity, to see some of the tables at court, where ten or a dozen of those enormous knives and forks were lifted up together, I thought I had never till then beheld so terrible a sight.

It is the custom that, every Wednesday (which, as I have observed, is their Sabbath)

* Sir Walter Scott thinks that Swift has designedly introduced some traits of William III.'s character in the sketch of the king of Brobdingnag; but if anything more than the ideal of a patriot monarch is designed, it is probable that the Dean had an eye to the Prince of Wales, afterwards George II., from whom the Tories had formed favorable anticipations.

† Swift's frequent references to proportions, both here and in the Voyage to Lilliput, give an air of probability to his story which none of his imitators have been able to attain.

the king and queen, with the royal issue of both sexes, dine together in the apartment of his majesty, to whom I was now become a great favorite; and at these times my little chair and table were placed at his left hand, before one of the salt-cellars. This prince took a pleasure in conversing with me, inquiring into the manners, religion, laws, government, and learning of Europe, wherein I gave him the best account I was able. His apprehension was so clear, and his judgment so exact, that he made very wise reflections and observations upon all I said. But I confess that, after I had been a little too copious in talking of my own beloved country, of our trade and wars by sea and land, of our schisms in religion, and parties in the state, the prejudices of his education prevailed so far that he could not forbear taking me up in his right hand, and, stroking me gently with the other, after a hearty fit of laughing, asked me whether I was a Whig or Tory. Then turning to his first minister, who waited behind him with a white staff near as tall as the mainmast of the Royal Sovereign, he observed, "how contemptible a thing was human grandeur which could be mimicked by such diminutive insects as I; and yet," says he, "I dare engage these creatures have their titles and distinctions of honor; they contrive little nests and burrows that they call houses and cities; they make a figure and dress in equipage; they love, they fight, they dispute, they cheat, they betray." And thus he continued on, while my color came and went several times with indignation, to hear our noble country, the mistress of arts and arms, the scourge of France, the arbitress of Europe, the seat of virtue, piety, honor, and truth, the pride and envy of the world, so contemptuously treated.*

But as I was not in a condition to resent injuries, so upon mature thoughts I began to doubt whether I was injured or no.† For after having been accustomed several months to the sight and converse of this people, and observed every object upon which I cast mine eyes to be of proportionable magnitude, the horror I had at first conceived from their bulk and aspect was so far worn off that, if I had then beheld a company of English lords and ladies in their finery and birthday clothes, acting their several parts in the most courtly manner of strutting and bowing and prating, — to say the truth, I should have been strongly tempted to laugh as much at them as the king and his grandees did at me. Neither, indeed, could I forbear smiling at myself, when the queen used to place me upon her hand towards a looking-glass, by which both our persons appeared before me in full view together; and there could be nothing more ridiculous than the comparison; so that I really began to imagine myself dwindled many degrees below my usual size.

Nothing angered and mortified me so much as the queen's dwarf; who, being of the lowest stature that was ever in that country (for I verily think he was not full thirty feet high), became so insolent at seeing a creature so much beneath him, that he would always affect to swagger and look big as he passed by me in the queen's antechamber, while I was standing on some table talking with the lords or ladies of the court, and he seldom failed of a smart word or two upon my littleness; against which I could only revenge myself by calling him brother, challenging him to wrestle, and such repartees as are usually in the mouths of court pages. One day at dinner this malicious little cub was so nettled with something I had said to him, that, raising himself upon the frame of her majesty's chair, he took me up by the middle, as I was sitting down, not thinking any harm, and let me drop into a large silver bowl of cream, and then ran away as fast as he could. I fell over head and ears, and if I had not been a good swimmer it might have gone very hard with me; for Glumdalclitch in that instant happened to be at the other end of the room, and the queen was in such a fright that she wanted presence of mind to assist me. But my little nurse ran to my relief, and took me out, after I had swallowed above a quart of cream. I was put to bed; however I received no other damage than the loss of a suit of clothes, which was utterly spoiled. The dwarf was soundly whipped, and, as a further punishment, forced to drink up the bowl of cream into which he had thrown me; neither was he ever restored to favor; for soon after the queen bestowed him on a lady of high quality, so that I saw him no more, to my very great satisfaction; for I could not tell to what extremity such a malicious urchin might have carried his resentment.

* These boasts, which have been the commonplaces of party during the last two centuries, are rendered supremely ridiculous by their contrast with the speech of the king of Brobdingnag.

† "Whether I was injured or no." This vulgar and ungrammatical mode of expression has become almost universal; but instead of "no" the particle "not" should be used. The absurdity of the former will appear by only repeating the word to which it refers, and annexing to it, as thus, — "whether I were injured, or no injured," whereas, "whether I were injured, or not injured," is good grammar. — Sheridan.

He had before served me a scurvy trick, which set the queen a laughing, although at the same time she was heartily vexed, and would have immediately cashiered him, if I had not been so generous as to intercede. Her majesty had taken a marrow-bone upon her plate, and, after knocking out the marrow, placed the bone again on the dish erect, as it stood before; the dwarf watching his opportunity, while Glumdalclitch was gone to the sideboard, mounted the stool that she stood on to take care of me at meals, took me up in both hands, and squeezing my legs together, wedged them into the marrow-bone above my waist, where I stuck for some time, and made a very ridiculous figure. I believe it was near a minute before any one knew what was become of me; for I thought it below me to cry out. But, as princes seldom get their meat hot, my legs were not scalded, only my stockings and breeches in a sad condition. The dwarf, at my entreaty, had no other punishment than a sound whipping.

I was frequently rallied by the queen upon account of my fearfulness; and she used to ask me whether the people of my country were as great cowards as myself? The occasion was this; the kingdom is much pestered with flies in summer; and these odious insects, each of them as big as a Dunstable lark, hardly gave me any rest while I sat at dinner, with their continual humming and buzzing about mine ears. They would sometimes alight upon my victuals, and leave their loathsome excrement or spawn behind, which to me was very visible, though not to the natives of that country, whose larger optics were not so acute as mine in viewing smaller objects. Sometimes they would fix upon my nose or forehead, where they stung me to the quick, smelling very offensively; and I could easily trace that viscous matter, which, our naturalists tell us, enables those creatures to walk with their feet upwards upon a ceiling. I had much ado to defend myself against these detestable animals, and could not forbear starting when they came on my face. It was the common practice of the dwarf to catch a number of these insects in his hand, as school-boys do among us, and let them out suddenly under my nose, on purpose to frighten me and divert the queen. My remedy was to cut them in pieces with my knife, as they flew in the air, wherein my dexterity was much admired.

I remember one morning, when Glumdalclitch had set me in a box upon a window, as she usually did in fair days to give me air (for I durst not venture to let the box be hung on a nail out of the window, as we do with cages in England), after I had lifted up one of my sashes, and sat down at my table to eat a piece of sweet cake for my breakfast, above twenty wasps, allured by the smell, came flying into the room, humming louder than the drones of as many bagpipes. Some of them seized my cake, and carried it piecemeal away; others flew about my head and face, confounding me with the noise, and putting me in the utmost terror of their stings. However, I had the courage to rise and draw my hanger, and attack them in the air. I despatched four of them, but the rest got away, and I presently shut my window. These insects were as large as partridges; I took out their stings, found them an inch and a half long, and as sharp as needles. I carefully preserved them all; and having since shown them, with some other curiosities, in several parts of Europe; upon my return to England I gave three of them to Gresham College, and kept the fourth for myself.

CHAPTER IV.

THE COUNTRY DESCRIBED. — A PROPOSAL FOR CORRECTING MODERN MAPS. — THE KING'S PALACE, AND SOME ACCOUNT OF THE METROPOLIS. — THE AUTHOR'S WAY OF TRAVELLING. — THE CHIEF TEMPLE DESCRIBED.

Journeys with Glumdalclitch having given me some knowledge of the country, I now intend to give the reader a short description of it, as far as I travelled, which was not above two thousand miles round Lorbrulgrud, the metropolis. For the queen, whom I always attended, never went farther when she accompanied the king in his progresses, and there stayed till his majesty returned from viewing his frontiers. The whole extent of this prince's dominions reaches about six thousand miles in length, and from three to five in breadth; whence I cannot but conclude that our geographers of Europe are in a great error by supposing nothing but sea between Japan and California; for it was ever my opinion that there must be a balance of earth to counterpoise the great continent of Tartary; and therefore they ought to correct their maps and charts by joining this vast tract of land to the northwest parts of America, wherein I shall be ready to lend them my assistance.

The kingdom is a peninsula, terminated to the northeast by a ridge of mountains thirty miles high, which are altogether impassable by reason of the volcanoes upon the tops; neither do the most learned know what sort of mortals inhabit beyond those mountains, or whether they be inhabited at all. On the three other sides it is bounded by the ocean. There is not one seaport in the whole kingdom; and those parts of the coasts into which the rivers issue are so full of pointed rocks, and the sea generally so rough, that there is no venturing with the smallest of their boats; so that these people are wholly excluded from any commerce with the rest of the world.* But the large rivers are full of vessels, and abound with excellent fish: for they seldom get any from the sea, because the sea fish are of the same size with those in Europe, and consequently not worth catching; whereby it is manifest that nature, in the production of plants and animals of so extraordinary a bulk, is wholly confined to this continent, of which I leave the reasons to be determined by philosophers. However, now and then they take a whale that happens to be dashed against the rocks, which the common people feed on heartily. These whales I have known so large that a man could hardly carry one upon his shoulders; and sometimes for curiosity they are brought in hampers to Lorbrulgrud: I saw one of them in a dish at the king's table, which passed for a rarity, but I did not observe he was fond of it; for I think, indeed, the bigness disgusted him, although I have seen one somewhat larger in Greenland.

The country is well inhabited, for it contains fifty-one cities, near a hundred walled towns, and a great number of villages. To satisfy my curious reader, it may be sufficient to describe Lorbrulgrud. This city stands upon almost two equal parts, on each side the river that passes through. It contains above eighty thousand houses and about six hundred thousand inhabitants. It is in length three *glomglungs (which make about fifty-four English miles), and two and a half in breadth; as I measured it myself in the royal map made by the king's order, which was laid on the ground on purpose for me, and extended a hundred feet; I paced the diameter and circumference several times, barefoot, and, computing by the scale, measured it pretty exactly.

The king's palace is no regular edifice, but a heap of building about seven miles round: the chief rooms are generally two hundred and forty feet high, and broad and long in proportion. A coach was allowed to Glumdalclitch and me, wherein her governess frequently took her out to see the town, or go among the shops; and I was always of the party, carried in my box; although the girl, at my own desire, would often take me out and hold me in her hand, that I might more conveniently view the houses and the people as we passed along the streets. I reckoned our coach to be about a square of Westminster Hall, but not altogether so high; however, I cannot be very exact. One day the governess ordered our coachman to stop at several shops, where the beggars, watching their opportunity, crowded to the sides of the coach and gave me the most horrible spectacle that ever a European eye beheld. There was a woman with a cancer in her breast, swelled to a monstrous size, full of holes, in two or three of which I could have easily crept and covered my whole body. There was a fellow with a wen in his neck larger than five wool-packs; and another with a couple of wooden legs, each about twenty feet high. But the most hateful sight of all was the lice crawling on their clothes. I could see distinctly the limbs of these vermin with my naked eye, much better than those of a European louse through a microscope, — and their snouts, with which they rooted like swine. They were the first I had ever beheld, and I should have been curious enough to dissect one of them if I had had proper instruments, which I unluckily left behind me in the ship, although, indeed, the sight was so nauseous that it perfectly turned my stomach.

* This description of a sea that could not be safely navigated appears to have been taken from that veracious traveller, Sir J. Mandeville. "From the land of Bactry men go many days' journey to the land of Prester John, that is a great emperor of Inde; and men call his land the yle of Pantoxore .... There are many places in the sea where are many rockes of a stone that is called adamand, the which of his own kinde draweth all manner of yron, and therefore there may be no ships that hath yron nayles pass but it draweth them to him, and therefore they dare not go into that country with ships for fear of adamand. I went once into that sea, and saw along as it had been a great yle of trees, stockes, and branches growinge, and the shipman told me that those were of greate shippes that abode there through the vertue of the adamandes, and of things that were in the shippes, whereof those trees sprung and waxed."

Besides the large box in which I was usually carried, the queen ordered a smaller one to be made for me, of about twelve feet square and ten high, for the convenience of travelling; because the other was somewhat too large for Glumdalclitch's lap, and cumbersome in the coach; it was made by the same artist, whom I directed in the whole contrivance. This travelling-closet was an exact square, with a window in the middle of three of the squares, and each window was latticed with iron wire on the outside, to prevent accidents in long journeys. On the fourth side, which had no window, two strong staples were fixed, through which the person that carried me, when I had a mind to be on horseback, put a leathern belt and buckled it about his waist. This was always the office of some grave, trusty servant, in whom I could confide, whether I attended the king and queen in their progresses, or were disposed to see the gardens, or pay a visit to some great lady or minister of state in the court, when Glumdalclitch happened to be out of order; for I soon began to be known and esteemed among the greatest officers, I suppose more upon account of their majesties' favor than any merit of my own. In journeys, when I was weary of the coach, a servant on horseback would buckle on my box, and place it upon a cushion before him; and there I had a full prospect of the country on three sides from my three windows. I had in this closet a field-bed and a hammock, hung from the ceiling, two chairs and a table neatly screwed to the floor to prevent being tossed about by the agitation of the horse or the coach. And, having been long used to sea voyages, those motions, although sometimes very violent, did not much discompose me.

Whenever I had a mind to see the town it was always in my travelling-closet, which Glumdalclitch held in her lap in a kind of open sedan, after the fashion of the country, borne by four men, and attended by two others in the queen's livery. The people, who had often heard of me, were very curious to crowd about the sedan, and the girl was complaisant enough to make the bearers stop, and to take me in her hand that I might be more conveniently seen.

I was very desirous to see the chief temple, and particularly the tower belonging to it, which is reckoned the highest in the kingdom. Accordingly, one day my nurse carried me thither, but I may truly say I came back disappointed; for the height is not above three thousand feet, reckoning from the ground to the highest pinnacle top; which, allowing for the difference between the size of those people and us in Europe, is no great matter for admiration, nor at all equal in proportion (if I rightly remember) to Salisbury steeple. But, not to detract from a nation to which, during my life, I shall acknowledge myself extremely obliged, it must be allowed that whatever this famous tower wants in height is amply made up in beauty and strength; for the walls are near a hundred feet thick, built of hewn stone, whereof each is about forty feet square, and adorned on all sides with statues of gods and emperors cut in marble, larger than the life, placed in their several niches. I measured a little finger which had fallen down from one of these statues and lay unperceived among some rubbish, and found it exactly four feet and an inch in length.* Glumdal-

* Had Swift seen the colossal statuary of ancient Egypt he would have found that it rivalled the imaginary sculpture of Brobdingnag. Belzoni has clitch wrapped it up in her handkerchief, and carried it home in her pocket, to keep among other trinkets of which the girl was very fond, as children at her age usually are.

The king's kitchen is, indeed, a noble building, vaulted at top, and about six hundred feet high. The great oven is not so wide, by ten paces, as the cupola at St. Paul's; for I measured the latter on purpose, after my return. But if I should describe the kitchen grate, the prodigious pots and kettles, the joints of meat turning on the spits, with many other particulars, perhaps I should be hardly believed; at least a severe critic would be apt to think I enlarged a little, as travellers are often suspected to do. To avoid which censure, I fear I have run too much into the other extreme, and that if this treatise should happen to be translated into the language of Brobdingnag (which is the general name of that kingdom), and transmitted thither, the king and his people would have reason to complain that I had done them an injury by a false and diminutive representation.*

His majesty seldom keeps above six hundred horses in his stables; they are generally from fifty-four to sixty feet high. But when he goes abroad on solemn days he is attended, for state, by a militia guard of five hundred horse, which, indeed, I thought was the most splendid sight that could be ever beheld, till I saw part of his army in battalia, whereof I shall find another occasion to speak.

given the exact dimensions of the four stupendous figures which are seated side by side in front of the excavated temple of Ipsambul; each of them, though seated, measures sixty-four feet from the ground to the top of the cap: the arm, from the shoulder to the elbow, measures fifteen feet and a half, the ear three feet and a half, and the chest, across the shoulders, twenty-five feet four inches Yet the great Sphinx is half as large again as these. Among the Egyptian antiquities there is a colossal fist, probably belonging to a sphinx; were the hand opened, the finger would be nearly of the size of that which Glumdalclitch is said to have picked up

* Lord Orrery has directed attention to the air of probability which Swift's minute attention to proportions and his reference to familiar objects, as a standard, give to his account of Lilliput. The same tact is not less observable in the account of Brobdingnag, and particularly in the comparison of the royal kitchen with the cupola of St. Paul's; perhaps, also, Swift intended to hint that St. Paul's, however splendid as an edifice, does not, like the Gothic cathedrals, immediately suggest that it was erected for religious purposes.

CHAPTER V.

SEVERAL ADVENTURES THAT HAPPENED TO THE AUTHOR. — THE EXECUTION OF A CRIMINAL. — THE AUTHOR SHOWS HIS SKILL IN NAVIGATION.

JUSTLY may I say that I should have lived happy enough in the country, if my littleness had not exposed me to several ridiculous and troublesome accidents, some of which I shall venture to relate. Glumdalclitch often carried me into the gardens of the court in my smaller box, and would sometimes take me out of it, and hold me in her hand, or set me down to walk. I remember, before the dwarf left the queen, he followed us one day into those gardens, and my nurse having set me down, he and I being close together, near some dwarf apple-trees, I must need show my wit by a silly allusion between him and the trees, which happens to hold in their language as it does in ours. Whereupon, the malicious rogue, watching his opportunity, when I was walking under one of them, shook it directly over my head, by which a dozen apples, each of them near as large as a Bristol barrel, came tumbling about my ears; one of them hit me on the back as I chanced to stoop, and knocked me down flat on my face; but I received no other hurt, and the dwarf was pardoned at my desire, because I had given the provocation.

Another day Glumdalclitch left me on a smooth grass-plot to divert myself while she walked at some distance with her governess. In the mean time there suddenly fell such a violent shower of hail that I was immediately, by the force of it, struck to the ground, and when I was down the hailstones gave me such cruel bangs all over the body, as if I had been pelted with tennis-balls; however, I made a shift to creep on all fours, and shelter myself by lying flat on my face, on the lee side of a border of lemon-thyme, but so bruised from head to foot that I could not go abroad in ten days. Neither is that at all to be wondered at, because nature, in that country, observing the same proportion through all her operations, a hailstone is near eighteen hundred times as large as one in Europe, which I can assert upon experience, having been so curious * to weigh and measure them.

But a more dangerous accident happened to me in the same garden, when my little nurse, believing she had put me in a secure place (which I often entreated her to do, that I might enjoy my own thoughts), and having left my box at home to avoid the trouble of carrying it, went to another part of the garden with her governess and some ladies of her acquaintance. While she was absent, and out of hearing, a small white spaniel that belonged to one of the chief gardeners having got by accident into the garden, happened to range near the place where I lay; the dog, following the scent, came directly up, and taking me in his mouth, ran straight to his master, wagging his tail, and set me gently on the ground. By good fortune he had been so well taught that I was carried between his teeth without the least hurt, or even tearing my clothes. But the poor gardener, who knew me well, and had a great kindness for me, was in a terrible fright; he gently took me up in both his hands, and asked me how I did, but I was so amazed and out of breath that I could not speak a word. In a few minutes I came to myself, and he carried me safe to my little nurse, who, by this time, had returned to the place where she left me, and was in cruel agonies when I did not appear nor answer when she called. She severely reprimanded the gardener on account of his dog. But the thing was hushed up and never known at court, for the girl was afraid of the queen's anger, and truly, as to myself, I thought it would not be for my reputation that such a story should go about.

This accident absolutely determined Glumdalclitch never to trust me abroad for the future out of her sight. I had been long afraid of this resolution, and therefore concealed from her some little unlucky adventures that happened in those times when I was left by myself. Once a kite, hovering over the garden, made a stoop at me, and if I had not resolutely drawn my hanger, and run under a thick espalier, he would have certainly carried me away in his talons. Another time, walking to the top of a fresh molehill, I fell to my neck in the hole through which that animal had cast up the earth, and coined some lie, not worth remembering, to excuse myself for spoiling my clothes. I likewise broke my right shin against the shell of a snail, which I happened to stumble over, as I was walking along and thinking on poor England.

I cannot tell whether I were more pleased or mortified to observe, in those solitary walks, that the smaller birds did not appear to be at all afraid of me, but would hop about within a yard's distance, looking for worms and other food, with as much indifference and security as if no creature at all were near them. I remember a thrush had the confidence to snatch out of my hand, with his bill, a piece of cake that Glumdalclitch had just given me for my breakfast. When I attempted to catch any of these birds they would boldly turn against me, endeavoring to peck my fingers, which I durst not venture within their reach; and then they would hop back unconcerned, to hunt for worms or snails, as they did before. But one day I took a thick cudgel and threw it with all my strength so luckily at a linnet, that I knocked him down, and, seizing him by the neck with both my hands, ran with him in triumph to my nurse. However, the bird, who had only been stunned, recovering himself, gave me so many boxes with his wings on both sides of my head and body, though I held him at arm's-length and was out of the reach of his claws, that I was twenty times thinking to let him go. But I was soon relieved by one of our servants, who wrung off the bird's neck, and I had him next day for dinner, by the queen's command. This linnet, as near as I can remember, seemed to be somewhat larger than an English swan.

The maids of honor often invited Glumdalclitch to their apartments, and desired she would bring me along with her, on purpose to have the pleasure of seeing and touching me *. With this I was much disgusted,

* The particle "as" is here improperly omitted; it should be so curious "as" to weigh, etc. — Sheridan.

* Swift attributed his disappointment in his hopes of obtaining a bishopric from Queen Anne to the united influence of female intrigues and the remonstrances of Archbishop Sharpe. The Duchess of Somerset is said to have besought the queen on because, to say the truth, a very offensive smell came from their skins, which I do not mention or intend to the disadvantages of those excellent ladies, for whom I have all manner of respect, but I conceive that my sense was more acute in proportion to my littleness, and that those illustrious persons were no more disagreeable to their lovers, or to each other, than people of the same quality are with us in England. And, after all, I found their natural smell was much more supportable than when they used perfumes, under which I immediately swooned away. I cannot forget that an intimate friend of mine in Lilliput took the freedom in a warm day, when I had used a good deal of exercise, to complain of a strong smell about me, although I am as little faulty that way as most of my sex, but I suppose his faculty of smelling was as nice with regard to me as mine was to that of this people. Upon this point I cannot forbear doing justice to the queen my mistress, and Glumdalclitch my nurse, whose persons were as sweet as those of any lady in England.

That which gave me most uneasiness among these maids of honor (when my nurse carried me to visit them) was to see them use me without any manner of ceremony, like a creature who had no sort of sensitiveness, for they would strip themselves to the skin, and put their clothes on in my presence, while I was placed on their toilet, directly before their naked bosoms, which I am sure to me was very far from being a tempting sight, or from giving me any other emotions than those of horror and disgust: their skins appeared so coarse and uneven, so various colored, when I saw them near, with a mole here and there as broad as a trencher, and hairs hanging from it thicker than packthreads, to say nothing further concerning the rest of their persons.

One day a young gentleman, who was nephew to my nurse's governess, came and pressed them both to see an execution. It was of a man who had murdered one of that gentleman's intimate acquaintance. Glumdalclitch was prevailed on to be of the company, very much against her inclination, for she was naturally tender-hearted, and as for myself, although I abhorred such kind of spectacles, yet my curiosity tempted me to see something that I thought must be extraordinary. The malefactor was fixed on a chair upon a scaffold erected for that purpose, and his head cut off at one blow, with a sword of about forty feet long. The veins and arteries spouted up such a prodigious quantity of blood, and so high in the air, that the great jet d'eau at Versailles was not equal * for the time it lasted, and the head, when it fell on the scaffold floor, gave such a bounce as made me start, although I were at least half an English mile distant.

The queen, who often used to hear me talk of my sea-voyages, and took all occasions to divert me when I was melancholy, asked me whether I understood how to handle a sail or an oar, and whether a little exercise of rowing might not be convenient for my health? I answered that I understood both very well; for although my proper employment had been to be surgeon or doctor to the ship, yet often, upon a pinch, I was forced to work like a common mariner. But I could not see how this could be done in their country, where the smallest wherry was equal to a first-rate man-of-war among us, and such a boat as I could manage would never live in any of their rivers. Her majesty said, "If I would contrive a boat, her own joiner should make it, and she would provide a place for me to sail in." The fellow was an ingenious workman, and by my instructions, in ten her knees not to grant him promotion, in revenge for a bitter lampoon, in which the character of the duchess was very roughly handled. Course as is the description here given of the maids of honor in the court of Brobdingnag, it contains, in earlier editions of "Gulliver's Travels," passages still more offensive than those here preserved, and there is reason to believe that even in its worst printed version it had been much softened down from the original sketch.

Swift, writing to Mrs. Howard in the character of Gulliver, says: "The zeal you have shown for truth [in answering objections to the "Travels"] calls for my particular thanks, and at the same time encourages me to beg you would continue your goodness to me by reconciling me to the maids of honor, whom they say I have most grievously offended. I am so stupid as not to find out how I have disobliged them. I will venture to affirm that if ever the young ladies of your court should meet with a man of as little consequence in this country as I was in Brobdingnag, they would use him with as much contempt." He had neither admiration nor respect for the maids of honor, no doubt they deserved the censure which he implies in the text, though no wonder they took it in dudgeon.

days, finished a pleasure-boat, with all its tackling, able conveniently to hold eight Europeans. When it was finished, the queen was so delighted that she ran with it in her lap to the king, who ordered it to be put into a cistern full of water, with me in it, by way of trial: where I could not manage my two skulls, or little oars, for want of room. But the queen had before contrived another project. She ordered the joiner to make a wooden trough of three hundred feet long, fifty broad, and eight deep: which, being well pitched to prevent leaking, was placed on the floor along the wall, in an outer room of the palace. It had a cock near the bottom to let out the water when it began to grow stale; and two servants could easily fill it in half an hour. Here I often used to row for my own diversion, as well as that of the queen and her ladies, who thought themselves well entertained with my skill and agility. Sometimes I would put up my sail, and then my business was only to steer, while the ladies gave me a gale with their fans; and when they were weary some of their pages would blow my sail forward with their breath, while I showed my art by steering starboard or larboard as I pleased. When I had done, Glumdalclitch always carried back my boat into her closet, and hung it on a nail to dry.

In this exercise I once met an accident, which had like to have cost me my life; for, one of the pages having put my boat into the trough, the governess who attended Glumdalclitch very officiously lifted me up, to place me in the boat; but I happened to slip through her fingers, and should infallibly have fallen down forty feet, upon the floor, if, by the luckiest chance in the world, I had not been stopped by a corking-pin that stuck in the good gentlewoman's stomacher; the head of the pin passed between my shirt and the waistband of my breeches, and thus I was held by the middle in the air, till Glumdalclitch ran to my relief.

Another time one of the servants, whose office it was to fill my trough every third day with fresh water, was so careless * to let a huge frog (not perceiving it) slip out of his pail. The frog lay concealed till I was put into my boat, but then, seeing a resting-place, climbed up, and made it lean so much on one side, that I was forced to balance it with all my weight on the other to prevent overturning. When the frog was got in, it hopped at once half the length of the boat, and then over my head, backward and forward, daubing my face and clothes with its odious slime. The largeness of its features made it appear the most deformed animal that can be conceived. However, I desired Glumdalclitch to let me deal with it alone. I banged it a good while with one of my sculls, and at last forced it to leap out of the boat.

But the greatest danger I underwent in that kingdom was from a monkey who belonged to one of the clerks of the kitchen. Glumdalclitch had locked me up in her closet, while she went somewhere upon business or a visit. The weather being very warm, the closet-window was left open, as well as the windows and the door of my bigger box, in which I usually lived, because of its largeness and conveniency. As I sat quietly meditating at my table, I heard something bounce in at the closet-window, and skip about from one side to the other; whereat although I was much alarmed, yet I ventured to look out, but not stirring from my seat; and then I saw this frolicsome animal frisking and leaping up and down, till at last he came to my box, which he seemed to view with great pleasure and curiosity, peeping in at the door and every window. I retreated to the farther corner of my room, or box, but the monkey, looking in at every side, put me into such a fright that I wanted presence of mind to conceal myself under the bed, as I might easily have done. After some time spent in peeping, grinning, and chattering, he at last espied me; and reaching one of his paws in at the door, as a cat does when she plays with a mouse, although I often shifted place to avoid him, he at length seized the lappet of my coat (which being made of that country silk was very thick and strong), and dragged me out. He took me up in his right fore-foot, and held me as a nurse does a child she is going to suckle, just as I have seen the same sort of creature do with a kitten in Europe; and when I offered to struggle, he squeezed me so hard that I thought it more prudent to submit. I have good reason to believe that he took me for a young one of his own species, by his often stroking my face very gently with his other paw. In these diversions he was interrupted by a noise at the closet door, as if somebody were opening it; whereupon he suddenly leaped up to the window, at which he had come in, and thence upon the leads and gutters, walking upon three legs, and holding me in the fourth, till he clambered up to a roof that was next to ours. I heard Glumdalclitch give a shriek the moment he was carrying me out. The poor girl was almost distracted; that quarter of the palace was all in an uproar; the servants ran for ladders; the monkey was seen by hundreds in the court, sitting upon the ridge of a building, holding me like a baby in one of his fore-paws, and feeding me with the other, by cramming into my mouth some victuals he had squeezed out of the bag on one side of his chaps, and patting me when I would not eat; whereat many of the rabble below could not forbear laughing: neither do I think they justly ought to be blamed, for, without question, the sight was ridiculous enough to everybody but myself. Some of the people threw up stones, hoping to drive the monkey down; but this was strictly forbidden, or else, very probably, my brains had been dashed out.

The ladders were now applied, and mounted by several men, which the monkey observing, and finding himself almost encompassed, not being able to make speed enough with his three legs, let me drop on a ridge tile, and made his escape. Here I sat for some time, five hundred yards from the ground, expecting every moment to be blown down by the wind, or to fall by my own giddiness, and come tumbling over and over from the ridge to the eaves; but an honest lad, one of my nurse's footmen, climbed up, and, putting me into his breeches-pocket, brought me down safe.

I was almost choked with the filthy stuff the monkey had crammed down my throat; but my dear little nurse picked it out of my mouth with a small needle, and then I fell a vomiting, which gave me great relief. Yet I was so weak and bruised in the sides with the squeezes given me by this odious animal, that I was forced to keep my bed a fortnight. The king, queen, and all the court, sent every day to inquire after my health; and her majesty made me several visits during my sickness. The monkey was killed, and an order made that no such animal should be kept about the palace.

When I attended the king after my recovery, to return him thanks for his favors, he was pleased to rally me a good deal upon this adventure. He asked me "what my thoughts and speculations were while I lay in the monkey's paw, how I liked the victuals he gave me, his manner of feeding, and whether the fresh air on the roof had sharpened my stomach." He desired to know "what I would have done upon such an occasion in my own country." I told his majesty, "that in Europe we had no monkeys, except such as were brought for curiosities from other places, and so small that I could deal with a dozen of them together if they presumed to attack me. And as for that monstrous animal with whom I was so lately engaged (it was indeed as large as an elephant), if my fears had suffered me to think so far as to make use of my hanger (looking fiercely, and clapping my hand upon the hilt as I spoke) when he poked his paw into my chamber, perhaps I should have given him such a wound as would have made him glad to withdraw it with more haste than he put it in." This I delivered in a firm tone, like a person who was jealous lest his courage should be called in question. However, my speech produced nothing else beside a loud laughter, which all the respect due to his majesty from those about him could not make them contain. This made me reflect how vain an attempt it is for a man to endeavor to do himself honor among those who are out of all degree of equality or comparison with him. And yet I have seen the moral of my own behavior very frequent in England since my return, where a little contemptible varlet, without the least title to birth, person, wit, or common-sense, shall presume to look with importance, and put himself upon a foot with the greatest persons of the kingdom.

I was every day furnishing the court with some ridiculous story; and Glumdalclitch, although she loved me to excess, yet was arch enough to inform the queen whenever I committed any folly that she thought would be diverting to her majesty. The girl, who had been out of order, was carried by her governess to take the air about an hour's distance, or thirty miles from town. They alighted out of the coach near a small footpath in a field, and Glumdalclitch setting down my travelling-box, I went out of it to walk. There was a cowdung in the path, and I must need try my activity by attempting to leap over it. I took a run, but unfortunately jumped short, and found myself just in the middle, up to my knees. I waded through with some difficulty, and one of the footmen wiped me as clean as he could with his handkerchief, for I was filthily bemired; and my nurse confined me to my box till we returned home, where the queen was soon informed of what had passed, and the footmen spread it about the court, so that all the mirth for some days was at my expense.

CHAPTER VI.

SEVERAL CONTRIVANCES OF THE AUTHOR TO PLEASE THE KING AND QUEEN. — HE SHOWS HIS SKILL IN MUSIC. — THE KING INQUIRES INTO THE STATE OF ENGLAND, WHICH THE AUTHOR RELATES TO HIM. — THE KING'S OBSERVATIONS THEREON.

JOINED as I was to the court, I used to attend the king's levee once or twice a week, and had often seen him under the barber's hand, which, indeed, was at first very terrible to behold, for the razor was almost twice as long as an ordinary scythe. His majesty, according to the custom of the country, was only shaved twice a week. I once prevailed on the barber to give me some of the suds or lather, out of which I picked forty or fifty of the strongest stumps of hair. I then took a piece of fine wood, and cut it like the back of a comb, making several holes in it at equal distances, with as small a needle as I could get from Glumdalclitch. I fixed in the stumps so artificially, scraping and sloping them with my knife towards the points, that I made a very tolerable comb; which was a seasonable supply, my own being so much broken in the teeth that it was almost useless; neither did I know any artist in that country so nice and exact as would undertake to make me another.

And this puts me in mind of an amusement wherein I spent many of my leisure hours. I desired the queen's woman to save for me the combings of her majesty's hair, whereof in time I got a good quantity; and consulting with my friend the cabinet-maker, who had received general orders to do little jobs for me, I directed him to make two chair frames, no larger than those I had in my box, and to bore little holes with a fine awl round those parts where I designed the backs and seats: through these holes I wove the strongest hairs I could pick out, just after the manner of cane chairs in England. When they were finished I made a present of them to her majesty, who kept them in her cabinet, and used to show them for curiosities, as, indeed, they were the wonder of every one that beheld them. The queen would have had me sit upon one of these chairs, but I absolutely refused to obey her, protesting I would rather die a thousand deaths than place a dishonorable part of my body on those precious hairs that once adorned her majesty's head. Of these hairs (as I had always a mechanical genius) I likewise made a neat little purse, about five feet long, with her majesty's name deciphered in gold letters, which I gave to Glumdalclitch by the queen's consent. To say the truth, it was more for show than use, being not of strength to bear the weight of the larger coins, and therefore she kept nothing in it but some little toys that girls are fond of.

The king, who delighted in music, had frequent concerts at court, to which I was sometimes carried, and set in my box on the table to hear them; but the noise was so great that I could hardly distinguish the tunes. I am confident that all the drums and trumpets of a royal army, beating and sounding together just at your ears, could not equal it. My practice was to have my box removed from the place where the performers sat as far as I could, then to shut the doors and windows of it, and draw the window curtains, after which I found their music not disagreeable.

I had learned in my youth to play a little upon the spinet. Glumdalclitch kept one in her chamber, and a master attended twice a week to teach her: I called it a spinet, because it somewhat resembled that instrument, and was played upon in the same manner. A fancy came into my head that I would entertain the king and queen with an English tune upon this instrument. But this appeared extremely difficult: for the spinet was near sixty feet long, each key being almost a foot wide, so that with my arms extended I could not reach to above five keys, and to press them down required a good smart stroke with my fist, which would be too great a labor, and to no purpose. The method I contrived was this: I prepared two round sticks about the bigness of common cudgels; they were thicker at one end than the other, and I covered the thicker ends with pieces of a mouse's skin, that by rapping on them I might neither damage the tops of the keys nor interrupt the sound. Before the spinet a bench was placed, about four feet below the keys, and I was put upon the bench. I ran sidelong upon it, that way and this, as fast as I could, banging the proper keys with my two sticks, and made a shift to play a jig, to the great satisfaction of both their majesties; but it was the most violent exercise I ever underwent; and yet I could not strike above sixteen keys, nor, consequently, play the bass and treble together, as other artists do; which was a great disadvantage to my performance.

The king, who, as I before observed, was a prince of excellent understanding, would frequently order that I should be brought in my box and set upon the table in his closet; he would then command me to bring one of my chairs out of the box and sit down within three yards' distance, upon the top of the cabinet, which brought me almost to a level with his face. In this manner I had several conversations with him. I one day took the freedom to tell his majesty "that the contempt he discovered toward Europe and the rest of the world did not seem answerable to those excellent qualities of mind that he was master of; that reason did not extend itself with the bulk of the body; on the contrary, we observed in our country that the tallest persons were usually the least provided with it; that among other animals bees and ants had the reputation of more industry, art, and sagacity than many of the larger kinds; and that, as inconsiderable as he took me to be, I hoped I might live to do his majesty some signal service." The king heard me with attention, and began to conceive a much better opinion of me than he had ever before. He desired "I would give him as exact an account of the government of England as I possibly could; because, as fond as princes commonly are of their own customs (for so he conjectured of other monarchs by my former discourses), he should be glad to hear of anything that might deserve imitation."

Imagine with thyself, courteous reader, how often I then wished for the tongue of Demosthenes or Cicero, that might have enabled me to celebrate the praise of my own dear native country in a style equal to its merits and felicity.

I began my discourse by informing his majesty that our dominions consisted of two islands, which composed three mighty kingdoms under one sovereign, besides our plantations in America. I dwelt long upon the fertility of our soil and the temperature of our climate. I then spoke at large upon the constitution of an English Parliament; partly made up of an illustrious body, called the House of Peers,— persons of the noblest blood, and of the most ancient and ample patrimonies. I described that extraordinary care always taken of their education in arts and arms to qualify them for being counsellors both to the king and kingdom; to have a share in the legislature; to be members of the highest court of judicature, whence there can be no appeal; and to be champions always ready for the defence of their prince and country, by their valor, conduct, and fidelity. That these were the ornament and bulwark of the kingdom, worthy followers of their most renowned ancestors, whose honor has been the reward of their virtue, from which their posterity were never once known to degenerate. To these were joined several holy persons, as part of that assembly, under the title of bishops, whose peculiar business it is to take care of religion, and of those who instruct the people therein. These were searched and sought out through the whole nation, by the prince and his wisest counsellors, among such of the priesthood as were most deservedly distinguished by the sanctity of their life and the depth of their erudition; who were indeed the spiritual fathers of the clergy and the people.*

That the other part of the Parliament consisted of an assembly called the House of Commons, who were all principal gentlemen, freely picked and culled out by the people themselves for their great abilities and love of their country, to represent the wisdom of the whole nation. And that these two bodies made up the most august assembly in Europe, to whom, in conjunction with the prince, the whole legislature is committed.

I then descended to the courts of justice; over which the judges, those venerable sages and interpreters of the law, presided for determining the disputed rights and properties of men, as well as for the punishment of vice and protection of innocence. I mentioned the prudent management of our treasury; the valor and achievements of our forces by sea and land. I computed the number of our people, by reckoning how many millions there might be of each religious sect or political party among us. I did not omit even our sports and pastimes, or any other particular which I thought might redound to the honor of my country. And I finished all with a brief historical account of affairs and events in England for about a hundred years past.

This conversation was not ended under five audiences, each of several hours; and the king heard the whole with great attention, frequently taking notes of what I spoke, as well as memorandums of what questions he intended to ask me.

When I had put an end to these long discourses, his majesty, in a sixth audience, consulting his notes, proposed many doubts, queries, and objections upon every article. He asked, "What methods were used to cultivate the minds and bodies of our young nobility, and in what kind of business they commonly spent the first and teachable part of their lives? What course was taken to supply that assembly, when any noble family became extinct? What qualifications were necessary in those who are to be created new lords; whether the humor of the prince, a sum of money to a court lady, or a design of strengthening a party opposite to the public interest, ever happened to be the motives in those advancements?* What share of knowledge these lords had in the laws of their country, and how they came by it, so as to enable them to decide the properties of their fellow-subjects in the last resort? Whether they were always so free from avarice, partialities, or want, that a bribe, or some other sinister view, could have no place among them? Whether those holy lords I spoke of were always promoted to that rank upon account of their knowledge in religious matters and the sanctity of their lives; had never been compliers with the times while they were common priests, or slavish prostitute chaplains to some nobleman, whose opinions they continued servilely to follow, af-of suspicion to the several Whig cabinets, and ministerial patronage was exerted to weaken the political influence of the Church by promoting persons not likely to maintain the claims of ecclesiastical power. Not only Swift, but many others, complained that the Church was betrayed by the state, and that the secular power was directly exerted to overthrow Episcopal authority. Bishop Warburton, in one of his letters, urges this complaint with his usual force, vulgarity, and mannerism; the passage is also remarkable for a Brobdingnagian image worthy of Swift himself. "You mention Noah's ark. I have really forgot what I said of it. But I suppose I compared it to the Church, as many a grave divine has done before me. The rabbins make the giant Gog or Magog contemporary with Noah, and convinced by his preaching; so that he was disposed to take the benefit of the ark. But here lay the distress; it by no means suited his dimensions. Therefore, as he could not enter in, he contented himself to ride upon it astride. And though you must suppose that, in that stormy weather he was more than half boots over, he kept his seat, and dismounted safely when the ark landed on Mount Ararat. Image now to yourself this illustrious cavalier mounted on his hackney, and see if it does not bring before you the Church bestrid by some lumpish minister of state, who turns and winds it at his pleasure. The only difference is that Gog believed the preacher of righteousness and religion."

The former comparison of the Church to the ark, which Warburton's correspondent appears to have noticed, is not less characteristic. "The Church, like the ark of Noah, is worth saving; not for the sake of the unclean beasts and vermin that almost filled it, and probably made most noise and clamor in it, but for the little corner of rationality that was as much distressed by the stink within as by the tempest without."

* A bill for the Limitation of the Peerage was passed by the House of Lords in 1719; but, after a long debate, was rejected by an overwhelming majority of the Commons. On this occasion the Tories joined with that section of the Whigs which recognized Walpole as a leader. Swift unconsciously has adopted a portion of the reasoning of his great enemy.

ter they were admitted into that assembly?"*

He then desired to know, "What arts were practised in electing those whom I called commoners; whether a stranger with a strong purse might not influence the vulgar voters to choose him before their own landlord, or the most considerable gentleman in the neighborhood? How it came to pass that people were so violently bent upon getting into this assembly, which I allowed to be a great trouble and expense, often to the ruin of their families, without any salary or pension; because this appeared such an exalted strain of virtue and public spirit, that his majesty seemed to doubt it might possibly not be always sincere?"† And he desired to know "Whether such zealous gentlemen could have any views of refunding themselves for the charges and trouble they were at, by sacrificing the public good to the designs of a weak and vicious prince, in conjunction with a corrupted ministry?" He multiplied his questions, and sifted me thoroughly upon every part of this head, proposing numberless inquiries and objections, which I think it not prudent or convenient to repeat.

* Swift very frequently assailed the Irish bench of bishops, asserting that they were ignorant of the creed of their own church; in one of these attacks on the Episcopal body he says:—

"Of whom there are not four at most
Who know there is an Holy Ghost,
And when they boast they have conferred it,
Like Paul's Ephesians, never heard it;
And when they gave it, 't is well known,
They gave what never was their own."

In another political squib we find the following bitter lines:—

"Let prelates by their good behavior
Convince us they believe a Saviour;
Nor sell, what they so dearly bought,
This country nor their own, for naught"

The Bishop of Kilkenny was particularly obnoxious to the Dean, and bears the brunt of Swift's fierce attack on the Irish bench for proposing to divide the church livings.

"Old Latimer, preaching, did fairly describe
A bishop, who ruled all the rest of his tribe:
And who is this bishop? and where did he dwell?
Why, truly, 't is Satan, Archbishop of Hell:
And he was a primate, and he wore a mitre,
Surrounded with jewels of sulphur and nitre
How nearly this bishop our bishops resembles!
But he has the odds who believes and who trembles
Could you see his Grim Grace for a pound to a penny
You 'd swear it must be the baboon of Kilkenny:
Poor Satan will think the comparison odious,
I wish I could find him out one more commodious
But this I am sure, the most reverend old dragon
Had got on the bench many bishops suffragan;
And all men believe he resides there incog,
To give them by turns an invisible jog"

† Considerable excitement was produced by Sir John Cope having charged Sir Francis Page, one of the barons of the Exchequer, with endeavoring to corrupt the borough of Banbury, in order to secure the return of Sir William Codrington at the next election. The charge was heard at the bar of the House of Commons, and though the ministers of the day exerted all their influence to shield the judge, he was acquitted by a majority of four only, the numbers being 128 to 124 A bill for securing the freedom of elections was, about the same time, rejected by the House of Lords, through the influence of the ministers, who had failed to strangle it in the Commons This afforded the Tories an opportunity of representing themselves as the friends, and the Whigs as the enemies, of constitutional liberty, which they were too wise to neglect. During the debate in the Commons Mr. Hutcheson, member for Hastings, used the following language, which seems to have suggested the king of Brobdingnag's queries to Swift. "But what in God's name can all this tend to? What other construction can any man in common sense put upon all these things, but that there seems to have been a grand design of violence and oppression, first to humble you and make your necks pliable to the yoke, and then to finish the work by tempting the poverty and necessities of the people to sell themselves into the most abject and detestable slavery, for that very money which had been either unnecessarily raised or mercilessly and unjustly plundered and torn from their very bowels? And thus you may be in a fair way of being beaten by your own weapons. Nor can I imagine what inducement men have who run from borough to borough and purchase their elections at such extravagant rates, unless it be from a strong expectation of being well paid for their votes, and of receiving ample recompense and reward for the secret service they have covenanted to perform here. . . . . It were very much to be wished that gentlemen of estates and families in the country would heartily unite in this particular, of keeping the elections in the several counties among themselves; that they would resolve inviolably to support each other's interests against the encroachments and corrupt applications of strangers, let them come from what quarter they will. If this were done, it would in a great measure put an end to those dangerous and infamous practices that are now on foot, and we might hope once more to see this House filled with gentlemen of free and independent fortunes, such as would be above making their court anywhere at the expense of their country, and would despise all manner of slavish concessions to men in power."

Upon what I said in relation to our courts of justice his majesty desired to be satisfied in several points: and this I was the better able to do, having been formerly almost ruined by a long suit in chancery, which was decreed for me with costs. He asked "What time was usually spent in determining between right and wrong, and what degree of expense? Whether advocates and orators had liberty to plead in causes manifestly known to be unjust, vexatious, or oppressive? Whether party, in religion or politics, were observed to be of any weight in the scale of justice? Whether those pleading orators were persons educated in general knowledge of equity, or only in provincial, national, and other local customs? Whether they or their judges had any part in penning those laws which they assumed the liberty of interpreting and glossing upon at their pleasure? Whether they had ever, at different times, pleaded for and against the same cause, and cited precedents to prove contrary opinions? Whether they were a rich or a poor corporation? Whether they received any pecuniary reward for pleading or delivering their opinions? And particularly whether they were ever admitted as members in the lower senate?"*

He fell next upon the management of our treasury; and said "he thought my memory had failed me, because I computed our taxes at about five or six millions a year, and when I came to mention the issues, he found they sometimes amounted to more than double; for the notes he had taken were very particular in this point, because he hoped, as he told me, that the knowledge of our conduct might be useful to him, and he could not be deceived in his calculations.* But, if what I told him were true, he was still at a loss how a kingdom could run out of its estate, like a private person." He asked me "Who were our creditors; and where we found money to pay them?" He wondered to hear me talk of such chargeable and expensive wars; "that certainly we must be a quarrelsome people, or live among very bad neighbors, and that our generals must needs be richer than our kings!" He asked "What business we had out of our own islands, unless upon the score of trade or treaty, or to defend the coasts with our fleet?" Above all, he was amazed to hear me talk of a mercenary standing army in the midst of peace and among a free people. He said, "if we were governed by our own consent, in the persons of our representatives, he could not imagine of whom we were afraid, or against whom we were to fight; and would hear my opinion whether a private man's house might not better be defended by himself, his children, and family, than by half a dozen rascals, picked up at a venture in the streets for small wages, who might get a hundred times more by cutting their throats?"†

* In the session of 1720 Sir William Thompson, solicitor-general, charged Mr Lechmere, attorney-general, with breach of his oath, trust, and duty as a privy councillor, saying that he acted as counsel and received sums of money for his advice in matters to him referred by the privy council as attorney-general. The charge was investigated by a committee of the whole House; it appeared that Mr. Lechmere had taken nothing but his usual fees as chamber counsellor, and the accusation was declared by the House to be false, scandalous, and malicious. The lawyers of Swift's day were for the most part Whigs, and strongly attached to the Protestant succession; they were on this account particularly odious to the Jacobites, and, when individual satire failed, bitter attacks were made on the entire legal profession. It must, however, be added, that the Whig lawyers were too ready to extend the dangerous principle of constructive treason, and far too ardent in their prosecutions for libel. Swift was particularly hostile to lawyers on account of the vexatious prosecutions undertaken against the printers and publishers of the Drapier's Letters, and he never omits an opportunity of venting his indignation.

* The National Debt was first incurred by the Whig administrations in the reigns of William III. and Queen Anne, when the ordinary revenue was found inadequate to the expenses of the great wars against France. It was a favorite topic of declamation with their Tory opponents, and was not the least efficacious in depriving the Whigs of their popularity. In 1722 the Tories proposed the following resolution in the Lords: "That the lessening the public debt annually by all proper methods is necessary to the restoring and securing the public credit." The previous question was carried; upon which a spirited protest was entered on the Journals, and copies of it industriously circulated through the country.

† One of the most memorable debates in the reign of George I. was on the grant for maintaining a standing army of sixteen thousand men. Mr. Shippen and Mr Jeffries resisted the proposal with great energy, and the former used such severity of

He laughed at my "odd kind of arithmetic," as he was pleased to call it, "in reckoning the numbers of our people by a computation drawn from the several sects among us in religion and politics." He said "he knew no reason why those who entertain opinions prejudicial to the public should be obliged to change, or should not be obliged to conceal them. And as it was tyranny in any government to require the first, so it was weakness not to enforce the second; for a man may be allowed to keep poisons in his closet, but not to vend them about for cordials." *

He observed "that among the diversions of our nobility and gentry I had mentioned gaming; he desired to know at what age this entertainment was usually taken up, and when it was laid down; how much of their time it employed: whether it ever went so high as to affect their fortunes; whether mean, vicious people, by their dexterity in that art, might not arrive at great riches, and sometimes keep our very nobles in dependence, as well as habituate them to vile companions; wholly take from them the improvement of their minds, and force them, by the losses they received,† to learn and practise that infamous dexterity upon others?"

He was perfectly astonished with the historical account I gave him of our affairs during the last century, protesting it was only a heap of conspiracies, rebellions, murders, massacres, revolutions, banishments, the very worst effects that avarice, faction, hypocrisy, perfidiousness, cruelty, rage, madness, hatred, envy, lust, malice, and ambition could produce.

His majesty, in another audience, was at the pains to recapitulate the sum of all I had spoken; compared the questions he made with the answers I had given; then taking me into his hands, and, stroking me gently, delivered himself in these words, which I shall never forget, nor the manner he spoke them in: "My little friend Grildrig, you have made a most admirable panegyric upon your country; you have clearly proved that ignorance, idleness, and vice are the proper ingredients for qualifying a legislator; that laws are best explained, interpreted, and applied by those whose interest and abilities lie in perverting, confounding, and eluding them. I observe among you some lines of an institution which in its original might have been tolerable, but these half erased, and the rest wholly blurred and blotted by corruptions. It does not appear, from all you have said, how any one perfection is required toward the procurement of any one station among you; much less that men are ennobled on account of their virtue; that priests are advanced for their piety or learning, soldiers for their conduct or valor, judges for their integrity, senators for the love of their country, or counsellors for their wisdom. As for yourself," continued the king, "who have spent the greatest part of your life in travelling, I am well disposed to hope you may hitherto have escaped many vices of your country. But by what I have gathered from your own relation and the answers I have with much pains wringed * and extorted from you, I cannot but conclude the bulk of your natives to be the most pernicious race of little odious vermin that nature ever suffered to crawl upon the surface of the earth."

language that he was committed to the Tower The Tories, both on this question and on the Debt, had a decided advantage in argument over their adversaries, especially as they could appeal to a parliamentary resolution in the reign of Charles II., which declared, "That the continuance of standing forces in this nation, other than the militia, is illegal, and a great grievance and vexation to the people." Mr Shippen, in his speech, perplexed the Whigs by referring to their own recorded principles. "It is," said he, "every year declared in the Act of Mutiny and Desertion, that the keeping up a standing army in time of peace is against law, and as the freeing us from it was one of the ends of the Revolution, so, no doubt, the preserving us forever from an attempt of the like nature was one of those innumerable glorious advantages proposed by the Act of Succession."

* It is not easy to reconcile these intolerant sentiments with the opinions on toleration already noticed in the Voyage to Lilliput. There was at this time reason to fear that the Presbyterians would obtain the ascendancy in the Irish Parliament, and abolish Episcopacy; hence probably arises Swift's bitterness against sectaries, which is very strongly manifested here and in his celebrated Letter on the Sacramental Test.

* Instead of "wringed," it should have been "wrung." — Sheridan.

CHAPTER VII.

THE AUTHOR'S LOVE OF HIS COUNTRY. — HE MAKES A PROPOSAL OF MUCH ADVANTAGE TO THE KING, WHICH IS REJECTED. — THE KING'S GREAT IGNORANCE IN POLITICS. — THE LEARNING OF THAT COUNTRY VERY IMPERFECT AND CONFINED. — THE LAWS AND MILITARY AFFAIRS, AND PARTIES IN THE STATE.

Love of truth could alone have hindered me from concealing this part of my story. It was in vain to discover my resentments, which were always turned into ridicule; and I was forced to rest with patience while my noble and beloved country was so injuriously treated. I am as heartily sorry as any of my readers can possibly be, that such an occasion was given; but this prince happened to be so curious and inquisitive upon every particular, that it could not consist either with gratitude or good manners to refuse giving him what satisfaction I was able. Yet thus much I may be allowed to say in my own vindication, that I artfully eluded many of his questions, and gave to every point a more favorable turn, by many degrees, than the strictness of truth would allow. For I have always borne that laudable partiality to my own country which Dionysius Halicarnassensis, with so much justice, recommends to an historian; I would hide the frailties and deformities of my political mother, and place her virtues and beauties in the most advantageous light. This was my sincere endeavor in those many discourses I had with that monarch, although it unfortunately failed of success.

But great allowances should be given to a king who lives wholly secluded from the rest of the world, and must therefore be altogether unacquainted with the manners and customs that most prevail in other nations; the want of which knowledge will ever produce many prejudices, and a certain narrowness of thinking, from which we, and the politer countries of Europe, are wholly exempted. And it would be hard indeed, if so remote a prince's notions of virtue and vice were to be offered as a standard for all mankind.

To confirm what I have now said, and further to show the miserable effects of a confined education, I shall here insert a passage which will hardly obtain belief. In hopes to ingratiate myself further into his majesty's favor, I told him of "an invention, discovered between three and four hundred years ago, to make a certain powder, into a heap of which, the smallest spark of fire falling, would kindle the whole in a moment, although it were as big as a mountain, and make it all fly up into the air together with a noise and agitation greater than thunder. That a proper quantity of this powder rammed into a hollow tube of brass or iron, according to its bigness, would drive a ball of iron or lead with such violence and speed as nothing was able to sustain its force. That the largest balls thus discharged would not only destroy whole ranks of an army at once, but batter the strongest walls to the ground; sink down ships, with a thousand men in each, to the bottom of the sea; and when linked together by a chain would cut through masts and rigging, divide hundreds of bodies in the middle, and lay all waste before them. That we often put this powder into large hollow balls of iron, and discharged them by an engine into some city we were besieging, which would rip up the pavements, tear the houses to pieces, burst and throw splinters on every side, dashing out the brains of all who came near. That I knew the ingredients very well, which were cheap and common; I understood the manner of compounding them, and could direct his workmen how to make those tubes, of a size proportionable to all other things in his majesty's kingdom, and the largest need not be above a hundred feet long; twenty or thirty of which tubes, charged with the proper quantity of powder and balls, would batter down the walls of the strongest town in his dominions in a few hours, or destroy the whole metropolis if ever it should pretend to dispute his absolute commands. This I humbly offered to his majesty, as a small tribute of acknowledgment in return of so many marks that I had received of his royal favor and protection."

The king was struck with horror at the description I had given of these terrible engines and the proposal I had made. "He was amazed how so impotent and grovelling an insect as I" (these were his expressions) "could entertain such inhuman ideas, and in so familiar a manner as to appear wholly unmoved at all the scenes of blood and desolation which I had painted, as the common effects of those destructive machines; whereof," he said, "some evil genius, enemy to mankind, must have been the first contriver. As for himself, he protested that although few things delighted him so much as new discoveries in art or in nature, yet he would rather lose half his kingdom than be privy to such a secret; which he commanded me, as I valued my life, never to mention any more."*

A strange effect of narrow principles and views! that a prince possessed of every quality which procures veneration, love, and esteem; of strong parts, great wisdom, and profound learning; endowed with admirable talents, and almost adored by his subjects, should from a nice unnecessary scruple, whereof in Europe we can have no conception, let slip an opportunity put into his hands that would have made him absolute master of the lives, the liberties, and the fortunes of his people.† Neither do I say this with the least intention to detract from the many virtues of that excellent king, whose character, I am sensible, will on this account be very much lessened in the opinion of the English reader; but I take this defect among them to have risen from their ignorance, by not having hitherto reduced politics into a science, as the more acute wits of Europe have done. For I remember very well in a discourse one day with the king, when I happened to say, "there were several thousand books among us written upon the art of government," it gave him (directly contrary to my intention) a very mean opinion of our understandings. He professed both to abominate and despise all mystery, refinement, and intrigue, either in a prince or a minister. He could not tell what I meant by secrets of state, where an enemy, or some rival nation, were not in the case. He confined the knowledge of governing within very narrow bounds, to common-sense and reason, to justice and lenity, to the speedy determination of civil and criminal causes, with some other obvious topics, which are not worth considering. And he gave it for his opinion, "that whoever could make two ears of corn, or two blades of grass, to grow upon a spot of ground where only one grew before, would deserve better of mankind, and do more essential service to his country, than the whole race of politicians put together."* The learning of this people is very defective; consisting only in morality, history, poetry, and mathematics, wherein they must be allowed to excel. But the last of these is wholly applied to what may be useful in life, to the improvement of agriculture and all mechanical arts; so that among us it would be little esteemed. And as to ideas, entities, abstractions, and transcendentals, I could never drive the least conception into their heads.

No law of that country must exceed in words the number of letters in their alphabet, which consists only of two-and-twenty. But indeed few of them extend even to that length. They are expressed in the most plain and simple terms, wherein those people are not mercurial enough to discover above one interpretation; and to write a comment upon any law is a capital crime. As to the decision of civil causes or proceedings against criminals, their precedents are so few that they have little reason to boast of any extraordinary skill in either.

They have had the art of printing, as well as the Chinese, time out of mind, but their libraries are not very large; for that of the king, which is reckoned the largest, does not amount to above a thousand volumes, placed in a gallery of twelve hundred feet long,

* It is scarcely necessary to expose the fallacious reasoning of this passage; everybody knows that wars have been far less sanguinary since the invention of gunpowder than they were before, and that every improvement in the arts of destruction has been followed by a saving of human life. Swift, however, knew that the glories of Marlborough's campaigns were the chief source of the popularity of the Whigs, and, as he could not deny the military merits of these victories, he hoped to weaken their influence by declaiming against wars in general.

† It was more than hinted by the Tories that the House of Brunswick intended to make use of the standing army to subvert British liberty. Mr. Shippen, in the speech to which allusion has been already made, said "that the second paragraph of the king's speech seemed rather to be calculated for the meridian of Germany than Great Britain; and that the king was a stranger to our language and constitution." It was for these expressions that he was committed to the Tower.

* The Tories were always anxious to identify themselves with the agricultural interest, to which Swift consequently loses no opportunity of paying a compliment.

whence I had liberty to borrow what books I pleased. The queen's joiner had contrived, in one of Glumdalclitch's rooms, a kind of wooden machine five-and-twenty feet high, formed like a standing ladder; the steps were each fifty feet long; it was indeed a movable pair of stairs, the lowest end placed at ten feet distance from the wall of the chamber. The book I had a mind to read was put up leaning against the wall; I first mounted to the upper step of the ladder, and, turning my face towards the book, began at the top of the page, and so walking to the right and left about eight or ten paces, according to the length of the lines, till I had gotten a little below the level of mine eyes, and then descending gradually till I came to the bottom; after which I mounted again and began the other page in the same manner, and so turned over the leaf, which I could easily do with both my hands, for it was as thick and stiff as a pasteboard, and, in the largest folios, not above eighteen or twenty feet long.

Their style is clear, masculine, and smooth, but not florid; for they avoid nothing more than multiplying unnecessary words or using various expressions. I have perused many of their books, especially those in history or morality. Among the rest, I was much diverted with a little old treatise which always lay in Glumdalclitch's bedchamber, and belonged to her governess, a grave, elderly gentlewoman, who dealt in writings of morality and devotion. The book treats of the weakness of human kind, and is in little esteem, except among the women and the vulgar. However, I was curious to see what an author of that country could say upon such a subject. This writer went through all the usual topics of European moralists, showing "how diminutive, contemptible, and helpless an animal was man in his own nature; how unable to defend himself from inclemencies of the air or the fury of wild beasts; how much he was excelled by one creature in strength, by another in speed, by a third in foresight, by a fourth in industry." He added "that nature was degenerated in these latter declining ages of the world, and could now produce only small, abortive births in comparison of those in ancient times." He said "it was very reasonable to think not only that the species of men were originally much larger, but also that there must have been giants in former ages; which, as it is asserted by history and tradition, so it has been confirmed by huge bones and skulls, casually dug up in several parts of the kingdom, far exceeding the common, dwindled race of men in our days." He argued "that the very laws of nature absolutely required we should have been made, in the beginning, of a size more large and robust, not so liable to destruction from every little accident, — of a tile falling from a house, or a stone cast from the hand of a boy, or being drowned in a little brook." From this way of reasoning the author drew several moral applications, useful in the conduct of life, but needless here to repeat. For my own part, I could not avoid reflecting how universally this talent was spread, of drawing lectures in morality, or indeed rather matter of discontent and repining, from the quarrels we raise with nature. And I believe, upon a strict inquiry, those quarrels might be shown as ill-grounded among us as they are among that people.

As to their military affairs, they boast that the king's army consists of a hundred and seventy-six thousand foot, and thirty-two thousand horse; if that may be called an army, which is made up of tradesmen in the several cities and farmers in the country, whose commanders are only the nobility and gentry, without pay or reward. They are indeed perfect enough in their exercises, and under very good discipline, wherein I saw no great merit; for how should it be otherwise, where every farmer is under the command of his own landlord and every citizen under that of the principal men in his own city, chosen, after the manner of Venice, by ballot? I have often seen the militia of Lorbrulgrud drawn out to exercise in a great field, near the city, of twenty miles square. They were in all not above twenty-five thousand foot and six thousand horse; but it was impossible for me to compute their number, considering the space of ground they took up. A cavalier mounted on a large steed might be about ninety feet high. I have seen this whole body of horse upon a word of command draw their swords at once and brandish them in the air. Imagination can figure nothing so grand, so surprising, and so astonishing! it looked as if ten thousand flashes of lightning were darting at the same time from every quarter of the sky.

I was curious to know how this prince, to whose dominions there is no access from any other country, came to think of armies, or to teach his people the practice of military discipline. But I was soon informed, both by conversation and reading their histories; for, in the course of many ages, they have been troubled with the same disease to which the whole race of mankind is subject, — the nobility often contending for power, the people for liberty, and the king for absolute dominion. All which, however happily tempered by the laws of that kingdom, have been sometimes violated by each of the three parties, and have more than once occasioned civil wars; the last whereof was happily put an end to by this prince's grandfather, in a general composition, and the militia, then settled with common consent, has been ever since kept in the strictest duty.

CHAPTER VIII.

JUNCTURES of perilous circumstances from which I had already escaped inspired me with a strong impulse that I should some time recover my liberty, though it was impossible to conjecture by what means, or to form any project with the least hope of succeeding. The ship in which I sailed was the first known to be driven within sight of that coast, and the king had given strict orders "that if at any time another appeared, it should be taken ashore, and, with all its crew and passengers, brought in a tumbril to Lorbrulgrud." He was strongly bent to get me a woman of my own size, by whom I might propagate the breed; but I think I should rather have died than undergone the disgrace of leaving a posterity to be kept in cages, like tame canary-birds, and perhaps in time sold about the kingdom to persons of quality for curiosities. I was indeed treated with much kindness; I was the favorite of a great king and queen, and the delight of the whole court; but it was upon such a foot as ill became the dignity of human kind. I could never forget those domestic pledges I had left behind me. I wanted to be among people with whom I could converse upon even terms, and walk about the streets and fields without being afraid of being trod to death like a frog or a young puppy. But my deliverance came sooner than I expected, and in a manner not very common; the whole story and circumstances of which I shall faithfully relate.

I had now been two years in the country; and about the beginning of the third, Glumdalclitch and I attended the king and queen in a progress to the south coast of the kingdom. I was carried as usual in my travelling-box, which, as I have already described, was a very convenient closet of twelve feet wide. And I had ordered a hammock to be fixed, by silken ropes, from the four corners at the top, to break the jolts when a servant carried me before him on horseback, as I sometimes desired, and would often sleep in my hammock while we were upon the road. On the roof of my closet, not directly over the middle of the hammock, I ordered the joiner to cut a hole of a foot square, to give me air in hot weather as I slept; which hole I shut at pleasure with a board that drew backward and forward through a groove.

When we came to our journey's end, the king thought proper to pass a few days at a palace he has near Flanflasnic, a city within eighteen English miles of the seaside. Glumdalclitch and I were much fatigued; I had gotten a small cold, but the poor girl was so ill as to be confined to her chamber. I longed to see the ocean, which must be the only scene of my escape, if ever it should happen. I pretended to be worse than I really was, and desired leave to take the fresh air of the sea, with a page, whom I was very fond of, and who had sometimes been trusted with me. I shall never forget with what unwillingness Glumdalclitch consented, nor the strict charge she gave the page to be careful of me, bursting at the same time into a flood of tears, as if she had some foreboding of what was to happen. The boy took me out in my box, about half an hour's walk from the palace, towards the rocks on the sea-shore. I ordered him to set me down, and lifting up one of my sashes, cast many a wistful, melancholy look towards the sea. I found myself not very well, and told the page that I had a mind to take a nap in my hammock, which I hoped would do me good. I got in, and the boy shut the window close down to keep out the cold. I soon fell asleep, and all I can conjecture is, while I slept, the page, thinking no danger could happen, went among the rocks to look for birds' eggs, having before observed him from my window searching about, and picking up one or two in the clefts. Be that as it will, I found myself suddenly awakened with a violent pull upon the ring which was fastened at the top of my box for the convenience of carriage. I felt my box raised very high in the air, and then borne forward with prodigious speed. The first jolt had like to have shaken me out of my hammock, but afterward the motion was easy enough. I called out several times as loud as I could raise my voice, but all to no purpose. I looked towards my windows, and could see nothing but the clouds and sky. I heard a noise just over my head, like the clapping of wings, and then began to perceive the woful condition I was in, that some eagle had got the cord of my box in his beak, with an intent to let it fall on a rock, like a tortoise in a shell, and then pick out my body and devour it; for the sagacity and smell of this bird enable him to discover his quarry at a great distance, though better concealed than I could be within a two-inch board. In a little time I observed the noise and flutter of wings to increase very fast, and my box was tossed up and down, like a sign in a windy day. I heard several bangs or buffets, as I thought, given to the eagle (for such I am certain it must have been that held the cord of my box in his beak), and then, all on a sudden, felt myself falling perpendicularly down, for above a minute, but with such incredible swiftness that I almost lost my breath. My fall was stopped by a terrible squash, that sounded louder to my ears than the cataract of Niagara;* after which I was quite in the dark for another minute, and then my box began to rise so high that I could see light from the tops of the windows. I now perceived I was fallen into the sea. My box, by the weight of my body, the goods that were in, and the broad plates of iron fixed for strength at the four corners of the top and bottom, floated about five feet deep in water. I did then and do now suppose, that the eagle which flew away with my box was pursued by two or three others, and forced to let me drop while he defended himself against the rest, who hoped to share in the prey. The plates of iron fastened at the bottom of the box (for those were the strongest) preserved the balance while it fell, and hindered it from being broken on the surface of the water. Every joint of it was well grooved, and the door did not move on hinges, but up and down like a sash, which kept my closet so tight that very little water came in. I got with much difficulty out of my hammock, having first ventured to draw back the slip-board on the roof already mentioned, contrived on purpose to let in air, for want of which I found myself almost stifled.

How often did I then wish myself with my dear Glumdalclitch, from whom one single hour had so far divided me! And I may say with truth, that in the midst of my own misfortunes I could not forbear lamenting my poor nurse, the grief she would suffer for my loss, the displeasure of the queen, and the ruin of her fortune. Perhaps many travellers have not been under greater difficulties and distress than I was at this juncture, expecting every moment to see my box dashed to pieces, or at least overset by the first violent blast or rising wave. A breach in one single pane of glass would have been immediate death; nor could anything have preserved the windows but the strong lattice wires placed on the outside against accidents in travelling. I saw the water ooze in at several crannies, although the leaks were not considerable, and I endeavored to stop them as well as I could. I was not able to lift up the roof of my closet, which otherwise I certainly should have done and sat on the top of it, where I might at least preserve myself some hours longer, than by being shut up (as I may call it) in the hold. Or, if I escaped these dangers for a day or two, what could I expect but a miserable death of cold and hunger? I was for four hours under these circumstances, expecting, and indeed wishing, every moment to be my last.

I have already told the reader that there were two strong staples fixed upon that side of my box which had no window; and into which the servant who used to carry me on horseback would put a leathern belt and buckle it about his waist. Being in this disconsolate state I heard, or at least thought I heard, some kind of grating noise on that side of my box where the staples were fixed; and soon after I began to fancy that the box was pulled or towed along the sea; for I now and then felt a sort of tugging, which made the waves rise near the tops of my windows, leaving me almost in the dark This gave me some faint hopes of relief, although I was not able to imagine how it could be brought about. I ventured to unscrew one of my chairs, which were always fastened to the floor, and having made a hard shift to screw it down again, directly under the slipping-board that I had lately opened, I mounted on the chair, and putting my mouth as near as I could to the hole, I called for help in a loud voice, and in all the languages I understood. I then fastened my handkerchief to a stick I usually carried, and, thrusting it up the hole, waved it several times in the air, that if any boat or ship were near, the seamen might conjecture some unhappy mortal to be shut up in the box.

I found no effect from all I could do, but plainly perceived my closet to be moved along; and in the space of an hour, or better, that side of the box where the staples were, and had no windows, struck against something that was hard. I apprehended it to be a rock, and found myself tossed more than ever. I plainly heard a noise upon the cover of my closet, like that of a cable, and the grating of it as it passed through the ring. I then found myself hoisted up, by degrees, at least three feet higher than I was before. Whereupon I again thrust up my stick and handkerchief, calling for help till I was almost hoarse. In return to which I heard a great shout repeated three times, giving me such transports of joy as are not to be conceived but by those who feel them. I now heard a trampling over my head, and somebody calling through the hole with a loud voice, in the English tongue, "If there be anybody below, let them speak." I answered, "I was an Englishman, drawn by ill fortune into the greatest calamity that ever any creature underwent, and begged, by all that was moving, to be delivered out of the dungeon I was in." The voice replied "I was safe, for my box was fastened to their ship; and the carpenter should immediately come and saw a hole in the cover large enough to pull me out." I answered "that was needless, and would take up too much time; for there was no more to be done, but let one of the crew put his finger into the ring and take the box out of the sea into the ship, and so into the captain's cabin."* Some of them, upon hearing me talk so wildly, thought I was mad; others laughed; for indeed it never came into my head that I was now got among people of my own stature and strength. The carpenter came, and in a few minutes sawed a passage about four feet square, then let down a small ladder, upon which I mounted, and thence was taken into the ship in a very weak condition.

The sailors were all in amazement, and asked me a thousand questions which I had no inclination to answer. I was equally confounded at the sight of so many pygmies, for such I took them to be, after having so long accustomed mine eyes to the monstrous objects I had left. But the captain, Mr. Thomas Wilcocks, an honest worthy Shropshire man, observing I was ready to faint, took me into his cabin, gave me a cordial to comfort me, and made me turn in upon his own bed, advising me to take a little rest, of which I had great need. Before I went to sleep I gave him to understand that I had some valuable furniture in my box, too good to be lost: a fine hammock, a handsome field-bed, two chairs, a table, and a cabinet; that my closet was hung on all sides, or rather quilted, with silk and cotton; that if he would let one of the crew bring my closet into his cabin, I would open it there before him and show him my goods. The captain, hearing me utter these absurdities, concluded I was raving; however (I suppose to pacify me) he promised to give order as I desired, and, going upon deck, sent some of his men down into my closet, whence (as I afterward found) they drew up all my goods, and stripped off the quilting; but the chairs, cabinet, and bedstead, being screwed to the floor, were much damaged by the ignorance of the seamen, who tore them up by force. Then they knocked off some of the boards for the use of the ship, and when they had got all they had a mind for, let the hull drop into the sea, which, by reason of many breaches made in the bottom and sides, sunk outright. And, indeed, I was glad not to have been a spectator of the havoc they made; because I am confident it would have sensibly touched me, by bringing former passages into my mind which I would rather have forgot.

I slept some hours, but perpetually disturbed with dreams of the place I had left and the dangers I had escaped. However, upon waking, I found myself much recovered. It was now about eight o'clock at night, and the captain ordered supper immediately, thinking I had already fasted too long. He entertained me with great kindness, observing me not to look wildly or talk inconsistently; and when we were left alone desired I would give him a relation of my travels, and by what accident I came to be set adrift in that monstrous wooden chest. He said, "that about twelve o'clock at noon, as he was looking through his glass, he spied it at a distance, and thought it was a sail, which he had a mind to make, being not much out of his course, in hopes of buying some biscuit, his own beginning to fall short. That upon coming nearer, and finding his error, he sent out his long-boat to discover what it was; that his men came back in a fright, swearing they had seen a swimming house. That he laughed at their folly, and went himself in the boat, ordering his men to take a strong cable along with them. That the weather being calm he rowed round me several times, observed my windows and wire lattices that defended them. That he discovered two staples upon one side, which was all of boards, without any passage for light. He then commanded his men to row up to that side, and fastening a cable to one of the staples, ordered them to tow my chest, as they called it, toward the ship. When it was there, he gave directions to fasten another cable to the ring fixed in the cover, and to raise up my chest with pulleys, which all the sailors were not able to do above two or three feet. He said they saw my stick and handkerchief thrust out of the hole, and concluded that some unhappy man must be shut up in the cavity." I asked "whether he or the crew had seen any prodigious birds in the air about the time he first discovered me." To which he answered "that, discoursing this matter with the sailors while I was asleep, one of them said he had observed three eagles flying towards the north, but remarked nothing of their being larger than the usual size"; which I suppose must be imputed to the great height they were at; and he could not guess the reason of my question. I then asked the captain, "how far he reckoned we might be from land." He said, "by the best computation he could make, we were at least a hundred leagues." I assured him that he must be mistaken by almost half, for I had not left the country whence I came above two hours before I dropped into the sea." Whereupon he began again to think that my brain was disturbed, of which he gave me a hint, and advised me to go to bed in a cabin he had provided. I assured him "I was well refreshed with his good entertainment and company, and as much in my senses as ever I was in my life." He then grew serious, and desired to ask me freely "whether I were not troubled in my mind by the consciousness of some enormous crime for which I was punished, at the command of some prince, by exposing me in that chest; as great criminals, in other countries, have been forced to sea in a leaky vessel without provisions; for although he should be sorry to have taken so ill a man into his ship, yet he would engage his word to set me safe ashore in the first port where we arrived." He added "that his suspicions were much increased by some very absurd speeches I had delivered at first to his sailors, and afterwards to himself, in relation to my closet or chest, as well as by my odd looks and behavior while I was at supper."

I begged his patience to hear me tell my story, which I faithfully did, from the last time I left England to the moment he first discovered me. And as truth always forces its way into rational minds, so this honest, worthy gentleman, who had some tincture of learning, and very good sense, was immediately convinced of my candor and veracity. But, further to confirm all I had said, I entreated him to give order that my cabinet should be brought, of which I had the key in my pocket; for he had already informed me how the seamen disposed of my closet. I opened it in his own presence, and showed him the small collection of rarities I made in the country from which I had been so strangely delivered. There was the comb I had contrived out of the stumps of the king's beard, and another of the same materials, but fixed into a paring of her majesty's thumb-nail, which served for the back. There was a collection of needles and pins, from a foot to half a yard long; four wasp-stings, like joiners' tacks; some combings of the queen's hair; a gold ring which one day she made me a present of, in a most obliging manner, taking it from her little finger, and throwing it over my head like a collar. I desired the captain would please to accept this ring in return of his civilities, which he absolutely refused. I showed him a corn that I had cut off, with my own hand, from a maid of honor's toe; it was about the bigness of a Kentish pippin, and grown so hard that when I returned to England I got it hollowed into a cup and set in silver. Lastly, I desired him to see the breeches I had then on, which were made of a mouse's skin. I could force nothing on him but a footman's tooth, which I observed him to examine with great curiosity, and found he had a fancy for it. He received it with abundance of thanks, more than such a trifle could deserve. It was drawn by an unskilful surgeon, in a mistake, from one of Glumdalclitch's men, who was afflicted with the toothache, but it was as sound as any in his head. I got it cleaned, and put it into my cabinet. It was about a foot long and four inches in diameter.

The captain was very well satisfied with this plain relation I had given him, and said "he hoped, when we were returned to England, I would oblige the world by putting it on paper and making it public." My answer was "that I thought we were overstocked with books of travels; that nothing could now pass which was not extraordinary; wherein I doubted some authors less consulted truth than their own vanity or interest, or the diversion of ignorant readers; that my story could contain little besides common events without those ornamental descriptions of strange plants, trees, birds, and other animals, or of the barbarous customs and idolatry of savage people, with which most writers abound." However, I thanked him for his good opinion, and promised to take the matter into my thoughts.

He said "he wondered at one thing very much, which was to hear me speak so loud, asking me whether the king and queen of that country were thick of hearing." I told him, "it was what I had been used to for above two years past, and that I admired as much at the voices of him and his men, who seemed to me only to whisper, and yet I could hear them well enough. But when I spoke in that country, it was like a man talking in the streets to another looking out from the top of a steeple, unless when I was placed on a table, or held in any person's hand." I told him, "I had likewise observed another thing, that when I first got into the ship, and the sailors stood all about me, I thought they were the most contemptible little creatures I had ever beheld." For indeed, while I was in that prince's country, I could never endure to look in a glass after mine eyes had been accustomed to such prodigious objects, because the comparisons gave me so despicable a conceit of myself. The captain said "that while we were at supper he observed me to look at everything with a sort of wonder, and that I often seemed hardly able to contain my laughter, which he knew not well how to take, but imputed it to some disorder in my brain." I answered "it was very true; and I wondered how I could forbear, when I saw his dishes of the size of a silver threepence, a leg of pork hardly a mouthful, a cup not so big as a nutshell"; and so I went on describing the rest of his household stuff and provisions after the same manner. For, although the queen had ordered a little equipage of all things necessary for me, while I was in her service, yet my ideas were wholly taken up with what I saw on every side of me, and I winked at my own littleness as people do at their own faults. The captain understood my raillery very well, and merrily replied with the old English proverb that he doubted mine eyes were bigger than my belly, for he did not observe my stomach so good, although I had fasted all day; and, continuing in his mirth, protested "he would have gladly given a hundred pounds to have seen my closet in the eagle's bill, and afterwards in its fall from so great a height into the sea; which would certainly have been a most astonishing object, worthy to have the description of it transmitted to future ages"; and the comparison of Phaeton was so obvious that he could not forbear applying it, although I did not much admire the conceit.

The captain, having been at Tonquin, was, in his return to England, driven northeastward to the latitude of 44 degrees and longitude of 143. But meeting a trade-wind two days after I came on board him, we sailed southward a long time, and, coasting New Holland, kept our course west-southwest, and then south-southwest, till we doubled the Cape of Good Hope. Our voyage was very prosperous, but I shall not trouble the reader with a journal of it. The captain called in at one or two ports, and sent in his long-boat for provisions and fresh water; but I never went out of the ship till we came into the Downs, which was on the third day of June, 1706, about nine months after my escape. I offered to leave my goods in security for payment of my freight, but the captain protested he would not receive one farthing. We took a kind leave of each other, and I made him promise he would come to see me at my house in Redriff. I hired a horse and guide for five shillings, which I borrowed of the captain.*

As I was on the road, observing the littleness of the houses, the trees, the cattle, and the people, I began to think myself in Lilliput. I was afraid of trampling on every traveller I met, and often called aloud to them to have them stand out of the way, so that I had like to have gotten one or two broken heads for my impertinence.

When I came to my own house, for which I was forced to inquire, one of my servants opening the door, I bent down to go in (like a goose under a gate), for fear of striking my head. My wife ran out to embrace me, but I stooped lower than her knees, thinking she could otherwise never be able to reach my mouth. My daughter kneeled to ask my blessing, but I could not see her till she arose, having been so long used to stand with my head and eyes erect to above sixty feet; and then I went to take her up with one hand by the waist. I looked down upon the servants and one or two friends who were in the house as if they had been pygmies and I a giant. I told my wife "she had been too thrifty, for I found she had starved herself and her daughter to nothing." In short, I behaved myself so unaccountably that they were all of the captain's opinion when he first saw me, and concluded I had lost my wits. This I mention as an instance of the great power of habit and prejudice.

In a little time I and my family and friends came to a right understanding; but my wife protested I should never go to sea any more; although my evil destiny so ordered that she had not power to hinder me, as the reader may know hereafter. In the mean time I here conclude the Second Part of my unfortunate Voyages.

* This exquisitely simple incident will probably remind the reader of Campbell's description of Commodore Byron:—

"In horrid climes, where Chiloe's tempests sweep Tumultuous murmurs o'er the troubled deep,
'T was his to mourn Misfortune's rudest shock;
Scourged by the winds and cradled on the rock,
To wake each joyless morn and search again
The famished haunts of solitary men,
Whose race unyielding as their native storm,
Know not a trace of nature but the form;
Yet at thy call the hardy tar pursued,
Pale, but intrepid, sad, but unsubdued,
Pierced the deep woods, and hailing from afar
The moon's pale planet and the northern star,
Paused at each dreary cry unheard before,
Hyenas in the wild and mermaids on the shore;
Till led by Hope o'er many a cliff sublime,
He found a warmer world, a milder clime,
A home to rest, a shelter to defend,
Peace and repose, a Briton and a friend."

INTRODUCTION.

HENRI-JACQUES BERNARDIN DE ST. PIERRE was born at Havre in 1737. Many anecdotes are related of his childhood, indicative of the youthful author, — of his strong love of nature, and his humanity to animals.

That "the child is father of the man" has been seldom more strongly illustrated. At eight years of age he took the greatest pleasure in the regular culture of his garden, and possibly then stored up some of the ideas which afterward appeared in the "Fraisier." His sympathy with all living things was extreme. In "Paul and Virginia" he praises, with evident satisfaction, their meal of milk and eggs, which had not cost any animal its life. It has been remarked, and possibly with truth, that every tenderly disposed heart, deeply imbued with a love of nature, is at times somewhat Brahminical. St. Pierre's certainly was.

When quite young he advanced with a clenched fist toward a carter who was ill-treating a horse. And when taken for the first time by his father to Rouen, having the towers of the cathedral pointed out to him, he exclaimed, "My God! how high they fly!" Every one present naturally laughed. Bernardin had only noticed the flight of some swallows who had built their nests there. He thus early revealed those instincts which afterward became the guidance of his life; the strength of which possibly occasioned his too great indifference to all monuments of art. The love of study and of solitude were also characteristics of his childhood. His temper is said to have been moody, impetuous, and intractable. Whether this faulty temper may not have been produced or rendered worse by mismanagement, cannot now be ascertained. It undoubtedly became afterward to St. Pierre a fruitful source of misfortune and of woe.

The reading of voyages was with him, even in childhood, almost a passion. At twelve years of age his whole soul was occupied by Robinson Crusoe and his island. His romantic love of adventure seeming to his parents to announce a predilection in favor of the sea, he was sent by them with one of his uncles to Martinique. But St. Pierre had not sufficiently practised the virtue of obedience to submit, as was necessary, to the discipline of a ship. He was afterward placed with the Jesuits at Caen, with whom he made immense progress in his studies. But it is to be feared he did not conform too well to the regulations of the college, for he conceived from that time the greatest detestation for places of public education. And this aversion he has frequently testified in his writings. While devoted to his books of travels, he in turn anticipated being a Jesuit, a missionary, or a martyr; but his family at length succeeded in establishing him at Rouen, where he completed his studies, with brilliant success, in 1757. He soon after obtained a commission as an engineer, with a salary of one hundred louis. In this capacity he was sent (1760) to Dusseldorf, under the command of Count St. Germain. This was a career in which he might have acquired both honor and fortune; but, most unhappily for St. Pierre, he looked upon the useful and necessary etiquettes of life as so many unworthy prejudices. Instead of conforming to them, he sought to trample on them. In addition, he evinced some disposition to rebel against his commander, and was unsocial with his equals. It is not, therefore, to be wondered at, that at this unfortunate period of his existence he made himself enemies; or that, notwithstanding his great talents, or the coolness he had exhibited in moments of danger, he should have been sent back to France. Unwelcome, under these circumstances, to his family, he was ill received by all.

A prize in the lottery had just doubled his very slender means of existence, when he obtained the appointment of geographical engineer, and was sent to Malta. The Knights of the Order were at this time expecting to be attacked by the Turks. Having already been in the service, it was singular that St. Pierre should have had the imprudence to sail without his commission. He thus subjected himself to a thousand disagreeable incidents, for the officers would not recognize him as one of themselves. The effects of their neglect on his mind were tremendous; his reason for a time seemed almost disturbed by the mortifications he suffered. After receiving an insufficient indemnity for the expenses of his voyage, St. Pierre returned to France, there to endure fresh misfortunes; and the pressure of poverty drove him to Holland. He was well received at Amsterdam by a French refugee named Mustel, who edited a popular journal there, and who procured him employment, with handsome remuneration. St. Pierre did not, however, remain long satisfied with this quiet mode of existence. Allured by the encouraging reception given by Catherine II. to foreigners, he set out for St. Petersburg. Here, until he obtained the protection of the Maréchal de Munich and the friendship of Duval, he had again to contend with poverty. The latter generously opened to him his purse, and by the Maréchal he was introduced to Villebois, the Grand Master of Artillery, and by him presented to the empress. The empress, with the rank of captain, bestowed on him a grant of fifteen hundred francs; but when General Dubosquet proposed to take him with him to examine the military position of Finland, his only anxiety seemed to be to return to France: still he went to Finland; and his own notes of his occupations and experiments on that expedition prove that he gave himself up in all diligence to considerations of attack and defence. He who loved nature so intently seems only to have seen in the extensive and majestic forests of the North a theatre of war. In this instance he appears to have stifled every emotion of admiration, and to have beheld alike cities and countries in his character of military surveyor.

On his return to St. Petersburg he found his protector, Villebois, disgraced. St. Pierre then resolved on espousing the cause of the Poles. He went into Poland with a high reputation, — that of having refused the favors of despotism to aid the cause of liberty. But it was his private life, rather than his public career, that was affected by his residence in Poland, and, owing to a sorrowful love affair with the Princess Mary, he left Poland for Germany.

In 1766 he returned to Havre; but his relations were by this time dead or dispersed, and after six years of exile he found himself once more in his own country, without employment, and destitute of pecuniary resources.

The Baron de Breteuil at length obtained for him a commission as engineer to the Isle of France, whence he returned in 1771. In this interval his heart and imagination doubtless received the germs of his immortal works. Many of the events, indeed, of the "Voyage à l'Ile de France" are to be found, modified by imagined circumstances, in "Paul and Virginia." He returned to Paris poor in purse, but rich in observations and mental resources, and resolved to devote himself to literature. By the Baron de Breteuil he was recommended to D'Alembert, who procured a publisher for his "Voyage," and also introduced him to Mlle. de l'Espinasse. But no one, in spite of his great beauty, was so ill calculated to shine or please in society as St. Pierre. His manners were timid and embarrassed, and, unless to those with whom he was very intimate, he scarcely appeared intelligent.

St. Pierre, in his "Préambule de l'Arcadie," has pathetically and eloquently described the deplorable state of his health and feelings, after frequent humiliating disputes and disappointments had driven him from society; or rather when, like Rousseau, he was "self-banished" from it.

"I was struck," he says, "with an extraordinary malady. Streams of fire, like lightning, flashed before my eyes; every object appeared to me double, or in motion; like Œdipus, I saw two suns. . . . . In the finest day of summer I could not cross the Seine in a boat without experiencing intolerable anxiety. If, in a public garden, I merely passed by a piece of water, I suffered from spasms and a feeling of horror. I could not cross a garden in which many people were collected; if they looked at me, I immediately imagined they were speaking ill of me." It was during this state of suffering that he devoted himself with ardor to collecting and making use of materials for that work which was to give glory to his name.

St. Pierre asked Rousseau, in one of their frequent rambles, if, in delineating St. Preux, he had not intended to represent himself. "No," replied Rousseau; "St. Preux is not what I have been, but what I wished to be." St. Pierre would most likely have given the same answer, had a similar question been put to him with regard to the Colonel in "Paul and Virginia." This, at least, appears the sort of old age he loved to contemplate and wished to realize.

For six years he worked at his "Études," and with some difficulty found a publisher for them. M. Didot, a celebrated typographer, whose daughter St. Pierre afterward married, consented to print a manuscript which had been declined by many others. He was well rewarded for the undertaking. The success of the "Études de la Nature" surpassed the most sanguine expectation, even of the author. Four years after its publication St. Pierre gave to the world "Paul and Virginia," which had for some time been lying in his portfolio. He had tried its effect, in manuscript, on persons of different characters and pursuits. They had given it no applause, but all had shed tears at its perusal; and perhaps few works of a decidedly romantic character have ever been so generally read or so much approved. Among the great names whose admiration of it is on record, may be mentioned Napoleon and Humboldt.

He continued writing and publishing successfully, and in 1792, about thirteen days before the celebrated 10th of August, Louis XVI. appointed St. Pierre superintendent of the "Jardin des Plantes." Soon afterward the king, on seeing him, complimented him on his writings, and told him he was happy to have found a worthy successor to Buffon.

Although deficient in exact knowledge of the sciences, and knowing little of the world, St. Pierre was, by his simplicity and the retirement in which he lived, well suited at that epoch to the situation. About this time, and when in his fifty-seventh year, he married Mlle. Didot.

In 1795 he became a member of the French Academy. On the suppression of his place, he retired to Essonne. It is delightful to follow him there, and to contemplate his quiet existence. His days flowed on peaceably, occupied in the publication of "Les Harmonies de la Nature," the republication of his earlier works, and the composition of some lesser pieces. He enjoyed in his old age a degree of opulence which, as much as glory, had perhaps been the object of his ambition. In any case, it is gratifying to reflect that, after a life so full of chance and change, he was, in his latter years, surrounded by much that should accompany old age. His day of storms and tempests was closed by an evening of repose and beauty.

Amid many other blessings, the elasticity of his mind was preserved to the last. He died at Eragny sur l'Oise, on the 21st of January, 1814.

St. Pierre's merit as an author has been too long and too universally acknowledged to make it needful that it should be dwelt on here. A careful review of the circumstances of his career induces the belief that his writings grew (so to speak) out of his life. In his most imaginative passages, to whatever height his fancy soared, the starting-point seems ever from a fact. The past appears to have been always spread out before him when he wrote, like a beautiful landscape, on which his eye rested with complacency, and from which his mind transferred and idealized some objects without a servile imitation of any. When at Berlin he had had it in his power to marry Virginia Tanbenheim; and in Russia Mlle. de la Tour, the niece of General Dubosquet, would have accepted his hand. He was too poor to marry either. A grateful recollection caused him to bestow the names of the two on his most beloved creation. Paul was the name of a friar with whom he had associated in his childhood, and whose life he wished to imitate. How little had the owners of these names anticipated that they were to become the baptismal appellations of half a generation in France, and to be re-echoed through the world to the end of time!

THE AUTHOR'S PREFACE.

I HAVE attempted a great object in this little work. I have undertaken to describe a soil and vegetation differing from those of Europe. Long enough have our poets placed their lovers on the banks of streams, in meadows, and under the foliage of the beech. I have desired to locate mine on the shore of the sea, at the foot of cliffs, in the shade of cocoanut trees, bananas, and citrons in bloom. Nothing is needed in the other quarter of the globe but a Theocritus or a Virgil, that we may have scenes at least as interesting as those of our own land. I know that travellers of taste have given us enchanting descriptions of many isles of the South Sea; but the customs of their inhabitants, and particularly those of the Europeans who settle there, often mar the landscape. It has been my aim to unite the beauty of nature in the tropics with the moral beauty of a small domestic circle. I have also designed to bear testimony to a number of great truths, among others the following: that our happiness consists in living according to nature and virtue. Nevertheless, it has not been necessary for me to compose a romance in order to describe happy families. I can state with truth that those of which I am about to speak had an actual existence, and that this narrative is in most respects true. It was related to me as such by many inhabitants of the Isle of France. I have added nothing to it except certain unimportant circumstances, which, however, being within my own experience, are in this respect also real. When, some years since, I drew up a very imperfect sketch of this pastoral, I requested a fair dame, who moved in high life, and grave men who were far removed from it, to listen to the reading of this tale, that I might gain some previous idea of the way in which it might affect readers of such different character. I had the satisfaction of beholding them all shed tears. This was the only criticism I could draw from them, and, indeed, it was all I desired. But as great imperfection accompanies small talents, this success inspired me with the vanity of giving to my work the title of "A Picture of Nature." Happily, I recollected how little known to me was nature in the clime even where I was born; how, in the countries whose productions I had seen only as a traveller, nature is rich, varied, lovely, magnificent, and mysterious; and how much I was lacking in the perception, taste, and expression needful in understanding and describing her. Thus I returned to my senses. I have consequently included this feeble essay under the title and in the sequel of my "Studies of Nature"; in order that this title, recalling my incapacity, should be a perpetual reminder of the weakness to which I had yielded.

THE AUTHOR'S INTRODUCTION.

THIS little work is only an episode of my "Studies of Nature," and is the application of her laws to the happiness of two unfortunate families. It was published in 1786, and its reception at its birth surpassed my expectations: it gave rise to romances, idyls, and numerous dramatic pieces. Many mothers gave to their children the names of Paul and Virginia; finally, the reputation of this pastoral spread throughout Europe, and it was successively translated into English, Italian, German, Dutch, Polish, Russian, and Spanish. Doubtless for this unanimous success among nations so differing in opinion, I am indebted to the women, who, in every land, recall men by all means in their power to the laws of nature. They gave me a sufficient proof of this from the circumstance that the greater part of these translations were made by ladies, both married and single. I have been delighted, I confess, at seeing my adopted children rehabited in foreign garb by virgin or maternal hands, to which they are unquestionably beholden for a fame that seems destined to be transmitted to posterity.

Many individuals have questioned me regarding the subject of this work. They say to me, "Did the old man really relate this narrative to you? Have you seen the places which you describe? Did Virginia perish in such a melancholy manner? How can a maiden resolve to give up her life rather than disrobe herself?"

I have answered: "Man resembles a child. Give a rose to a child; at first he enjoys it, but soon he desires to analyze it. He examines the leaves, then he pulls them one from another; and when he at last comprehends the whole, he no longer has a rose. Telemachus, Clarissa, and so many other characters who lead us to virtue or cause us to weep, — are they real?"

At heart, I am convinced that these persons made the inquiries rather from sympathy than from curiosity. They were sorry that two such tender and happy lovers should meet with such a terrible end.

Would to God that I could have been at liberty to mark out for virtue an uninterrupted career of happiness on earth! But, I repeat it, I have described real places, customs (examples of which may, perhaps, still be found in some retired spots of the Isle of France or of the neighboring Isle of Bourbon), and an actual catastrophe for which I can produce unimpeachable witnesses, even in Paris.

One day, being at the Jardin du Roi, a lady of very prepossessing figure, accompanied by her husband, having learned from M. Jean Thonin, keeper of the garden, that I was the author of "Paul and Virginia," accosted me, in order to say to me: "Ah, sir, what a terrible night you have caused me to pass! I ceased not sighing and shedding tears. The person whose mournful fate you have described with so much truth, in the wreck of the Saint Géran, was a relation of mine. I am a Creole of Bourbon." Afterwards I learned from M. Jean Thonin that this lady was the wife of M. de Bonneud, first valet-de-chambre to Monsieur. Since then this lady has been perfectly willing that I should here publish her testimony to the truth of this catastrophe, concerning which she has related to me circumstances adapted to add much to the interest inspired by the death of this sublime victim to modesty, as well as by that of her unfortunate lover.

Other persons having intimated to me a desire that I should give a somewhat detailed account of the life of M. de la Bourdonnais, my relations with his family have placed me in a position to gratify them.

His chief virtue was humanity. The institutions which he founded at the Isle of France are proofs of this. In fact, I have seen at that island, where I served as royal engineer, not only the batteries and redoubts which he placed in suitable locations, but storehouses and hospitals very well organized. To him especially is owing an aqueduct more than three quarters of a league in length, by which he conducted the water of a small stream to Port Louis, where, before his day, there was no drinkable water. Whatever I saw in that island that was most useful and was best executed was done by him.

His military talents were not inferior to his virtues and his administrative ability. Appointed governor of the Isles of France and Bourbon, with nine vessels he beat the squadron of Admiral Peyton, who was cruising on the Coromandel coast with a far superior force. After this victory he immediately laid siege to Madras, being able to land a total force of only eighteen hundred men, whites as well as blacks. After capturing this emporium of English commerce in India, he returned to France. A division had arisen between him and M. Dupleix, governor of Pondicherry. Directly after arriving in his native land, he was accused of employing the spoils of his conquest for his own profit, and was, in consequence, thrown into the Bastile, without further investigation. The chief witness to this offence was a mere soldier. This man testified, under oath, that after the capture of Madras, being on guard on one of the bastions of the place, he saw some boats, at night, transporting some boxes and bales to the ship of M. de la Bourdonnais. This calumny was maintained at Paris by the support of a multitude of envious men who had never been to the Indies, but who were such as, in any country, are ever ready to ruin the glory of others. The unfortunate captor of Madras maintained that it was impossible to see the alleged transportation from the bastion mentioned by the soldier, even if it had occurred. But it was necessary to prove this; and, according to the tyranny then exercised towards prisoners of state, he had been deprived of every means of defence. But he obtained these by very simple methods, which will give an idea of the resources of his genius. He quickly made a knife-blade with a sou-piece, sharpened on the pavement, and cut with it boxwood twigs, which probably had been distributed to the prisoners at Easter. With these he made a compass and a pen. White handkerchiefs, dipped in rice water and dried in the sun, served him for paper. He made ink out of water and burnt straw. He needed, above all, colors to trace the plan and the map of the environs of Madras; yellow he procured from coffee, and green from coppers covered with verdigris, and boiled. I obtained all these details from his affectionate daughter, who still preserves with reverence these memorials of the genius which restored her father to liberty. Thus, furnished with knife, compass, rule, pen, paper, ink, and colors of his own invention, he drew, from memory, the plan of the place he had captured, wrote his defence, and demonstrated that his accuser was a perjured witness, who, from the bastion where he was stationed, could not have seen either the flag-ship or even the fleet. M. de la Bourdonnais secretly conveyed these means for his defence to the lawyer who served as his counsel; who, in turn, carried them to the judges. It was like a ray of light to them. In consequence, they bade him emerge from the Bastile, after three years of imprisonment. He languished three years longer after his liberation, overwhelmed with sorrow at seeing all his fortune dissipated, and at having reaped nothing from such important services, except calumny and persecution. He was, without doubt, more affected by the ingratitude of the government than by the triumphant jealousies of his enemies. They could never crush his open-heartedness and courage, even in prison. Amid the large number of accusers who came thither to depose against him, a director of the India Company thought to put an unanswerable question, by asking him how he could have conducted his own affairs so well, and the affairs of the company so badly. "It is," replied La Bourdonnais to him, "because I have managed my own affairs according to my own judgment, and those of the company according to their instructions."

Bernard-François Mahé de la Bourdonnais was born at St. Malo in 1699, and died in 1754, at about fifty-five years of age. O you who are occupied with benefiting mankind, look not for your recompense during lifetime! Posterity alone can render you justice.

This is what finally happened to the conqueror of Madras, and the founder of the colony of the Isle of France. Joseph Dupleix, the rival of his glory and fortune in India, and the most cruel of his persecutors, died a short time after him, having, by a just reaction of Providence, experienced a similar fate during the last years of his life. The government awarded the widow of M. de la Bourdonnais a pension of twenty-four hundred livres, and honored the memory of this illustrious man with its regrets; and at length, his worthy daughter now informs me, the inhabitants of the Isle of France, of their own accord, have granted her a pension, in memory of the benefits which they received from her father.

I trust that none of my readers will think it ill that I have permitted this slight digression from my subject, in order to render my homage to the virtues of a great and unfortunate man, as well as to those of his worthy daughter and of a grateful colony.

I am old; my voyage is already far advanced. But if Providence, which has guided my feeble bark in the midst of so many storms, delays my arrival at port, for some years longer, I shall employ them in the collection of other studies. The tardy blossoms of my spring yet promise some fruit for my autumn. If the rays of a tempestuous dawn gave bloom to the first, the fires of a peaceful sunset will ripen the last. I have delineated the transitory happiness of two children, reared in the bosom of nature by unfortunate mothers. I shall attempt to describe the lasting welfare of a people restored to her eternal laws by revolutions.

Let us derive hope from our past sorrows of bliss to come. It is only by revolutions that the Divine intelligence itself develops its plans, and carries them out from perfection to perfection.

Nature has not enclosed within the little acorn the sturdy oak covered by spreading foliage. She has only deposited there the fragile germ of its first elements. But she commands the waters of heaven and earth to nourish it, the rocks to receive its sunken roots in their sides, the tempests to strengthen these by their shocks, the sun to fertilize them, the seasons to clothe the gnarled branches one after the other with verdure, flowers, and fruit, and the years to strengthen the tree with new circles, to raise it above the forests, and to make it a lasting landmark for beasts and for man.

The same is the case with our globe; it did not spring from her hands such as we behold it now. Nature ordained the cycles to revolve it through the heavens, and to develop it during unknown periods. She then established it in a region of darkness and winter, buried in a vast ocean of glaciers, like a babe in the amnios of its mother's womb. Soon its centre and its poles were magnetized by diverse attractions, and by the sun which appeared in the east. Its waters, heated at that quarter of the equator, arose in the atmosphere in dense fogs, expanded by the heat; the winds conveyed them through the air, and the still frozen poles attracted and stationed them in new glacial oceans at the extremities of its axis, which they preserved in equilibrium by their variable counterbalance. The world having become lighter at length on its eastern side, the western side, still immovable with frost and more ponderous, was elevated towards the sun which attracted it. Then the globe, by balancing its poles, turned on itself within the circuit of the year around the luminary which had given it motion and life. Soon, on the surface of the fluid oceans, which had been half exhausted by the atmospheric and glacial seas which had flowed from them, appeared the granite peaks of the isles and continents, like the first bones of the world's frame.

Little by little the marine waters, impregnated with light and salt, reared around themselves their alluvia, and transformed them into vast beds of calcareous rock, as the atmospheric water is changed into wood in vegetation, and the sap of vegetation into the flesh and blood of animals. Thus the rocks were formed in the region of storms, — those bones and nerves of the earth to which vast groups of mountains would be joined like muscles, which would sustain the weight of the continents. Their cavernous foundations, still lacking firmness, on coming to the light were established by earthquakes, and by these appalling convulsions clouds of smoke rose to the surface of the sea and foretold the first volcanoes, whose fires were destined to purify it.

Other upheavals prepared other organizations. The globe overweighted at the poles by two unequal glacial oceans, presented them alternately towards the sun, and alternately vast currents proceeded from them, each of which, for six months, ploughed through both hemispheres. The northern stream clove the outline of that immense strait where the waters of the Atlantic are enclosed like a river, and flow, twice each day, between the Old and the New World. The current of the south, on the other hand, descending from a single glacier, situated in the bosom of the vast ocean of that hemisphere, and preserving an equilibrium with the great part of the opposite continents, washed their shores once each day with its diverging waves at the same time and from the same region that the sun covered the pole with its rays. The half-frozen torrents which rushed down, then divided the coasts of the Old World into numerous archipelagoes, vast bays, and long promontories.

The globe is a celestial bark, spherical, without either prow or stern, fitted, in every sense, to glide throughout the expanse of the heavens. The sun is its magnet and its heart; the ocean is the blood whose circulation gives it motion. The day-star causes the systole and diastole, the flux and reflux, by its presence and its absence, by day and night, by summer and winter, by the flowing seas and the glaciers. The poles change with the cycles, according to the varying weight of the glacial oceans. Time was when what is now in our meridian was at our equator; when our torrid zone was projected into our temperate and frigid zones, and these again into our torrid zone; when winter reigned over other lands, and when the frozen seas escaped from its empire by other channels. Such is the condition of all the planets. Their spheres, inclined towards the sun in different directions, are, in the hands of Providence, like those musical cylinders whose axes it is sufficient to elevate or depress a few degrees, in order entirely to change the character of their harmony.

Doubtless it was not until Nature had caused the globe to pass, if I may so express myself, through the successive periods of infancy, adolescence, and puberty, that she created in turn vegetation, animals, and men, as she causes a tree, after a certain period of years, to produce leaves, blossoms, and fruit. But it was in the epoch when the globe scarcely reared fragments of its continents above the surface of the sea, that the torrents of the frozen poles and of the loftiest mountains hollowed out in their descent the many amphitheatres which the sun would illumine with various aspects in the same latitudes. They excavated those deep and extensive valleys where, in our day, rove innumerable flocks. They sloped the aerial summits of the rocks which are the charm of our landscapes, whose beauty was enhanced by the atmospheric storms which wafted through the air the first seeds of the forests that grow on the inaccessible heights.

It was the ocean which, from age to age, exhausting its waters by innumerable productions, raised the summits of the primeval islands by lowering its own level, and, by causing its shores to retire, placed them in the bosom of continents. It is their primeval pyramids which, at various heights, surmount the mountain chains. Some are clothed with verdure; others are naked as on the day of their birth; others, perpetually encircled with snow and ice, resemble the poles; while others still belch forth thick whirlwinds of sulphurous, bituminous flames, and appear to have their foundations on a level with the seas which feed them. The peaks of Teneriffe and Etna blend this double empire, and from the wombs of frost and fire scatter afar abundance and fertility. All these aerial pyramids, the greater part of which tower above the middle region of the air, have for their bases the marine bodies which encircled their first cradle. All, at the present day, attract the vapors and storms of the atmosphere. Sometimes they are concealed as with a veil and disappear from view, or they uncover their brows or the blanks of their obelisks. If at that time the sun smites them with his rays, he colors them with gold and purple, and scatters over their floating robes the hues of the rainbow. They seem, in the bosom of the thunder-gust, like beneficent deities. The ridges which support them likewise become breasts which diffuse fertilizing rains in every direction, the profound caverns of their sides are the urns whence rivers are poured to enrich the country down to the shores of old ocean, their sire, and invite navigators to land on the shores of which they were a terror in their aboriginal days.

Every century decreases the empire of the boisterous ocean and increases that of the peaceful land. Look at our hills alone which surround our valleys; they bear on their salient outlines the prints of the alluvions made by the rivers which erewhile filled all the interval between them. Even the soil of the valleys with its horizontal strata, as also the fluvial fossil shells everywhere scattered through it, bear testimony that it was deposited by water. But cast your eyes over the most elevated regions of our hemisphere; ancient Scandinavia, once divided from Norway and the Continent by roaring straits which connected the Arctic Ocean with the Baltic, has ceased to be an island, I have myself trod the bed of their granite basins. The Baltic Sea, which I have sailed, falls an inch every forty years; similar sinkings may be observed in the waters of the southern hemisphere. New Holland, whose sloping mountains rise above the clouds, extends its sandy shores above the waves in our day; already in the bosom of her briny marshes she shows us flourishing colonies of Europeans, once the scourge of their country; in every sea, multitudes of growing islands and half-submerged rocks are elevating their black brows, crowned with sea-weed, kelp, and varec, above the weltering waves. By their brown and purple tints, their confused and hoarse murmurs, and the sheets of foam boiling around them, one might say that old Tritons were having a furious contest with young Nereids. The day will come when these rocks, the dread of mariners, will furnish shelter to shepherds; after many storms, the strait which separates England and France will be changed into fields. After interminable wars, the English and the French will see their interests united in like manner with their territory.

So will it be with the human race. God has destined it to enjoy his bounties the world over. He has made of it a small creation wherein are included all the desires and necessities of sensible beings. He has formed it like the individual man, whom he causes to pass through infancy surrounded by the night of ignorance and prejudice, but attracts his head with the light of reason, and his heart with the instincts of virtue, whereby he may govern his passions and be guided towards the divine faculties, even as the globe which he inhabits is conducted around the sun.

He ordained that as in the individual, so in nations, these celestial gifts should not be developed except by experience, either personal or derived from that of those similarly constituted. He even willed that the interests of the human race should be composed only in accordance with the interests of each individual. Thus, every people has had its imbecile infancy, its credulous childhood, and its uncurbed youth. Only read the histories of Europe; you will see it inhabited in turn by Gauls, Greeks, Romans, Cimbri, Goths, Visigoths, Vandals, Alans, Franks, Normans, &c., who one after the other exterminated each other and ravaged the land like waves of an invading sea. The history of every one of these people presents naught but an uninterrupted succession of wars, as if man only came into the world to destroy his fellow-creatures. These olden times, so vaunted on account of their innocence and heroic virtues, were nothing but periods of errors and crimes, of which, happily for us, the greater part no longer exist. Ridiculous idolatry, magic, lots, oracles, the worship of demons, human sacrifices, cannibalism, chronic warfare, conflagrations, famines, slavery, polygamy, incest, mutilation, the rights of robbing the shipwrecked, the rights of aubaine, &c., at that time desolated our unhappy lands, although in our day consigned to the inhospitable shores of Africa or the gloomy forests of America. So has it been also with many bodily diseases as common as those of the soul, such as innumerable pestilences, leprosy, witchcraft, or convulsions, &c. What shall be said of the religious fables which made crime illustrious, and hallowed absurd and criminal origins still revered in our day! What shall be said of heroes whom we are taught to admire at school, who were at heart nothing but rogues; the ferocious Achilles, the perfidious Ulysses, Agamemnon the parricide, the entire family of Atreus, and so many other violators of law, who claimed a pretended descent from gods and goddesses that were certainly transformed into brutes! It seems as if the moral as well as the physical world moved on other poles in former times. Nevertheless, benefactors of the human race arose during the lapse of ages. Hercules, Æsculapius, Orpheus, Linus, Confucius, Lockman, Lycurgus, Solon, Pythagoras, Socrates, Plato, &c., civilized the barbarian hordes by slow degrees. They committed to them the elements of concord, law, industry, and a more humane worship. They loom up in the past ages above their native races like inexhaustible sources of wisdom, light, and virtue, which from generation to generation have flowed even to our time, like streams descended from the aerial summits of distant mountains, which, during the centuries, have traversed rocks, marshes, and sands, to reach and fertilize our valleys and plains.

Already in the same lands where men were burned by the Druids they are now summoned by philosophers to be enlightened by the torch of reason. The muses of the North and the West, and especially the French muses, hover over Europe and harmonize their lyres, and blending with these their mellow voices enchain the souls of the inhabitants by their concert. It is they who in America have shattered the bonds of the dark children of Africa and cleared her forests by the hands of the free. From thence have been exported a multitude of luxuries, while cultivation and useful flocks, new plants, more humane inhabitants, and evangelical legislation have been imported from Europe. O virtuous Penn, divine Fénelon, eloquent Jean Jacques, your names, one day, shall be more revered than those of Lycurgus and Plato! Superstition no longer raises, with us, as in former time, temples to God on account of the dread of demons; philosophy has dispersed them. It displays the earth clothed with the bounties of the Deity, and the heavens clustered with his suns. What useful discoveries, what daring inventions, what humane institutions, unknown to antiquity, do we now possess! It is the virtues of great men which have caused the torch of truth to come down from heaven to earth; alas! often persecuted and fugitive, these virtues have not illuminated the earth until after long convulsions and numerous revolutions.

But the women have contributed more than the philosophers towards forming and reforming the nations. They have not grown pale, by night, composing long moral treatises, nor have they ascended the tribunes to thunder forth the laws. It was in their arms that they have taught men to relish the bliss of being, by turn in the round of life, happy infants, faithful lovers, constant husbands, and virtuous fathers. They laid the foundations of the first natural laws. The first founder of a human society was the mother of a family. In vain did a lawgiver, book in hand, declare, as from heaven, that nature is hateful even to her Author; they appeared with their charms, and the fanatic fell at their feet.

It was originally around them that roving man collected and settled. The geographers and historians have not divided them into castes and tribes. They have not made of them monarchical or democratic sections. Men are born Asiatics, Europeans, Frenchmen, Englishmen; they are agriculturists, traders, soldiers, but in every land women are born and live and die as women alone. They have duties, occupations, destinies, apart from the men, among whom they are distributed in order to remind them, above all, of their manhood, and to maintain, notwithstanding political laws, the fundamental laws of nature, like those winds that are adapted to the rays of the sun and to its absence, and vary the temperature of the countries which they enrich by heating or cooling it with their breath. They cannot be circumscribed within any chart, nor do they render allegiance to any sovereign. These winds belong only to the atmosphere. Thus woman belongs only to the human race. They constantly recall it to humanity by their natural feelings and even by their passions.

It is by this influence that they often preserve a people from its origin to its ultimate remnants. Behold those races which no longer maintain either altar, throne, or capital, such as the Guebres, Armenians, Jews, and Moors of Africa; they are tossed by ages and events from country to country; but their women still unite their individual members one to another by the manifold attractions of daughter, sister, spouse, and mother. They preserve their unity then by the same institutions which collected them. These wandering hordes resemble the ancient monuments of their empires, which lie overthrown, notwithstanding the iron clamps which bound them to their base. In vain do the waves of ocean beat the granite blocks; not a stone comes apart, so firm is the natural cement which caused its various atoms to cohere in the quarry.

But women not only unite men to each other by the ties of nature, but still more by social bonds. Filled with the most tender affections for them, they, by these, bring them into union with the Divinity, which is the source of these feelings. They are the first and the last apostles of every religious worship, with which they inspire men from earliest infancy. They adorn their whole career. Men are indebted to them for the invention of the first necessary arts, and for all that are æsthetic. Women invented bread, the pleasing drinks, clothing fabrics, spinning, cloths, &c. They first led to their feet the domestic animals, already timid because affrighted by masculine weapons, and tamed them by kindness. For the delight of man they composed blithesome songs and innocent dances; and by turn suggested poetry, painting, sculpture, and architecture to those who desired to perpetuate woman by precious memorials. Then men learned to blend with their passions heroism and compassion. Thus far, in the midst of their cruel and endless warfare, men had only imagined dread-inspiring gods; a Jove hurling thunderbolts, a scowling Pluto, an ever-raging Neptune, a sanguinary Mars, a thieving Mercury, a Bacchus never sober; but at the sight of their women, chaste, mild, affectionate, and industrious, they conceived the idea of benevolent deities in heaven. Filled with gratitude towards the partners of their lives, men reared to them monuments more numerous and lasting than temples. Then, in all languages, they gave feminine names to whatever was most cherished and delightful on earth; to their respective countries, to the greater part of the rivers which irrigated them, to the most fragrant flowers, the most delicious fruits, and the most melodious birds.

But whatever in nature seemed to men to merit the most universal homage on account of superior beauty or utility received from them the appellations of goddesses; that is to say, of immortal women whose abode was in heaven, while their sway was on earth. Thus men represented the moon and stars, the night and morning, as female deities. The springs were thus awarded to Naiads, the azure waves of the sea to Nereids, the pastures to Pales, the forests to Dryads. Still larger provinces were given to goddesses of a higher rank: the atmosphere, with its majestic clouds, was presided over by Juno; the placid sea by Tethys; the earth and its mineral wealth, by Cybele; the deer by Diana; and the harvests by Ceres. The powers of the soul, the source of all pleasures, were personified in the same manner as those of nature. Men made of the virtues goddesses to strengthen them, graces to render them impressible, muses who inspired them, and wisdom, mother of all enterprise. Finally, men bestowed on the goddess who united in herself all the charms of womanhood the name of Venus, doubtless more expressive than that of any other deity. Her father was Saturn, or Time; her cradle was the ocean; the companions of her youth were frolics, laughter, and graces; her husband was the god of fire; her child was love, and her dominion was over all nature.

In fact every pleasing object has its beauty, that is to say, a portion of the ineffable beauty which begets love. Without question the most touching is sensibility, that spirit of the soul which animates all the faculties. By this it was that Venus subdued the invincible god of war.

O women, it is by your tenderness that you enchain the ambitions of men! Wherever you have enjoyed your natural rights you have abolished barbarous education, slavery, tortures, mutilations, the cross, the wheel, the scaffold, stoning, death by piecemeal, and all the cruel modes of execution of antiquity, which were much less the punishments decreed by justice than the vengeance of political vindictiveness. Everywhere you have been the first to honor the victims of tyranny with your tears, and to bring remorse on the tyrant. Your natural compassion has given you at the same time the instinct of perceiving innocence and comprehending genuine greatness. It is you who by your memories preserve and adorn the renown of magnanimous victors whose generous virtues have protected the feeble, especially those of your sex. Such were Cyrus, Alexander, and Charlemagne; without you they would be no more worthy our remembrance than Tamerlane, Bajazet, or Attila. But the blood of the nations subjugated by the former raises its dun clouds in vain around their colossal proportions; for by the memory of their good deeds you surround them with rays of gratitude which cause them to shine above our horizon with all the splendors of virtue.

You are the flowers of life. It is in your bosom that nature pours the generations, and the first affections which cause them to blow. You civilize the human race, and bring its peoples nearer to each other by marriage than is possible by diplomacy or treaties. You are the souls of their labor and commerce. It is in order to procure new pleasures for you that the maritime powers go to the Indies in search of the most choice and pleasing productions of the soil and the sun. Pliny states that already in his time this traffic was chiefly carried on for your sakes. You form a vast system all the world over whose sons communicate with each other in the past, the present, and the future, and mutually assist each other. With flowers you enchain this globe, for whose empire the cruel passions of men are at strife.

O women of France! it is for you that to-day the daughter of India imparts transparence to cotton stuffs and gloss to silken tissues. It is for you that the maidens of Athens devise those convenient and charming robes, so conducive to modesty and beauty that the wise Fénelon himself considered them preferable to all the gaudy and troublesome costumes of his age. Fashion has again clad you in the former, and they have added to your natural graces. Mothers and nurses of our infancy, what a power your charms add to your virtues! You are the arbiters of our opinions and of our moral system. You have improved our tastes, manners, and habits, by simplifying them. You are the native judges of whatever is modest, pleasing, good, just, and heroic. You spread the influence of your correct judgment throughout Europe, of which you have established the focus at Paris. Within its walls our soldiers are inspired with devotion in their country's defence, either in your presence or by holding you in memory, and within the same walls also, foreign warriors, who have borne unhappy arms against them, flock in crowds, during the too brief intervals of peace, to forget their resentments at your feet.

Our language owes its perspicuity, purity, elegance, and softness, and whatever it possesses that is pleasing and artless, to you. You have formed and inspired our greatest poets and most celebrated orators. In your circles you give patronage to the solitary writer who has had the happiness to please you and the misfortune of irritating jealous factions. Before your modest glances, at the soft tones of your voice, the impudent quibbler is disturbed, the fanatic realizes that he is human, and the atheist becomes conscious that there is a God. Your moving tears quench the torch of superstition, and your celestial smiles dissipate the cold arguments of materialism.

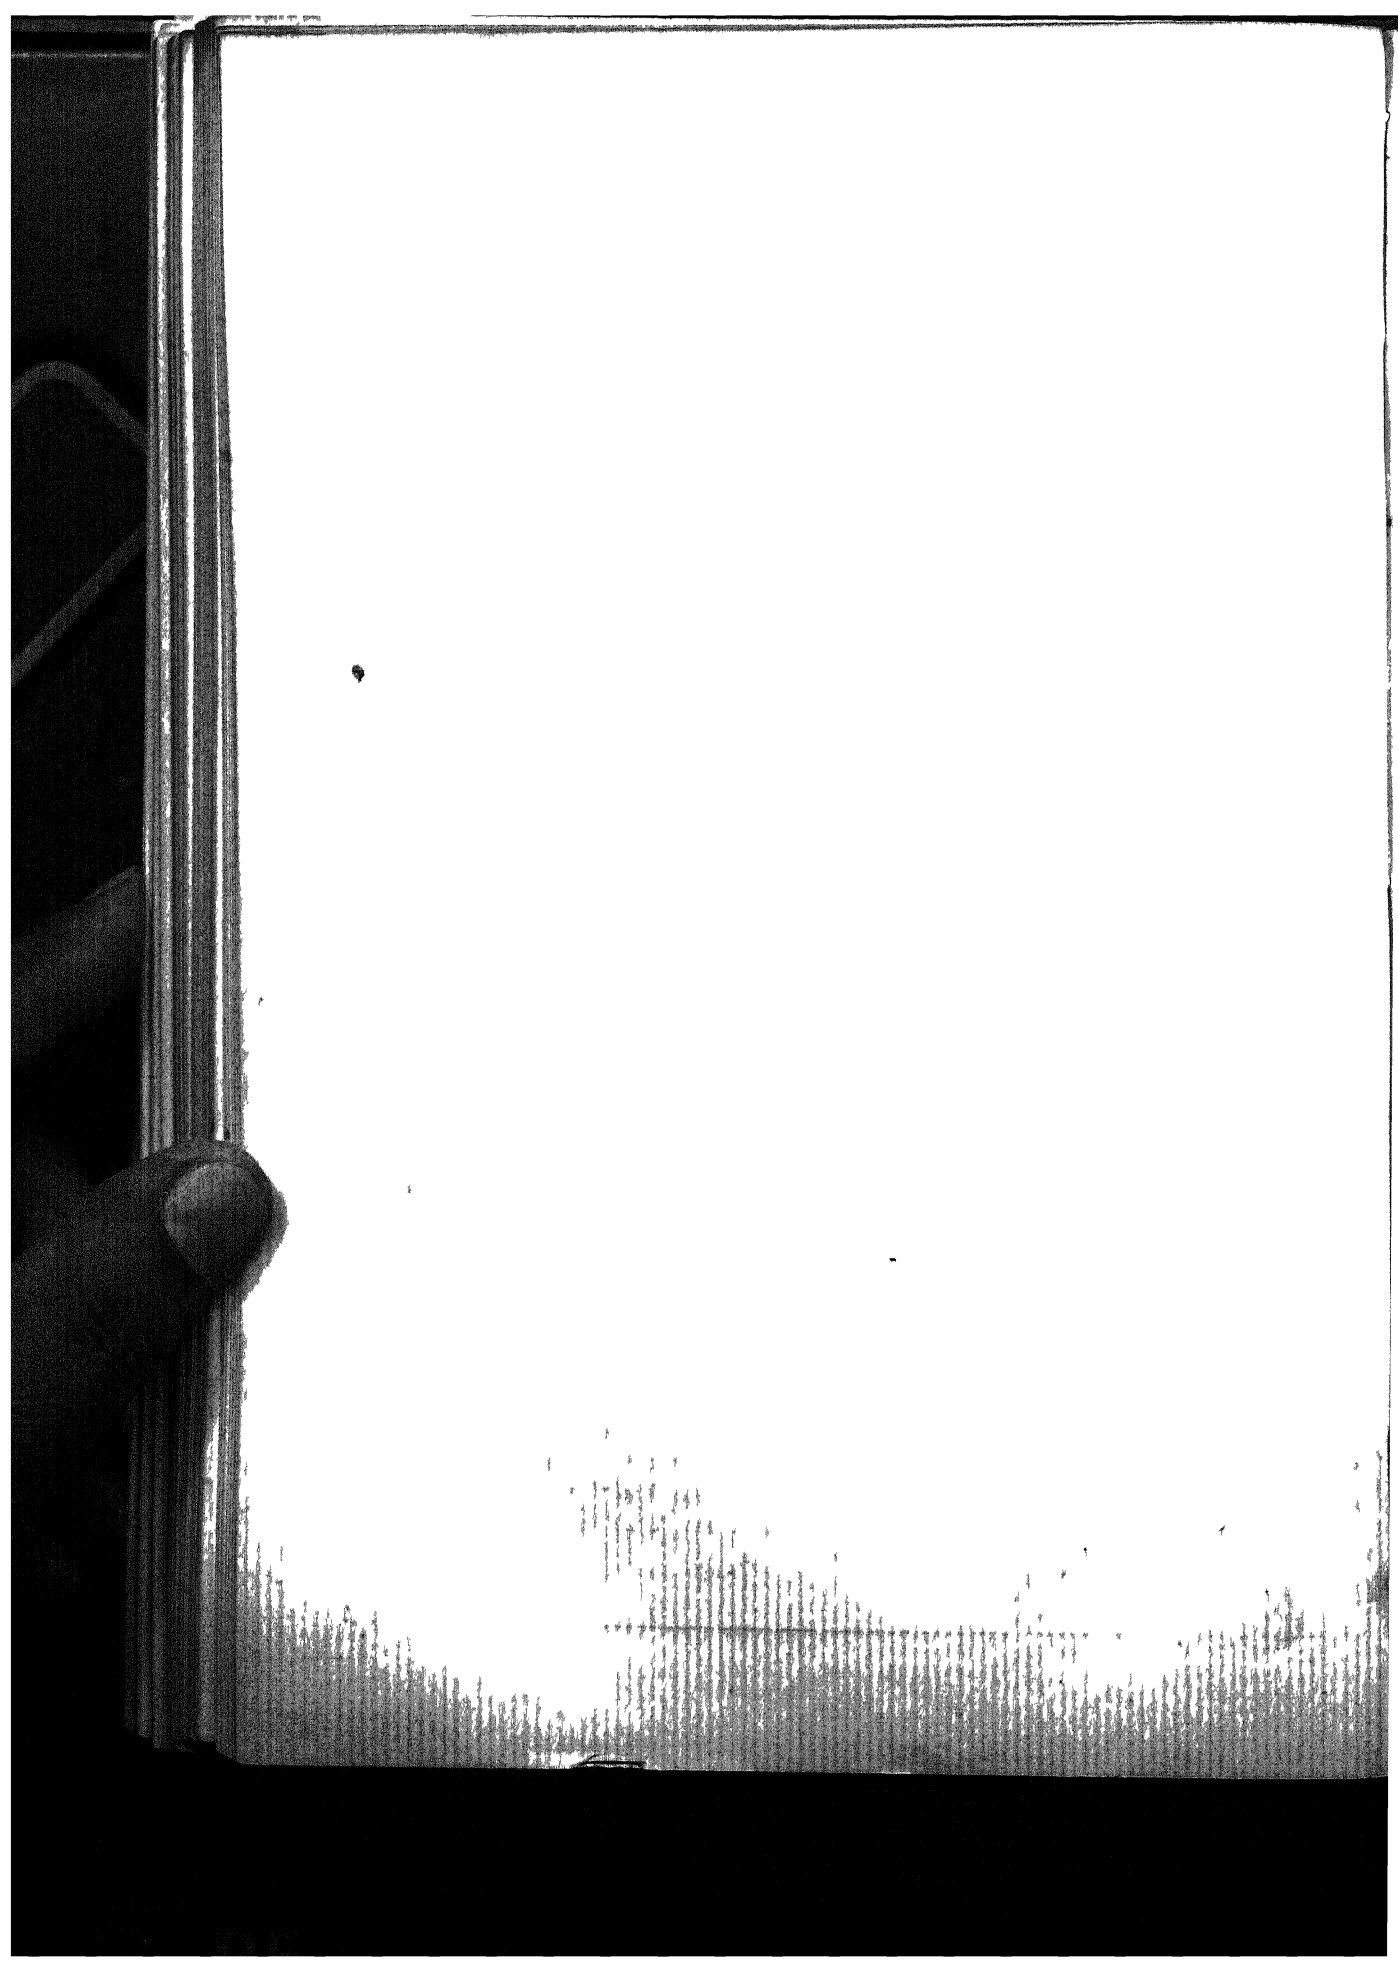
Thus, on the island shores, after the long winter, the queen of the Arctic seas, Mount Hecla, crowned with volcanic peaks, belches forth clouds of flames and smoke through the glacial pyramids which seem to threaten the skies; but when the globe, in the sign of the Gemini, begins to incline the north pole towards the sun, the airs of spring, which are born under the influence of the day-star, blend their tepid breath with his ardent rays. Then the sides of the mountain are heated; a subterranean warmth is diffused through the cupola of ice which caps it, and soon withdraws from it all support. Then these proud peaks are hurled into the seething craters, extinguish their fires, percolate through subterranean channels, and gush through the mountain's base in lofty columns of black boiling water. Its hollow foundations cave in on their supports, slide and plunge — enormous masses of rock — into the depths of ocean which they had threatened to invade. The appalling sound of their fall, the dull murmur of their torrents, the growling of the seals and white bears which inhabit them, are repeated from afar by the echoes of Horillax and Waigatz. The people dwelling on the Atlantic coasts look with dread on the fearful bergs which glide, overturned, along the shore. Driven by currents, in the grotesque shapes of temples and castles, these continue onward to cool the seas of the torrid zone, and to found rocks in the tepid waters which the next winter will never behold again.

Nevertheless, the mountain appears naked and hideous through the fogs of its melted snows and the smoke of its craters, the degraded slopes displaying its ancient bones. Then it is that the zephyrs, which spoiled it of its wintry mantle, also robe it anew in the garb of spring. They rush trooping from the temperate zones, bearing on their pinions the winged seeds of plants. They carpet its torn sides and deep gorges with mosses, grasses, and flowers. Land and aquatic fowls build their nests there. In a few years vast groves of cedars and birches spring from its extinguished craters. A renewed youth permeates it with all the genial influences of the sunlight during a day lasting for many months.

The mountain's beauty is even enhanced by the splendor of the long polar nights. When Winter, under cover of their shades, raises his throne there, spreads over it his ermine mantle and prepares new changes for the ocean, the moon wheels above and gives the mountain a portion of the rays of the sun which has forsaken it. The Aurora Borealis crowns it with flitting flames, and waves its luminous banners around it. At this celestial signal the reindeer seek milder climes; athwart the gleam of its wavering splendors they perceive Hecla surrounded by seas bristling with icebergs, and, bellowing, search out new pastures in its profound valleys. Thousands of swans circle around its summit in long spiral procession, and, rejoicing to descend upon this hospitable region, give vent in that upper air to cries unknown in our climes. The daughters of Ossian, listening, cease from their nightly hunt to repeat harmonious strains on their lyres, and soon new Pauls come to seek among them for new Virginias.



PAUL AND VIRGINIA.

ON the eastern coast of the mountain which rises above Port Louis in the Mauritius, upon a piece of land bearing the marks of former cultivation, are seen the ruins of two small cottages. Those ruins are situated near the centre of a valley, formed by immense rocks, and which opens only toward the north. On the left rises the mountain, called the Height of Discovery, whence the eye marks the distant sail when it first touches the verge of the horizon, and whence the signal is given when a vessel approaches the island. At the foot of this mountain stands the town of Port Louis. On the right is formed the road which stretches from Port Louis to the Shaddock Grove, where the church, bearing that name, lifts its head, surrounded by its avenues of bamboo, in the midst of a spacious plain; and the prospect terminates in a forest extending to the farthest bounds of the island. The front view presents the bay, denominated the Bay of the Tomb; a little on the right is seen the Cape of Misfortune; and beyond rolls the expanded ocean, on the surface of which appear a few uninhabited islands, and, among others, the Point of Endeavor, which resembles a bastion built upon the flood.

At the entrance of the valley which presents those various objects, the echoes of the mountain incessantly repeat the hollow murmurs of the winds that shake the neighboring forests, and the tumultuous dashing of the waves which break at a distance upon the cliffs; but near the ruined cottages all is calm and still, and the only objects which there meet the eye are rude, steep rocks that rise like a surrounding rampart. Large clumps of trees grow at their base, on their rifted sides, and even on their majestic tops, where the clouds seem to repose. The showers which their bold points attract often paint the vivid colors of the rainbow on their green and brown declivities, and swell the sources of the little river which flows at their feet, called the river of Fan-Palms.

Within this enclosure reigns the most profound silence. The waters, the air, all the elements are at peace. Scarcely does the echo repeat the whispers of the palm-trees spreading their broad leaves, the long points of which are gently agitated by the winds. A soft light illumines the bottom of this deep valley, on which the sun shines only at noon. But even at break of day the rays of light are thrown on the surrounding rocks; and their sharp peaks, rising above the shadows of the mountain, appear like tints of gold and purple gleaming upon the azure sky.

To this scene I loved to resort, where I could enjoy at once the richness of an unbounded landscape and the charm of uninterrupted solitude. One day, when I was seated at the foot of the cottages and contemplating their ruins, a man, advanced in years, passed near the spot. He was dressed in the ancient garb of the island, his feet were bare, and he leaned upon a staff of ebony: his hair was white, and the expression of his countenance was dignified and interesting. I bowed to him with respect; he returned the salutation, and, after looking at me with some earnestness, came and placed himself upon the hillock where I was seated. Encouraged by this mark of confidence, I thus addressed him: — cottages once belonged?" "My son," replied the old man, "those heaps of rubbish and that untilled land were, twenty years ago, the property of two families who then found happiness in this solitude. Their history is affecting; but what European, pursuing his way to the Indies, will pause one moment to interest himself in the fate of a few obscure individuals? What European can picture happiness to his imagination amidst poverty and neglect? The curiosity of mankind is only attracted by the history of the great, and yet from that knowledge little use can be derived." "Father," I rejoined, "from your manners and your observations I perceive that you have acquired much experience of human life. If you have leisure, relate to me, I beseech you, the history of the ancient inhabitants of this desert; and be assured that even the men who are most perverted by the prejudices of the world find a soothing pleasure in contemplating that happiness which belongs to simplicity and virtue." The old man, after a short silence, during which he leaned his face upon his hands, as if he were trying to recall the images of the past, thus began his narration:—

Monsieur de la Tour, a young man who was a native of Normandy, after having in vain solicited a commission in the French army, or some support from his own family, at length determined to seek his fortune in this island, where he arrived in 1726. He brought hither a young woman whom he loved tenderly, and by whom he was no less tenderly beloved. She belonged to a rich and ancient family of the same province; but he had married her without fortune, and in opposition to the will of her relations, who refused their consent because he was found guilty of being descended from parents who had no claims to nobility. Monsieur de la Tour, leaving his wife at Port Louis, embarked for Madagascar, in order to purchase a few slaves to assist him in forming a plantation in this island. He landed at Madagascar during that unhealthy season which commences about the middle of October, and soon after his arrival died of the pestilential fever, which prevails there six months of the year, and which will forever baffle the attempts of the European nations to form establishments on that fatal soil. His effects were seized upon by the rapacity of strangers, as so often happens to those who die away from their home, and his wife, who was pregnant, found herself a widow in a country where she had neither credit nor recommendation, and no earthly possession, or rather support, but one negro woman. Too delicate to solicit protection or relief from any man after the death of him whom alone she loved, misfortune armed her with courage, and she resolved to cultivate with her slave a little spot of ground, and procure for herself the means of subsistence.

In an island almost a desert, and where the ground was left to the choice of the settler, she avoided those spots which were most fertile and most favorable to commerce, and seeking some nook of the mountain, some secret asylum, where she might live solitary and unknown, she bent her way from the town toward these rocks, where she wished to shelter herself as in a nest. All sensitive and suffering creatures, from a sort of common instinct, fly for refuge amid their pains to haunts the most wild and desolate; as if rocks could form a rampart against misfortune, — as if the calm of Nature could hush the tumults of the soul. That Providence which lends its support when we ask but the supply of our necessary wants had a blessing in reserve for Madame de la Tour, which neither riches nor greatness can purchase; this blessing was a friend.

The spot to which Madame de la Tour fled had already been inhabited a year by a young woman of a lively, good-natured, and affectionate disposition. Margaret (for that was her name) was born in Brittany, of a family of peasants, by whom she was cherished and beloved, and with whom she might have passed life in simple rustic happiness, if, misled by the weakness of a tender heart, she had not listened to the passion of a gentleman in the neighborhood who promised her marriage. He soon abandoned her, and, adding inhumanity to seduction, refused to insure a provision for the child of which she was pregnant. Margaret then determined to leave forever her native village, and go, where her fault might be concealed, to some colony distant from that country where she had lost the only portion of a poor peasant girl, — her reputation. With some borrowed money she purchased an old negro slave, with whom she cultivated a little corner of this canton. Here Madame de la Tour, followed by her negro woman, found Margaret suckling her child. Soothed by the sight of a person in a situation somewhat similar to her own, Madame de la Tour related, in a few words, her past condition and her present wants. Margaret was deeply affected by the recital; and, more anxious to merit confidence than esteem, she confessed, without disguise, the errors of which she had been guilty. "As for me," said she, "I deserve my fate; but you, madame — you! at once virtuous and unhappy," — and, sobbing, she offered Madame de la Tour both her hut and her friendship. That lady, affected by this tender reception, pressed her in her arms, and exclaimed, "Ah, surely Heaven will put an end to my misfortunes, since it inspires you, to whom I am a stranger, with more goodness toward me than I have ever experienced from my own relations!"

I knew Margaret; and, although my habitation is a league and a half from hence, in the woods behind that sloping mountain, I considered myself as her neighbor. In the cities of Europe a street, even a simple wall, frequently prevents members of the same family from meeting for whole years; but in new colonies we consider those persons as neighbors from whom we are divided only by woods and mountains; and above all, at that period when this island had little intercourse with the Indies, neighborhood alone gave a claim to friendship, and hospitality toward strangers seemed less a duty than a pleasure. No sooner was I informed that Margaret had found a companion, than I hastened to her, in hope of being useful to my neighbor and her guest.

I found in Madame de la Tour a person interesting in appearance, showing at once dignity and dejection. She appeared to be in the last stage of her pregnancy. I told them that, for the future interests of their children, and to prevent the intrusion of any other settler, it would be well for them to divide the property of this wild sequestered valley, which is nearly twenty acres in extent. They confided that task to me, and I marked out two equal portions of land. One included the higher part of this enclosure, from the peak of that rock buried in clouds, whence springs the river of Fan-Palms, to that precipitous cleft which you see on the summit of the mountain, and which is called the Cannon's Mouth, from the resemblance in its form. It is difficult to find a path along this wild portion of enclosure, the soil of which is encumbered with fragments of rock, or worn into channels formed by torrents; yet it produces noble trees and innumerable springs and rivulets. The other portion of land comprised the plain extending along the banks of the river of Fan-Palms to the opening where we are now seated, whence the river takes its course between those two hills, until it falls into the sea. You may still trace the vestiges of some meadow-land; and this part of the common is less rugged, but not more valuable, than the other, since in the rainy season it becomes marshy, and in dry weather is so hard and unbending that it will yield only to the stroke of the hatchet. When I had thus divided the property, I persuaded my neighbors to draw lots for their respective possessions. The higher portion of land became the property of Madame de la Tour; the lower, of Margaret; and each seemed satisfied with her share. They entreated me to place their habitations together, that they might at all times enjoy the soothing intercourse of friendship and the consolation of mutual kind offices. Margaret's cottage was situated near the centre of the valley, and just on the boundary of her own plantation. Close to that spot I built another cottage for the dwelling of Madame de la Tour; and thus the two friends, while they possessed all the advantages of neighborhood, lived on their own property. I myself cut palisades from the mountain, and brought leaves of fan-palms from the seashore, in order to construct those two cottages, of which you can now discern neither the entrance nor the roof. Yet, alas! there still remain but too many traces for my remembrance! Time, which so rapidly destroys the proud monuments of empires, seems in this desert to spare those of friendship, as if to perpetuate my regrets to the last hour of my existence.

Scarcely was the second of these cottages finished, when Madame de la Tour was delivered of a girl. I had been the godfather of Margaret's child, who was christened by the name of Paul. Madame de la Tour desired me to perform the same office for her child also, together with her friend, who gave her the name of Virginia. "She will be virtuous," cried Margaret, "and she will be happy. I have only known misfortune by wandering from virtue."

At the time Madame de la Tour recovered, these two little territories had already begun to yield some produce, perhaps in a small degree owing to the care which I occasionally bestowed on their improvement, but far more to the indefatigable labors of the two slaves. Margaret's slave, who was called Domingo, was still healthy and robust, although advanced in years; he possessed some knowledge and a good natural understanding. He cultivated indiscriminately, on both settlements, such spots of ground as seemed to him most fertile, and sowed whatever grain he thought most congenial to each particular soil. Where the ground was poor he strewed maize; where it was most fruitful he planted wheat; and rice in such spots as were marshy. He threw the seeds of gourds and cucumbers at the foot of the rocks, which they loved to climb and decorate with their luxuriant foliage. In dry spots he cultivated the sweet potato; the cotton-tree flourished upon the heights, and the sugar-cane grew in the clayey soil. He reared some plants of coffee on the hills, where the grain, although small, is excellent. His plantain-trees, which spread their grateful shade on the banks of the river and encircled the cottage, yielded fruit throughout the year. And, lastly, Domingo cultivated a few plants of tobacco, to charm away his own cares. Sometimes he was employed in cutting wood for firing from the mountain, sometimes in hewing pieces of rock within the enclosure, in order to level the paths. He performed all these labors with intelligence and activity because he worked with zeal. He was much attached to Margaret, and not less to Madame de la Tour, whose negro woman, Mary, he had married at the time of Virginia's birth; and he was passionately fond of his wife. Mary was born at Madagascar, from whence she had brought a few arts of industry. She could weave baskets, and a sort of stuff, with long grass that grows in the woods. She was active, cleanly, and, above all, faithful. It was her care to prepare their meals, to rear the poultry, and go sometimes to Port Louis and sell the superfluous produce of these little plantations, which was not very considerable. If you add two goats, who were brought up with the children, and a great dog, who kept watch at night, you will have a complete idea of the household, as well as of the revenue, of these two little farms.

Madame de la Tour and her friend were employed from morning till evening in spinning cotton for the use of their families. Destitute of all those things which their own industry could not supply, at home they went barefoot; shoes were a convenience reserved for Sunday, when, at an early hour, they attended mass at the church of the Shaddock Grove, which you see yonder. The church was farther away than Port Louis; yet they seldom visited the town, lest they should be treated with contempt because they were dressed in the coarse blue linen of Bengal, which is usually worn by slaves. After all, is the world's esteem worth as much as domestic happiness? If they had something to suffer when away, they re-entered their homes with all the more pleasure. No sooner did Mary and Domingo perceive them from this height, on the road of the Shaddock Grove, than they flew to the foot of the mountain, in order to help them to ascend. They discerned in the looks of their domestics the joy which their return excited. They found in their retreat neatness, independence, all the blessings which are the recompense of toil, and they received those services which spring from affection. United by the ties of similar wants and the sympathy of similar misfortunes, they gave each other the tender names of companion, friend, sister. They had but one will, one interest, one table. All their possessions were in common. And if sometimes a passion more ardent than friendship awakened in their hearts the pang of unavailing anguish, a pure religion, united with chaste manners, drew their affections toward another life: as the trembling flame rises toward heaven, when it no longer finds any aliment on earth.

The tender and sacred duties which Nature imposed became a source of additional happiness to those affectionate mothers, whose mutual friendship acquired new strength at the sight of their children, alike the offspring of unhappy love. They delighted in washing their infants together in the same bath, putting them to rest in the same cradle, and sometimes they nursed one another's babes. "My friend," cried Madame de la Tour, "we shall each of us have two children, and each of our children will have two mothers." As two buds which remain on two trees of the same kind, after the tempest has broken all their branches, produce more delicious fruit if each, separated from the maternal stem, be grafted on the neighboring tree, so those two children, deprived of all other relations, imbibed sentiments more tender than those of son and daughter, brother and sister, when thus exchanged at the breast of those who had given them birth.

While they were yet in their cradles, their mothers talked of their marriage; and this prospect of conjugal felicity with which they soothed their own cares often called forth the tears of bitter regret: one mother recalling how her troubles had arisen from having neglected marriage, the other how hers had sprung from having submitted to its laws; one had been made unhappy by attempting to raise herself above her condition, the other by descending from her rank. But they found consolation in reflecting that their more fortunate children, far from the cruel prejudices of Europe, would enjoy at once the pleasures of love and the blessings of equality.

Nothing could exceed the attachment which these infants already displayed for each other. If Paul complained, his mother pointed to Virginia, and at that sight he smiled and was appeased. If any accident befell Virginia, the cries of Paul gave notice of the disaster, and then the dear child would suppress her complaints when she found that Paul was unhappy. When I came hither, I usually found them quite naked, as is the custom of this country, tottering in their walk, and holding each other by the hands and under the arms, as we represent the constellation of the Twins. At night these infants often refused to be separated, and were found lying in the same cradle, their cheeks, their bosoms, pressed close together, their hands thrown round each other's neck, and sleeping locked in one another's arms.

When they began to speak, the first names they learned to give each other were those of brother and sister, and childhood knows no softer appellation. Their education served to increase their early friendship, by directing it to the supply of each other's wants. In a short time, all that regarded the household economy, the care of preparing the rural repasts, became the task of Virginia, whose labors were always crowned with the praises and kisses of her brother. As for Paul, always in motion, he dug the garden with Domingo, or followed him with a little hatchet into the woods; and if in his rambles he espied a beautiful flower, fine fruit, or a nest of birds, even at the top of a tree, he would climb up, and bring it home to his sister.

When you met one of these children, you might be sure the other was not far off. One day, as I was coming down that mountain, I saw Virginia at the end of the garden, running toward the house, with her petticoat thrown over her head in order to screen herself from a shower of rain. At a distance I thought she was alone; but as I hastened toward her, in order to help her on, I perceived that she held Paul by the arm, almost entirely enveloped in the same canopy, and both were laughing heartily at being sheltered together under an umbrella of their own invention. Those two charming faces placed within the swelling petticoat recalled to my mind the children of Leda enclosed within the same shell.

Their sole study was how to please and assist each other; for of all other things they were ignorant, and knew neither how to read nor write. They were never disturbed by inquiries about past times, nor did their curiosity extend beyond the bounds of their mountain. They believed the world ended at the shores of their own island, and all their ideas and affections were confined within its limits. Their mutual tenderness, and that of their mothers, employed all the activity of their souls. Their tears had never been called forth by tedious application to useless sciences. Their minds had never been wearied by lessons of morality, superfluous to bosoms unconscious of ill. They had never been taught not to steal, because everything with them was in common; or not to be intemperate, because their simple food was left to their own discretion; or not to lie, because they had no truth to conceal.

Their young imaginations had never been terrified by the idea that God has punishments in store for ungrateful children, since with them filial affection arose naturally from maternal fondness. All they had been taught of religion was to love it; and if they did not offer up long prayers in the church, wherever they were, in the house, in the fields, in the woods, they raised toward heaven their innocent hands and their hearts purified by virtuous affections.

Thus passed their early childhood, like a beautiful dawn, the prelude of a bright day. Already they partook with their mothers the cares of the household. As soon as the crow of the cock announced the first beam of the morning, Virginia arose, and hastened to draw water from a neighboring spring; then returning to the house, she prepared the breakfast. When the rising sun lighted up the points of the rocks which overhang this enclosure, Margaret and her child went to the dwelling of Madame de la Tour, and offered up together their morning prayer. This sacrifice of thanksgiving always preceded their first repast, of which they often partook before the door of the cottage seated upon the grass, under a canopy of plantain; and while the branches of that delightful tree afforded a grateful shade, its solid fruit furnished food ready prepared by Nature; and its long glossy leaves, spread upon the table, supplied the want of linen.

Plentiful and wholesome nourishment gave early growth and vigor to the persons of these children, and their countenances expressed the purity and the peace of their souls. At twelve years of age the figure of Virginia was in some degree formed: a profusion of light hair shaded her face, to which her blue eyes and coral lips gave the most charming brilliancy. Her eyes sparkled with vivacity when she spoke; but when she was silent, her look had a cast upward, which gave it an expression of extreme sensibility, or rather of tender melancholy. Already the figure of Paul displayed the graces of manly beauty. He was taller than Virginia; his skin was of a darker tint; his nose more aquiline; and his black eyes would have been too piercing, if the long eyelashes, by which they were shaded, had not given them a look of softness. He was constantly in motion, except when his sister appeared, and then, placed at her side, he became quiet. Their meals often passed in silence, and, from the grace of their attitudes, the beautiful proportions of their figures, and their naked feet, you might have fancied you beheld an antique group of white marble, representing some of the children of Niobe, but for the glances of their eyes which were constantly seeking to meet, and their mutual soft and tender smiles which gave rather the idea of those happy celestial spirits, whose nature is love, and who are not obliged to have recourse to words for the expression of their feelings. In the mean time Madame de la Tour, perceiving every day some unfolding grace, some new beauty, in her daughter, felt her maternal anxiety increase with her tenderness. She often said to me, "If I should die, what will become of Virginia without fortune?"

Madame de la Tour had an aunt in France, who was a woman of quality, rich, old, and a devotee. She had behaved with so much cruelty toward her niece upon her marriage that Madame de la Tour had determined that no extremity of distress should ever compel her to have recourse to her hard-hearted relation. But when she became a mother, she stifled the pride of resentment. She wrote to her aunt, informing her of the sudden death of her husband, the birth of her daughter, and the difficulties in which she was involved, far from her own country, without support, and burdened with a child. She received no answer; but, notwithstanding that high spirit which was natural to her character, she no longer feared exposing herself to mortification and reproach; and although she knew her relation would never pardon her for having married a man of merit, but not of noble birth, she continued to write to her by every opportunity, in the hope of awakening her compassion for Virginia. Many years, however, passed, during which she received not the smallest testimony of her remembrance.

At length, in 1738, three years after the arrival of Monsieur de la Bourdonnais in this island, Madame de la Tour was informed that the governor had a letter to give her from her aunt. She flew to Port Louis, careless on this occasion of appearing in her homely garment; maternal joy made her regardless of such trifles. Monsieur de la Bourdonnais delivered to her the letter from her aunt, who informed her that she deserved her fate for having married an adventurer and a libertine; that the passions brought along with them their own punishment, and that the sudden death of her husband was a just visitation from Heaven; that she had done well in going to a distant island, rather than dishonor her family by remaining in France; and that, after all, in the colony where she had taken refuge every person grew rich except the idle. Having thus censured her, she finished by praising herself. To avoid, she said, the almost inevitable evils of marriage, she had determined to remain in a single state. The truth was that, being of a very ambitious temper, she had resolved only to unite herself to a man of high rank; but although she was very rich, her fortune was not found a sufficient bribe, even at court, to counterbalance the malignant disposition of her mind and the disagreeable qualities of her person.

She added in a postscript, that, after mature deliberation, she had strongly recommended her niece to Monsieur de la Bourdonnais. This she had indeed done, but in a manner of late too common, and which renders a patron perhaps even more formidable than a declared enemy; for, in order to justify herself for her harshness, she had cruelly slandered her niece, while affecting to pity her misfortunes.

Madame de la Tour, whom no unprejudiced person could have seen without feeling sympathy and respect, was received with the utmost coolness by Monsieur de la Bourdonnais; and when she painted to him her own situation and that of her child, he replied, "We will see what can be done, — there are so many to relieve, — all in good time, — why did you affront so respectable a relation? You have been much to blame."

Madame de la Tour returned to her cottage, her heart torn with grief and filled with all the bitterness of disappointment. When she arrived, she threw herself on a chair, and flinging her aunt's letter on the table exclaimed to her friend, "There is the fruit of eleven years of patient expectation!" As Madame de la Tour was the only person in the little circle who could read, she again took up the letter, which she read aloud. Scarcely had she finished, when Margaret exclaimed, "What have we to do with your relations? Has God then forsaken us? He only is our father! Have we not hitherto been happy? Why then this regret? You have no courage." Seeing Madame de la Tour in tears, she threw herself upon her neck, and pressing her in her arms, "My dear friend!" cried she, "my dear friend!" But her emotion choked her utterance.

At this sight Virginia burst into tears, and pressed her mother's hand and Margaret's alternately to her lips and to her heart; while Paul, with his eyes inflamed with anger, cried, clasped his hands together, and stamped with his feet, not knowing whom to blame for this scene of misery. The noise brought Domingo and Mary to the spot, and the little habitation resounded with the cries of distress. "Ah, madame! — My good mistress! — My dear mother! — Do not weep!"

Those tender proofs of affection at length dispelled Madame de la Tour's sorrow. She took Paul and Virginia in her arms, and, embracing them, cried, "You are the cause of my affliction, and yet my only source of delight! Yes, my dear children, misfortune has reached me from a distance, but surely I am surrounded by happiness." Paul and Virginia did not understand this reflection; but when they saw that she was calm, they smiled, and continued to caress her. Thus their former happiness was restored, and what had passed was but a storm in the midst of fair weather.

The amiable disposition of those children unfolded itself daily. One Sunday, their mothers having gone at daybreak to mass, at the church of the Shaddock Grove, the children perceived a negro woman beneath the plantains which shaded their habitation. She appeared almost wasted to a skeleton, and had no other garment than a shred of coarse cloth thrown across her loins. She flung herself at Virginia's feet, who was preparing the family breakfast, and cried, "My good young lady, have pity on a poor runaway slave. For a whole month I have wandered among these mountains, half dead with hunger, and often pursued by the hunters and their dogs. I fled from my master, a rich planter of the Black River, who has used me as you see"; and she showed her body marked by deep scars from the lashes she had received. She added, "I was going to drown myself; but hearing you lived here, I said to myself, Since there are still some good white people in this country, I need not die yet."

Virginia answered with emotion, "Take courage, unfortunate creature! eat! eat!" and she gave her the breakfast she had prepared, which the poor slave in a few minutes devoured. When her hunger was appeased, Virginia said to her, "Poor woman! will you let me go and ask forgiveness for you of your master? Surely the sight of you will touch him with pity. Will you show me the way?" "Angel of heaven!" answered the poor negro woman, "I will follow you where you please." Virginia called her brother, and begged him to accompany her. The slave led the way, by winding and difficult paths, through the woods, over mountains which they climbed with difficulty, and across rivers through which they were obliged to wade. At length about the middle of the day they reached the foot of a precipice upon the borders of the Black River. There they perceived a well-built house, surrounded by extensive plantations, and a great number of slaves employed at their various labors. Their master was walking among them with a pipe in his mouth and a switch in his hand. He was a tall, thin man, of a brown complexion; his eyes were sunk in his head, and his dark eyebrows were joined together. Virginia, holding Paul by the hand, drew near, and with much emotion begged him, for the love of God, to pardon his poor slave, who stood trembling a few paces behind. The planter at first paid little attention to the children, who, he saw, were meanly dressed. But when he observed the elegance of Virginia's form, and the profusion of her beautiful light tresses, which had escaped from beneath her blue cap; when he heard the soft tone of her voice which trembled, as well as her own frame, while she implored his compassion, he took the pipe from his mouth, and lifting up his stick, swore, with a terrible oath, that he pardoned his slave, not for the love of Heaven, but of her who asked his forgiveness. Virginia made a sign to the slave to approach her master, and instantly sprang away, followed by Paul.

They climbed up the precipice they had descended, and having gained the summit, seated themselves at the foot of a tree, overcome with fatigue, hunger and thirst. They had left their cottage fasting, and had walked five leagues since break of day. Paul said to Virginia, "My dear sister, it is past noon, and I am sure you are thirsty and hungry; we shall find no dinner here; let us go down the mountain again, and ask the master of the poor slave for some food." "O no," answered Virginia, "he frightens me too much. Remember what mamma sometimes says, The bread of the wicked is like stones in the mouth." "What shall we do then?" said Paul; "these trees produce no fruit fit to eat, and I shall not be able to find even a tamarind or a lemon to refresh you." "God will take care of us," replied Virginia; "he listens to the cry even of the little birds when they ask him for food." Scarcely had she pronounced these words, when they heard the dashing of waters which fell from a neighboring rock. They ran thither, and having quenched their thirst at this crystal spring, they gathered and ate a few cresses which grew on the border of the stream.

While they were looking on this side and that in search of more solid nourishment, Virginia spied a young palm-tree. The kind of cabbage which is found at the top of the palm, enfolded within its leaves, is well adapted for food; but, although the stalk of the tree is not thicker than a man's leg, it grows to above sixty feet in height. The wood of this tree indeed is composed of very fine filaments, but the bark is so hard that it turns the edge of the hatchet, and Paul was not furnished even with a knife. At length he thought of setting fire to the palm-tree; but a new difficulty occurred, — he had no steel with which to strike fire, and although the whole island is covered with rocks, I do not believe it possible to find a single flint. Necessity, however, is fertile in expedients, and the most useful inventions have arisen from men placed in the most destitute situations. Paul determined to kindle a fire in the manner of the negroes. With the sharp end of a stone he made a small hole in the branch of a tree that was quite dry, which he held between his feet; he then with the edge of the same stone brought to a point another dry branch of a different sort of wood, and afterward placing the piece of pointed wood in the small hole of the branch which he held with his feet, and turning it rapidly between his hands, in a few minutes smoke and sparks of fire issued from the points of contact. Paul then heaped together dried grass and branches, and set fire to the palm-tree, which soon fell to the ground with a great crash. The fire was useful to him in stripping off the long, thick and pointed leaves within which the cabbage was inclosed.

Paul and Virginia ate part of the cabbage raw, and part dressed upon the ashes, which they found equally palatable. They made this frugal repast with delight, from the remembrance of the benevolent action they had performed in the morning; yet their joy was embittered by the thoughts of the uneasiness which their long absence would give their mothers. Virginia often recurred to this subject; but Paul, who felt his strength renewed by their meal, assured her that it would not be long before they eased their mothers' minds by reaching home.

After dinner they were much embarrassed by the recollection that they had no longer any guide, and that they were ignorant of the way. Paul, whose spirit was not subdued by difficulties, said to Virginia, "The sun shines full upon our huts at noon; we must pass, as we did this morning, over that mountain with its three points, which you see yonder. Come, let us go." This mountain was that of the Three Breasts, so called from the form of its three peaks. They descended the steep bank of the Black River, on the northern side, and arrived, after an hour's walk, on the banks of a large stream which stopped their further progress.

This large portion of the island, wholly covered with forests, is even now so little known that many of its rivers and mountains have not yet received a name. The river, on the banks of which they stood, rolls foaming over a bed of rocks. The noise of the water frightened Virginia, and she durst not wade through the current. Paul therefore took her up in his arms, and went thus loaded over the slippery rocks which formed the bed of the river, careless of the tumultuous noise of its waters. "Do not be afraid," cried he to Virginia; "I feel very strong with you. If that planter at the Black River had refused you the pardon of his slave, I would have fought with him." "What!" answered Virginia, "with that great wicked man? To what have I exposed you! Good God! how difficult it is to do good, and it is so easy to do wrong."

When Paul had crossed the river, he wished to continue his journey carrying his sister, and he flattered himself that he was able to climb in that way the mountain of the Three Breasts, which was still at the distance of half a league; but his strength soon failed, and he was obliged to set down his burden, and to rest himself by her side. Virginia then said to him, "My dear brother, the sun is going down; you have still some strength left, but mine has quite failed; do leave me here, and return home alone to ease the fears of our mothers." "O no," said Paul, "I will not leave you. If night surprises us in this wood, I will light a fire, and bring down another palm-tree; you shall eat the cabbage, and I will form a covering of the leaves to shelter you." In the mean time Virginia, being a little rested, pulled from the trunk of an old tree, which hung over the bank of the river, some long leaves of hart's-tongue, which grew near its root. Of these she made a sort of buskin, with which she covered her feet, that were bleeding from the sharpness of the stony paths; for, in her eager desire to do good, she had forgotten to put on her shoes. Feeling her feet cooled by the freshness of the leaves, she broke off a branch of bamboo, and continued her walk, leaning with one hand on the staff, and with the other on Paul.

Thus they walked on slowly through the woods; but from the height of the trees, and the thickness of their foliage, they soon lost sight of the mountain of the Three Breasts, by which they had directed their course, and of the sun also, which was now setting. At length they wandered, without perceiving it, from the beaten path in which they had hitherto walked, and found themselves in a labyrinth of trees and rocks, which appeared to have no opening. Paul made Virginia sit down, while he ran backward and forward, half frantic, in search of a path which might lead them out of this thick wood; but he fatigued himself to no purpose. He climbed to the top of a high tree, whence he hoped at least to discern the mountain of the Three Breasts; but all he could perceive around him were the tops of trees, some of which were gilded by the last beams of the setting sun Already the shadows of the mountains were spreading over the forests in the valleys The wind lulled, as it usually does at the evening hour The most profound silence reigned in those awful solitudes, interrupted only by the cry of the stags, who came to their lairs in that unfrequented spot Paul, in the hope that some hunter would hear his voice, called out as loud as he was able, "Come, come to the help of Virginia" But the echoes of the forests alone answered his call, and repeated again and again, "Virginia, Virginia" Paul at length descended from the tree, overcome with fatigue and vexation, and reflected how they might best contrive to pass the night in that desert But he could find neither fountain nor palm-tree, nor even a branch of dry wood to kindle a fire He then felt by experience the sense of his own weakness, and began to weep Virginia said to him, "Do not weep, my dear brother, or I shall be overwhelmed with grief I am the cause of all your sorrow and of all that our mothers are suffering at this moment I find we ought to do nothing, not even good, without consulting our parents. O, I have been very imprudent!" and she began to shed tears She then said to Paul, "Let us pray to God, my dear brother, and he will have pity on us"

Scarcely had they finished their prayer, when they heard the barking of a dog "It is the dog of some hunter," said Paul, "who comes here at night to lay in wait for the stags" Soon after the dog barked again with more violence "Surely," said Virginia, "it is Fidéle, our own dog, yes, I know his voice Are we then so near home? at the foot of our own mountain?" A moment after Fidéle was at their feet, barking, howling, moaning, and devouring them with his caresses Before they had recovered their surprise they saw Domingo running toward them At the sight of the good old negro, who wept for joy, they began to weep too, without being able to utter one word When Domingo had recovered himself a little, "O my dear children," cried he, "how miserable have you made your mothers! How astonished were they when they returned from mass, where I went with them, on not finding you at home! Mary, who was at work at a little distance, could not tell us where you were gone I ran backward and forward about the plantation, not knowing where to look for you At last I took some of your old clothes, and showing them to Fidele, the poor animal, as if he understood me, immediately began to scent your path, and conducted me, wagging his tail all the while, to the Black River It was there a planter told me that you had brought back a maroon negro woman, his slave, and that he had granted you her pardon But what pardon! he showed her to me with her feet chained to a block of wood, and an iron collar with three hooks fastened round her neck!

"From there Fidele, still on the scent, led me up the precipice of the Black River, where he again stopped and barked with all his might This was on the brink of a spring, near a fallen palm-tree, and close to a fire which was still smoking At last he led me to this very spot We are at the foot of the mountain of the Three Breasts, and still four good leagues from home Come, eat, and gather strength" He then presented them with a cake, some fruits, and a very large gourd filled with a liquor composed of wine, water, lemon-juice, sugar, and nutmeg, which their mothers had prepared to invigorate and refresh them Virginia sighed at the recollection of the poor slave, and at the uneasiness which they had given their mothers She repeated several times, "O, how difficult it is to do good!"

While she and Paul were taking refreshment, Domingo kindled a fire, and having sought among the rocks for a particular kind of crooked wood, which burns when quite green, and throws out a great blaze, he made a torch, which he lighted, it being already night But when they prepared to continue their journey, a new difficulty occurred, Paul and Virginia could no longer walk, their feet being violently swollen and inflamed Domingo knew not whether it were better to leave them, and go in search of help, or remain and pass the night with them on that spot. "What is become of the time," said he, "when I used to carry you both together in my arms? But now you are grown big and I am grown old." While he was in this perplexity, a troop of maroon negroes appeared at the distance of twenty paces. The chief of the band, approaching Paul and Virginia, said to them, "Good little white people, do not be afraid. We saw you pass this morning, with a negro woman of the Black River. You went to ask pardon for her of her wicked master, and we, in return for this, will carry you home upon our shoulders." He then made a sign, and four of the strongest negroes immediately formed a sort of litter with the branches of trees and lianas, and, having seated Paul and Virginia on it, they carried them thus upon their shoulders. Domingo marched in front, with his lighted torch, and they proceeded amidst the rejoicings of the whole troop, and overwhelmed with their benedictions. Virginia, affected by this scene, said to Paul, with emotion, "O my dear brother! God never leaves a good action without reward."

It was midnight when they arrived at the foot of their mountain, on the ridges of which several fires were lighted. Scarcely had they begun to ascend, when they heard voices exclaiming, "Is it you, my children?" They answered, and the negroes with them, "Yes, it is we"; and soon after perceived their mothers and Mary coming toward them, with lighted sticks in their hands. "Unhappy children!" cried Madame de la Tour, "from whence do you come? What agonies you have made us suffer!" "We come," said Virginia, "from the Black River, where we went to ask pardon for a poor maroon slave, to whom I gave our breakfast this morning because she was dying of hunger; and these maroon negroes have brought us home." Madame de la Tour embraced her daughter without being able to speak; and Virginia, who felt her face wet with her mother's tears, exclaimed, "You repay me for all the hardships I have suffered." Margaret, in a transport of delight, pressed Paul in her arms, crying, "And you also, my dear child! you have done a good action." When they reached the cottage with their children, they gave plenty of food to the negroes, who returned to their woods, praying for all sorts of blessings to fall on those good white people.

Every day was to these families a day of tranquillity and of happiness. Neither ambition nor envy disturbed their repose. They did not seek an empty reputation away from home, to be had by intrigue and lost by calumny; they were content to be the sole witnesses and judges of their own actions. In this island, where, as in all the European colonies, every malignant anecdote is circulated with avidity, their virtues and even their names were unknown. Only when a traveller on the road of the Shaddock Grove inquired of any of the inhabitants of the plain, "Who live in those two cottages above?" he was always answered, even by those who did not know them, "They are good people." Thus the modest violet, concealed beneath the thorny bushes, sheds its fragrance while itself remains unseen.

Slander, which, under an appearance of justice, naturally inclines the heart to falsehood or to hatred, was entirely banished from their conversation; for it is impossible not to hate men, if we believe them to be wicked, and to live with the wicked without concealing that hatred under a false pretence of good feeling. Slander thus puts us ill at ease with others and with ourselves. Without passing judgment, then, upon particular persons, they only sought how they could do good to all in general, and, though they had but little power, they had an unceasing good-will, which made them always ready with a kind deed. Solitude, so far from making them savages, had made them more thoroughly civilized. If the scandal of society gave them nothing to talk about, Nature was at hand to fill them with delight. They adored the bounty of that Providence which had enabled them to spread abundance and beauty amidst those barren rocks, and to enjoy those pure and simple pleasures which are ever grateful and ever new.

Paul, at twelve years of age, was stronger and more intelligent than Europeans are at fifteen, and had embellished the plantations which Domingo had only cultivated. He had gone with him to the neighboring woods, and rooted up young plants of lemon-trees, oranges, and tamarinds, the round heads of which are of so fresh a green, together with date-palm trees, producing fruit filled with a sweet cream which has the fine perfume of the orange-flower. Those trees, which were already of a considerable size, he planted round this little enclosure. He had also sown the seeds of many trees which the second year bear flowers or fruit: such as the agathis, encircled with long clusters of white flowers, which hang upon it like the crystal pendants of a lustre; the Persian lilac, which lifts high in air its gray flax-colored branches; the papaw-tree, the branchless trunk of which forms a column set round with green melons, surmounted by a capital of large leaves like those of the fig-tree.

The seeds and kernels of the gum-tree, terminalia, mangoes, alligator pear, the guava, the breadfruit-tree, and the narrow-leaved rose-apple, were planted with profusion; and the greater number of those trees already afforded their young cultivator both shade and fruit. His industrious hands had diffused the riches of nature even on the most barren parts of the plantation. Several kinds of aloes, the Indian fig, adorned with yellow flowers spotted with red, and the thorny torch-thistle, grew upon the dark summits of the rocks, and seemed to aim at reaching the long lianas, which, loaded with blue or crimson flowers, hung scattered over the steepest part of the mountain. Those trees were disposed in such a manner that you could command the whole at one view. He had placed in the middle of this hollow the plants of the lowest growth: behind grew the shrubs; then trees of an ordinary height; above which rose the venerable lofty trees which bordered the circumference. Thus from its centre this extensive enclosure appeared like a verdant amphitheatre of fruits and flowers, enclosing plats of vegetables, strips of meadow-land, and fields of rice and corn. But, in blending these vegetable productions to his own taste, he did not wander from Nature's arrangement. Guided by her suggestions, he had thrown upon the rising grounds such seeds as the winds might scatter over the heights, and near the borders of the springs such grains as float upon the waters. Every plant grew in its proper soil, and every spot seemed decorated by Nature's own hands. The waters which rushed from the summits of the rocks formed in the valley here fountains, there large, clear mirrors which reflected in a setting of bright verdure the trees in blossom, the bending rocks, and the azure heavens.

Notwithstanding the great irregularity of the ground, these plantations were for the most part easy of access. We had, indeed, all given him our advice and assistance in order to accomplish this end. He had formed a path which wound round the valley, and various ramifications from it led from the circumference to the centre. He had drawn some advantage from the most rugged spots, and had blended in harmonious variety smooth walks with the inequalities of the soil, and wild with domestic trees. With that immense quantity of rolling stones which now block up those paths, and which are scattered over most of the ground of this island, he formed here and there pyramids; and at their base he laid earth, and planted the roots of rose-bushes, the Barbadoes flower-fence, and other shrubs which love to climb the rocks. In a short time those gloomy, shapeless pyramids were covered with verdure, or with the glowing tints of the most beautiful flowers. Hollow recesses on the borders of the streams, shaded by the overhanging boughs of aged trees, formed vaulted caves impenetrable to the sun, and where you might enjoy coolness during the heats of the day. One path led to a clump of forest-trees, in the centre of which, sheltered from the wind, grew a cultivated tree loaded with fruit. Here was a cornfield, there an orchard. From that avenue you had a view of the cottages; from this, of the inaccessible summit of the mountain. Beneath a tufted bower of gum-trees, interwoven with lianas, no object whatever could be discerned, even at noon; while the point of the neighboring rock, which projects from the mountain, commanded a view of the whole enclosure, and of the distant ocean, where sometimes we spied a vessel which was coming from Europe or returning thither. On this rock the two families assembled in the evening, and enjoyed in silence the freshness of the air, the fragrance of the flowers, the murmurs of the fountains, and the last blended harmonies of light and shade.

Nothing could be more agreeable than the names which were bestowed upon some of the charming retreats of this labyrinth. That rock of which I was speaking, and from which my approach could be seen from afar, was called the DISCOVERY OF FRIENDSHIP. Paul and Virginia in their sports had planted a bamboo on that spot; and whenever they saw me coming they hoisted a little white handkerchief, by way of signal of my approach, as they had seen a flag hoisted on the neighboring mountain at the sight of a vessel at sea. The idea struck me of engraving an inscription upon the stalk of this reed. Whatever pleasure I have felt during my travels at the sight of a statue or monument of antiquity, I have felt still more in reading a well-written inscription. It seems to me as if a human voice issued from the stone, and, making itself heard after the lapse of ages, addressed man in the midst of a desert, and told him that he was not alone; that other men on that very spot have felt and thought and suffered like himself. If the inscription belongs to an ancient nation which no longer exists, it leads the soul through infinite space, and inspires the feeling of its immortality by showing that a thought has survived the ruins of an empire.

I inscribed then, on the little mast of Paul and Virginia's flag, these lines of Horace: —

"Fratres Helenæ, lucida sidera,
Ventorumque regat pater, Obstrictis aliis, præter Iapyga."

"May the brothers of Helen, bright stars, and the Father of the winds, guide you; and may you only feel the breath of the zephyr."

I engraved this line of Virgil upon the bark of a gum-tree, under the shade of which Paul sometimes seated himself, in order to contemplate the agitated sea: —

"Fortunatus et ille deos qui novit agrestes!"

"Happy art thou, my son, to know only the pastoral divinities."

And this other one above the door of Madame de la Tour's cottage, where the families used to assemble: —

"At secura quies, et nescia fallere vita."

"Here is a calm conscience, and a life ignorant of deceit."

But Virginia did not approve of my Latin; she said that what I had placed at the foot of her weather-flag was too long and too learned. "I should have liked better," added she, "to have seen inscribed, Ever agitated, yet constant." My reflection made her blush.

The sensibility of those happy families extended itself to everything around them. They had given names the most tender to objects in appearance the most indifferent. A border of orange, plantain, and rose-apple trees, planted round a greensward where Virginia and Paul sometimes danced, was called Concord. An old tree, beneath the shade of which Madame de la Tour and Margaret used to relate their misfortunes, was called, The Tears wiped away. They gave the names of Brittany and Normandy to little portions of ground where they had sown corn, strawberries, and pease. Domingo and Mary, wishing, in imitation of their mistresses, to recall the places of their birth in Africa, gave the names of Angola and Foullepointe to the spots where grew the herb with which they wove baskets, and where they had planted a calabash-tree. Thus, with the productions of their respective climates, those exiled families cherished the dear illusions which bind us to our native country, and softened their regrets in a foreign land. Alas! I have seen, enlivened by a thousand delightful appellations, those trees, those fountains, those stones which are now overthrown, and, like the plains of Greece, present nothing but ruins and affecting remembrances.

But perhaps the most charming spot of this enclosure was that which was called Virginia's Resting-place. At the foot of the rock which bore the name of the Discovery of Friendship is a nook, from whence issues a fountain, forming, near its source, a little spot of marshy soil in the midst of a field of rich grass. At the time Margaret was delivered of Paul I made her a present of an Indian cocoa which had been given me, and which she planted on the border of this fenny ground, in order that the tree might one day serve to mark the epoch of her son's birth. Madame de la Tour planted another cocoa, with the same view, at the birth of Virginia. These nuts produced two cocoa-trees, which formed the only records of the two families: one was called Paul's tree; the other, Virginia's tree. They both grew in the same proportion as their two owners, a little unequally; but they rose, at the end of twelve years, above the cottages. Already their tender stalks were interwoven, and their young clusters of cocoas hung over the basin of the fountain. Except this little plantation, the nook of the rock had been left as it was decorated by Nature. On its brown and moist sides large plants of maiden-hair glistened with their green and dark stars; and tufts of wave-leaved hart's-tongue, suspended like long ribbons of purpled green, floated on the winds. Near this grew a chain of the Madagascar periwinkle, the flowers of which resemble the red gillyflower; and the long-podded capsicum, the seed-vessels of which are of the color of blood, and more glowing than coral. Hard by, the herb of balm, with its leaves within the heart, and the sweet basil, which has the odor of the gillyflower, exhaled the most delicious perfumes. From the steep side of the mountain hung the graceful lianas, like floating drapery, forming magnificent canopies of verdure upon the sides of the rocks. The sea-birds, allured by the stillness of those retreats, resorted thither to pass the night. At the hour of sunset we could see the curlew and the stint skimming along the sea-shore; the black frigate-bird poised high in air; and the white bird of the tropic, which abandons, with the star of day, the solitudes of the Indian Ocean. Virginia loved to rest upon the border of this fountain, decorated with wild and sublime magnificence. She often seated herself beneath the shade of the two cocoa-trees, and there she sometimes led her goats to graze. While she was making cheeses of their milk, she loved to see them browse on the maiden-hair which grew upon the steep sides of the rock, and hung suspended upon one of its cornices, as on a pedestal. Paul, observing that Virginia was fond of this spot, brought thither, from the neighboring forest, a great variety of birds'-nests. The old birds, following their young, established themselves in this new colony. Virginia at certain times distributed among them grains of rice, millet, and maize. As soon as she appeared the whistling blackbird, the amadavid bird, the note of which is so soft, the cardinal, with its plumage the color of flame, forsook their bushes; the paroquet, green as an emerald, descended from the neighboring fan-palms; the partridge ran along the grass; all came running helter-skelter 'toward her, like a brood of chickens, and she and Paul delighted to observe their sports, their repasts, and their loves.

Amiable children! thus passed your early days in innocence and in the exercise of benevolence. How many times, on this very spot, have your mothers, pressing you in their arms, blessed Heaven for the consolations that you were preparing for their declining years, and that they could see you begin life under such happy auspices! How many times beneath the shade of those rocks, have I partaken with them of your rural repasts, which cost no animal its life! Gourds filled with milk, fresh eggs, cakes of rice placed upon plantain leaves, baskets loaded with mangoes, oranges, dates, pomegranates, pineapples, furnished at once the most wholesome food, the most beautiful colors, and the most delicious juices.

The conversation was gentle and innocent as the repasts. Paul often talked of the labors of the day and those of the morrow. He was continually planning something useful for their little society. Here he discovered that the paths were rough; there that the seats were uncomfortable; sometimes the young arbors did not afford sufficient shade, and Virginia might be better pleased elsewhere.

In the rainy season the two families met together in the cottage, and employed themselves in weaving mats of grass and baskets of bamboo. Rakes, spades, and hatchets were ranged along the walls in the most perfect order; and near these instruments of agriculture were placed its products, — sacks of rice, sheaves of corn, and baskets of plantains. Some degree of luxury is usually united with plenty, and Virginia was taught by her mother and Margaret to prepare sherbet and cordials from the juice of the sugar-cane, the lemon, and the citron.

When night came, they all supped together by the light of a lamp; after which Madame de la Tour or Margaret told stories of travellers lost during the night in forests of Europe infested by banditti, or of some shipwrecked vessel thrown by the tempest upon the rocks of a desert island. To these recitals their children listened with eager sensibility, and earnestly begged that Heaven would grant they might one day have the joy of showing their hospitality toward such unfortunate persons. At length the two families would separate and retire to rest, impatient to meet again the next morning. Sometimes they were lulled to repose by the beating rains which fell in torrents upon the roofs of their cottages, and sometimes by the hollow winds, which brought to their ear the distant murmur of the waves breaking upon the shore. They blessed God for their own safety, of which their feeling became stronger from the idea of remote danger.

Madame de la Tour occasionally read aloud some affecting history of the Old or New Testament. Her auditors reasoned but little upon these sacred books, for their theology consisted in sentiment, like that of Nature; and their morality in action, like that of the gospel. Those families had no particular days devoted to pleasure and others to sadness. Every day was to them a holiday, and all which surrounded them one holy temple, where they forever adored an Infinite Intelligence, almighty, and the friend of human kind. A sentiment of confidence in his supreme power filled their minds with consolation for the past, with fortitude for the present, and with hope for the future. Behold how these women, compelled by misfortune to return to a state of nature, had unfolded in their own bosoms, and in those of their children, the feelings which Nature gives us, our best support under evil.

But as clouds sometimes arise which cast a gloom over the best-regulated tempers, whenever any member of this little society appeared sad, the rest gathered around, endeavoring to banish painful thoughts rather by sentiment than by arguments. Each used in this their especial character. Margaret exerted her gayety, Madame de la Tour employed her mild theology, Virginia her tender caresses, Paul his cordial frankness. Even Mary and Domingo hastened to offer their succor, and to weep with those that wept. Thus weak plants are interwoven in order to resist the tempests.

During the fine season they went every Sunday to the church of the Shaddock Grove, the steeple of which you see yonder upon the plain. Rich planters used to come to church in their palanquins, who several times sought the acquaintance of families so bound up in each other, and would have invited them to parties of pleasure. But they always declined these overtures with respectful politeness, persuaded that the powerful seek the weak only to feed their own complacency, and that the weak cannot please them without flattering them, whether they are good or evil. On the other hand, they avoided with equal care too intimate an acquaintance with the small planters, who are as a class jealous, calumniating, and gross. They thus acquired with some the character of being timid, and with others of being proud; but their reserve was accompanied with so much obliging politeness, above all toward the unfortunate, that they insensibly acquired the respect of the rich and the confidence of the poor. After service the poor often came to require some kind office at their hands. Perhaps it was a person troubled in mind who sought their advice, or a child led them to its sick mother in the neighborhood. They always took with them remedies for the ordinary diseases of the country, which they administered in that soothing manner which stamps so much value upon the smallest favors. Above all, they succeeded in banishing the disorders of the mind, which are so intolerable in solitude, and under the infirmities of a weakened frame. Madame de la Tour spoke with such sublime confidence of the Divinity, that the sick, while listening to her, believed that he was present. Virginia often returned home with her eyes wet with tears and her heart overflowing with delight, at having had an opportunity of doing good. After these visits of charity they sometimes prolonged their walk by the valley of the Sloping Mountain, till they reached my dwelling, where I used to prepare dinner for them upon the banks of the little river which glides near my cottage. I procured for these occasions some bottles of old wine, in order to heighten the gayety of our Indian repast by the more genial productions of Europe. At other times we met upon the sea-shore, at the mouth of other little rivers, which are here scarcely larger than brooks. We brought from the plantation our vegetable provisions, to which we added such as the sea furnished in great variety. We caught on these shores the mullet, the roach, and the sea-urchin, lobsters, shrimps, crabs, oysters, and all other kinds of shell-fish. In this way we often enjoyed the most tranquil pleasures in situations the most frightful. Sometimes, seated upon a rock under the shade of the velvet sunflower-tree, we saw the enormous waves of the Indian Ocean break beneath our feet with a tremendous noise. Paul, who could swim like a fish, would advance on the reefs to meet the coming billows; then, at their near approach, would run back to the beach, closely pursued by the foaming breakers, which threw themselves with a roaring noise far on the sands. But Virginia at this sight uttered piercing cries, and said that such sports frightened her too much.

Our repasts were succeeded by the songs and dances of the two young people. Virginia sang the happiness of pastoral life, and the misery of those who were impelled, by avarice, to cross the furious ocean, rather than cultivate the earth and enjoy its peaceful bounties. Sometimes she performed a pantomime with Paul, in the manner of the negroes. The first language of man is pantomime; it is known to all nations, and is so natural and so expressive that the children of the European inhabitants catch it with facility from the negroes. Virginia recalling, from among the histories which her mother had read to her, those which had affected her most, represented the principal events in them with beautiful simplicity. Sometimes at the sound of Domingo's tamtam she appeared upon the greensward, bearing a pitcher upon her head, and advanced with a timid step toward the source of a neighboring fountain, to draw water. Domingo and Mary, who personated the Shepherds of Midian, forbade her to approach, and repulsed her sternly. Upon this Paul flew to her succor, beat away the Shepherds, filled Virginia's pitcher, and placing it upon her head, bound her brows at the same time with a wreath of the red flowers of the Madagascar periwinkle, which served to heighten the delicacy of her complexion. Then, joining their sports, I took upon me the part of Raguel, and bestowed upon Paul my daughter Zephora in marriage.

Another time she represented Ruth, accompanying Naomi, who returns poor and widowed to her own country, where she finds herself a stranger after her long absence. Domingo and Mary personated the reapers. Virginia followed their steps, pretending to glean here and there a few ears of corn. She was interrogated by Paul with the gravity of a patriarch, and answered with a faltering voice his questions. Soon, touched with compassion, he granted an asylum to innocence and hospitality to misfortune. He filled Virginia's lap with all kinds of food; and, leading her toward us as before the old men of the city, declared his purpose to take her in marriage. At this scene, Madame de la Tour, recalling the desolate situation in which she had been left by her relations, her widowhood, the kind reception she had met with from Margaret, succeeded now by the soothing hope of a happy union between their children, could not forbear weeping; and these mixed recollections of good and evil caused us all to join in her tears of sorrow and of joy.

These dramas were performed with such an air of reality, that you might have fancied yourself transported to the plains of Syria or of Palestine. We were not unfurnished with either decorations, lights, or an orchestra, suitable to the representation. The scene was generally placed in an opening of the forest, where such parts of the wood as were penetrable formed around us numerous arcades of foliage, beneath which we were sheltered from the heat during the whole day; but when the sun descended toward the horizon, its rays, broken by the trunks of the trees, diverged among the shadows of the forest in strong lines of light, which produced the most sublime effect. Sometimes the whole of its broad disk appeared at the end of an avenue, spreading one dazzling mass of brightness. The foliage of the trees, illuminated from beneath by its saffron beams, glowed with the lustre of the topaz and the emerald. Their brown and mossy trunks appeared changed into columns of antique bronze; and the birds, which had retired in silence to their leafy shades to pass the night, surprised to see the radiance of a second morning, hailed the star of day with innumerable carols.

Night soon overtook us during those rural entertainments; but the purity of the air and the mildness of the climate admitted of our sleeping in the woods secure from the injuries of the weather, and no less secure from the molestation of robbers. At our return the following day to our respective habitations, we found them exactly in the same state in which they had been left. In this island, which then had no commerce, there was so much simplicity and good faith that the doors of several houses were without a key, and a lock was an object of curiosity to many of the natives.

There were, however, some days in the year celebrated by Paul and Virginia in a more peculiar manner; these were the birthdays of their mothers. Virginia never failed the day before to prepare some wheaten cakes, which she distributed among a few poor white families born on the island, who had never eaten European bread, and who, uncared for by the blacks, forced to live in the woods on tapioca roots, had not to sustain their poverty either the stupidity which attends slavery or the courage which springs from education. These cakes were all the gifts that Virginia could offer to ease their condition, but she gave them in so delicate a manner that they were worth vastly more. In the first place Paul was commissioned to take the cakes himself to these families, and get their promise to come and spend the next day at Madame de la Tour's and Margaret's. They might then be seen coming, — a mother of a family, perhaps, with two or three thin, yellow, miserable-looking daughters, so timid that they dared not lift their eyes from the ground. Virginia soon put them at their ease; she brought them refreshments, the excellence of which she endeavored to heighten by relating some particular circumstance which, in her own estimation, greatly improved them. This drink had been prepared by Margaret; this other by her mother; her brother had himself picked this fruit from the top of the tree. She would get Paul to dance with them, nor would she leave them till she saw that they were happy. She wished them to partake of the joy of her own family. "We are happy," she would say, "only when we are seeking the happiness of others." When they left, she would have them carry away some little thing that appeared to please them, enforcing their acceptance of it by some delicate pretext, that she might not appear to know that they were in want. If she remarked that their clothes were much tattered, she obtained her mother's permission to give them some of her own, and then sent Paul to leave them secretly at their cottage-doors. She followed thus the example of God, concealing the benefactor and revealing only the benefit.

You Europeans, whose minds are imbued from infancy with prejudices at variance with happiness, cannot imagine all the instruction and pleasure which Nature has to give. Your soul, confined to a little round of human knowledge, soon reaches the limit of its artificial enjoyment; but Nature and the heart are inexhaustible.

Paul and Virginia had neither clock nor almanac, nor books of chronology, history, or philosophy. The periods of their lives were regulated by those of Nature. They knew the hours of the day by the shadows of the trees, the seasons by the times when those trees bore flowers or fruit, and the years by the number of their harvests. These soothing images diffused an inexpressible charm over their conversation. "It is time to dine," Virginia would say to the family; "the shadows of the plantain-trees are at their roots"; or, "Night approaches; the tamarinds close their leaves." "When will you come to see us?" some of her companions in the neighborhood would inquire. "At the time of the sugar-canes," Virginia would answer. "Your visit will be then still more delightful," her young acquaintances would reply. When she was asked what was her own age and that of Paul, "My brother," said she, "is as old as the great cocoa-tree of the fountain, and I am as old as the little cocoa-tree. The mangoes have borne fruit twelve times, and the orange-trees have flowered four-and-twenty times, since I came into the world." Their lives seemed linked to the trees like those of fauns or dryads. They knew no other historic epochs than that of the lives of their mothers, no other chronology than that of their orchards, and no other philosophy than that of doing good and resigning themselves to the will of God.

After all, what need had these young people of riches or learning after our sort? Even their necessities and their ignorance added to their happiness. No day passed in which they did not do one another some service or give some knowledge; and while there might be some errors in this last, yet man in a simple state has no dangerous ones to fear.

Thus grew those children of Nature. No care had troubled their peace, no intemperance had corrupted their blood, no misplaced passion had depraved their hearts. Love, innocence, and piety were each day unfolding the beauty of their souls, disclosing matchless grace in their features, their attitudes, and their motions. Still in the morning of life, they had all its blooming freshness; and surely such in the garden of Eden appeared our first parents, when, coming from the hands of God, they first saw, approached, and conversed together, like brother and sister. Virginia was gentle, modest, and confiding as Eve; and Paul, like Adam, united the figure of manhood with the simplicity of a child.

Sometimes, when alone with Virginia, he has a thousand times told me, he would say to her, at his return from labor, "When I am wearied, the sight of you refreshes me. If from the summit of the mountain I perceive you below in the valley, you appear to me in the midst of our orchard like a rose-bud. If you go toward our mother's house, the partridge, running to meet its young, has a shape less beautiful and a step less light. When I lose sight of you through the trees, I have no need to see you in order to find you again. Something of you, I know not how, remains for me in the air where you have passed, in the grass where you have been seated. When I come near you, you delight all my senses. The azure of heaven is less charming than the blue of your eyes, and the song of the amadavid bird less soft than the sound of your voice. If I only touch you with the tip of my finger, my whole frame trembles with pleasure. Do you remember the day when we crossed over the great stones of the river of the Three Breasts? I was very tired before we reached the bank; but as soon as I had taken you in my arms I seemed to have wings like a bird. Tell me by what charm you have so enchanted me? Is it by your wisdom? Our mothers have more than either of us. Is it by your caresses? They embrace me much oftener than you. I think it must be by your goodness. I shall never forget how you walked barefooted to the Black River, to ask pardon for the poor runaway slave. Here, my beloved, take this flowering branch of a lemon-tree which I have gathered in the forest; you will place it at night near your bed. Eat this honeycomb, which I have taken for you from the top of a rock. But first lean upon my bosom, and I shall be refreshed."

Virginia would answer him: "O my dear brother, the rays of the sun in the morning on the tops of the rocks give me less joy than the sight of you. I love my mother, I love yours; but when they call you their son, I love them a thousand times more. When they caress you, I feel it more sensibly than when I am caressed myself. You ask me why you love me. Why, all creatures that are brought up together love one another. Look at our birds; reared up in the same nests, they love like us; they are always together like us. Hark! how they call and answer from one tree to another! So when the echoes bring to my ears the air which you play upon your flute on the top of the mountain, I repeat the words at the bottom of the valley. You are dear to me more than ever since the day when you were ready to fight the master of the slave for me. Since that time how often I have said to myself, 'Ah, my brother has a good heart; but for him I should have died of terror.' I pray to God every day for my mother and for yours, for you and for our poor servants; but when I pronounce your name, my devotion seems to increase, I ask so earnestly of God that no harm may befall you! Why do you go so far and climb so high to seek fruits and flowers for me? How tired you are!" and with her little white handkerchief she would wipe the damps from his forehead and cheeks, and kiss him tenderly.

For some time past, however, Virginia had felt her heart agitated by new sensations. Her beautifully blue eyes lost their lustre, her cheek its freshness, and her frame was seized with universal languor. Serenity no longer sat upon her brow, nor smiles played upon her lips. She became suddenly gay without joy, and melancholy without vexation. She fled her innocent sports, her gentle labors, and the society of her beloved family; wandering here and there among the most unfrequented parts of the plantation, and seeking everywhere that rest which she could nowhere find. Sometimes, at the sight of Paul, she advanced sportively toward him; then, all at once, when just about to accost him, was seized with sudden confusion, her pale cheeks overspread with blushes, and her eyes no longer daring to meet those of her brother.

Paul said to her: "The rocks are covered with verdure, our birds begin to sing when you approach, everything around you is gay, and you only are unhappy." He endeavored to soothe her by his embraces; but she turned away her head, and fled trembling toward her mother. The caresses of her brother excited too much emotion in her agitated heart. Paul could not comprehend the caprices so novel and so strange. Misfortunes never come single.

One of those summers which sometimes desolate the countries situated between the tropics now spread its ravages over this island. It was near the end of December, when the sun in Capricorn darts its vertical fires over Mauritius during the space of three weeks. The southeast wind, which prevails throughout almost the whole year, no longer blew. Vast columns of dust arose from the highways and hung suspended in the air; the ground was everywhere broken into clefts; the grass was burnt; hot exhalations issued from the sides of the mountains, and their rivulets, for the most part, became dry; no refreshing cloud ever arose from the sea; fiery vapors during the day ascended from the plains, and appeared at sunset like a vast conflagration. Night brought no coolness to the heated atmosphere; the red moon, rising in a misty horizon, appeared of supernatural magnitude. The drooping cattle, on the sides of the hills, stretching out their necks toward heaven, and panting for air, made the valleys re-echo with their melancholy lowings; even the Caffre by whom they were led threw himself upon the earth in search of coolness; but the scorching sun had everywhere penetrated, and the stifling atmosphere resounded with the buzzing noise of insects, who sought to allay their thirst in the blood of men and of animals.

On one of those sultry nights Virginia, restless and unhappy, arose, then went again to rest, but could find in no attitude either slumber or repose. At length she bent her way, by the light of the moon, toward her fountain, and gazed at its spring, which, notwithstanding the drought, still flowed like silver threads down the brown sides of the rock. She flung herself into the basin; its coolness reanimated her spirits, and a thousand soothing remembrances presented themselves to her mind. She recollected that in her infancy her mother and Margaret amused themselves by bathing her with Paul in this very spot; that Paul afterward, reserving this bath for her use only, had dug out its bed, covered the bottom with sand, and sown aromatic herbs around the borders. She saw, reflected through the water upon her naked arms and bosom, the two cocoa-trees which were planted at her birth and that of her brother, and which interwove about her head their green branches and young fruit. She thinks of Paul's friendship, sweeter than the odors, purer than the waters of the fountain, stronger than the intertwining palm-trees, and she sighs. She thinks on the hour of the night and the profound solitude, and a raging fire seizes her. Forthwith she flies affrighted from those dangerous shades, and those waters hotter than the torrid sunbeam; she runs to her mother to find a refuge from herself. More than once wishing to unfold her sufferings, she presses her mother's hand within her own; more than once she is ready to pronounce the name of Paul; but her oppressed heart leaves her lips no power of utterance, and, leaning her head on her mother's bosom, she can only bathe it with her tears.

Madame de la Tour, though she easily discerned the source of her daughter's uneasiness, did not think it well to speak to her on that subject. "My dear child," said she, "address yourself to God, who disposes, at his will, of health and of life. He tries you to-day to recompense you to-morrow. Remember that we are only placed upon earth for the exercise of virtue."

Meanwhile the excessive heat drew vapors from the ocean, which hung over the island like a vast parasol. The summits of the mountains gathered them about, while long flakes of fire issued from time to time from their misty peaks. Soon the most terrible thunder re-echoed through the woods, the plains, and the valleys; the rains fell from the skies in cataracts; foaming torrents rushed down the sides of this mountain; the bottom of that valley became a sea; the table-land on which the cottages were built, a little island; and the entrance of this valley a sluice, along which rushed headlong with the moaning waters, earth, trees, and rocks.

The trembling family were all in prayer to God in the cottage of Madame de la Tour, the roof of which cracked horribly from the struggling winds. So vivid and frequent were the lightnings, that, although the doors and window-shutters were well fastened, every object without was distinctly seen through the joints in the woodwork. Paul, followed by Domingo, went with intrepidity from one cottage to another, notwithstanding the fury of the tempest; here supporting a partition with a buttress, there driving in a stake, and only returning to the family to calm their fears by the hope that the storm was passing away. In fact, in the evening the rains ceased, the trade-winds of the southeast pursued their ordinary course, the tempestuous clouds were thrown toward the northeast, and the setting sun appeared in the horizon

Virginia's first wish was to visit the spot called her Resting-place. Paul approached her with a timid air, and offered her the assistance of his arm, which she accepted, smiling, and they left the cottage together. The air was fresh and clear; white vapors arose from the ridges of the mountains, furrowed here and there by the foam of the torrents, which were now beginning to dry up on all sides. As for the garden, it was completely torn to pieces by deep water-courses, the roots of the fruit-trees were for most part laid bare, and vast heaps of sand covered the borders of meadows, and had choked up Virginia's Bath. The two cocoa-trees, however, were still erect, and still retained their freshness; but they were no longer surrounded by turf or arbors or birds, except a few amadavid birds, who, upon the points of the neighboring rocks, lamented in plaintive notes the loss of their young.

At the sight of this general desolation, Virginia exclaimed to Paul, "You brought birds hither, and the hurricane has killed them. You planted this garden, and it is now destroyed. Everything then upon earth perishes, and it is only heaven that is not subject to change." "Why," answered Paul, "cannot I give you something that comes from heaven! but I have nothing even upon earth." Virginia with a blush replied, "You have the picture of Saint Paul." Scarcely had she spoken when he flew to his mother's cottage in search of it. This picture was a small miniature representing Paul the Hermit. Margaret had a great reverence for it. She had for a long time worn it hung at her neck when she was a girl, and since she became a mother she had placed it round the neck of her child. It had even happened that being, while pregnant, abandoned by the whole world, and continually employed in contemplating the image of this benevolent recluse, her offspring had contracted some resemblance to this revered object. It was this that had led her to bestow upon him the name of Paul, giving him for his patron a saint who had passed his life far from mankind, by whom he had been first deceived and then forsaken. Virginia, upon receiving this little picture from the hands of Paul, said to him, with emotion, "My dear brother, I will never part with this while I live; nor will I ever forget that you have given me the only thing which you possess in the world." At this tone of friendship, this unhoped-for return of familiarity and tenderness, Paul attempted to embrace her; but, light as a bird, she fled, and left him astonished, and unable to account for a conduct so extraordinary.

Meanwhile Margaret said to Madame de la Tour, "Why do we not unite our children by marriage? They have a strong attachment to each other, which my son does not yet wholly understand. When Nature shall speak to him, in vain we shall shut our eyes; there is everything then to fear." Madame de la Tour replied, "They are too young and too poor. What grief would it occasion us to see Virginia bring into the world unfortunate children, whom she would not perhaps have sufficient strength to rear. Your negro, Domingo, is almost too old to labor; Mary is infirm. As for myself, my dear friend, at the end of fifteen years I find my strength much lessened; one grows old rapidly in hot climates, and, above all, under the pressure of misfortune. Paul is our only hope; let us wait till years have formed his constitution and he can support us by his labor; at present you well know that we have only sufficient to supply the wants of the day; but were we to send Paul for a short time to the Indies, commerce would furnish him with the means of purchasing some slaves; and at his return we could unite him to Virginia; for I am persuaded no one on earth can render her so happy as your son. We will speak to our neighbor about it."

They accordingly asked my advice, and I was of their opinion. "The Indian seas," said I, "are calm, and in choosing a favorable season, the voyage out is seldom longer than six weeks, and the same for the return. We will furnish Paul with a little venture from my neighborhood, where he is much beloved. If we were only to supply him with some raw cotton, of which we make no use for want of mills to work it; some ebony, which is here so common that it serves us for firing; and some rosin, which is found in our woods; — all those articles will sell advantageously in the Indies, while to us they are useless."

I engaged to obtain permission from Monsieur de la Bourdonnais to undertake this voyage; and I wished beforehand to mention the affair to Paul. But what was my surprise when this young man said to me, with a degree of good sense above his age, "And why do you wish me to leave my family for this precarious pursuit of fortune? Is there any commerce in the world more advantageous than the culture of the ground, which yields sometimes fifty or a hundred fold? If we wish to engage in commerce, can we not do so by carrying our superfluities to the town, without my wandering to the Indies? Our mothers tell me that Domingo is old and feeble, but I am young, and gather strength every day. If any accident should happen during my absence, above all, to Virginia, who already suffers — O no, no! — I cannot resolve to leave them."

This answer threw me into great perplexity, for Madame de la Tour had not concealed from me the situation of Virginia, and the desire which she had of gaining the delay of a few years by separating the young people from one another. These were motives which I thought unwise to suggest to Paul.

About this time a ship from France brought Madame de la Tour a letter from her aunt. The fear of death, without which hard hearts would never feel, had alarmed her. She was recovering from a dangerous disorder, which had left her in a state of weakness rendered incurable by age. She desired her niece to return to France; or, if her health forbade her to undertake so long a voyage, she enjoined on her to send Virginia, on whom she would bestow a good education, procure for her a splendid marriage, and leave her the inheritance of her whole fortune.

The perusal of this letter spread general consternation through the family. Domingo and Mary began to weep. Paul, motionless with surprise, appeared ready to burst with indignation; while Virginia, fixing her eyes upon her mother, had not power to utter a word.

"And can you now leave us?" cried Margaret to Madame de la Tour. "No, my dear friend, no, my beloved children," replied Madame de la Tour, "I will not leave you. I have lived with you, and with you I will die. I have known no happiness but in your affection. If my health be deranged, my past misfortunes are the cause. My heart has been deeply wounded by the cruelty of my relations and the loss of my husband. But I have since found more consolation and happiness with you in these humble huts, than all the wealth of my family could now lead me to expect in my own country."

At this language every eye overflowed with tears of delight. Paul, pressing Madame de la Tour in his arms, exclaimed, "Neither will I leave you! I will not go to the Indies. We will all labor for you, my dear mamma; and you shall never feel any want with us." But of the whole society, the person who displayed the least transport, and who probably felt the most, was Virginia; and during the remainder of the day that gentle gayety which flowed from her heart, and proved that her peace was restored, completed the general satisfaction.

The next day, at sunrise, just as they had concluded offering up, as usual, their morning prayer, which preceded their breakfast, Domingo informed them that a gentleman on horseback, followed by two slaves, was coming toward the plantation. This person was Monsieur de la Bourdonnais. He entered the cottage, where he found the family at breakfast. Virginia had prepared, according to the custom of the country, coffee and rice boiled in water; to these she had added hot yams and fresh bananas. The leaves of the plantain-tree supplied the want of table-linen, and calabash shells, split in two, served for cups. The Governor discovered at first some surprise at the homeliness of the dwelling; then, addressing himself to Madame de la Tour, he observed that, although public affairs drew his attention too much from the concerns of individuals, she had many claims to his good offices. "You have an aunt at Paris, madame," he added, "a woman of quality, and immensely rich, who expects that you will hasten to see her, and who means to bestow upon you her whole fortune." Madame de la Tour replied that the state of her health would not permit her to undertake so long a voyage. "At least," resumed Monsieur de la Bourdonnais, "you cannot, without injustice, deprive this amiable young lady, your daughter, of so noble an inheritance. I will not conceal from you that your aunt has made use of her influence to secure your daughter being sent to her; and that I have received official letters, in which I am ordered to exert my authority, if necessary, to that effect. But, as I only wish to employ my power for the purpose of rendering the inhabitants of this colony happy, I expect from your good sense the voluntary sacrifice of a few years, upon which depend your daughter's establishment in the world and the welfare of your whole life. Wherefore do we come to these islands? Is it not to acquire a fortune? And will it not be more agreeable to return and find it in your own country?"

So saying, he placed upon the table a great bag of piastres, which had been brought hither by one of his slaves. "This sum," he continued, "is allotted by your aunt for the preparations necessary for your daughter's voyage." Gently reproaching Madame de la Tour for not having had recourse to him in her difficulties, he extolled at the same time her noble fortitude. Upon this, Paul said to the Governor, "My mother did address herself to you, sir, and you received her ill." "Have you another child, madame?" said Monsieur de la Bourdonnais to Madame de la Tour. "No, sir," she replied; "this is the son of my friend; but he and Virginia are equally dear to us." "Young man," said the Governor to Paul, "when you have acquired a little more experience of the world, you will know that it is the misfortune of people in place to be deceived, and thence to bestow upon intriguing vice that which belongs to modest merit."

Monsieur de la Bourdonnais, at the request of Madame de la Tour, placed himself next her at table, and breakfasted, in the manner of the Creoles, upon coffee, mixed with rice, boiled in water. He was delighted with the order and neatness which prevailed in the little cottage, the harmony of the two interesting families, and the zeal of their old servants. "Here," exclaimed he, "I discern only wooden furniture; but I find serene countenances and hearts of gold." Paul, enchanted with the affability of the Governor, said to him, "I wish to be your friend; you are a good man." Monsieur de la Bourdonnais received with pleasure this insular compliment, and, taking Paul by the hand, assured him that he might rely upon his friendship.

After breakfast he took Madame de la Tour aside and informed her that an opportunity presented itself of sending her daughter to France, in a ship which was going to sail in a short time; that he would recommend her to a lady, a relation of his own, who would be a passenger; and that she must not think of renouncing an immense fortune on account of being separated from her daughter a few years. "Your aunt," he added, as he was leaving, "cannot live more than two years; of this I am assured by her friends. Think of it seriously. Fortune does not visit us every day. Consult your friends. Every person of good sense will be of my opinion." She answered "that, desiring no other happiness henceforth in the world than that of her daughter, she would leave her departure for France entirely to her own inclination."

Madame de la Tour was not sorry to find an opportunity of separating Paul and Virginia for a short time, and provide, by this means, for their mutual happiness at a future period. She took her daughter aside and said to her, "My dear child, our servants are now old. Paul is still very young; Margaret is advanced in years, and I am already infirm. If I should die, what would become of you, without fortune, in the midst of these deserts? You would then be left alone, without any person who could afford you much help, and forced to labor without ceasing, as a hired servant, in order to support your wretched existence. This idea fills my soul with sorrow." Virginia answered, "God has appointed us to labor. You have taught me to labor, and to bless him every day. Thus far he has not forsaken us; he never will forsake us. His providence peculiarly watches the unfortunate. You have told me this often, my dear mother. I cannot resolve to leave you." Madame de la Tour replied with much emotion, "I have no other aim than to render you happy, and to marry you one day to Paul, who is not your brother. Reflect at present that his fortune depends upon you."

A young girl who loves believes that all the world is ignorant of it ; she throws over her eyes the veil which she has over her heart ; but when it is lifted by some cherishing hand, then the hidden pains of her passion escape as through a newly opened barrier, and the sweet outpourings of confidence succeed that reserve and mystery in which she had enfolded herself. Virginia, deeply affected by this new proof of her mother's tenderness, related to her how cruel had been those struggles which God alone had witnessed ; declared that she saw the succor of Providence in that of an affectionate mother, who approved of her attachment, and would guide her by her counsels ; that being now strengthened by such support, every consideration led her to remain with her mother, without anxiety for the present and without apprehension for the future.

Madame de la Tour, perceiving that this confidential conversation had produced an effect altogether different from that which she expected, said, "My dear child, I will not any more constrain your inclination ; think over it at leisure, but conceal your feelings from Paul. When a young girl's heart is taken captive, her lover has nothing left to ask of her."

Toward evening, when she was alone with Virginia, there entered a tall man dressed in a blue cassock ; he was a missionary priest of the island, and the confessor of Madame de la Tour and Virginia. He had been sent by the Governor. "My children," he exclaimed as he entered, "God be praised ! you are now rich. You can now listen to the kind suggestion of your excellent hearts, and do good to the poor. I know what Monsieur de la Bourdonnais has said to you, and what you have answered. Your health, dear madame, obliges you to remain here ; but you, young lady, are without excuse. We must obey the will of Providence ; and we must also obey our aged relations, even when they are unjust. A sacrifice is required of you, but it is the order of God. He devoted himself for you ; and you, in imitation of his example, must devote yourself for the welfare of your family. Your voyage to France will have a happy termination. You will surely consent to go, my dear young lady ?"

Virginia, with downcast eyes, answered, trembling, "If it be the command of God, I have nothing to say against it. Let the will of God be done," said she, weeping.

The priest went away and informed the Governor of the success of his mission. In the mean time Madame de la Tour sent Domingo to desire I would come hither, that she might consult me upon Virginia's departure. I was of opinion that she ought not to go. I consider it as a fixed principle of happiness, that we ought to prefer the advantages of nature to those of fortune, and never go in search of that at a distance which we may find at home. But what could be expected from my moderate counsels, opposed to the illusions of a splendid fortune ; or from my simple reasoning, contradicted by the prejudices of the world and an authority which Madame de la Tour held sacred ? This lady had only consulted me from a sentiment of respect, and had in reality ceased to deliberate since she had heard the decision of her confessor. Margaret herself, who, notwithstanding the advantages she hoped for her son from the possession of Virginia's fortune, had hitherto opposed her departure, made no further objections. As for Paul, ignorant of what was decided, and alarmed at the secret conversation which Madame de la Tour held with her daughter, he abandoned himself to deep melancholy. "They are plotting something against my peace," cried he, "for they conceal everything from me."

A report having in the mean time been spread over the island that fortune had visited those rocks, we beheld merchants of all kinds climbing their steep ascent, and displaying in those humble huts the richest stuffs of India, — the fine dimity of Gondelore, the handkerchiefs of Pellicate and Musulapatan, the plain, striped, and embroidered muslins of Decca, clear as the day. Those merchants unrolled the gorgeous silks of China, white satin damasks, others of grass-green and bright red ; rose-colored taffetas, a profusion of satins, pelongs, and gauze of Tonquin, some plain and some beautifully decorated with flowers ; the soft pekins, downy like cloth ; white and yellow nankeens, and the calicoes of Madagascar.

Madame de la Tour wished her daughter to purchase everything she liked; and Virginia made choice of whatever she believed would be agreeable to her mother, Margaret, and her son. "This," said she, "will serve for furniture, and that will be useful to Mary and Domingo." In short, the bag of piastres was emptied before she had considered her own wants; and she was obliged to receive a share of the presents which she had distributed to the family circle.

Paul, penetrated with sorrow at the sight of those gifts of fortune which he felt were the presage of Virginia's departure, came a few days after to my dwelling. With an air of despondency he said to me, "My sister is going; she is already making preparations for her voyage. Come to our house, I pray you; use your influence over her mother and mine, in order to detain her here." I could not refuse Paul's solicitations, although well convinced that my representations would be unavailing.

If Virginia had appeared to me charming when clad in the blue cloth of Bengal, with a red handkerchief tied round her head, how much was her beauty improved when I saw her attired like the ladies of this country! She was dressed in white muslin, lined with rose-colored taffeta. Her small and elegant shape was displayed to advantage by her corset; and her fair hair, woven in tresses, accorded admirably with her maidenly head. Her fine blue eyes were filled with an expression of melancholy; and the struggles of passion, with which her heart was agitated, flushed her cheek and gave her voice a tone of emotion. The contrast between her pensive look and her gay habiliments rendered her more interesting than ever, nor was it possible to see or hear her unmoved. Paul became more and more melancholy; at length Margaret, distressed by the situation of her son, took him aside and said to him, "Why, my dear son, will you cherish vain hopes which will only render your disappointment more bitter? It is time that I should make known to you the secret of your life and of mine. Mademoiselle de la Tour belongs, by her mother, to a rich and noble family; while you are but the son of a poor peasant girl, and, what is worse, you are a natural child."

Paul, who had never before heard this last expression, inquired with eagerness its meaning. His mother replied: "You had no legitimate father. When I was a girl, seduced by love, I was guilty of a weakness of which you are the offspring. My fault deprived you of the protection of a father's family, and my flight from home of that of a mother's family. Unfortunate child! you have no relation in the world but me!" And she shed a flood of tears. Paul, pressing her in his arms, exclaimed, "O my dear mother! since I have no relation in the world but you, I will love you still more! But what a secret have you disclosed to me! I now see the reason why Mademoiselle de la Tour has estranged herself from me for two months past, and why she has determined to go. Ah, I perceive too well that she despises me!"

The hour of supper being arrived, we placed ourselves at table; but the different sensations with which we were all agitated left us little inclination to eat, and the meal passed in silence. Virginia first went out, and seated herself on the very spot where we now are. Paul hastened after her, and seated himself by her side. For some time both of them kept a profound silence. It was one of those delicious nights which are so common between the tropics, and the beauty of which no pencil can trace. The moon appeared in the midst of the firmament, curtained in clouds, which her beams gradually dispelled. Her light insensibly spread itself over the mountains of the island and over their peaks, which glistened with a silvered green. The winds were perfectly still. We heard along the woods, at the bottom of the valleys and on the summits of the rocks, the weak cry and the soft murmurs of the birds, wantoning in their nests and exulting in the brightness of the night and the serenity of the atmosphere. The hum of insects was heard in the grass. The stars sparkled in the heavens, and were reflected in the bosom of the sea that repeated their trembling images. Virginia's eyes wandered over its vast and gloomy horizon, distinguishable from the bay of the island by the red fires in the fishing-boats. She perceived at the entrance of the harbor a light and a shadow; these were the watchlight and the body of the vessel in which she was to embark for Europe, and which, ready to set sail, lay at anchor, waiting for the wind. Affected at this sight, she turned away her head, in order to hide her tears from Paul.

Madame de la Tour, Margaret, and myself were seated at a little distance beneath the plantain-trees; and in the stillness of the night we distinctly heard their conversation, which I have not forgotten.

Paul said to her: "You are going, they tell me, in three days. You do not fear, then, to encounter the danger of the sea, at which you are so much terrified?" "I must fulfil my duty," answered Virginia, "by obeying my parent." "You leave us," resumed Paul, "for a distant relation whom you have never seen. "Alas!" cried Virginia, "I would have remained my whole life here, but my mother would not have it so. My confessor told me that it was the will of God I should go; that life was a trial — O, how sore a trial it is!"

"What," exclaimed Paul, "you have found so many reasons then for going, and not one for remaining here! Ah, there is one reason more for your departure, which you do not tell me. Riches have great attractions. You will soon find in a new world another to whom you will give the name of brother, which you bestow on me no more. You will choose that brother from among persons who are worthy of you by their birth, and by a fortune which I have not to offer. But where will you go in order to be happier? On what shore will you land which will be dearer to you than the spot which gave you birth? Where will you find a society more interesting to you than this by which you are so beloved? How will you bear to live without your mother's caresses, to which you are so accustomed? What will become of her, already advanced in years, when she no longer sees you at her side at table, in the house, in the walks where she used to lean upon you? What will become of my mother, who loves you with the same affection? What shall I say to comfort them when I see them weeping for your absence? Cruel! I speak not to you of myself; but what will become of me, when in the morning I shall no more see you; when the evening will come, and will not reunite us; when I shall gaze on the two palm-trees planted at our birth, and so long the witnesses of our mutual friendship? Ah! since a new destiny attracts you, since you seek in a country distant from your own other possessions than those which were the fruits of my labor, let me accompany you in the vessel in which you are going to embark. I will animate your courage in the midst of those tempests at which you are so terrified even on shore. I will lay your head on my bosom. I will warm your heart upon my own; and in France, where you go in search of fortune and of grandeur, I will attend you as your slave. Happy only in your happiness, you will find me, in those palaces where I shall see you cherished and adored, at least sufficiently noble to make for you the greatest of all sacrifices by dying at your feet."

The violence of his emotion stifled his voice, and we then heard that of Virginia, which, broken by sobs, uttered these words. "It is for you I go; for you, whom I see every day bent beneath the labor of sustaining two infirm families. If I have accepted this opportunity of becoming rich, it is only to return you a thousand-fold the good which you have done us. Is there any fortune worthy of your friendship? Why do you talk to me of your birth? Ah! if it was again possible to give me a brother, should I make choice of any other than you? O Paul! Paul! you are far dearer to me than a brother! How much has it cost me to avoid you! Help me to tear myself from my very self, till Heaven can bless our union. Now I stay, I go, I live, I die; do with me as you will. Unhappy that I am! I could have withstood your caresses, but I cannot support your affliction."

At these words Paul seized her in his arms, and, holding her pressed fast to his bosom, cried, in a piercing tone, "I will go with her; nothing shall divide us!" We ran toward him; and Madame de la Tour said to him, "My son, if you go, what will become of us?"

He, trembling, repeated the words, "My son! — My son! — You, my mother," cried he; "you, who would separate the brother from the sister! We have both been nourished at your bosom; we have both been reared upon your knees; we have learnt of you to love each other; we have said so a thousand times; and now you would separate her from me! You send her to Europe, that barbarous country which refused you an asylum, and to relations by whom you were abandoned. You will tell me that I have no right over her, and that she is not my sister. She is everything to me, — riches, birth, family, my sole good! I know no other. We have had but one roof, one cradle, and we will have but one grave. If she goes, I will follow her. The Governor will prevent me! Will he prevent me from flinging myself into the sea? I will follow her by swimming! The sea cannot be more fatal to me than the land. Since I cannot live with her, at least I will die before her eyes, far from you. Inhuman mother! woman without compassion! May the ocean, to which you trust her, restore her to you no more! May the waves, rolling back our corpses amidst the stones of the beach, give you, in the loss of your two children, an eternal subject of remorse!"

At these words I seized him in my arms, for despair had deprived him of reason. His eyes flashed fire, big drops of sweat hung upon his face, his knees trembled, and I felt his heart beat violently against his burning bosom.

Virginia, affrighted, said to him, "O my friend, I call to witness the pleasures of our early age, your sorrow and my own, and everything that can forever bind two unfortunate beings to each other, that if I remain, I will live but for you; that if I go, I will one day return to be yours. I call you all to witness, — you who have reared my infancy who dispose of my life, who see my tears. I swear by that Heaven which hears me, by the sea which I am going to pass, by the air I breathe, which I never sullied by a falsehood."

As the sun softens and precipitates an icy rock from the summit of the Apennines, so the impetuous passions of the young man were subdued by the voice of her he loved. He bent his head, and a flood of tears fell from his eyes. His mother, mingling her tears with his, held him in her arms, but was unable to speak. Madame de la Tour, half distracted, said to me, "I can bear this no longer. My heart is broken. This unfortunate voyage shall not take place. Do take my son home with you. It is eight days since any one here has slept."

I said to Paul, "My dear friend, your sister will remain. To-morrow we will speak to the Governor; leave your family to take some rest, and come and pass the night with me. It is late; it is midnight; the Southern Cross is just above the horizon."

He suffered himself to be led away in silence, and, after a night of great agitation, he arose at break of day and returned home.

But why should I continue any longer to you the recital of this history? There is never but one aspect of human life which we can contemplate with pleasure. Like the globe upon which we revolve, our fleeting course is but a day; and if one part of that day be visited by light, the other is thrown into darkness.

"Father," I answered, "finish, I conjure you, the history which you have begun in a manner so interesting. If the images of happiness are most pleasing, those of misfortune are more instructive. What became, I pray you, of unhappy Paul?"

The first object which Paul saw on his way home was the negro woman Mary, who, mounted upon a rock, was earnestly looking toward the sea. As soon as he perceived her, he called to her from a distance, "Where is Virginia?" Mary turned her head toward her young master, and began to weep. Paul, beside himself, turned upon his steps and ran to the harbor. He was there informed that Virginia had embarked at break of day, that the vessel had immediately after set sail, and could no longer be discerned. He instantly returned to the plantation, which he crossed without uttering a word.

Although the pile of rocks behind us appears almost perpendicular, those green platforms which separate their summits are so many stages by means of which you may reach, through some difficult paths, that cone of hanging and inaccessible rocks called the Thumb. At the foot of that cone is a stretching slope of ground, covered with lofty trees, and so high and steep that it appears like a forest in air, surrounded by tremendous precipices. The clouds, which are attracted round the summit of the Thumb, supply innumerable rivulets, which fall to so great a depth in the valley situated behind that mountain, that from this elevated point we do not hear the sound of their fall. From that spot you can discern a considerable part of the island, with its precipices crowned with their majestic peaks; and, among others, Peter-Booth, and the Three Breasts, with their valley filled with woods. You also command an extensive view of the ocean, and even perceive the Isle of Bourbon forty leagues toward the west. It was from this height that Paul gazed upon the vessel which had borne away Virginia. He saw it, more than ten leagues out at sea, appearing like a black spot in the midst of the ocean. He remained a great part of the day with his eyes fixed upon this object: when it had disappeared, he still fancied he beheld it; and when it was lost in the mists of the horizon, he seated himself on that wild point, forever beaten by the winds, which never cease to agitate the tops of the cabbage and gum trees upon it. Their hoarse, moaning murmurs are like the distant sound of organs, and inspire a deep melancholy. There I found Paul, with his head reclined on the rock, and his eyes fixed upon the ground. I had followed him since break of day, and after much importunity, I prevailed with him to descend and return to his family. I went home with him, where the first impulse of his mind, upon seeing Madame de la Tour, was to reproach her bitterly for having deceived him. Madame de la Tour told us that a favorable wind having sprung up at three o'clock in the morning, and the vessel being ready to set sail, the Governor, attended by some of his staff and the missionary, had come with a palanquin in search of Virginia, and that, notwithstanding her own objections, her tears, and those of Margaret, all the while exclaiming that it was for the good of them all, they had carried away her daughter almost dying. "At least," cried Paul, "if I had bid her farewell, I should now be more calm. I would have said to her, Virginia, if, during the time we have lived together, one word may have escaped me which has offended you, before you leave me forever, tell me that you forgive me, I would have said to her, Since I am destined to see you no more, farewell, my dear Virginia, farewell! Live, far from me, contented and happy!"

When he saw that his mother and Madame de la Tour were weeping, "You must now," said he, "seek some other than me to wipe away your tears"; and then, rushing out of the house and groaning aloud, he wandered up and down the plantation. He hovered especially about those spots which had been most dear to Virginia. He said to the goats and their little kids which followed him, bleating, "What do you ask of me? You will see no more with me her who used to feed you with her own hand." He went to the bower called Virginia's Resting-place, and, as the birds flew around him, exclaimed, "Poor birds! you will fly no more to meet her who cherished you!" and observing Fidéle running backward and forward in search of her, he heaved a deep sigh, and cried, "Ah, you will never find her again!" At length he went and seated himself upon the rock where he had conversed with her the preceding evening, and at the view of the ocean upon which he had seen the vessel disappear which bore her away, he wept bitterly.

We continually watched his steps, apprehending some fatal consequence from the violent agitation of his mind. His mother and Madame de la Tour conjured him, in the most tender manner, not to increase their affliction by his despair. At length Madame de la Tour soothed his mind by lavishing upon him such epithets as were best calculated to revive his hopes. She called him her son, her dear son, her son-in-law whom she destined for her daughter. She prevailed with him to return to the house and receive a little nourishment. He seated himself with us at table next to the place which used to be occupied by the companion of his childhood, and, as if she had still been present, he spoke to her, and offered whatever he knew was most agreeable to her taste; and then, perceiving his wandering, he began to weep. For some days he employed himself in gathering together everything which had belonged to Virginia, — the last nosegays she had worn, the cocoa-shell in which she used to drink, and, as if those relics of his friend had been the most precious treasures which the world contained, he kissed them and hid them in his bosom. Amber does not shed so sweet a perfume as the objects which have belonged to those we love. At length, perceiving that his anguish increased that of his mother and Madame de la Tour, and that the wants of the family required continual labor, he began, with the assistance of Domingo, to repair the garden.

Soon after, this young man, till now indifferent as a Creole with respect to what was passing in the world, desired I would teach him to read and write, that he might carry on a correspondence with Virginia. He then wished to be instructed in geography, in order that he might form a just idea of the country where she had disembarked; and in history, that he might know the manners of the society in which she was placed. Just so he had become versed in agriculture, and in the art of laying out the most irregular grounds with advantage and beauty, by this same sentiment of love. Without doubt it is to the fond dreams of this restless and ardent passion that mankind are indebted for a great number of arts and sciences, while its disappointments have given birth to philosophy, which teaches us to bear the evils of life with resignation. Thus Nature, having made love the general link which binds all beings, has rendered it the first spring of society, the first incitement to knowledge as well as pleasure.

Paul found little satisfaction in the study of geography, which, instead of describing the natural history of each country, gives us only a view of its political boundaries. History, and especially modern history, interested him little more. He there saw only general and periodical evils of which he did not discern the cause; wars, for which there was no reason and no object; nations without principle, and princes without humanity. He preferred the reading of romances, which, being filled with the particular feelings and interests of men, represented situations similar to his own. No book gave him so much pleasure as "Telemachus," from the pictures which it draws of pastoral life, and of those passions which are natural to the human heart. He read aloud to his mother and Madame de la Tour those parts which affected him most sensibly, when, sometimes, touched by the most tender remembrances, his voice became choked, and his eyes were filled with tears. He fancied he had found in Virginia the wisdom of Antiope, with the misfortunes and the tenderness of Eucharis. With very different sensations he perused our fashionable novels, filled with licentious maxims and manners. And when he was informed that those romances drew a just picture of European society, he trembled, not without reason, lest Virginia should become corrupted, and should forget him.

More than a year and a half had indeed passed away before Madame de la Tour received any tidings of her daughter. During that period she had only accidentally heard that Virginia had arrived safely in France. At length a vessel, which stopped on its way to the Indies, brought to Madame de la Tour a packet, and a letter written with her own hand. Notwithstanding the care taken by her loving and gentle daughter, Madame de la Tour was certain that she was not at all happy. Her letter paints so naturally her situation and her character, that I have retained it almost word for word:—

"My dearest and beloved Mother: I have already sent you several letters written with my own hand, but having received no answer, I fear they have not reached you. I have better hopes for this, from the means I have now taken of sending you tidings of myself, and of hearing from you.

"I have shed many tears since our separation; I, who never used to weep but for the misfortunes of others! My aunt was much astonished when, having upon my arrival inquired what accomplishments I possessed, I told her that I could neither read nor write. She asked me what then I had learned since I came into the world, and when I answered that I had been taught to take care of the household affairs and obey your will, she told me that I had received the education of a servant. The next day she placed me as a boarder in a great abbey near Paris, where I have masters of all kinds, who teach me, among other things, history, geography, grammar, mathematics, and riding. But I have so little capacity for all these sciences that I make but small progress with my masters. I feel that I am but a poor creature, with very little ability to learn what they can teach. My aunt's kindness, however, does not lessen. She gives me new dresses for each season, and she has placed two waiting-women with me, who are both dressed like fine ladies. She has made me take the title of countess, but has obliged me to renounce the name of La Tour, which is as dear to me as it is to you, from all you have told me of the sufferings my father endured in order to marry you. She has replaced your name by that of your family, which is also dear to me, because it was your name when a girl. Seeing myself in so splendid a situation I implored her to let me send you some assistance. But how shall I repeat her answer? Yet you have desired me always to tell you the truth. She told me, then, that a little would be of no use to you, and that a great deal would only encumber you in the simple life you led.

"I endeavored, upon my arrival, to send you tidings of myself by another hand, since I could not myself write; but, finding no person here in whom I could place confidence, I applied night and day to reading and writing, and God gave me grace to attain my end in a short time. I intrusted my first letters to some of the ladies here, who, I have reason to think, carried them to my aunt. This time I have had recourse to a boarder, who is my friend. I send you her direction, by means of which I shall receive your answer. My aunt has forbid my holding any correspondence whatever, which might, she says, become an obstacle to the great views she has for my advantage. No person is allowed to see me at the grate but herself and an old nobleman, one of her friends, who, she says, is much pleased with me. I am sure I am not at all so with him, nor should I, even if it were possible for me to be pleased with any one at present.

"I live in the midst of affluence, and have not a sou at my disposal. They say I might make an improper use of money. Even my clothes belong to my waiting-women, who quarrel about them before I have left them off. In the bosom of riches, I am poorer than when I lived with you; for I have nothing to give. When I found that the great accomplishments they taught me would not procure me the power of doing the smallest good, I had recourse to my needle, of which, happily, you had taught me the use. I send several pair of stockings of my own making for you and Mamma Margaret, a cap for Domingo, and one of my red handkerchiefs for Mary. I also send with this packet some kernels and seeds of various kinds of fruits, which I gathered during my hours of recreation in the abbey park. I have added also some seeds of violets, daisies, buttercups, poppies, blue-bottle, and scabiouses, which I picked up in the fields. There are many more beautiful flowers in the meadows of this country than in ours, but nobody cares for them. I am sure that you and Mamma Margaret will be better pleased with this bag of seeds than you were with the bag of piastres, which was the cause of our separation and of my tears. It will give me great delight if you should one day see apple-trees growing at the side of the plantain, and elms blending their foliage with our cocoa-trees. You will fancy yourself in Normandy, which you love so much.

"You desired me to relate to you my joys and my griefs. I have no joys far from you. As for my griefs, I endeavor to soothe them by reflecting that I am in the situation in which you placed me by the will of God. But my greatest affliction is, that no one here speaks to me of you, and that I must speak of you to no one. My waiting-women — or rather those of my aunt, for they belong more to her than to me — say to me when I attempt to turn the conversation upon the objects most dear to me, 'Remember, mademoiselle, that you are a French woman, and must forget that country of savages.' Ah, sooner will I forget myself than forget the spot on which I was born, and where you dwell! It is this country which is to me a land of savages; for I live alone, having no one to whom I can impart those feelings of tenderness for you which I shall bear with me to the grave. I am,

"My dearest and beloved mother,

"Your affectionate and dutiful daughter,

"VIRGINIA DE LA TOUR.

"I recommend to your goodness Mary and Domingo, who took so much care of my infancy. Caress Fidéle for me, who found me in the wood."

Paul was astonished that Virginia had not said one word of him, she who had not forgotten even the house-dog. But he was not aware that, however long may be a woman's letter, she keeps her tenderest sentiment for the close.

In a postscript Virginia recommended particularly to Paul's care two kinds of seed, those of the violet and the scabious. She gave him some instructions upon the nature of those plants and the spots most proper for their cultivation. "The violet," said she, "produces a little flower of a deep purple color, which loves to hide itself beneath the bushes, but is soon discovered by its delightful odors." She desired those seeds might be sown along the borders of the fountain, at the foot of her cocoa-tree. "The scabious," she added, "produces a beautiful flower of a pale blue, and a black ground, spotted with white. You might fancy it was in mourning, and for this reason it is called the widow's flower. It delights in bleak spots beaten by the winds." She begged him to sow this upon the rock where she had spoken to him at night for the last time, and for her sake to give it henceforth the name of the Farewell Rock.

She had put those seeds into a little purse, the tissue of which was extremely simple; but which appeared above all price to Paul when he perceived a P and a V entwined together, and formed of hair which he knew from its beauty to be the hair of Virginia.

The whole family listened with tears to the letter of that sensitive and pure girl. Her mother answered it in the name of the little society, and desired her to remain or return at her will; assuring her that they had lost their chief happiness since her departure, and that, for herself, she was inconsolable.

Paul also sent her a long letter, in which he assured her that he would make the garden worthy of her, and blend the plants of Europe with those of Africa as she had blended their initials together in her work. He sent her some fruit from the cocoa-trees of the fountain, which were now arrived at maturity; telling her that he would not add seeds of any other trees of the island, that the desire of seeing their fruit again might hasten her return. He conjured her to comply without delay with the ardent wishes of her family, and, above all, with his own, since he could never hereafter taste any happiness while far from her.

With a careful hand Paul sowed the European seeds, particularly the violet and the scabious, the flowers of which seemed to bear some analogy to the character and situation of Virginia, who had so especially recommended them; but whether they were injured by the voyage, or whether the soil of this part of Africa was unfavorable to their growth, a very small number of them blew, and none came to perfection.

Meanwhile that envy which pursues human happiness, especially in the French colonies, spread some reports over the island which gave great uneasiness to Paul. The passengers in the vessel that had brought Virginia's letter asserted that she was upon the point of being married, and named the nobleman of the court to whom she was betrothed. Some even declared that the affair had already taken place and that they had been witnesses of it. Paul at first despised this report, brought by one of those trading ships which often spread false reports in their passage; but when some inhabitants of the island by an insulting commiseration affected to pity him for the issue, he began to give some credit to the story. He had seen in the novels which he had lately read, that perfidy was treated as a subject of pleasantry; and knowing that those books were faithful representations of European manners, he feared that the heart of Virginia was corrupted, and had forgotten its former engagements. Thus his acquirements only served to render him miserable; and what increased his apprehension was, that several ships arrived from Europe, during the space of six months, and not one brought any tidings of Virginia.

This unfortunate young man, with a heart torn by a most cruel agitation, came often to visit me, that I might confirm or banish his inquietude by my experience of the world.

I live, as I have already told you, a league and a half from hence, upon the banks of a little river which glides along the Sloping Mountain; there I lead a solitary life, without wife, children, or slaves.

After having enjoyed, and lost, the rare felicity of living with a congenial mind, the state of life which appears the least wretched is that of living alone. Every man who has much cause to complain of his fellows seeks solitude. It is very remarkable that all those nations which have been rendered unhappy by their opinions, their manners, or their forms of government, have produced numerous classes of citizens altogether devoted to solitude and celibacy. Such were the Egyptians in their decline, the Greeks of the Lower Empire; and such in our days are the Indians, the Chinese, the modern Greeks, the Italians, and most part of the eastern and southern nations of Europe.

Solitude restores to men, in a degree, natural enjoyments, in removing them from social unhappiness. In the midst of society, divided by so many prejudices, the spirit is in a constant state of agitation; it is continually revolving in itself a thousand turbulent and contradictory opinions, by which the members of an ambitious and miserable circle seek to raise themselves above each other. But in solitude the soul lays aside the morbid illusions which troubled her, and resumes the pure consciousness of herself, of Nature, and of its Author. Thus, the muddy water of a torrent which has ravaged the plains, turning aside from its course into some little basin, deposits its slime, resumes its primitive clearness, and, once more pure, reflects within its own banks the verdure of the earth and the light of heaven. Solitude also re-establishes the harmony of the powers of the body and the soul. Among the class who live a solitary life are those who push the career of man to its farthest limit, as the Brahmin of India. In short, I believe solitude to be so necessary to happiness, even in the world, that it seems to me impossible to derive lasting pleasure from any sentiment whatsoever, or to regulate our conduct on any sound principle, if we do not create for ourselves an interior solitude, from whence our opinion rarely goes forth, and into which the opinions of others never enter. I would not say, however, that man should live absolutely alone; he is linked with mankind by his necessities; his labors are due to men; he owes himself also to Nature. But as God has given to each one of us organs perfectly adapted to the elements of the globe on which we live, — feet for the ground, lungs for the air, eyes for the light, — without the power of changing the use of any of these faculties, he has reserved for himself alone, who is the Author of life, the heart, which is its principal organ.

Thus I pass my days far from mankind, whom I wished to serve and by whom I have been persecuted. After having travelled over many countries of Europe, and some parts of America and Africa, I at length pitched my tent in this thinly peopled island, allured by its mild temperature and its solitude. A cottage which I built in the woods at the foot of a tree, a little field which I cultivated with my own hands, a river which glides before my door, suffice for my want and for my pleasures. I blend with these enjoyments that of some chosen books, which teach me to become better. They make that world which I have abandoned still contribute to my satisfaction. They place before me pictures of those passions which render its inhabitants so miserable; and the comparison which I make between their destiny and my own leads me to feel a sort of negative happiness. Like a man saved from shipwreck and thrown upon a rock, I contemplate, from my solitude, the storms which roll over the rest of the world, and my repose seems more profound from the distant sounds of the tempest.

Since men are no longer in my path nor I in theirs, I no longer hate them: I pity them. If I meet some unfortunate one, I endeavor to aid him by my counsels, as a passer-by on the border of a torrent stretches his hand to a drowning man. But I have rarely found any but the innocent attentive to my voice. Nature calls the rest of men in vain; each one forms an image of her for himself, which he clothes with his own passions. He pursues all his life this vain phantom which leads him astray, and afterward complains to Heaven of the error which is his own. Among the great number of unfortunate ones that I have endeavored to bring back to Nature, I have not found one who was not intoxicated with his own misery. They have listened to me at first with attention, in the hope that I would aid them to acquire glory or fortune; but when they saw that I only wished to teach them to do without these, they considered me miserable because I did not run after their wretched happiness; they blamed my solitary life; they pretended that they alone were useful to men, and endeavored to draw me into their vortex. But if I communicate with all the world, I give my confidence to none. It is often sufficient for me to serve as a lesson to myself. In my present calm I review the past agitations of my own life, to which I have given so much value, — patronage, fortune, reputation, pleasure, and the opinions which are ever at strife throughout the world. I liken so many men whom I have seen disputing over these chimeras, and who are no more, to the waves of my river which break in foam against the rocks in their bed, and disappear never to return.

For me, I suffer myself to be led calmly down the stream of time to the ocean of the future, which has no shores; and by the contemplation of the present harmony of Nature I raise my soul toward its Author, and hope for a more happy destiny in another world.

Although one does not see from my hermitage, situated in the midst of a forest, that variety of objects which is presented to us from the elevated spot where we now are, there is much there that is interesting, especially for a man who, like me, prefers self-communion to looking abroad upon external objects. The river which flows before my door passes in a straight line through the wood, appearing like a long canal shaded by all varieties of foliage. There are the black date and the ebony; that which they call here the apple, the olive, and cinnamon; thickets of palms raise their naked stems a hundred feet high, their summits crowned with tufts of palm-leaves, and appearing above the rest of the trees like a forest planted upon a forest. There intertwine lianas of various foliage, which reach from one tree to another, forming here arcades of flowers and there canopies of verdure. Most of these trees emit aromatic odors, which can be perceived even after several hours in the garments of those who have passed through the forest. At the time of their blossoming one might think they were covered with snow. At the end of summer many sorts of foreign birds come, guided by an incomprehensible instinct across vast oceans, to feed upon the seeds of the plants which grow upon the island, and to contrast the brilliancy of their plumage with the foliage browned by the sun. Among these are various species of paroquets and the blue pigeons called here Dutch pigeons. Monkeys, the domesticated inhabitants of our forests, sport in the dark branches, from which they can be distinguished by their grayish green skins and black faces, — some swinging in the air, suspended by their tails; others leaping from branch to branch, with their little ones in their arms. The murderous gun has never frightened these peaceable children of Nature. Nothing is heard but cries of joy, the warbling and chirping of southern birds, which are repeated by the echoes of the forest. The river, which runs rippling over a bed of rocks, through the trees, reflects here and there in its limpid waters their venerable masses of verdure and shadow, as well as the sports of their inhabitants; a short distance beyond it is precipitated over ledges of rocks, forming in its fall a sheet of water smooth as glass, and breaking at the bottom into a foaming mass. Innumerable confused sounds issue from these tumultuous waters, which, dispersed by the winds of the forest, sometimes seem near and sometimes far off, and sometimes deafening as the clang of cathedral bells. The air, being constantly renewed by the motion of the water, causes on the borders of this river a verdure and freshness, notwithstanding the heats of summer, that are rarely found in this island, even on the mountains.

At some distance there is a rock, far enough from the cascade that one may not be deafened by the noise of the torrent, and yet near enough for one to enjoy the sight of it, the coolness of the air, and the murmur of the water. Sometimes, when it was very warm, we would go to dine in the shadow of this rock, — Madame de la Tour, Margaret, Virginia, Paul, and I. Virginia, who in all her actions thought of the good of others, in eating fruit, always put the seed or kernel into the ground. "From them there will come," said she, "trees which will give their fruit to some traveller, or at least to a bird." One day she had eaten a papaw at the foot of this rock, and planted the seed. Soon after several sprung up, and one of them was of the kind which bears fruit. This tree was not as high as Virginia's knees when she left, but, as it grew rapidly, two years after it was twenty feet high, and the upper part of its trunk was encircled by several rows of ripe fruit. Paul, coming to the place by chance, was filled with joy on seeing this tall tree which had sprung from the little seed that he had seen planted by his friend; and at the same time was seized with profound sadness at this evidence of the length of her absence. Things which we see constantly do not remind us of the flight of time; they grow old with us insensibly; but it is those which we see again after several years that remind us how rapidly runs the river of our days. Paul was as surprised and excited at the sight of this tall papaw in fruit as a traveller is, after a long absence from his country, not to find, on his return, his contemporaries, and to see their children, whom he had left at the breast, themselves fathers of families. At one moment he wished to hew it down, because it made him feel how long the time was since the departure of Virginia; then, regarding it as a monument of her benevolence, he kissed its trunk, and addressed it in words full of love and regret.

O tree, whose posterity still exists in our woods, I myself have looked upon ye with more interest and veneration than upon triumphal arches of the Romans. May Nature, which destroys every day the monuments of the ambition of kings, multiply in our forests those of the benevolence of a young and poor girl!

It was then at the foot of this papaw-tree that I was sure of meeting Paul when he came into my neighborhood. One day I found him there depressed and melancholy, and had a conversation with him that I will repeat to you, if I do not weary you too much with my long digressions, pardonable at my age. I will tell it in the form of dialogue, that you may judge of the natural good sense of the young man. He said to me:—

"I am very unhappy. Mademoiselle de la Tour left us two years and two months since, and for eight months and a half she has sent us no news of herself. She is rich, I am poor; she has forgotten me. I will sail for France, I will serve the king, I will make a fortune, and the aunt of Mademoiselle de la Tour will give me her niece in marriage when I shall have become a great lord."

The old man. "O my friend, have you not told me that you are not of good birth?"

Paul. "My mother has told me so; but, for myself, I do not know what good birth is. I have never perceived that I had less than others or that others had more than I."

The old man. "Want of birth will in France bar the way to all high position. More than that, you cannot be admitted into any distinguished corps."

Paul. "You have told me more than once that one of the causes of the grandeur of France was that the least subject could attain anything; and you have cited many celebrated men who, having sprung from a low condition, have done honor to their country. Do you wish, then, to damp my courage?"

The old man. "My son, never would I do that. I have told you the truth of time past, but things are much changed now; everything has become venal in France; everything is in the possession of a small number of families or of certain bodies of men. The king is a sun that the nobles and these corporate bodies surround like clouds; it is nearly impossible that one of his rays should fall upon you. Formerly, in an administration less complicated, such phenomena have been seen. Then talents and merits showed themselves everywhere, as new lands after they are cleared yield with abundance. But great kings who know men and how to choose them are rare. The ordinary race of monarchs are swayed by the nobles and courtiers that surround them."

Paul. "But perhaps I shall find one of these nobles who will protect me."

The old man. "In order to be protected by the great, you must serve their ambition or their pleasures. You will never succeed there, for you are without birth and you are honest."

Paul. "But I will perform such courageous actions, I will be so faithful to my words, so exact in the performance of my duties, so zealous and so constant in my friendships, that I will deserve to be adopted by one of them, as I have seen instances in the ancient histories which you have made me read."

The old man. "O my friend! among the Greeks and Romans, even in their decline, the nobles respected virtue; we have had multitudes of men in France who have distinguished themselves in every possible manner, and who have sprung from the mass of the people, but I do not know of a single one who had been adopted by a great family. Virtue, without our kings, would be condemned in France to be eternally plebeian. As I have told you, sometimes they honor it when they perceive it; but in the present day the distinctions which should be reserved for virtue can only be obtained by money."

Paul. "If I cannot find a nobleman to adopt me, I will seek to please some public body. I will espouse its interests and opinions; I will make myself beloved by it."

The old man. "Will you act then like other men: will you sacrifice your conscience to be successful?"

Paul. "O no, I will never seek anything but the truth."

The old man. "Instead of making yourself beloved, you would make yourself hated. Besides, public bodies interest themselves very little in the discovery of truth. All opinions are indifferent to the ambitious, provided they govern."

Paul. "How unfortunate I am! everything repulses me. I am condemned to pass my life in obscure labor far from Virginia!" And he sighed profoundly.

The old man. "Let God be your only patron, and the human race the body you would serve. Be constantly attached to them both. Families, corporations, people, and kings have their prejudices and passions; it is often necessary to serve them by vices; God and the human race only demand virtues. But why do you wish to be distinguished from the rest of mankind? It is a sentiment which is not natural, since if every one possessed it, every man would be at war with his neighbor. Be contented with fulfilling your duty in the station where Providence has placed you; be grateful for your lot, which permits you to have a conscience of your own, and which does not oblige you, like the great, to let your happiness rest on the opinion of the little; or, like the little, to cringe to the great in order to obtain the means to live. You are in a country and a condition in which, in order to live, it is not necessary for you to deceive nor flatter nor debase yourself, as most of those who seek fortune in Europe are obliged to do; in which the exercise of no virtue is forbidden you; in which you may be with impunity good, true, sincere, well-informed, patient, temperate, chaste, pious, without any shaft of ridicule coming to blast your wisdom, which is yet only in flower. Heaven has given you liberty, health, a good conscience, and friends; the kings whose favor you desire are not so happy."

Paul. "Ah! I only want Virginia. Without her, I have nothing; with her, I should have all. She alone is my birth, my glory, and my fortune. But since her aunt will give her for her husband a man with a great name, and with study and books one can become learned and celebrated, I am going to study. I will become a man of science; I will serve usefully my country with my knowledge without injuring any one, without depending upon any one; I will become celebrated, and my glory shall be achieved by myself alone."

The old man. "My son, talents are yet more rare than birth or riches; and without doubt they are a greater good than either, since nothing can take them from us, and everywhere they obtain for us public esteem. But they cost dearly; one only acquires them by privations of all sorts, — by exquisite sensibility, which exposes us to unhappiness from within and from without, by the persecutions of our contemporaries. The lawyer in France envies not the glory of the soldier, nor the soldier that of the naval officer; but every one will cross your path, because every one prides himself upon having talents and wit. You will serve mankind, you say; but he who makes the earth produce one grain more of wheat renders them a greater service than he who gives them a book."

Paul. "Ah! she who planted this papaw has made a more useful and more grateful present to the inhabitants of this island than if she had given them a whole library." And at the same time he threw his arms around the tree, and kissed it with transport.

The old man. "The best of books, which only preaches equality, brotherly love, charity, and peace, — the gospel, — has served as a pretext for centuries in Europe for the action of the evil passions. How many tyrannies, both public and private, are still practised in its name! After that, who will flatter himself that he can be useful to men by a book? Recall the fate of most of the philosophers who have preached to them wisdom. Homer, who clothed it in such noble verse, asked alms all his life; Socrates, who gave to the Athenians such admirable lessons by his discourses and his manners, was judicially sentenced by them to be poisoned. His sublime disciple, Plato, was delivered into slavery by the order of the very prince who protected him; and before them, Pythagoras, whose humanity extended even to animals, was burned alive by the Crotoniates. What do I say? many even of these illustrious names have descended to us disfigured by some traits of satire with which they were characterized, — human ingratitude taking pleasure in thus recognizing them; and if in the crowd the glory of some names has come down to us pure and without blemish, it is because those who bore them lived apart from the society of their contemporaries; like those statues which are found buried in the fields of Greece and Italy, which, by being hidden in the bosom of the earth, have escaped uninjured the fury of the barbarians.

"You see, then, that to acquire the stormy glory of literature, you must have virtue, and be ready to sacrifice your own life. Besides, do you think that in France this glory interests the rich? Do you suppose they care for men of letters, whose knowledge brings them neither honors nor power, nor even admission at court? There is, it is true, little persecution in this age, which is indifferent to everything but wealth and luxury; but knowledge and virtue lead no longer to distinction, because everything in the state is to be purchased with money. Formerly, men of letters found sure rewards in places in the Church, the magistracy, or the administration; now they are only considered useful to make books; but this fruit, little prized by people of the world, is worthy its divine origin. To these books is reserved the privilege of shedding lustre on obscure virtue, of consoling the unhappy, of enlightening nations, and of telling the truth even to kings. This is unquestionably the most august function with which Heaven can honor a mortal on earth. Where is the man who would not be consoled for the injustice or contempt of those who are the dispensers of the ordinary gifts of fortune, when he reflects that his work may pass from age to age, from nation to nation, serving as a barrier to error and tyranny; and that from amid the obscurity in which he has lived, there will shine forth a glory which will efface that of most kings, the monuments of whose deeds perish in oblivion, notwithstanding the flatterers who erect and extol them?"

Paul. "Ah! I only desire that glory that it may be reflected upon Virginia, and make her dear to the whole world. But you, who know so much, tell me if we shall ever be married. I should like to be learned, that I may know the future."

The old man. "Who would live, my son, if he knew the future? A single misfortune foreseen gives us so much useless inquietude! The foreknowledge of one certain calamity poisons all the days that precede it. We must not even pry too curiously into the things that surround us; and Heaven, which has given us the power of reflection to foresee our necessities, has given us those necessities to set limits to its exercise."

Paul. "You tell me that in Europe, with money, one acquires dignities and honors. I will go to Bengal to enrich myself, that I may afterward go to Paris and marry Virginia. I will embark at once."

The old man. "What! would you leave her mother and yours?"

Paul. "You yourself have advised me to go to the Indies."

The old man. "Virginia was then here; but you are now the only support of her mother and your own."

Paul. "Virginia will assist them through her rich relation."

The old man. "The rich only give to those who do them honor in the world. There are many relations of the rich more to be pitied than Madame de la Tour, who, for want of aid, sacrifice their liberty for bread, and pass their lives immured in a convent."

Paul. "What a country is Europe! O, Virginia must come back! What need has she of a rich relation? She was so happy in these cabins, so beautiful, and so adorned, with a red handkerchief twisted about her head or flowers in her hair! Return, Virginia! leave your fine house and your grandeur. Come back to these rocks, to the shade of these woods and our cocoa-trees. Alas, you are perhaps now unhappy!" And he began to weep. "My father," continued he, "hide nothing from me; if you cannot tell me whether I shall marry Virginia, at least tell me if she loves me still, surrounded as she is by those grand seigneurs who speak to the king, and who go to see her."

The old man. "Ah, my dear friend! I am sure, for many reasons, that she loves you; but, above all, because she is virtuous." At these words he threw himself upon my neck in a transport of joy.

Paul. "But do you think the women of Europe are false, as they are represented in the comedies and books which you have lent me?"

The old man. "Women are false in countries where men are tyrants. Everywhere violence produces deceit."

Paul. "How can one be a tyrant to a woman?"

The old man. "By giving them in marriage without consulting them, — a young girl to an old man, a woman of sensibility to an indifferent husband."

Paul. "Why not marry those who suit each other, — the young to the young, lovers to those who love them?"

The old man. "Because few young men in France have property enough to marry, and only acquire it as they become old. When young, they seduce the wives of others; when old, they cannot secure the affection of their own. They have deceived when they were young; they are deceived in their turn when they are old. This is one of the reactions of that universal justice which governs the world; one excess is always balanced by another. Thus the greater part of Europeans pass their life in this double disorder, and this disorder increases everywhere in the same proportion that wealth is accumulated in the hands of the few. The state is like a garden where the small trees cannot grow if too many large ones overshadow them; but there is this difference, that the beauty of a garden may result from a small number of large trees, and that the prosperity of a state always depends upon the multitude and equality of its citizens, and not on a small number of rich men."

Paul. "But why is it necessary to be rich in order to marry?"

The old man. "In order to pass one's days in abundance, without working."

Paul. "But why not work? I am sure I work hard enough."

The old man. "Because in Europe labor with the hands is considered a degradation; they call it mechanical labor. That of cultivating the earth is the most despised of all. An artisan is there held in higher esteem than a peasant."

Paul. "What! the art which nourishes man is despised in Europe! I do not understand you."

The old man. "It is not possible for one educated according to Nature to comprehend the depraved state of society. One can form a precise idea of order, but not of disorder. Beauty, virtue, happiness, have their proportions; deformity, vice, and misery have none."

Paul. "The rich then are very happy! They encounter no obstacles; they can lavish happiness on those they love."

The old man. "They are for the most part satiated with pleasure, for the reason that it costs them no pains. Have you not yourself experienced that the pleasure of repose is bought by fatigue, that of eating by hunger, that of drinking by thirst? Well! that of loving and being loved is only acquired by innumerable privations and sacrifices. Wealth, by anticipating all their necessities, deprives its possessors of all these pleasures. Add to the ennui consequent upon satiety the pride which springs from their opulence; and that the least privation wounds, while the greatest enjoyments have no longer the power to gratify them. The perfume of a thousand roses pleases but for a moment; but the pain a single thorn causes endures long after the wound. A single evil in the midst of their pleasures is, for the rich, a thorn among flowers. For the poor, on the contrary, one pleasure in the midst of their troubles is a flower among thorns; they taste keenly the pleasure. All effects are heightened by contrast. Nature has balanced all things. Which condition, upon the whole, do you think preferable, — to have almost nothing to hope and everything to fear, or almost nothing to fear and all to hope? The first state is that of the rich, and the second that of the poor. But either of these extremes is equally difficult for man to bear, whose happiness consists in possessing a competence and virtue."

Paul. "What do you understand by virtue?"

The old man. "My son, to you who sustain your family by your labor, it is not necessary to define it. Virtue is the effort that we make for the good of others, with the desire to please God for our motive."

Paul. "O, how virtuous is Virginia! It is through virtue that she wished to be rich, in order to be benevolent. It is through virtue that she left this island; virtue will bring her back."

The idea of her speedy return firing the imagination of the young man, all his inquietude vanished. Virginia had not written because she would soon arrive. It took so little time to come from Europe with a good wind! He enumerated the vessels which had made the passage of four thousand five hundred leagues in less than three months Perhaps the vessel in which she had embarked would not be more than two, shipbuilders were so ingenious now, and sailors so expert! He talked of the arrangements he would make for her reception, of the new dwelling he would build, of the pleasures and surprises he would contrive for her each day when she should be his wife. His wife! The idea was ecstasy. "At least, my father," he said to me, "you shall do nothing but for your pleasure. Virginia being rich, we shall have many negroes who will labor for us You will be always with us, having no other care than to amuse yourself and be happy." And, almost beside himself, he went to impart to his family the joy with which he was intoxicated.

Soon, however, great fears succeeded great hopes. Violent passions always throw the soul into opposite extremes. The next day Paul came to see me, overwhelmed with sadness. He said to me: "Virginia has not written me. If she had left Europe, she would have warned me of her departure. Ah, the reports which I have heard of her are but too well founded! Her aunt has married her to some great lord. She, like so many others, has been undone by the love of riches. In those books which portray women so well, virtue is but a subject for romance. Had Virginia possessed virtue, she would not have forsaken her mother and me. While I pass my life in thinking of her, she forgets me. I am wretched and she is diverting herself. Ah, that thought distracts me! All work is hateful to me, all society wearies me. Would to God that war were declared in India! I would go there and die."

"My son," I answered, "that courage which would seek death is only the courage of a moment. It is often excited by the vain applause of men. There is another sort of courage, which is more rare and more necessary, which enables us to support every day, without witness and without applause, the vexations of life; that is patience. It rests not upon the opinions of others or the impulse of the passions, but upon the will of God. Patience is the courage of virtue."

"Ah," cried he, "then I am without virtue! Everything overwhelms me and drives me to despair."

"Virtue," I replied, "that is always equal, constant, and invariable, does not belong to man. In the midst of the many passions which agitate us, our reason is disordered and obscured; but there are beacon lights at which we can always relight the flame; these are literature.

"Literature, my son, is the gift of Heaven. It is a ray of that wisdom which governs the universe that man, inspired by a celestial art, has learned to keep on the earth. Like the rays of the sun, it enlightens, it rejoices, it warms; it is a divine fire. Like fire, it appropriates all nature for our use. By it we bring around us all things, all men, places, and times. It is this that reminds us of the rules of human life. It calms the passions, it represses the vices, it excites to virtue by the august examples of good and great men which it records, and of whom it presents to us the ever-honored images. It is a daughter of Heaven which has descended to earth to charm away the evils of the human race. The greatest writers have always appeared in the worst times, the hardest to be borne by society, — times of barbarism and depravity. My son, literature has consoled an infinite number of men more unhappy than you. Xenophon, exiled from his country after having saved to her ten thousand of her sons; Scipio Africanus, wearied to death by the calumnies of the Romans; Lucullus, by their intrigues; Catinat, by the ingratitude of his court. The Greeks, so ingenious, gave to each one of the Muses who preside over literature a particular part of our understanding to govern; we ought then to give to literature our passions to govern, that it may impose upon them a yoke and a curb. They ought to fulfil with regard to the powers of our souls the same functions as the Hours who harnessed and drove the horses in the chariot of the Sun.

"Read then, my son. The wise men, who have written before our time, are travellers who have preceded us in the paths of misfortune, and who reach out to us their hands to invite us to join their society, when all else have abandoned us. A good book is a good friend."

"Ah," cried Paul, "I did not need to read when Virginia was here! She had not studied more than I, and when she looked at me and called me her friend, I could not be unhappy."

"Without doubt," I said to him, "there is no friend so agreable as a mistress by whom one is beloved. There is, besides, in woman a lively gayety which dissipates the sadness of man. Her graces cause the dark phantoms of reflection to vanish. In her countenance is tender consolation and confidence. What joy is not heightened by her joy? What frowns are not dispelled by her smiles? What anger can resist her tears? Virginia will return with more philosophy than you have. She will be much surprised not to find the garden finished, — she who thought of its embellishment, notwithstanding the persecutions of her aunt, far from her mother and from you."

The idea of Virginia's near return renewed the courage of Paul, and he resumed his rural occupations; happy, in the midst of his pain, to give to his labor an object which pleased his passion.

At daybreak on the morning of December 24, 1744, Paul, when he arose, perceived a white flag hoisted on the Mountain of Discovery. This flag was the signal of a vessel which had been seen at sea. He ran to the town to learn if it bore any news from Virginia. He waited there till the return of the pilot, who had gone according to custom to see what vessel it was. He did not return till evening, when he brought the Governor word that the vessel signalled was the Saint Géran, of seven hundred tons' burden, commanded by a captain named Aubin; that it was now four leagues out at sea, and would anchor at Port Louis the next afternoon if the wind became favorable. The pilot brought the Governor the letters which the Saint Géran had brought from France, among which was one for Madame de la Tour, in the handwriting of Virginia. Paul seized it, kissed it with transport, placed it in his bosom, and ran to the plantation. From afar, as he perceived the family waiting for his return on the Rock of Adieus, he raised the letter in the air without being able to speak, and instantly the whole family crowded around Madame de la Tour to hear it read. Virginia informed her mother that she had experienced much ill-usage from her aunt, who had endeavored to marry her contrary to her inclinations, then had disinherited her, and at last sent her back at a time when she must arrive at the Isle of France during the season of hurricanes. In vain, she added, had she endeavored to soften her by representing what she owed to her mother and to the habits of her early age. She was treated as a senseless girl whose head had been turned by reading romances. She could now only think of the joy of again seeing and embracing her beloved family, and she would have gratified this ardent desire at once if the captain would have allowed her to go ashore in the pilot-boat; but he had objected on account of the distance and a heavy swell which, notwithstanding the calm, reigned in the open sea.

Scarcely was the letter finished, when all the family, transported with joy, cried, "Virginia has arrived," and mistresses and servants embraced each other. Madame de la Tour said to Paul, "My son, go and inform our neighbor of the arrival of Virginia." Domingo immediately lighted a torch of wood, and he and Paul bent their way to my dwelling.

It was about ten o'clock at night. I had just extinguished my lamp and retired to rest, when I perceived through the palisades of my cabin a light in the wood. Soon after I heard the voice of Paul calling to me. I arose, and had hardly dressed myself when Paul, almost beside himself and panting for breath, sprang on my neck crying, — "Come, come, Virginia has arrived! Let us go to the port; the vessel will anchor at daybreak." We started immediately. As we were passing through the woods of the Sloping Mountain, and were already on the road which leads from the Shaddock Grove to the port, I heard some one walking behind us. It was a negro advancing with hasty steps. When he had reached us I asked him whence he came, and whither he was going in such great haste. He replied, "I come from that part of the island called Poudre d'Or; I am sent to the port to inform the Governor that a vessel from France has anchored under the Isle of Amber. It is firing guns to demand help, for the sea is very rough." Having thus spoken, the man hastened on without further delay.

I then said to Paul, "Let us go to the quarter of Poudre d'Or and meet Virginia there; it is only three leagues from here."

And we turned to go toward the north of the island. The heat was suffocating. The moon had risen, and was surrounded by three large black circles. A frightful darkness covered the sky. Frequent flashes of lightning discovered to us long rows of heavy, gloomy clouds, hanging low, and heaped together over the island, driven in with great rapidity from the sea, although not a breath of air was perceptible on the land. As we walked along we thought we heard the rolling of thunder, but on listening attentively we perceived that it was the firing of guns repeated by the echoes. These ominous sounds, joined to the aspect of the tempestuous sky, made me tremble. I could not doubt that they were signals of distress from a vessel in great danger. After a half an hour we heard no more firing, and this silence seemed to me more frightful than the dismal sounds which had preceded it.

We hastened on without saying a word or daring to communicate to each other our mutual apprehensions. Near midnight we arrived at the sea-shore at Poudre d'Or. The breakers dashed against the shore with a frightful noise; they covered the rocks and the beach with foam of a dazzling whiteness, apparently filled with sparks of fire. Notwithstanding the darkness, by this phosphorescent light we saw the canoes of the fishermen, which they had drawn high up on the beach.

At the entrance of a wood, at a little distance from there, we saw a fire, around which several of the inhabitants were assembled. We went there to wait for the morning. While we were seated near this fire one of the men related that in the afternoon he had seen a vessel in the open sea driven toward the island by the currents; that the night had hidden it from his view; that two hours after sunset he had heard signal-guns of distress, but the surf was so high it was impossible to launch a boat to go to her; that soon after he thought he saw her signal-lights, and in that case he feared that the vessel, being so near the shore, had passed between the land and the little island of Amber, mistaking that for the Coin-de-Mire, near which vessels pass in going into Port Louis; that if this was so (of which he could not be certain), the vessel was in very great peril. Another islander then said that he had often crossed the channel which separates the island of Amber from the coast; that he had sounded it; that the anchorage was very good, and that the vessel was there in as perfect safety as in the best harbor. "I would trust all my fortune in it," added he, "and if I were in it I should sleep as tranquilly as if I were on land." A third declared that it was impossible for this vessel to enter the channel, which was scarcely navigable for a boat. He was sure that he had seen it anchor outside of the Isle of Amber, so that if the wind rose in the morning it could put to sea, or come into port. Other inhabitants gave other opinions. While they continued to discuss them in the usual desultory manner of the indolent Creoles, Paul and I kept profound silence. We remained there till daybreak; but a heavy fog made it impossible for us to distinguish any object at sea. We could only see a dark cloud, that they told us was the Isle of Amber, a quarter of a league from the coast. On this gloomy day nothing could be seen but the point of land on which we were, and the peaks of some inland mountains, which occasionally were visible in the midst of the clouds which hung around them.

At about seven o'clock in the morning we heard the sound of drums in the woods; it announced the approach of the Governor, Monsieur de la Bourdonnais, who soon after arrived on horseback, followed by a detachment of soldiers armed with muskets, and a crowd of islanders and negroes. He drew up his soldiers on the beach and ordered a simultaneous discharge. Immediately we saw a flash of light on the water, instantly followed by the report of a cannon. We judged that the ship was at no great distance from us, and all ran toward the place where we had seen the signal. Then we could see the hull and yards of a large vessel. We were so near that, notwithstanding the noise of the waves, we heard the whistle of the officer in command and the shouts of the sailors, who cried three times, "Vive le roi!" for that is the cry of the French in extreme danger as well as in great joy; as if in danger they would call their prince to their aid, or testify that they were ready to perish for him.

From the moment that the Saint Géran perceived that we were near enough to render aid, they had not ceased to fire guns at intervals of three minutes. Monsieur de la Bourdonnais caused great fires to be lighted at certain distances along the shore, and sent to all the inhabitants of the neighborhood for provisions, planks, cables, and empty barrels. Very soon a crowd of the inhabitants arrived, accompanied by their negroes, laden with provisions and ropes, who came from the habitations of Poudre d'Or, from the district of La Flaque, and from the river of Rempart. One of the most aged of these planters, approaching the Governor, said to him, "Monsieur, all night hollow sounds have been heard in the mountains; in the woods the leaves of the trees are shaken, though there is no wind; the sea-birds take refuge on land; certainly all these signs predict a hurricane." "Well, my friends," replied the Governor, "we are prepared for it, and surely the vessel is also."

Indeed, everything presaged the near approach of the hurricane. The clouds in the zenith were of a frightful blackness and their edges copper-colored. The air resounded with the cries of the tropic-birds, frigate-birds, cut-waters, and a multitude of other marine birds, which, notwithstanding the obscurity of the atmosphere, came from all points of the horizon, seeking shelter on the island.

About nine in the morning we heard, in the direction of the ocean, the most terrific noise, like the sound of thunder mingled with that of torrents rushing down the steeps of lofty mountains. Every one exclaimed, "There is the hurricane!" and in an instant a frightful gust of wind dispelled the fog which covered the Isle of Amber and its channel. The Saint Géran was presented to our view, — the deck crowded with people, the yards and topmast lowered to the deck, her flag at half-mast, moored by four cables at the bow and one at the stern; it was anchored between the Isle of Amber and the mainland, within that belt of reefs which encircles the Isle of France, and which it had passed through in a place where no vessel had ever passed before. She presented her front to the waves, which rolled in from the open sea; and as each billow rushed into the narrow strait, her prow was so lifted that the keel could be seen, the stern plunging into the sea, disappearing from view as if it were swallowed by the surges. In this position, driven by the wind and waves toward the land, it was equally impossible for her to return through the passage by which she had entered, or by cutting her cables to strand herself upon the beach from which she was separated by sand-banks and reefs of rock. Every billow which broke upon the coast advanced roaring to the bottom of the bay, throwing up the shingle to the distance of fifty feet on the land; then, rushing back, laid bare its sandy bed, rolling down the stones with a harsh and frightful sound. The sea, swollen by the violence of the wind, rose higher every moment; and the whole channel between this island and the Isle of Amber was one vast sheet of white foam full of yawning black depths. Heaps of this foam more than six feet high were piled up at the lower part of the bay, and the wind which swept the surface carried masses of it over the steep sea bank on to the land to the distance of half a league. These innumerable white flakes, driven horizontally even to the foot of the mountains, looked like snow issuing from the bosom of the sea. The horizon showed all the signs of a long tempest; the sky and the water seemed blended together. Thick, horrible clouds swept across the zenith with the swiftness of birds, while others appeared motionless as rocks. Not a spot of blue sky could be seen in the whole firmament; a wan olive light alone made visible the earth, the sea, and the skies.

In the violent rolling of the vessel, what we all dreaded happened. The cables which held her bow broke; and then, being held by a single hawser, she was dashed upon the rocks at half a cable's length from the shore. One cry of horror burst from us all. Paul rushed forward to throw himself into the sea, when I seized him by the arm. "My son," said I, "would you perish?" "Let me go to save her," cried he, "or let me die!" Seeing that despair had deprived him of reason, Domingo and I, in order to preserve him, fastened a long cord around his waist, and held it fast by the end. Paul precipitated himself toward the vessel, sometimes swimming, sometimes walking on the rocks. Sometimes he had hopes of reaching it; for the sea, by the reflux of its waves, left it at times almost dry, so that one could walk around it; but immediately returning with renewed fury, shrouded it beneath mountains of water, raising it again upon its keel, and throwing the unfortunate Paul far upon the shore, his legs bleeding, his breast torn and wounded, and himself half dead. When the young man had scarcely recovered the use of his senses, he would arise and return with new ardor toward the vessel, whose joints the sea was now opening by the terrible blows of its waves.

The crew, despairing then of safety, precipitated themselves in crowds into the sea upon yards, planks, hen-coops, tables, and barrels. At this moment we saw an object worthy of eternal pity, a young girl in the gallery of the stern of the Saint Géran stretching out her arms toward him who made so many efforts to join her. It was Virginia. She had recognized her lover by his intrepidity. The sight of this lovely girl exposed to such horrible danger filled us with grief and despair. As for Virginia, with a noble and dignified bearing she waved her hand to us as if bidding us an eternal adieu. All the sailors had thrown themselves into the sea except one who remained upon the deck, who was naked, and strong as Hercules. He approached Virginia with respect; we saw him kneeling at her feet, and attempt to force her to throw off her clothes; but she repulsed him with dignity, and turned away her head. Then were heard redoubled cries from the spectators, "Save her! save her! do not leave her!" But at that moment a mountain of water of frightful size was ingulfed between the Isle of Amber and the coast, and advanced roaring toward the vessel, which it menaced with its black flanks and foaming summit. At this terrible sight, the sailor flung himself alone into the sea; and Virginia, seeing death inevitable, with one hand held her robe about her, pressing the other upon her heart, and raising upward her serene eyes, seemed an angel ready to take her flight to the skies.

O day of horror! alas! all was ingulfed. The wave threw some of the spectators, whom an impulse of humanity had prompted to advance toward Virginia, far up on the beach, as well as the sailor who had wished to save her in swimming. This man, who had escaped from almost certain death, kneeled on the sand, saying, "O my God, thou hast saved my life, but I would have given it gladly for that noble young lady." Domingo and I drew the unfortunate Paul from the waves senseless, the blood flowing from his mouth and ears. The Governor put him in the hands of the surgeons, while we searched along the shore, hoping that the sea might have thrown up the body of Virginia. But the wind having suddenly changed, as it often does in hurricanes, we had the grief of feeling that we could not even bestow upon the unfortunate girl the last rites of sepulture. We retired from the spot overwhelmed with consternation, our minds wholly occupied by a single loss, although in the shipwreck so many had perished. Many went away doubting, after witnessing such a terrible fate for this virtuous girl, whether there was a Providence; for there are evils so terrible and unmerited that even the faith of the wise is shaken.

In the mean time, Paul, who had begun to return to consciousness, had been carried into a neighboring house, till he was in a fit state to be taken to his own home. Thither I bent my way with Domingo to prepare Virginia's mother and her friend for the disastrous event. When we were at the entrance of the valley of the river of Fan-Palms, some negroes informed us that the sea had thrown many pieces of the wreck into the opposite bay. We descended to it, and one of the first objects I saw upon the beach was the body of Virginia; it was half covered with sand, and in the attitude in which we had seen her perish. Her features were not changed; her eyes were closed, but her brow still retained its expression of serenity, and on her cheeks the livid hue of death blended with the blush of virgin modesty. One hand still held her robe, and the other, which was pressed upon her heart, was firmly closed and stiffened. With difficulty I disengaged from its grasp a small case; how great was my emotion when I saw that it was the picture of Saint Paul, that she had promised him never to part with while she lived. At the sight of this last evidence of the constancy and love of the unfortunate girl, I wept bitterly. As for Domingo, he beat his breast, and pierced the air with his cries of grief. We carried the body of Virginia to a fisherman's hut, and gave it in charge to some poor Malabar women to wash away the sand.

CAST ASHORE.

While they were performing this sad office we ascended the hill with trembling steps to the plantation. We found Madame de la Tour and Margaret in prayer, awaiting news from the vessel. As soon as Madame de la Tour saw me, she cried, "Where is my daughter, my dear daughter, my child?" My silence and my tears leaving her no doubt as to her misfortune, she was instantly seized with a convulsive stopping of the breath and agonizing pain, and her voice was no longer heard but in sighs and sobs. Margaret cried, "Where is my son? I do not see my son!" and fainted. We ran to her assistance, and I assured her that Paul was living, and cared for by the Governor. As soon as she recovered consciousness, she devoted herself to the care of her friend, who was roused from one fainting-fit only to fall into another. Madame de la Tour passed the whole night in the most cruel sufferings, which caused me to feel that there is no grief like a mother's grief. When she returned to consciousness she turned a sad, fixed look toward heaven. In vain her friend and I pressed her hand in ours; in vain we called her by the tenderest names. She appeared wholly insensible to these testimonials of our affection, and no sound issued from her oppressed breast but deep, hollow moans.

In the morning Paul was brought home in a palanquin; he had recovered the use of his reason, but was unable to utter a word. His interview with his mother and Madame de la Tour, which I had dreaded, produced a better effect than all my cares. A ray of consolation appeared on the countenances of these two unfortunate mothers. They pressed close to him, clasped him in their arms and kissed him, and their tears, which had been held back by their excessive grief, began to flow. Paul mingled his tears with theirs, and nature having thus found relief in these three unfortunate creatures, a long stupor succeeded the convulsive expression of their grief, and afforded them a lethargic repose, resembling, in truth, that of death.

Monsieur de la Bourdonnais sent privately to inform me that the corpse of Virginia had been carried to the town by his order, from whence it would be transferred to the church of Shaddock Grove. I immediately went down to Port Louis, where I found a multitude assembled from all parts of the island, in order to be present at the funeral, as if the island had lost in her that which was most dear. The vessels in the harbor had their yards crossed, their flags at half-mast, and they fired guns at short intervals. A body of grenadiers led the funeral procession, with their muskets reversed, and the drums covered with crape, giving only muffled, mournful sounds. Dejection was depicted on the countenances of these warriors, who had so often faced death in battle without a change of countenance. Eight young ladies of the principal families of the island, dressed in white, carrying palm branches in their hands, bore the body of their young companion covered with flowers. They were followed by a choir of children chanting hymns. After them came the Governor, his staff, and all the principal inhabitants of the island, and an immense crowd of people.

This was what had been ordered by the administration to do honor to the virtues of Virginia. But when the corpse arrived at the foot of this mountain, in sight of those cottages of which she had been so long the joy, and that her death filled now with despair, all the funeral pomp was interrupted; the hymns and chants ceased, and nothing was heard throughout the plain but sighs and sobs. Then many young girls from the neighboring habitations were seen running to touch the coffin of Virginia with handkerchiefs, chaplets, and crowns of flowers, invoking her as a saint. Mothers asked of Heaven a daughter like Virginia; lovers, a heart as faithful; the poor, a friend as tender; slaves, a mistress as good.

When they arrived at the place of interment, some negresses of Madagascar and Caffres of Mozambique placed baskets of fruit around the corpse, and hung pieces of stuff upon the adjoining trees, according to the custom of their several countries; the Indian women from Bengal and from the Malabar coast brought cages full of birds which they set at liberty upon her coffin. So much the loss of a beloved object touches all people, and so great is the power of unfortunate virtue that it unites all religions around its tomb.

It became necessary to place guards around her grave, and to remove from it some of the daughters of the poor families in the neighborhood, who endeavored to throw themselves into it, saying that they had no longer any consolation to hope for in the world, and that nothing remained for them but to die with their only benefactress.

They buried her near the church of Shaddock Grove, at the foot of a small group of bamboos, where, in returning from mass with her mother and Margaret, she loved to rest, seated by the side of him whom she then called her brother.

On the return of the funeral procession, Monsieur de la Bourdonnais came up here, followed by a part of his numerous retinue. He offered to Madame de la Tour and her friend all the assistance in his power. He expressed in a few words his indignation at the unnatural conduct of her aunt; then approaching Paul, he said to him that which he thought would console him: "Heaven is my witness, I desired your happiness and that of your family. My friend, you must go to France; I will obtain service for you, and in your absence I will care for your mother as for my own." At the same time he offered him his hand; but Paul drew back and turned away, so that he might not see him.

I remained at the house of my unfortunate friends, to give to them as well as to Paul all the succor that was in my power. At the end of three weeks Paul was able to walk; but his grief seemed to augment as his body regained strength. He was insensible to everything; his look was vacant; and he made no reply to the questions that were put to him. Madame de la Tour, who was dying, said often to him, "My son, while I see you I think I see my dear Virginia." At the name of Virginia he shuddered, and hastened away from her, notwithstanding the entreaties of his mother, who begged him to remain near her friend. He would go alone into the garden, and seat himself at the foot of Virginia's cocoa-tree, with his eyes fixed upon her fountain. The Governor's surgeon, who had taken the greatest care of Paul and of Madame de la Tour and Margaret, told us that in order to draw him from his deep melancholy we must let him do what he pleased without contradiction; that this was the only means of overcoming the silence in which he persevered.

I resolved to follow this advice. The first use which Paul made of his returning strength was to leave the plantation. As I would not lose sight of him, I followed him, and told Domingo to take provisions and accompany us. In proportion as he descended the mountain the young man's strength and spirits seemed to revive. He took first the road to the Shaddock Grove, and when he was near the church in the avenue of bamboos exactly in the spot where the earth had been freshly stirred, he knelt, and raising his eyes to heaven, offered a long prayer.

This appeared to me a favorable symptom of the return of his reason, since this mark of confidence in the Supreme Being showed that his mind was beginning to resume its natural functions. Domingo and I, following his example, fell upon our knees and joined our prayers with his. When he arose he took the road toward the northern part of the island, paying little attention to us. As I knew that he was not only ignorant of the spot where the body of Virginia had been buried, and even of the fact that it had been recovered from the waves, I asked him why he had offered his prayer at the foot of these bamboos. He replied, "We have been there so often!"

He continued his route until we reached the borders of the forest, when night came on. By setting him the example, I induced him to take some nourishment; and we slept upon the grass at the foot of a tree. The next day I thought he seemed disposed to retrace his steps. He looked for some time across the plain toward the Shaddock Grove, with its avenues of bamboos, and made a movement as if to return there; but suddenly plunging into the forest, he directed his course toward the north. I saw what his intention was, and tried in vain to divert him from it. At noon we arrived at the quarter of Poudre d'Or. He rushed down to the sea-shore directly opposite to the place where the Saint Géran had been wrecked. At the sight of the Isle of Amber and the channel, now smooth as a mirror, he cried, "Virginia! O my dear Virginia!" and sank senseless to the ground. Domingo and I carried him into the forest, where we had some difficulty in recovering him. As soon as he regained his senses he wished to return to the sea-shore; but on my beseeching him not to renew his grief and ours by such cruel reminders, he took another direction. For a whole week he visited the various places where he had been in the habit of going with the companion of his childhood. He traced the path by which she had gone to intercede for the slave of the Black River; he revisited the banks of the Three Breasts, where she had rested when unable to walk farther, and that part of the wood where she had lost her way. All the haunts which recalled to his memory the anxieties, the sports, the repasts, the benevolence, of her he loved, — the river of the Sloping Mountain, my house, the neighboring cascade, the papaw-tree she had planted, the grassy fields where she loved to run, the paths of the forest where she used to sing, — all in turn again caused his tears to flow; and those very echoes which had so often resounded with their joyful shouts now repeated only those accents of despair, "Virginia! O my dear Virginia!"

In this wild and wandering life his eyes became hollow, his skin sallow, and his health rapidly failed. Convinced that our present sufferings are redoubled by the remembrance of the past pleasures, and that the passions gather strength in solitude, I resolved to remove my unfortunate friend from the places which recalled the remembrance of his loss, and to lead him to a more busy part of the island. For this purpose I conducted him to the inhabited parts of the elevated quarter of Williams, where he had never been. Agriculture and commerce occasioned in this part of the island much bustle and variety. A great many carpenters were squaring trees, while others sawed them into planks; carriages were continually passing and repassing on the road; herds of cattle and horses were feeding in vast pastures, and the whole country was dotted with habitations. In several places there, the elevation of the land permitted the cultivation of many of the plants of Europe. Here and there on the plain could be seen the harvesting of wheat; in the opening of the woods, a carpeting of strawberries, and the roads bordered with hedges of roses. The freshness of the air in this region giving tension to the nerves was favorable to the health of the white population. From these heights, situated near the middle of the island and surrounded by extensive forests, neither the sea, nor Port Louis, nor the church of Shaddock Grove, nor any other object which was associated with Virginia, could be seen. Even the mountains, which present an irregular form from the side of Port Louis, look from the plains of Williams like a long straight promontory, from which rise lofty pyramids of rock, about whose summits the clouds gather. It was to these plains that I led Paul. I kept him continually in action, walking with him in sunshine and rain, by night and by day, wandering into the depths of the forest, over cultivated land and grassy fields, hoping to divert his mind by the fatigue of his body, and to change the course of his reflections by his ignorance of the place where we were. But the soul of a lover finds everywhere traces of the beloved object. Night and day, the calm of solitude, the noise of crowds, time even, which effaces so many other memories, have no power to remove these, — like the needle once touched by the loadstone, which, however it may be disturbed, turns, as soon as it is still, to the pole that attracts it. When I inquired of Paul, as we wandered in the plains of Williams, "Where shall we go now?" he turned toward the north and said, "Yonder are our mountains; let us return there!"

I saw that all the means which I had tried to divert him were useless, and that no other resource was left me but to attack his passion itself with all the strength of my feeble reason. I therefore replied to him, "Yes, there are the mountains where your dear Virginia lived, and here is the portrait which you gave her, and which, when dying, she held to her heart, — that heart whose last beatings were for you." I then gave Paul the little portrait which he had given Virginia at the cocoa-tree fountain. At the sight of it a gloomy joy overspread his countenance. He eagerly seized the picture with his feeble hands, and pressed it to his lips. His oppressed bosom seemed bursting, and from his bloodshot eyes no tears would flow.

I said to him: "My son, listen to me; I am your friend, and have been the friend of Virginia, and have often, when your hopes were highest, tried to fortify you against the unforeseen accidents of life. What is it that you deplore so bitterly, — your misfortune, or Virginia's?

"Your loss without doubt is great. Virginia was the most lovely of girls, and would have been the most admirable of women. She had sacrificed her interests to yours, and preferred you to fortune, as the only recompense worthy of her virtue. But how do you know that the object from which you expected the purest happiness might not have been to you the source of infinite pain? She was without fortune, and disinherited; you would have had nothing henceforth to share with her but your labor. Rendered more delicate by her education, more courageous by her unhappiness, you would have seen her each day sinking from the vain effort to share your fatigue. Had she borne you children, her anxieties and yours would have been augmented by the difficulty of sustaining your parents and your children.

"You may say to me,' The Governor would have aided us.' How do you know that in a colony whose governors are so often changed you would have had others like Monsieur de la Bourdonnais; that one might not have been sent destitute of good manners and morals; that your wife, in order to obtain some miserable pittance, might not have been obliged to court his favor? Either she would have been weak and you to be pitied, or she would have been virtuous and you remained poor; happy if on account of her beauty and her virtue you were not persecuted by those from whom you had hoped for protection.

"There would have remained to you, you say, the happiness, independent of fortune, of protecting a beloved being who, in proportion to her own weakness, had attached herself to you; of sharing with her your inquietude and your sadness, and causing your love to grow by your mutual sufferings. Undoubtedly, love does delight in these bitter pleasures. Virginia is no more; but there remain to you those who, after you, were dearest to her, — her mother and yours, — and your inconsolable grief is bringing them both to the grave. Let your happiness be, as hers was, in aiding and comforting them. My son, benevolence is the happiness of virtue; there is none greater or more sure in this world. Schemes of pleasure, repose, luxury, wealth, and glory are not suited to man, weak, wandering, and transitory as he is. See how one step toward the acquisition of fortune has precipitated us from one abyss to another! You were opposed to it, it is true; but who would have thought that Virginia's voyage would not terminate in her happiness and yours? An invitation from a rich and aged relation, the counsel of a wise governor, the approval of the whole colony, the exhortations and authority of the priest, have decided the misfortune of Virginia. Thus do we run to our ruin, deceived even by the prudence of those who advise us. It would be better, no doubt, not to believe them, nor to trust the advice and the hopes of a deceitful world. Of the many men that we see occupied in these plains, those that go to seek their fortune in the Indies, and those who in Europe enjoy repose and profit by the labor of others, there are none that are not destined some day to lose that which is most dear to them, — greatness, wealth, wife, children, friends. Most of these will have to add to their loss the remembrance of their own imprudence. But you have nothing with which to reproach yourself; you have been true to your faith. You have had in the flower of youth the wisdom of a sage in not putting aside the sentiments of nature. Your views alone were just, because they were pure, simple, disinterested, and you had sacred claims on Virginia which no fortune could outweigh. You have lost her; it is neither your imprudence nor your avarice nor your false wisdom which has caused your loss, but God, who has employed the passions of others to deprive you of the object of your love, — God, from whom you receive all, who knows what is most fitting for you, and whose wisdom has not left you any cause for the repentance and despair which follow those calamities we have brought upon ourselves.

"You can then say in your misfortune, 'I have not merited it.' Is it then that you deplore for Virginia her end, her present state? She has met the fate allotted to all, — to high birth, to beauty, and even to empires. The life of man, with all his projects, is like building a tower whose crown is death. In being born she was condemned to die. Happy to have died before her mother, before yours, before you, — that is to say, in not dying several times before the last!

"Death, my son, is a benefit to all men; it is the night of the restless day that we call life. It is in the sleep of death that the diseases, grief, vexations, and fears repose, that molest without cessation the unfortunate living. Inquire into the lives of the men who seem most happy; you will learn that they have bought their apparent happiness very dearly: public consideration by domestic evils; fortune by the loss of health; the rare happiness of being beloved by continual sacrifices; and often, at the expiration of a life devoted to the interests of others, they only see about them false friends and ungrateful relations. But Virginia was happy to her very last moment. When with us, she was happy in the gifts of nature; far from us, in the practice of virtue; and even in the terrible moment when we saw her perish, she was still happy; for whether she cast her eyes on the assembled colony, made wretched by her danger, or on you, who strove with so much intrepidity to save her, she must have seen how dear she was to all. She was fortified against fears for the future by the remembrance of the innocence of her life; and she received then the reward that Heaven reserves for virtue, — a courage superior to danger. She met death with a serene countenance.

"My son, God gives to virtue all the trials of life, that it may be shown that virtue alone can use them and find in them happiness and glory. When he designs for it an illustrious reputation, he exhibits it on a grand theatre and contending with death; then does the courage of virtue serve as an example, and the remembrance of its misfortunes receives forever from posterity the tribute of tears. What an immortal monument is reserved for virtue in a world where everything else passes away, and where even the memory of most kings is soon shrouded in eternal forgetfulness!

"But Virginia still exists. My son, everything changes on this earth, but nothing is lost. No art of man can annihilate the smallest particle of matter; and can that which was reasonable, sensitive, loving, virtuous, religious, perish when the elements with which it was clothed are indestructible? Ah, if Virginia was happy with us, she is much more so now! There is a God, my son; all nature proclaims him; it is not necessary for me to prove it. It is only the wickedness of men that leads them to deny a justice that they fear. The consciousness of him is in your heart, as his works are before your eyes. Do you believe, then, that he will leave Virginia without reward? Do you believe that the same Power that clothed that soul so noble in a form so beautiful, in which you felt a divine power, was not able to draw her from the waves? That he who has arranged the actual happiness of men by laws unknown to you cannot prepare other happiness for Virginia by laws of which you are equally ignorant? Before we were born into this world, if we had been capable of thinking, could we have formed an idea of our present existence? And now that we are in this gloomy and fleeting life, can we foresee what is beyond that death by which we must leave it? Does God, like man, need this little globe, our earth, as a theatre for the display of his intelligence and goodness? And can he only dispose of life in the fields of death? There is not in the ocean a single drop of water which is not peopled with living beings for our use, and does there exist nothing for us in the stars which roll over our heads? What! is there no supreme intelligence and divine goodness except precisely where we are? In these innumerable shining globes, in the infinite fields of light which surround them, which neither storm nor darkness can ever obscure, is there nothing but useless space and an eternal void? If we dared assign limits to the power of Him from whom we have received all, we might believe that we are here on the boundaries of his empire, where life combats with death, and innocence with tyranny.

"Without doubt there is some place where virtue receives its recompense. Virginia is now happy. Ah! if from the abode of angels she could communicate with you, she would say, as in her last adieu, 'O Paul! life is only a trial. I have been found faithful to the laws of nature, of love, and of virtue. I crossed the ocean in obedience to my relations; I renounced riches in order to keep my faith; and I preferred to lose my life rather than violate my modesty. Heaven found my probation sufficient. I have escaped forever from poverty and calumny, and from the sight of others' griefs. Henceforth none of the evils which terrify men can touch me; — and you pity me! I am pure and unchangeable as a particle of light, and you would recall me into the light of life! O Paul! O my friend! do you remember those days of happiness, when from early morning we tasted the delights of nature, rising with the sun on the peaks of those rocks, and spreading with his rays over the bosom of the forest, we experienced a delight the cause of which we could not comprehend? In the innocence of our desires we wished to be all sight, to enjoy the rich colors of the early dawn; all smell, to receive the perfume of our plants; all hearing, to listen to the concerts of our birds; all heart, to acknowledge these blessings. Now, at the source of all beauty, whence flows all that is delightful upon earth, my soul sees, hears, tastes, touches, what before she could only feel through imperfect organs. Ah, what tongue can describe the shores of the eternal Orient, which I inhabit forever! All that infinite power and celestial goodness could create to console one who has suffered; all that the friendship of numberless beings, enjoying the same felicity, can give of harmony in mutual transports, we enjoy without alloy. Support then the trial which is given you, that you may heighten the happiness of your Virginia by a love which shall have no end, by a Hymen whose torch can never be extinguished. Then I will calm your regrets, then I will wipe away your tears. O my friend, my husband, raise your thoughts toward the infinite, that you may support the pains of a moment.'"

My own emotion put an end to my discourse. Paul, looking at me steadfastly, cried, "She is no more! she is no more!" and a long fainting-fit followed these woful words. When restored to consciousness he said, "Since death is a benefit, and Virginia is happy, I too will die and rejoin her." Thus my grounds of consolation only served to nourish his despair. I was like a man trying to save a friend sinking in the waves, who will not swim. He was drowning in grief. Alas! the sorrows of early years prepare man to endure those of later life; and Paul had experienced none.

I led him back to his home. I there found his mother and Madame de la Tour in a state of increased languor. Margaret was the most dejected. Lively characters upon whom petty troubles have little effect are those who the least resist great sorrows.

She said to me: "O my good friend, I thought I saw Virginia last night, clothed in white, in the midst of groves and delicious gardens. She said to me, 'I enjoy a happiness worthy of envy'; and then approaching Paul with a smiling air, she bore him away with her. While I was struggling to retain my son, I felt that I was myself quitting the earth, and that I followed him with inexpressible pleasure. I then wished to bid adieu to my friend; as I turned I saw that she was following us, with Domingo and Mary.. But that which is most strange is, that Madame de la Tour the same night had a dream exactly like mine."

I replied to her, "My friend, I believe that nothing happens in this world without the permission of God. Dreams sometimes announce the truth."

Madame de la Tour related to me her dream, in all respects like that of Margaret. I had never noticed in either of these ladies any tendency to superstition; I was struck with the singular coincidence of their dream, and did not doubt that it would be realized. The belief that future events are sometimes revealed to us in sleep prevails among all the nations of the earth. The greatest men of antiquity have had faith in it; among others Alexander, Cæsar, the Scipios, the two Catos, and Brutus, none of whom were weak-minded persons. Both the Old and New Testament furnish us with numerous examples of dreams which have come to pass. As for myself, I need on this subject only appeal to my own experience, as I have more than once had reason to believe that dreams are warnings given us by some superior intelligences who interest themselves in us. If one attempts to combat or defend by reasoning that which is beyond the light of human reason, it will be found impossible. However, if man's reason is only the image of God's, since man has the power by hidden and secret means to make known his will to the ends of the earth, why may not the Intelligence which governs the universe employ like means for the same end? One friend consoles another by a letter, which passes through many kingdoms, and through the hands of those at enmity with each other, to bring joy and hope to one man; why may not the sovereign Protector of innocence come by some secret way to the help of a virtuous soul who puts its trust only in him. Does he need to employ some visible sign to execute his will, — he whose ways are hidden in all his works?

Why should we not have faith in dreams?

What is life, so full of vain and fleeting projects, but a dream?

However it may be, the dreams of my unfortunate friends were soon realized. Paul died two months after the death of his Virginia, with her name on his lips. A week after the death of her son, Margaret saw her last hour approach with a joy which only virtue can experience. She bade Madame de la Tour a most tender farewell, in the hope, as she said, of a delightful and eternal reunion. "Death is the greatest of blessings," added she, "and we ought to desire it If life is a punishment, we ought to wish for its end, if it is a trial, we should ask that it may be short."

The Governor took care of Domingo and Mary, who were no longer able to labor, and who survived their mistresses but a short time. As for poor Fidéle, he pined to death soon after he lost his master.

I took Madame de la Tour to my own home. She bore her great losses with incredible fortitude. She had consoled Paul and Margaret even to their last moments, as if she had only their sorrows to bear. When they were no more, she talked to me of them every day, as of beloved friends who were living near her. She survived them, however, only a month. Far from reproaching her aunt for the afflictions she had caused, she prayed God to pardon her, and to appease that remorse which we heard began to torment her immediately after she had sent Virginia away with so much inhumanity.

This unnatural relative received the punishment of her harshness. I heard on the successive arrival of several vessels that her torment was so great that life and death were equally insupportable to her. Sometimes she reproached herself with the untimely fate of her lovely niece, and the death of her mother which so soon followed it. At other times she congratulated herself for having repulsed two wretched creatures, who she said had dishonored their family by their low inclinations. Sometimes she would fly into a rage at the sight of the many miserable beggars with which Paris abounds, and exclaim, "Why do they not send these idle creatures to perish in our colonies?" As for the notions of humanity, virtue, and religion adopted by all nations, she said they were only the inventions of their rulers to serve political purposes. Then flying all at once to the other extreme, she abandoned herself to superstitious terrors, which filled her with mortal fears. She would then give abundant alms to the wealthy ecclesiastics who guided her, praying them to appease the Divinity by the sacrifice of her fortune; as if the wealth she had withheld from the unfortunate could please the Father of men! In her imagination she often beheld fields of fire and burning mountains, where hideous spectres wandered, loudly calling her. She would throw herself at the feet of her confessor, devising for herself tortures and punishments; for Heaven — just Heaven — always sends to cruel souls frightful ideas of religion. Thus she lived for several years, by turns an atheist and a fanatic, dreading equally life and death. But what at last brought her deplorable existence to an end was the very object to which she had sacrificed the sentiments of nature. She had the chagrin of seeing that her fortune would fall, at her death, to relatives whom she hated; she therefore tried to alienate the larger part of it. They, however, taking advantage of the attacks of low spirits to which she was subject, caused her to be confined as a lunatic, and her property to be placed under guardianship. Thus her wealth completed her ruin; and as it had hardened the heart of her who possessed it, it corrupted the hearts of those who desired it. She soon died; and to crown her misery had sufficient use of her reason to know that she was despoiled and despised by those whose opinions had guided her all her life.

They laid Paul by the side of Virginia, at the foot of the same trees, and near them their tender mothers and their faithful servants. No marble marks the spot of their humble graves, — no inscription records their virtues; but their memory is indelibly engraved on the hearts of those they have befriended. Their spirits do not need the display that they shunned during their lives; but if they still take an interest in what passes on earth, they no doubt love to wander beneath the roofs of those dwellings inhabited by industrious virtue; to console unhappy poverty, to cherish in the hearts of lovers unchanging fidelity, a taste for the blessings of nature, the love of labor, and the fear of riches.

The voice of the people, which is often silent as to the monuments raised to kings, has given to several parts of this island names which will immortalize the loss of Virginia. Near the Isle of Amber, in the midst of the rocks, is a place called "The Pass of the Saint Géran," from the name of the vessel which brought her from Europe and was wrecked there. The extremity of that long point of land which you see three leagues from here, half covered by the waves, which the Saint Géran could not double the night before the hurricane to enter the port, is called "The Cape of Misfortune"; and before us, at the end of the valley, is the "Bay of the Tomb," where Virginia was found shrouded in sand, as if the sea had wished to restore her corpse to her family, and render the last duties to her modesty on the shores that she had honored by her innocence.

Young lovers so tenderly united! Unfortunate mothers! Beloved family! These woods which lent you their shade, these fountains which flowed for you, these hillsides where you rested together, still deplore your loss. Since then no one has dared to cultivate this desolate spot or occupy these humble cottages. Your goats have become wild, your orchards are destroyed, your birds have fled, and nothing is heard but the cry of the hawks as they whirl above this rocky basin. As for me, since I no longer see you, I am as a friend without friends, a father who has lost his children, a traveller who wanders over the earth where he remains alone.

With these words the good old man burst into tears and left me; my own had flowed more than once during this sad recital.

INTRODUCTION.

THE story of "Elizabeth, or The Exiles of Siberia," is one whose novel descriptions of unfamiliar scenes, perfect simplicity of plot and naturalness of incident, singular pathos and tenderness of sentiment, have united to make it one of the choicest and most interesting tales in any language. The purity and noble elevation of its characters have commended it as the best kind of fictional literature to place in the hands of the young, while maturer minds find a true pleasure in reading and re-reading it. Its translation from the original French into several other tongues is one of the best evidences of its admirable characteristics

Madame Sophie Ristaud Cottin, the writer of this touching story, was born at Tonneins, France, in the year 1773. At the early age of seventeen she married M. Cottin, a wealthy Bordeaux banker, who left her a widow within three years. Literature was rather a recreation than a pursuit with Madame Cottin; her first work, indeed, (a novel called Claire d'Albe,) was published in 1798 in order to help a friend. Her benevolent purposes, however, were generally carried out by means of the wealth left her by her husband, and she never would allow her name to be used on her publications, until the secret was found out by those interested to discover the author of tales which were attracting so much attention. This generous-hearted and highly gifted lady died in Paris, August 25, 1807.

Élisabeth was the work on which Madame Cottin bestowed the most care. It was founded upon a fact (as her Preface relates), but the delicacy and interest of the tale, the passion without extravagance and love without sentimentality, the filial piety and parental tenderness, the adventurous journey of the one friendless, moneyless girl across deserts of ice and snow, through forests, strange cities, wild people, and all manner of perils, — these elements are wrought up with that highest perfection of art which reproduces nature. And as long as children and parents and lovers have hearts, so long will the story of "Elizabeth" hold a firm place in the affections of those who read.

AUTHOR'S PREFACE.

THE incident which gave rise to this history is founded in truth. No imagination, however fertile, could produce actions so heroic or sentiments so noble and elevated. The heart alone could inspire them.

The daughter who conceived the glorious design of delivering her parents from exile, and who carried this design into execution in spite of the various and almost insurmountable obstacles which opposed her, is not the child of fiction, but of nature. She really existed, nay, does still exist, and should my tale possess any of the powers of attraction it will from this source be principally derived.

Authors have been frequently accused of representing the beauties of virtue with too bold a pencil and in colors too vivid. Far am I, however, from presuming to insinuate that this criticism is applicable to myself, who possess not the abilities requisite to attain this brilliant though creative talent; nor do I conceive that it is in the power of the most eloquent author, by all the studied embellishments and decorations of language, to add a single charm to the innate beauties of virtue; on the contrary, she is in herself so far superior to the adscititious aids of ornament that it would rather appear impossible to describe her in all her native dignity and loveliness. This is the chief difficulty I have experienced in writing Elizabeth.

The real heroine is far superior to mine, and has gone through more perils. By bestowing a guide upon Elizabeth, and in terminating her journey at Moscow, I have considerably diminished her fatigue and danger, and consequently her merit. But there are many who are not sufficiently sensible how paramount is the duty to parents, and therefore know not to what extent this duty will instigate a child, at once affectionate and enterprising, when achieving the service and preservation of a beloved parent; to such, had I related the whole truth, my tale might have borne the appearance of exaggeration or improbability, and to them a recital of long fatigues, though unable to exhaust the courage and perseverance of a heroine of eighteen, might yet appear tedious and uninteresting.

The scene of the principal anecdote of this story is removed as far as Siberia; yet I must add that it was unnecessary for me to extend my researches to so distant a region, since every country affords traits of filial piety, and of mothers animated with the glow of parental tenderness.

ELIZABETH.

I.

ON the banks of the Irtish, which rises in Calmuck Tartary, and falls into the Oby, is situated Tobolsk,* the capital of Siberia ;† bounded on the north by forests eleven hundred versts‡ in length, extending to the borders of the Frozen Ocean, and interspersed with rocky mountains covered with perpetual snows. Around it are sterile plains, whose frozen sands have seldom received an impression from the human foot, and numerous frigid lakes, or rather stagnant marshes, whose icy streams never watered a meadow nor opened to the sunbeam the beauties of a flower. On approaching nearer to the pole, these stately productions of nature, whose sheltering foliage is so grateful to the weary traveller, totally disappear. Brambles, dwarf birches, and shrubs alone ornament this desolate spot; and, farther on, even these vanish, leaving nothing but swamps covered with a useless moss, and presenting, as it were, the last efforts of expiring nature. But still, amidst the horror and gloom of an eternal winter, nature displays some of her grandest spectacles : the Aurora Borealis,* enclosing the horizon like a resplendent arch, emits columns of quivering

* Tobolsk, or Tobolski, is the residence of a governor and of the Greek Archbishop of Siberia. It is situated at the confluence of the Irtish and the Tobol, and is built partly upon a little hill on the east of the Irtish, so that it is divided into upper and lower. The governor's palace is in the citadel, some part of which was still in ruins when Kotzebue arrived there, as an exile, in 1800.

Tobolsk contains several churches; its inhabitants are computed at 15,000 souls. The bazar, or market-place, swarms with Kalmuck merchants, who bring goods from India; but the principal trade of Tobolsk consists in furs. In this city provisions are very cheap.

† Siberia is the most northern country of the Russian empire in Asia. It is bounded on the east by the sea of Japan, on the south by Chinese Tartary, on the west by European Russia, and on the North by the Frozen Ocean. As this immense country, more than 2,000 English miles in length, scarcely contains more than 3,500,000 inhabitants, the emperors of Russia send thither all the criminals of the empire, condemned to exile by the sentence of a court of justice, and all persons suspected of crimes against the state, often without their having been summoned to a single interrogatory or knowing the cause of their banishment. The people who inhabited Siberia when it was conquered in 1777 by Yermak, a Cossack chief, were the Tartars, the Vogouls, and the Ostiacks.

‡ The verst is a measure which serves to mark distance in Russia, like the mile in England and the league in France. Three versts are nearly equal to two English miles.

* The Aurora Borealis is a brilliant phenomenon of nature, which exists almost exclusively to the northern regions of the terrestrial globe, though some travellers have asserted that the South Pole has likewise its Aurora Australis. It is a sort of circular cloud, extended over the horizon, from which issue spouts, sheafs, and columns of fire of different hues, yellow, blood-color, red, blue, violet, &c.

The matter of which the Aurora Borealis is composed appears to have its seat in the atmosphere, at a considerable height, the same Aurora having been seen at Petersburg, Naples, Rome, Lisbon, and even at Cadiz. M. de Mairan, in his treatise on the Aurora Borealis, maintains that these phenomena are generally at an elevation of from three to nine miles.

The progress of electricity, in the century which has just passed, promises a sure way to the physical causes of the Aurora Borealis, whose rockets, spouts, and sheets of light seem to be so many electrical currents, which float in the highly rarified air of the elevated regions of the atmosphere.

light, and frequently offers to view sights which are unknown in a more southern hemisphere. South of Tobolsk is the province called Ischim.* plains strewed with the repositories of the dead, and divided by lakes of stagnant and unwholesome water, separate it from the Kirquis,† an idolatrous and wandering people. It is bounded on the left by the river Irtish, and on the right by the Tobol,‡ the naked and barren shores of which present to the eye fragments of rocks promiscuously heaped together, with here and there a solitary fir-tree rearing its head. Beneath them, in a space formed by an angle of the river, is the small village of Saimka, about six hundred versts from Tobolsk: situated in the farthest extremity of the circle, in the midst of a desert, its environs are as gloomy as the sombre light which illuminates the hemisphere, and as dreary as the climate.

The province of Ischim is nevertheless denominated the Italy of Siberia, since it enjoys nearly four months of summer, though the winter is rigorous to an excess. The north-winds which blow during that period are so incessant, and render the cold so piercing, that even in September the Tobol is paved with ice. A heavy snow falls upon the earth, and disappears not before the end of May; but from the time that it begins to dissolve, the celerity with which the trees shoot forth their leaves and the fields display their verdure is almost incredible; three days is the short period that Nature requires to bring her plants to maturity. The blossoms of the birch-tree exhale an odoriferous scent, and the wild-flowers of the field decorate the ground; flocks of various kinds of fowl play upon the surface of the lakes; the white crane plunges among the rushes of the solitary marsh to build her nest, which she plaits with reeds; whilst the flying-squirrels, in the woods cutting the air with their bushy tails, hop from tree to tree, and nibble the buds of the pines and the tender leaves of the birch. Thus the natives of these dreary regions experience a scene of pleasure; but the unhappy exiles who inhabit it, alas! experience none.

Of these miserable beings the greatest part reside in the villages situated on the borders of the river, between Tobolsk and the extremest boundary of Ischim; others are dispersed in cottages about the country. The government provides for some; but many are abandoned to the scanty subsistence they can procure from the chase during the winter season, and all are objects of general commiseration. Indeed, the name they give to the exiles seems to have been dictated by the tenderest sympathy, as well as by a strong conviction of their innocence; they call them "Unfortunates."

A few versts from Saimka, in the centre of a marshy forest, upon the border of a deep circular lake, surrounded with black poplars, resided one of these banished families, consisting of three persons, — a man about five-and-forty, his wife, and a beautiful daughter in the bloom of youth.

Secluded in the desert, this little family were strangers to the intercourse with society: the father went alone to the chase; but neither had he, his wife, or his daughter ever been at Saimka; and, except one poor Tartarian peasant* who waited on them, no human being had entered their dwelling. The Governor of Tobolsk only was informed of their birth, their country, and the cause of their banishment; and this secret he had not even confided to the lieutenant of his jurisdiction, who was established at Saimka.

* The province or Ischim, so called from the river of the same name, is an immense plain of Siberia to the south of Tobolsk between the Irtish and the Ischin.

† The Kirquis or Kirghese are a Tartar colony to the north of Independent Tartary, divided into three hordes, the greater, the middle, and the lesser. The desert of Ischim separates them from Siberia.

‡ The Tobol derives its source from the country of the Kirquis, among the mountains which separate it from the government of Ufa. It falls into the Irtish near Tobolsk, after having supplied a course of about five hundred versts. Its banks are so little elevated that it generally overflows them in the spring, and inundates a vast extent of country.

* The Tartars are a numerous people who inhabit the greater part of the north of Asia and the north of Europe. Siberia was originally inhabited by Tartars: it also borders upon Chinese and Independent Tartary. The Tartars are almost all Mahometans. They subsist on their cattle, and on plunder which they obtain from their neighbors. They are particularly fond of horse-flesh. For the most part they are a wandering race, encamping here and there without any fixed habitation. They are divided into many tribes, as the Kalmucks, Kirquis, Ushecs, Nogayans, Moguls, &c.

In committing these exiles to his care, the governor had merely given orders that they should be provided with a comfortable lodging, a garden, food, and raiment; and he had given to the lieutenant a positive charge to restrict them from all communication with any one, and particularly to intercept any letter they might attempt to convey to the court of Russia.

So much consideration, so much mystery, and such strict precaution excited a suspicion that under the simple name of Peter Springer the father of this family concealed a name more illustrious, and misfortunes of no common nature. Perhaps he had been guilty of some great crime; or possibly he was a victim to the hatred and injustice of the Russian Ministers.

But every endeavor to discover the truth of these conjectures having proved ineffectual, curiosity was soon extinguished, and all interest in the fate of the new exiles died with it. Indeed, they were so seldom seen that they were soon forgotten; and if, in pursuit of the chase, some straggling sportsman rambled towards the lake of the forest, and inquired the name of the inhabitants of the hut upon its borders, the only answer to be obtained was, that "they were Unfortunate Exiles"; and, on quitting the spot, a secret prayer that the Almighty would restore them to their country was the tribute of compassion generally bestowed.

Peter Springer had built their little cottage himself; it was of the wood of fir-trees, thatched with straw; detached masses of rocks defended it from the sweeping blasts of the north-wind and from the inundations of the lake. These rocks, formed of a soft peeling granite, in their exfoliation reflected the rays of the sun; mushrooms sprung from their crevices, some of a pale pink, others of a saffron-color or of a grayish-blue, like those which grow near the lake Baikal,*

* The lake Baikal is in the government of Irkutsk, and extends from the fifty-first to the fifty-fifth degree of north latitude The Russians call it the Baikal Sea and the Holy Sea; and, next to the Caspian Sea, it is the largest expanse of water in Russia. It is from five to six hundred versts in length, and from fifty to seventy in breadth. This lake is nearly surrounded by high mountains. It is generally covered with ice before the end of December, which does not melt till the month of May. There are several islands in it.

On the southern side of the lake the forest consisted only of underwood, thinly scattered, and leaving open to view the uncultivated plains beyond, covered with burying-places and monuments of the dead. Many of the tombs had been pillaged, and upon the earth had been strewed the bones, the only remains of a nation that would have been consigned to eternal oblivion, had not the gold and jewels buried with its people revealed to avarice its existence.

To the east of this extensive plain a little wooden chapel had been erected by the primitive Christians. On that side the tombs have been respected; and, under the cross which adorned it, no one had dared to profane the ashes of the dead. In these plains or steppes* (the name they bear in Siberia) Peter Springer, during the long and severe winter of the northern climate, spent his days in hunting. Sometimes he killed elks which feed on the leaves of the willow and poplar; sometimes he caught sables, but more frequently ermines, which are there very numerous. With the price that he obtained for their fur, he procured from Tobolsk different articles which contributed to the comfort of his wife and the education of his daughter. The long winter evenings were devoted to the instruction of the young Elizabeth. Seated between her parents, she would read aloud some passage of history, while Springer directed her attention to those parts which could elevate and expand her mind, and Phedora, her mother, to all that could make it tender and compassionate. One of them pointed out to her the beauties of heroism and glory, the other all the charms of piety and benevolence. Her father reminded her of the dignity and sublimity of virtue, her mother of the support and consolation it affords; the first taught how highly to revere, the latter how carefully to cherish it. From these united instructions Elizabeth acquired a disposition at once heroic and gentle; uniting the courage and energy of the father to the angelic mildness of the mother. At once ardent and enterprising, as the exalted ideas of honor could render her, docile and submissive as the blindest votary of love.

But as soon as the snow began to yield to the power of the sun, and a slight shade of verdure appeared upon the earth, the whole family was busily engaged in the culture of their garden. Springer turned up the earth, while Elizabeth sowed the seeds prepared by the industrious hand of Phedora. Their little enclosure was surrounded by plantations of alder, of white cornel,* and a species of birch much esteemed in Siberia, its blossom being the only one that affords a fragrant smell. On the southern side of his plantation Springer had built a sort of hot-house, in which he cultivated, with the greatest assiduity and care, various flowers unknown in that climate; when they were in full bloom he would gather them, and pressing them to his lips, ornament the brow of his daughter, saying, "Elizabeth, adorn yourself with the flowers of your native country; their fate resembles yours; like you they flourish in a foreign land. O, may your end be more fortunate than theirs!"

Except during these moments of emotion, he was calm and silent on the subject of his misfortunes. For successive hours he would remain absorbed in the deepest thought, his eyes fixed upon the same object, and seated in the same spot. The caresses of his wife, and more especially those of his daughter, at these times seemed rather to increase than to alleviate his misery. He would sometimes take her in his arms, and pressing her to his bosom, would exclaim, presenting her to her mother, "Take her, Phedora! take our child! her fate and yours rend my heart! Ah! why did you follow me? Had you abandoned me to my own sufferings, had you not insisted upon partaking of them, perhaps even in this desert I could have been content, knowing that you and my child were living happy and respected in our native land!" The gentle Phedora seldom answered him but with tears; her looks, her words, her actions, all bore testimony to the tender and sincere affection by which she was attached to her husband. Separated from him she could have known no happiness; nor did she so forcibly regret their exile from their country, or their fall from grandeur, when she reflected that high dignities, places of trust and danger, might have detained him at a distance from her. In exile he never quitted her; and therefore she could have almost rejoiced in Siberia, but for the grief she endured at seeing the affliction with which his soul was rent.

Although Phedora had passed the first season of youth, she was still beautiful. Devoted to her Creator, her husband, and her child, time had not hitherto effaced the charms that innocence and virtue had imprinted on her countenance. She seemed to have been created for love in its greatest purity; and if such were her destiny, it had been fulfilled. Attentive to all the wishes of her husband, she watched his looks to discover what could contribute to his comfort or pleasure, that she might anticipate his wish before he had expressed it. She prepared their repasts herself. Order, neatness, and comfort was the characteristic of their little abode. The largest apartment served as a sleeping-room for herself and Springer. It was warmed by a stove; the walls were decorated with the drawings and work of Phedora and her daughter, and the windows were glazed, — a luxury seldom enjoyed in this country, and for which they were indebted to the profit which Springer derived from the chase. Two small rooms completed their habitation: one was occupied by Elizabeth; in the other, where the garden and kitchen utensils were kept, slept the Tartarian peasant, their only attendant.

Their days were spent in superintending their domestic concerns; in making different articles of clothing out of the skins of the reindeer, which they dyed with a preparation from the bark of the birch, or lined with thick furs. But when Sunday arrived, Phedora secretly lamented that she was deprived from attending Divine service, and spent a great part of the day in prayer. Prostrate before the God of all consolation, she invoked him in behalf of the objects of her tenderness; and, if her piety daily increased, one of the principal causes was, that her ideas and her expressions became more eloquent, and better adapted to bestow that consolation which her husband so much required, in proportion as her soul became elevated by devotion.

II.

The young Elizabeth, who knew no other country than the desolate one which she had inhabited from the age of four years, discovered beauties which nature bestows even upon these inhospitable climes; and, innocence finding pleasure everywhere, she amused herself with climbing the rocks which bordered the lake, in search of the eggs of hawks and white vultures, that build their nests there during summer. Sometimes she caught wood pigeons to fill a little aviary, and at others angled for carassins,* which move in shoals, whose purple shells, lying against one another, appear through the water like a sheet of fire covered with liquid silver. It never occurred to the happy days of her childhood that there could be a lot more fortunate than her own. Her health was established by the keen air she breathed; and exercise, in her light figure, united agility and strength; while her countenance, beaming with innocence and peace, each day seemed to disclose some new charm. Thus, far removed from the busy world and mankind, did this lovely girl improve in beauty, for the eyes only of her parents, to charm no heart but theirs; like the flower of the desert, which blooms before the sun, and arrays itself in not less brilliant colors, because it is destined to shine only in the presence of that luminary to which it is indebted for its existence.

The most fervent affections are those which are least divided. Thus Elizabeth, who knew no one except her parents (consequently could love none but them), loved them with a fervor that scarcely admitted of comparison. They were the protectors of her childhood, the partakers of her amusements, her only society. She knew nothing but what they had taught her: to them was she indebted for her talents, her knowledge, her studies, her recreations, and everything; and feeling that without them she could do nothing, enjoy nothing, she delighted in a dependence that was felt only through the medium of the benefits which resulted from it. When reason and reflection, however, succeeded to the carelessness of childhood, Elizabeth observed the tears of her mother, and perceived that her father was unhappy. She often entreated of them to tell her the cause, but could obtain no other answer than that they regretted being such a distance from their country. But with the name of that country, or the rank they held in it, they did not intrust her, fearing to excite a vain regret by informing her of the elevated rank from which they had been precipitated. From the time that Elizabeth discovered the affliction of her parents, her thoughts no longer flowed in the same channel as before, and the whole tenor of her life became changed. The innocent amusements she had so much enjoyed lost all their attractions. Her birds were neglected, and her flowers were forgotten: when she went down to the lake, it was no longer to cast the bait, or to navigate her little canoe, but to meditate profoundly upon a scheme which had become the sole occupation of her mind. Sometimes, seated upon a projecting rock, her eyes fixed upon the waters of the lake, she reflected upon the griefs of her parents and on the means of alleviating them. They wept for their country. Elizabeth knew not where this country was situated; but that they were unhappy out of it was sufficient. All her thoughts were directed to devise some plan for restoring them to it. She would then raise her eyes to heaven to implore that assistance which she could expect from thence only; and would remain buried in a revery so profound that the snow, falling in large flakes, and driven with violence against her by the wind, could not disturb it. But if her parents called, in an instant she would descend from the tops of the rocks, to receive the lessons of her father or to assist her mother in her domestic avocations. But with them, or alone, whether engaged in reading or occupied with her needle, one sole idea pursued her; one project held constant possession of her mind; this project she kept profoundly secret, resolved not to mention it till the moment of her departure should arrive.

Yes; she resolved to tear herself from the embraces of her parents, — to proceed alone, on foot, to Petersburg, and to implore of the Emperor pardon for her father. Such was the bold design which had presented itself to her imagination; such was the daring enterprise, the dangers of which could not daunt the heroic courage of a young and timid female. She beheld, in their strongest light, many of the impediments she must surmount, but her confidence in the Creator and the ardor of her wishes encouraged her; and she felt convinced that she could overcome them all. As her scheme, however, began to unfold itself, and she reflected upon the means of carrying it into execution, her ignorance could not fail to alarm her. She had never passed the boundaries of the forest she inhabited; how then was she to find her way to Petersburg? how could she travel through countries inhabited by people who spoke a language unknown to her? She must subsist upon charity: to submit to this she recalled to her aid those precepts of humility which her mother had so carefully inculcated; but her father had so often spoken of the inflexibility of mankind that she dreaded being reduced to implore their compassion. Elizabeth was too well acquainted with the tenderness of her parents to indulge the hope that they would facilitate her journey. It was not to them that she could, in this instance, have recourse. To whom then could she apply, in the desert where she lived? to whom address herself in a dwelling, the entrance to which was forbidden to every human being? Still she did not despair; the remembrance of an accident to which her father had nearly fallen a victim had engraven upon her mind the conviction that there is no place so desolate, in which Providence cannot hear the prayers of the unfortunate and afford to them assistance.

Some years before Springer had been delivered, by the intrepidity of a young stranger, from imminent peril, upon one of the high rocks which form a boundary to the Tobôl. This brave youth was the son of M. de Smoloff, the governor of Tobolsk. He came every winter to the plains of Ischim to kill elks and sables, and sometimes to hunt the bears of the Uralian Mountains,* which are occasionally seen in the environs of Saimka. In this dangerous chase he had met Springer, and was the means of saving his life. From that period the name of Smoloff had never been mentioned in the abode of the exiles but with reverence and gratitude. Elizabeth and her mother felt the most lively regret at not knowing their benefactor, that they might offer to him their acknowledgments and benedictions; but to Heaven they daily offered them for him, and indulged the hope, at each return of the hunting season, that chance might lead him to their hut. They, however, expected in vain. Its entrance had been forbidden to him, as well as to every one else; and he lamented not the restriction, as he was yet ignorant of the treasure which this humble habitation enclosed.

Nevertheless, since Elizabeth had been thoroughly convinced of the difficulty of leaving the desert without some human aid, her thoughts had frequently rested upon young Smoloff. Such a protector would have dissipated all her terrors, and might have vanquished all the obstacles that opposed her design. Who could be better calculated than he to give all the information she required respecting her journey from Saimka to Petersburg; to instruct her in what method to get her petition delivered to the Emperor? and, should her flight irritate the governor, who could be better calculated than a son to soften his resentment, move his compassion, and save her parents from being made responsible for her transgression?

Thus did she reflect on all the advantages which were likely to result from such a support; and as winter drew near she resolved not to let the hunting season pass away without taking some steps to inform herself

They may be divided into three principal branches, one of which reaches to the Frozen Ocean. The highest point of the Uralian Mountains is the Bashkirey, in the government of Orenburg. whether young Smoloff was in the country; and, if so, of seeking an opportunity to speak to him.

Springer had been so much affected by the terror of his wife and daughter, at the mere recital of the danger he had incurred, that he promised never again to engage in the bear hunt, nor to extend his walks beyond the plain, except in pursuit of squirrels or ermines. Notwithstanding this promise, Phedora could not see him depart to a distance without terror: and she always continued till his return in a state of agitation and anxiety, as if his absence was the presage of some calamity.

A heavy fall of snow congealed into a solid mass by an intense frost, had completely covered the surface of the earth, when, on a fine morning in the month of December, Springer took his gun and prepared for the chase. Before his departure he embraced his wife and daughter, and promised to return before the close of day; but the hour had passed, night approached, and Springer arrived not. Since the adventure which threatened his life, this was the first time he had failed in the strictest punctuality, and the terror of Phedora was indescribable. Elizabeth, while she partook of it, sought every means to tranquillize her: she would have flown to seek and succor her father; but she had not resolution to leave her mother in the agony in which she beheld her.

At length, however, the delicate and timid Phedora, who hitherto had never ventured beyond the banks of the lake, roused to exertion by the violence of her agitation, resolved to accompany her daughter, intending, if she could find her husband, to incur any danger in offering him assistance. They proceeded together, through the underwood of the forest, towards the plain. The cold was intense, the firs appeared like trees of ice, their branches being hid under a thick covering of hoar-frost. A mist obscured the horizon. Night's near approach gave to each object a still gloomier shade, and the ground, smooth as a glass, refused to support the steps of the trembling Phedora. Elizabeth, reared in this climate, and accustomed to brave the extremest severity of the weather, assisted her mother, and led her on. Thus a tree, transplanted from its native soil, languishes in a foreign land, while the young suckling, that springs from its root, habituated to the new climate, acquires strength, flourishes, and, in a few years, sustains the branches of the trunk that nourished it; protecting, by its friendly shade, the tree to which it is indebted for existence. Before Phedora had reached the plain her strength had totally failed. "Rest here, my dear mother," said Elizabeth, "and let me go alone to the edge of the forest. If we stay longer, the darkness of the night will prevent me from distinguishing my father in the plain." Phedora supported herself against a tree, while her daughter hastened forward, and in a few seconds she reached the plain. Some of the monuments with which it is interspersed are very high. Elizabeth climbed upon the most elevated of them: her heart was full of grief, and her eyes dim with tears. She gazed around in vain for her father; all was still and lonely; the obscurity of night began to render the search useless. Terror almost suspended her faculties, when the report of a gun revived her hopes. She had never heard this sound but from the hand of her father, and to her it appeared a certain indication that he was near. She rushed towards the spot whence the noise proceeded, and behind a pile of rocks discovered a man in a bending posture, apparently seeking for something upon the ground. "My father, my father, is it you?" she exclaimed. He turned hastily; it was not Springer. His countenance was youthful and his air noble: at the sight of Elizabeth he stood amazed. "O, it is not my father," resumed she, with anguish; "but perhaps you may have seen him on the plain? O, can you tell me where to find him?"—"I know nothing of your father," replied the stranger; "but surely you ought not to be here alone at this unseasonable hour; you are exposed to great danger, and should not venture."—"O," interrupted she, "I fear nothing but losing my father!" As she spoke she raised her eyes to heaven: their expression revealed at once firmness in affliction and dignity united with softness. They expressed the feelings of her soul, and seemed to foretell her future destiny. The stranger had never seen a person, nor had his imagination ever painted a vision, like Elizabeth: he almost believed himself in a dream. When the first emotion of surprise had subsided, he inquired the name of her father. "Peter Springer," she replied. "How!" he exclaimed, "you are the daughter of the exile residing in a cottage by the lake! Be comforted; I have seen your father. It is not an hour since he left me; he intended to make a circuit, and must be at home ere this."

Elizabeth listened no longer, but flew towards the spot where she had left her mother; and on her she called with a voice of joy, that the sound might reanimate her before she could explain the cause; but Phedora was gone. The terrified Elizabeth made the forest resound with the names of her parents. A well-known voice answered her from the side of the lake; she redoubled her speed, arrived at the hut, and found her father and mother at the door, their arms held forth to receive her. Mutual embraces were followed by mutual explanations. Each of them had returned home by a different road, but all were now united and happy. It was not till that moment that Elizabeth perceived the stranger had followed her. Springer immediately recognized him, and said, with profound regret, "M. de Smoloff, it is very late; but, alas! you know I am not permitted to offer you an asylum, even for a single night." — "M. de Smoloff!" exclaimed Elizabeth and her mother, "our deliverer! Is it indeed he whom we behold?" They fell at his feet; and while Phedora, unable to express her acknowledgments, bathed them with her tears, Elizabeth thus addressed him: "M. de Smoloff, three years have now elapsed since you saved my father's life; during that period not a day has passed on which our fervent prayers have not been offered up to the Almighty to beseech him to reward and bless you." — "Your prayers, then, have been heard," answered Smoloff, with the most lively emotion, "since he has deigned to guide my footsteps to this blessed abode; the little good I did deserved not such a reward."

It was now night; profound darkness covered the forest. A return to Saimka, at this hour, would be attended with danger, and Springer knew not how to refuse the rites of hospitality to his deliverer; but he had pledged his honor to the governor of Tobolsk not to receive any one under his roof, and to fail in his word, solemnly given, was a dreadful alternative. He proposed, therefore, to accompany the youth to Saimka. "I will take a torch," said he; "I am well acquainted with every turn of the forest, and with all those places which we must avoid, and fear not to conduct you safely." The terrified Phedora rushed forward to prevent him; and Smoloff, addressing him respectfully, "Permit me, sir," said he, "to solicit a shelter in your cottage till break of day. I know what are my father's injunctions, and the motives which compel him to show you so much severity; but I am certain that he would authorize me, on this occasion, to release you from your promise, and I will engage to return shortly and thank you, in his name, for the asylum you will have granted me." Springer overcame his scruples; he took the young man by the hand, conducted him into his cottage, and, placing him near the stove, seated himself by his side, while Phedora and her daughter prepared their repast.

Elizabeth was dressed according to the costume of the peasants of Tartary, in trousers made of the skin of the reindeer, and a short petticoat of crimson stuff, looped up; while her hair, in graceful ringlets, almost reached the ground. A close vest, buttoned at the side, displayed to advantage the elegance of her form, and her sleeves, turned back above the elbow, discovered her beautifully shaped arm. The simplicity of her dress seemed to enhance the mild dignity of her manners, and all her gestures were accompanied with a grace which did not escape the observation of Smoloff, who, as he watched her, experienced an emotion to which he had before been a stranger. Elizabeth beheld him with equal delight, but it was a delight pure as her mind; founded on the gratitude she owed him, and on the hope of his assistance, which she had so long indulged. That Power who dives into the inmost recesses of the heart beheld not in the heart of Elizabeth a single thought which had not for its object the happiness of her parents; for to them, exclusively of every other earthly attachment, was it devoted.

During supper young Smoloff stated that he had been three days at Saimka, where he had learned that a great number of wolves infested the neighborhood; and that it was in contemplation, in the course of a few days, to commence a general chase for the purpose of destroying them. At this intelligence Phedora changed color. "I hope," said she, addressing herself to her husband, "that you will not join in this dangerous diversion; O, do not expose your life, the greatest of my blessings!" — "Alas, Phedora! what is it you say?" exclaimed Springer, with a sensation of grief which he could not repress; "of what value is my life? Were I gone, would it be any longer your destiny to remain in this desolate place? Do you not know what would restore liberty to yourself and to our child? Do you not know —" Phedora interrupted him with an exclamation expressive of the anguish of her soul; Elizabeth rose from her seat, and drawing near her father, seized his hand. "My dear father," said she, "you know that, reared in this forest, I am ignorant of every other country. With you, my mother and myself are happy; in losing you, our happiness would be lost. I answer for her as for myself; without you we could not be happy in any situation of the globe; not even in that country which you so much regret." — "Possibly, M. de Smoloff," resumed Springer, after a short pause, "you may think these words should bring me comfort; on the contrary, they plunge the poniard of grief still deeper in my bosom. That virtue which should be my delight creates new pangs, when I reflect that it will forever be concealed in this desert, a sacrifice to me. My Elizabeth will never be known, will never meet with the admiration and the love which are so justly her due." Elizabeth hastily interrupted him: "O my father! placed between my mother and you, can you tell me I am not loved?" Springer, unable to moderate his affliction, continued thus: "Never will you enjoy that happiness which I receive from you; never will you hear the voice of a beloved child addressing you in angelic words of consolation. Your life will be spent without a companion, without any of the tender, the endearing ties of life, like a solitary bird wandering in a desert. Innocent victim! you know not the blessings from which you are debarred; but I, who no longer possess the power of bestowing them upon you, I know and feel — I deeply feel their value!"

During this scene young Smoloff had in vain endeavored to repress his tears; they had fallen more than once. He had attempted to speak, but his voice refused utterance; at last, after a pause of some minutes, "Sir," said he, "from the melancholy office which my father holds, you must be well aware that I am not a stranger to the sight of distress. Often have I travelled through the different districts under his extensive jurisdiction. What lamentations have I heard! what solitary wretchedness have I witnessed! In the deserts of Beresow,* upon the borders of the Frozen Sea, I have seen men who possessed not in the wide world a single friend; who never received a caress nor heard the soothing language of consolation. Insulated and separated from all mankind, they were not merely banished; their misery admitted of no alleviation." — "And when Heaven has spared you and my child," interrupted Phedora, and addressing her husband in an accent of tender reproach, "should you complain so bitterly? Had she been taken from you, what would you have done?" Springer shuddered at the idea. He seized the hands of his daughter and his wife, and, pressing them to his heart, he exclaimed tenderly, "O, Heaven be my witness how strongly do I feel that I am not deprived of every blessing!"

III.

As soon as the morning dawned, young Smoloff took his leave of the exiles. Elizabeth with regret saw him depart, for she was impatient to reveal her project to him, and to implore his assistance. Not a moment's opportunity had presented itself for her to speak to him in private. Her parents had never quitted the apartment, and she could not address him unobserved in their presence. She hoped, however, as she should see him often, to be more fortunate another time;

*Beresow, or Beresov, is a city of Siberia, situated in a province of the same name, to the northeast of Tobolsk, and 372 miles distant from it, in 64° N. latitude, and 64° 14′ E. longitude. Prince Menzikof died there in exile in 1729. The district Beresov has some valuable gold mines.

and therefore, as he took leave, she said, in the most anxious manner : —

"Will you not come again, M. de Smoloff? Ah! promise me that this is not to be the last time I am to see the deliverer of my father."

Springer was surprised at the earnestness of her address, and felt somewhat uneasy. He reflected on the orders of the governor, and resolved not to disobey them a second time. Smoloff replied to Elizabeth's request, that he was certain of obtaining from his father an exception in his favor, and that he would go that very day to solicit it. "But, sir," he said to Springer, "when I am asking this favor for myself, can I not deliver any message from you? Is there any favor that you may also require at his hands?" — "No, sir," answered Springer with unusual gravity, "I have no request to trouble you with." His guest looked down dejected; then addressing himself to Phedora, he repeated his question in nearly the same terms. "Sir," she replied, "I should be glad if the governor would allow myself and my daughter to go to Saimka, on Sundays, to hear mass." Smoloff undertook to obtain this permission, and departed with the benedictions of the whole family, and with the secret wishes of Elizabeth for his speedy return.

During his walk back to Saimka, Smoloff could think only of her. His imagination had been forcibly struck at her first appearance in the desert, and his heart had been deeply interested in the scene which he had afterwards witnessed between her and her parents. He recalled to his memory every word she had uttered, her looks, her manner; and his mind dwelt particularly upon the last words he had heard her utter. Without this last address, a sort of respect, approaching to veneration, would perhaps have deterred him from presuming to love her; but the eagerness with which Elizabeth had expressed a desire to see him again, and the tender sentiment with which her request had been accompanied, could not fail to excite in his mind a suspicion that she had been actuated by feelings similar to his own. His ardent and youthful imagination dwelt upon the thought, and persuaded him that fate, not chance, had brought about the adventure of the preceding evening, and that a mutual sympathy now existed between them. He was impatient to read, in the innocent heart of Elizabeth, the confirmation of his hopes. Ah! how far was he from imagining the sentiments that he was destined, on a future day, to discover there.

After Smoloff's visit to the hut, Springer's melancholy seemed to have increased. He reflected upon the generosity, the intrepidity, the gentleness of character, which this young man appeared to possess; and it was ever present to his mind that such was the companion he would have chosen for his daughter. Her situation, however, prevented him from dwelling on the idea; and, far from being desirous of seeing Smoloff again, he dreaded his return; for it would have been an affliction infinitely more insupportable than any he had yet experienced, to see his child the victim of hopeless love.

One evening, while plunged in deep dejection, his head supported by his hand, his elbow resting on his knee, he heaved a deep sigh. Phedora dropped her needle, and, fixing her eyes upon her husband, with an expression of the most heartfelt commiseration, she implored Heaven to enable her to banish his vain regret, and to pour the balm of consolation into his wounded soul.

Elizabeth from a distant corner of the room observed them both, and felt a secret joy as she reflected that a day might possibly come when she should be able to restore them to their former happiness, not doubting that Smoloff would encourage and facilitate her enterprise. A secret instinct assured her that he would be moved by it, and would assist her; but she feared the refusal of her parents, and particularly that of her mother. Nevertheless, to depart without their knowledge would be repugnant to her feelings, nay, would be impossible, as she knew not the name of their country nor the nature of the offence for which she was to supplicate forgiveness of the Emperor. It was necessary, therefore, to discover to them her intention, and the present seemed to be a fit moment for the disclosure. Therefore, bending one knee to the ground, she fervently implored aid from the Almighty, and that he would incline her parents to grant her suit. Then, approaching her father, she stood behind him, leaning upon the back of the chair on which he was seated. For some moments she remained silent in the hope that he would perceive and speak to her; but he continued in the same dejected attitude, and she broke the silence thus: "Will you permit me, my father, to ask you a question?" He raised his head, and made a sign that she might proceed. "When M. de Smoloff inquired the other day if you wished for anything, you answered no. Is it true that there is nothing you wish for?" — "Nothing that he could procure me." — "And who then could grant your wish?" — "The hand of justice." — "Where, my father, is justice to be found?" — "In heaven, my child; but if you mean upon earth, nowhere." As he ceased speaking, a deeper gloom overcast his brow, and he resumed his melancholy attitude.

After a short pause Elizabeth again ventured to speak. "My dearest parents," said she, in a tone of excessive animation, "hear me; I have this day completed my seventeenth year. This was the day on which I received from you a being that will be valuable indeed in my estimation, if to you I am allowed to devote it, — to you whom my soul reveres and cherishes as the living images of my Creator. From the time of my birth not a day has passed unmarked by your benefits, unendeared by tokens of your love. Hitherto the only return in my power to make has been gratitude and tenderness. But what avails gratitude if it be not shown? What avails tenderness if I cannot prove it? — O my beloved parents! forgive the presumption of your child; once in her life she would do for you what, from the hour of her birth, you have so unceasingly done for her. Condescend, then, to intrust her with the secret of your misfortunes." — "My child, what wouldst thou ask?" interrupted her father. — "That you would inform me of as much as it is needful for me to know to be able to prove the extent of my regard for you: Heaven bear testimony to the motive which induces me to make this request." As she uttered these words she fell on her knees before her father, and raised her eyes towards him with a look of the most moving supplication. An expression so noble shone through the tears that overflowed her countenance, and the heroism of her soul reflected an air so angelic over the humility of her attitude, that a suspicion of her project instantaneously darted across the mind of Springer. Unable to shed a tear or to breathe a sigh, he remained silent, motionless, struck with a sort of awe like that which the presence of an angel might have inspired. No circumstance attending his misfortunes had ever had the power to move his soul to such a degree as the words that Elizabeth had uttered; and his firm spirit, which even regal dignity had not been able to intimidate, was subdued by the voice of his child, and he attempted in vain to strive against the emotions that overpowered it.

While Springer remained silent, Elizabeth continued kneeling before him. Her mother approached to raise her. Phedora had not observed the motion or the look which had revealed to Springer the secret of his daughter's heart; and she was still far from imagining the trial with which her tenderness was threatened. "Why," said she, "why do you hesitate to confide in your child the history of our misfortunes? Is it her youth that prevents you? Can you fear that the soul of Elizabeth will suffer itself to be weakly depressed by the knowledge of our reverse of fortune?"

"No," replied Springer, looking steadfastly on his daughter, — "no, it is not weakness that I apprehend from her." From these words, and from the expressive look which accompanied them, Elizabeth saw that her father had understood her. She pressed his hand in silence, that he alone might comprehend her meaning, for she knew the heart of her mother, and was glad to retard the moment in which it must be afflicted. "O Heaven!" exclaimed Springer, "forgive me that I have dared to repine. I regretted the blessings of which I was deprived, but I knew not those thou hadst in store for me. Elizabeth, in this one happy day you have made me ample amends for twelve years of suffering." — "My father," she replied, "say not again there is no real happiness on earth, when the child of such a parent can be blessed with hearing words like these. But speak! tell me, I conjure you, your name, that of your country, and the cause of your unhappiness." — "Unhappiness! I am unhappy no longer; my country is wherever I can live with my daughter. The name in which I place my greatest glory is that of the father of Elizabeth." — "O my child!" interrupted Phedora, "I did not think the tenderness I bore you could admit of increase; but you have afforded consolation to your father."

At these words Springer's firmness was entirely subdued. He burst into tears, and, pressing his wife and daughter to his heart, repeated in a voice broken with sobs, "Pardon, O Most High! pardon an ungrateful being who presumed to murmur at thy decrees; and, O God! withhold the chastisements which his temerity has deserved."

When these violent emotions had subsided, Springer said to his daughter, "My child, I give you my word that I will inform you of every particular which you wish to know; but you must wait some days. I cannot speak of my sufferings at the moment; you have taught me to forget them."

The obedient Elizabeth ventured not to press him further, determining to wait with deference till he should feel inclined to give the information he had promised. But she waited for that moment in vain; Springer appeared to dread it and to avoid her. He had guessed her intention; and, though no language could express the gratitude and admiration of this fond parent, his tenderness would not permit him to grant the consent which he knew she would entreat; nor did he consider himself absolutely authorized to refuse it. This was, indeed, the only resource from which he might hope to be re-established in his rights, and to replace Elizabeth in the rank to which she was born; but when he reflected on the fatigues she must undergo and on the dangers she must incur, the idea was insupportable. Willingly would he have sacrificed his own life to reinstate his family in their rank and possessions, but to risk that of his daughter in such an attempt was a trial to which he felt his courage was unequal.

The silence of her father taught Elizabeth the line of conduct she ought to pursue. She was certain that he had penetrated into her design, for he was more deeply affected than she had ever seen him; but, if he had approved of it, would he, with so much precaution, have avoided speaking to her upon the subject? Indeed, when she deliberately considered her scheme, it seemed, even to herself, so impracticable that she feared her parents would only regard it as the effusion of filial enthusiasm. In order, therefore, to place her project in a point of view more favorable to its execution, she must represent it divested of some of the greater obstacles by which it was opposed, and with this view it was requisite to solicit the advice and assistance of Smoloff. Determining, therefore, to maintain silence upon the subject, and not to disclose the secret entirely to her parents, till she had conversed with him, she waited impatiently for his return.

Elizabeth foresaw that one of the strongest reasons that would withhold the consent of her parents would be the difficulty of her undertaking to travel eight hundred leagues on foot, in the severest climate of the earth. To lessen this difficulty as much as possible, and to prepare herself for hardship and fatigue, she exercised her strength daily in the plains of Ischim. Whether the snow, drifted by the wind, beat against her with a violence that opposed her passage, or a thick mist concealed almost the path before her, she relinquished not her resolution, sometimes, in contradiction even to the wishes of her parents; thus, by degrees, accustoming herself to endure the clemency of weather and their disapprobation.

IV.

SIBERIA, in winter, is subject to sudden storms. Often, during this season, when the sky appears serene, dreadful hurricanes arise instantaneously and obscure the atmosphere. They are impelled from the opposite sides of the horizon, and when they meet the strongest trees in vain oppose their violence. In vain the pliant birch bends to the ground; its flexible branches with their trembling leaves are broken and dispersed. The snow rolls from the tops of the mountains, carrying with it enormous masses of ice which break against the points of the rocks: these break in their turn, and the wind, carrying away the fragments, together with those of the falling huts, in which the terrified animals have in vain sought shelter, whirls them aloft in the air, and, dashing them back to the earth, strews the ground with the ruins of every production of nature.

One morning in the month of January Elizabeth was overtaken by one of these terrible storms. She was in the plain near the little chapel; and as soon as the sudden darkness of the sky announced the approaching tempest, she sought shelter under its venerable roof. The furious wind soon attacked this feeble edifice, and, shaking it to its foundation, threatened every instant to level it with the ground. Elizabeth, prostrate before the altar, was insensible to fear. The storm she had heard destroying all around her excited in her breast no sensation but that of a reverential awe caused by a natural reflection on the Omnipotent Being from whose hand it came. As her life might be serviceable to her parents, she felt assured that Heaven would, for their sake, watch over and guard it, till she had delivered them from suffering. This sentiment, approaching almost to superstition, created by the fervor of her filial piety, inspired Elizabeth with a tranquillity so perfect, that, in the midst of warring elements, with the thunderbolts of heaven falling around her, she yielded calmly to the heaviness which oppressed her, and, lying down at the foot of the altar, before which she had been offering up her prayers, she fell into a slumber secure and peaceful as that of innocence reposing on the bosom of a father.

On this very day Smoloff had returned from Tobolsk. After his arrival at Saimka he hastily proceeded to the cottage of the exiles. He brought the permission which Phedora had solicited. Her daughter and herself were allowed to attend Divine service at Saimka every Sunday; but, so far from any indulgence being extended to Springer, the orders of the court respecting him were more strict than ever. And, in allowing young Smoloff to see him once more, the Governor of Tobolsk had consulted his feelings rather than his duty; but this visit was to be the last: of this his father had exacted a solemn promise. Smoloff was grieved to the soul at so much severity; but as he drew near the dwelling of Elizabeth his melancholy dispersed. He thought less of the pain of taking leave, under the cruel restriction imposed upon him by his father, than of the delight he should experience from seeing her again.

In the first ardent pursuit of the youthful mind, the enjoyment of the present felicity is so animated, so complete, that it obliterates all idea of the future, and engrosses the soul so entirely that no room is left for the anticipation of future distress. Happiness is a sensation too ardently felt by youth to suffer them to waste a thought upon the instability of its duration. But when, on entering the cottage, Smoloff looked round for Elizabeth in vain, and reflected that he might not be able to prolong his visit until her return, his disappointment was too apparent to escape the most superficial observation. In vain did Phedora address him in the most affecting terms of gratitude, blessing the hand which had reopened for her the house of God, and had preserved the life of her beloved husband. In vain did Springer call him the protector, the comforter of the afflicted. He appeared almost insensible to their discourse, and, in the little that he spoke, the name of Elizabeth every instant escaped his lips. His evident embarrassment betrayed the emotions of his heart; and the disclosure rendered him the dearer to that of Phedora. His love for her daughter flattered her pride; and surely no mother had more reason to be proud of a child.

Springer was not less sensible of the merit of his daughter; but, fearing she would discover the visible partiality of the young man, which might disturb her peace, he reminded Smoloff of the obedience that was due to his father; thereby hoping to terminate a visit, which, by divers pretences, the youth had thought to prolong. It was at this period that the storm arose; and the parents trembled for the safety of their child. "Elizabeth! what will become of my Elizabeth?" exclaimed the agonized mother. Springer took his stick in silence, and went to seek his daughter; Smoloff rushed after him.

The tempest raged with terrific violence on every side; the trees were torn up by the roots, and any attempt to cross the forest would be attended with imminent danger. Springer remonstrated with Smoloff, and endeavored, but in vain, to deter him from following. Smoloff saw all the danger, but he saw it with a secret satisfaction; he was happy to brave it for Elizabeth, as it might afford him opportunity of giving proof to her of an affection which he would scarcely have dared to declare to her by any other means.

They proceeded till they reached the middle of the forest. "On which side shall we turn?" asked Smoloff. "Let us proceed towards the plain," Springer replied; "she walks there every day, and has probably taken shelter in the chapel." They said no more, but proceeded intrepidly on. Stooping to shelter themselves from the blows of the broken boughs and from the fragments of rock which the wind whirled over their heads, they walked forward as fast as the snow, which beat in their faces, would permit.

On reaching the plain, the danger with which they had been menaced from the breaking of the trees ceased; but in this exposed situation they were sometimes driven backward, and at others thrown down by the violence of the tempest. At length they reached the chapel, in which they hoped Elizabeth had sought a refuge. But when they beheld this precarious shelter, the walls of which consisted only of slightly joined planks, that creaked in the wind and seemed every instant ready to fall, they began to shudder lest she might be within them. Animated with indescribable ardor, Smoloff rushed into the chapel, and, to his astonishment, beheld Elizabeth, not terrified, pale, and trembling, but in a peaceful sleep before the altar. Struck with unutterable surprise, he stops, points out to Springer the cause of his amazement; and, impelled by similar sentiments of veneration, they fall on their knees by the side of the angel sleeping under the protection of Heaven. The father bent over his child, while Smoloff, casting down his eyes, retired some steps, not presuming to approach too near to such supreme innocence.

Elizabeth awoke, beheld her father, and, throwing herself into his arms, exclaimed, "Ah! I knew you watched over me." Springer pressed her to his heart. "My child," said he, "into what agonies have you thrown your mother and me!" — "O, my father! pardon me for causing those tears," answered Elizabeth; "let us hasten to relieve the terrors of my mother." In rising, she perceived Smoloff. "Ah!" said she, in gentle accents of pleasure and surprise, "all my protectors have then been watching over me, — Heaven, my father, and you." It was not without extreme difficulty that the young man could repress the emotions of his heart.

Springer resumed. "My dear child," said he, "you speak of rejoining your mother, but do you know whether it will be possible to do so? whether you will be able to resist the violence of a tempest which M. de Smoloff and myself have escaped only by a miracle." — "I will try," answered she; "my strength is greater than you imagine; and I rejoice in an opportunity which enables me to show you how much it is capable of performing, when the consolation of my mother calls forth its exertion."

As she spake, unwonted courage beamed in her eyes; and Springer believed that he could depend upon her exertions. She rested on her father and Smoloff, who jointly supported her, and sheltered her head with their wide mantles. How much did Smoloff rejoice in that boisterous wind which obliged Elizabeth to trust to him for support! He thought not of his own life, which he would gladly have exposed a thousand times to prolong those moments. He feared not even for the life of Elizabeth, which, in the ecstasy that possessed him, he would have defied the elements combined to hinder him from preserving.

The sky now began to assume its serenity, the clouds dispersed, and the wind by degrees ceased. Springer recovered his spirits, but those of Smoloff were depressed. Elizabeth withdrew her arm, and chose to walk on unassisted, for she was desirous of braving, before her father, the remainder of the storm. She was proud of her strength, and was eager to display before him a proof of it; with the hope of convincing him that it would not fail when she should undertake to obtain his pardon from the Emperor, were it necessary to go to the remotest extremity of the earth to seek it.

Phedora received them all with transports of joy, and fervently thanked Heaven for having restored them to her. She was delighted in again receiving her daughter; dried her dripping garments, and, taking off her fur bonnet, smoothed her long hair. For maternal cares, like these, which Elizabeth received daily from the hands of her mother, her affectionate heart became every day more grateful. Young Smoloff was affected at witnessing them, and felt that the happiness he should experience in becoming the husband of Elizabeth would be much increased by being also the son of the amiable Phedora.

ELIZABETH IN THE RUINED CHAPEL.

The storm had now entirely subsided, and night had begun to spread its dark shade over the cloudless sky. Springer pressed the hand of his guest, and, with a mixed sensation of sorrow and of tenderness, reminded him that it was time to depart. Elizabeth then learned, for the first time, that he was come to take a farewell. The color forsook her cheeks at the intelligence, and her embarrassment became visible. "What!" said she to him, "shall I never see you again?"—"O yes!" replied he, eagerly, "as long as you inhabit these deserts and I am free I will not quit Saimka. I shall see you at church whenever you come, and I shall see you on the plain upon the banks of the lake whenever this happiness is allowed me." He suddenly stopped, astonished at his own feelings and at what he had uttered; but Elizabeth did not understand him. In all he had said she only remarked the certainty of their meeting again, and that she should be able to consult him respecting her enterprise. Comforted by these hopes, she took leave of him with less regret.

V.

When Sunday arrived, Elizabeth and her mother, after an early breakfast, set out for Saimka. Springer bade them adieu with a feeling of regret, as this was the first time since his exile that he had remained alone in the cottage. But he concealed his sensations and blessed them with composure, recommending them to the protection of the Supreme Being whom they were going to invoke. The weather was fine; the Tartarian peasant served them as a guide through the forest of Saimka; its distance appeared short. On entering the church, every eye was turned towards them; but theirs were reverently cast down, while their hearts were fixed upon God alone. They advanced to the altar, and, bending before it, offered their sincere supplications for the same object; and if those of Elizabeth were more comprehensive than the supplication of Phedora, the beneficent Being who knew their hearts heard them with equal indulgence.

During the time the ceremony lasted, Elizabeth did not remove the veil which concealed her face. Her thoughts were so entirely engrossed by her Creator and her parents, that they did not extend even to him from whom she hoped for protection. The pious concert of voices which chanted the sacred hymns made an impression on her senses which approached to ecstasy. Her imagination painted the heavens opening, and the Almighty himself presenting an angel to conduct her on her journey. This imaginary vision lasted as long as the music vibrated upon her delighted ear. When that ceased, she raised her head, and the first object that presented itself to her view was young Smoloff, leaning against one of the pillars at a little distance, with his eyes fixed intently upon her. He appeared to her to be the angel that God had presented, the guardian angel who was to assist her in the deliverance of her father. Her eyes beamed with confidence and with gratitude. Smoloff was moved by their expression; it seemed to be in unison with what passed in his mind; for he also felt grateful for the happiness he enjoyed in again beholding her, and in believing himself beloved.

On leaving the church he proposed to conduct Phedora and Elizabeth in his sledge to the entrance of the forest. Phedora consented with pleasure, as she would thereby be the sooner able to rejoin her beloved husband. But Elizabeth was disappointed by this arrangement. She had flattered herself that, in the course of a walk, some opportunity might have occurred of speaking to Smoloff in private. In a carriage this would be impossible. She could not speak on the subject before her mother, who, as yet, was wholly ignorant of her design, and would, on its first disclosure, reject it with terror, and forbid him to afford her any assistance. Yet it appeared to Elizabeth that she ought not to lose such an opportunity of mentioning her scheme to him, as, possibly, none equally favorable might ever occur again. Thus was her mind agitated and perplexed, when the sledge had already passed the border of the forest to which Smoloff had proposed to drive them. But wanting resolution to leave Elizabeth, he went on till they reached the banks of the lake. There he was obliged to stop. Phedora descended first, and, taking his hand, said, "Will you not sometimes walk this way?" Elizabeth, who followed her mother, whispered, in a faltering tone, "No, not this way, but to the little chapel on the plain, to-morrow." Thus did she innocently appoint a meeting, without thinking of the interpretation that Smoloff might give to her words. She fancied that she had spoken only of her father; and on seeing in Smoloff's countenance that her request had been heard and would be granted, hers brightened with joy.

While Phedora and her daughter walked towards their dwelling, Smoloff, entranced with delight, returned alone across the forest. He could no longer doubt that Elizabeth loved him. And, with the knowledge he had of her, the certainty of this excited in his breast the most lively emotions of joy. He had never beheld beauty equal to hers; he had lately seen her, in the presence of her Maker, the image of piety and of innocence: he had also seen repeated proofs of the tenderness of her heart in her conduct towards her parents; and how could a heart so tender fail of being induced to love the man to whom a father's life was owing. Ingenuous and candid, from her education in the midst of a desert, how should she have acquired the art of concealing her sentiments? Yet he felt astonished at her wishing to see him unknown to her parents; but he easily found excuses for an indiscretion which he dared to attribute to excess of love.

It was not with the embarrassment which is generally attendant on stolen meetings of this nature, but with all the security of unsuspecting innocence, that Elizabeth repaired, on the following morning, to the chapel. Her steps were lighter and her pace was swifter than usual; for she considered that what she was doing was the first movement she had made towards the liberation of her father. The sun shone with splendor on the snowy plains; and thousands of icicles, hanging suspended from the branches of the trees, reflected its bright image in various forms of beauty and grandeur; but this lustre, so brilliant and clear, was less pure and less noble than the soul of Elizabeth. She entered the chapel. Smoloff was not there; his delay disturbed her; a slight gloom overspread her countenance. It was not caused by disappointed vanity, nor even by neglected love. No passion, no foible, could at this moment have found a place in her heart; but she dreaded lest some accident or unforeseen circumstance might have prevented the arrival of him whom she so anxiously expected. With fervency she implored of the Almighty not to prolong the perplexity she endured. During her supplication Smoloff entered: he was astonished to find her there before him, who had hastened upon the wings of love.

The passions of the human heart are swift in search of their gratification; but Elizabeth this day afforded a proof that virtue, in the performance of its duty, was still swifter.

On seeing Smoloff, she raised her hands to Heaven in token of gratitude; then turning towards him with a graceful and expressive motion, "Ah, M. de Smoloff," said she, "how impatiently have I waited for you!" These words, the expression of her countenance, the exactness with which she had kept the appointment, all tended to confirm the delighted youth in the supposition that he was beloved. He was on the point of declaring to her the fervor by which he was animated; but she did not give him time. "Listen to me, M. de Smoloff," said she; "I have sought this opportunity of seeing you, that I might implore your assistance in an attempt to restore liberty to my father. Will you promise me your aid and counsel?" These few words completely overturned all the ideas that Smoloff had entertained. Distressed, embarrassed, he perceived his error; but it did not diminish his love for Elizabeth. He knelt: she imagined that it was before God; but it was to her that this mark of veneration was paid, and he solemnly declared that he would perform everything she required.

She resumed her discourse: "Since the dawn of reason enlightened my soul, my parents have been the sole objects of my thoughts; their love has been my greatest blessing, and to contribute to their happiness is my only wish. They are miserable. Heaven calls me to their relief, and has led you to this spot to aid me in fulfilling my destiny. My design is to proceed to Petersburg to solicit my father's pardon." Smoloff, overwhelmed with astonishment, indicated by his gestures that the project appeared to him utterly impracticable; but she hastily continued, "I cannot tell how long this design has held possession of my mind. It seems to me that I received it with my existence; it is the first that I remember, and it has never quitted me. In my sleeping as in my waking moments it pursues me. It is this idea that has always occupied me when with you; and it was this which induced me to request to see you here, as it has inspired me with courage sufficient to dread neither fatigue nor poverty nor opposition nor death. Indeed, so bent I am upon leaving Siberia that I should feel inclined to disobey my parents were they to refuse their consent. You see, M. de Smoloff, that it would be in vain to remonstrate with me: my resolution is not to be shaken."

During this address all the flattering hopes that Smoloff had entertained completely vanished; but his admiration soared far beyond the powers of description. Such heroism in a female, and in one so young, exceeded anything that he had ever imagined; and his tears, which flowed unrestrained, were caused by a sensation scarcely less delightful than the transports of requited love. "Happy," said he, "happy far beyond desert do I esteem myself in thus being selected as your guide and counsellor; but you are not aware of the various obstacles —" "Two only have discouraged me," interrupted she; "and perhaps no one could remove them so effectually as you." — "Speak," said he, impatient to obey: "what is there you can ask which I will not willingly perform?" — "The obstacles," answered Elizabeth, "are these: I am a stranger to the road, and my flight may injure my father. On you I rely for instruction in everything that regards my journey, — the towns I am to pass through; the houses founded for the accommodation of indigent travellers, on the hospitality of which I may depend for relief; and the mode in which I may get my petition presented to the Emperor. But first you must pledge yourself that your father will not punish mine for the offence of his child." — "Elizabeth," said he, "do you know to what extent the Emperor is prepossessed against your father? Do you know that he regards him as his most inveterate enemy?" — "I am ignorant," she replied, "of what crime my father is accused, I know not even his real name, nor that of his country; but I am convinced of his innocence." — "How!" said Smoloff, "you know not the rank your father held, nor the name by which you must speak of him?" — "Neither," answered she. — "Astonishing," he exclaimed, "that neither pride nor ambition should have had any share in suggesting an enterprise to which your whole soul is devoted! You know not the honors you would regain; you think only of your parents. But what is grandeur of birth to a soul like yours? What to the sentiments which inspire it is the lofty name of —" "Hold," interrupted she, "the secret you are about to reveal belongs to my father, and from him only I must learn it." — "True," replied Smoloff, in a tone of enthusiastic admiration, "there is no principle of honor, no point of delicacy, which is not an inmate in your soul." Elizabeth resumed the subject of her expedition to ask when Smoloff would give her the information that was requisite for it. "I must take time to consider it," answered he; "but, Elizabeth, do you think that it is possible for you to travel the 3,500 versts which divide Ischim from the province of Ingria;* and to do this alone, on foot, and unprovided with money?" — "Ah!" exclaimed Elizabeth, "He who sends me to succor my parents will not abandon me."

The eyes of Smoloff were filled with tears. After a moment's pause he replied, "It is impossible even to think of commencing such an undertaking till the long days of summer. At this season it would indeed be impracticable. Even the sledges could not proceed, and the marshy forests of Siberia are all inundated. I will see you again in a few days, and will then state to you my real opinion concerning your project. At present I feel incapable of forming a correct judgment upon it. I will return to Tobolsk and consult my father; he is the best of men. The situation of the exiles would be much more miserable than it now is, were he not governor of this district; and no one is more capable of appreciating a noble action than he. He cannot, however, assist you; his duty forbids it; but I pledge to you my honor that, so far from punishing your father for having given existence to a daughter so virtuous, it would be his greatest glory to call you his. Elizabeth, pardon me! My heart declares itself in defiance of opposition. I know that yours can now hold no other sentiment than the glorious one that has so long engrossed it; and I expect not a return. But should there come a day in which your parents, happy and secure in their native land, shall no longer require your exertions, remember that in this desert Smoloff saw you, loved you, and would have preferred a life of obscurity and poverty with Elizabeth in exile to all the glory that the world could offer." He would have said more, but tears interrupted his utterance. He was amazed at the extraordinary emotion which agitated him. Till that moment he had never felt such weakness; but till that moment he had never loved.

* Ingria, or Ingermanland, is that province of European Russia situated at the extremity of the Gulf of Finland, which Peter the Great conquered from the Swedes in the year 1702, at the same time with Livonia, Esthonia, and a part of Finland, which now forms the government of Riga, Revel, and Wibourg. St. Petersburg is its capital, and Ingria forms the government of St. Petersburg.

Elizabeth had remained motionless during this unexpected declaration. The idea of any other than filial love was to her so new that she scarcely comprehended it. It might have appeared to her less strange had her heart been free to receive it. Had her parents been happy, Smoloff might have been loved; he may still be loved, should that event ever take place; but while they are in affliction, she will remain constant to her first passion, and to contain two, the human heart, comprehensive as it is, is not formed.

Elizabeth had never lived in society. A stranger to its customs and rules, she had, nevertheless, a sort of decorum, the attendant of virtue, which taught her that, after a declaration of love, she ought not to remain alone with the man who had presumed to make it. She was therefore preparing to leave the chapel, when Smoloff, who saw her design, said, "Elizabeth, have I offended you? I call to witness Him who sees the inmost recesses of the heart, that in mine there is not less of respect than of love. He knows that, were you to command it, I would be silent and die; how, then, Elizabeth, can I have offended you?" — "You have not offended me," she mildly replied; "I came here merely to inform you what I have it in contemplation to do for the relief of my parents. I have nothing further to say, and am now proceeding to rejoin them." — "Noble-minded girl, return to your duty. In associating me with it you have rendered me worthy of you, and, far from ever wishing in the most secret thought to turn you from its paths, I will devote my time solely to your service in aiding you to fulfil it."

He then promised to give her, on the following Sunday, at Saimka, all the instructions and observations which might be requisite for her enterprise; and they parted, each looking forward, with eager expectation, to their next meeting.

When the Sunday arrived, Elizabeth accompanied her mother joyfully to Saimka. She was anxious to see Smoloff again, and to receive from him the information which might accelerate her departure. But the service ended and Smoloff did not appear. She became uneasy. While her mother still continued in prayer, Elizabeth inquired of an aged woman if M. de Smoloff had been seen in the church. The answer she received dismayed her. "No," replied the woman, "he departed two days since for Tobolsk." The object of her most ardent wishes seemed thus always to fly before her at the very moment that she thought herself on the point of obtaining it. A thousand different terrors now presented themselves to her imagination. Smoloff had left Saimka without remembering his promise: what reason had she to suppose that he would remember it at Tobolsk? And, if he did, how could he perform it? These thoughts haunted her all the remainder of the day; and at night, oppressed by the chagrin of disappointment (which weighed the more heavily upon her as there was no one to whom she could communicate it), she retired early to her little apartment, to indulge, unrestrained, in the grief which overwhelmed her.

As soon as she had quitted the room, Phedora, addressing herself to her husband, said, "I must disclose to you a source of solicitude which destroys my repose. Have you not marked the change which has recently taken place in Elizabeth? When with us, she seems at all times buried in thought: the name of Smoloff suffuses her countenance with blushes; his absence renders her unhappy. This morning, in the church, her eyes wandered on all sides; I heard her anxiously inquire if Smoloff was there; and she became pallid as death when informed that he had departed for Tobolsk. O, Stanislaus! I remember, in those days which preceded my union with you, that it was thus I changed color when your name was pronounced: it was thus that my eyes sought you in every place, and were filled with tears when the search was vain. Alas! these are symptoms of no transient attachment. How can I observe them in my child without dread? she is not destined, like her mother, to be happy." — "Happy!" exclaimed Springer, with a sensation of poignant regret, — "happy in a desert, and in exile!" — "Yes, in a desert, in exile, in every place, blessed with the society of him I love."

She pressed his hand to her lips. But, soon returning to the subject which distressed her, she said, "I fear Elizabeth loves young Smoloff; and, charming as she is, he will only behold in her the daughter of a poor exile. He will scorn her affection; and my child, my only child, will die with grief at seeing her love disdained." Tears suppressed her utterance, and the presence of Springer, which had consoled her under all her afflictions, could not allay the fears she entertained for her daughter's future happiness.

Springer reflected for a moment, and then replied: "Phedora, my beloved, be comforted; the conduct of Elizabeth has not been unnoticed by me; and perhaps I have seen farther than you into what passes in her soul. Another idea, and not that of Smoloff, engrosses it; I am certain of this. I am certain also, that, if we were to offer her to Smoloff, he would not contemn the gift, even in this desert; and this sentiment will render him deserving of her, if ever — Yes, it will be so; Elizabeth will not always live secluded in this desert: her virtue will not always remain buried in obscurity. She was not born to be unhappy; so much goodness Heaven sooner or later will recompense."

This was the first time since his banishment that Springer had appeared not to despair. Phedora argued from the circumstance the most pleasing presages; and, reassured by his words, she lay down composedly to rest.

VI.

For two months Elizabeth went every Sunday to Saimka with the hope of seeing Smoloff, but in vain; and at last she was informed that he had left Tobolsk. All her hopes now vanished: she now no longer doubted his having entirely forgotten her; and she frequently shed tears of the bitterest sorrow at the thought, but for which the purest innocence could not have reproached her.

The end of April approached. The snow began to melt, and a verdant shade began to diffuse itself over the sandy shores of the lake. The white blossoms of the thorn thickly covered its boughs, resembling flakes of newly fallen snow; while the blue-budded campanula, the downy mugwort,* and the iris enamelled the ground around its roots. The blackbirds descended in flocks on the naked trees, and were the first to interrupt the mournful silence of winter. Already upon the banks of the river, and sometimes on its surface, sported the beautiful mallard of Persia,† the bright flame-color, with a tufted head and ebony beak; and woodcocks of various species, some black with yellow beaks, others speckled with feathery ruffs around their necks, ran swiftly along the marshy grounds, or hid themselves among the rushes. In short, every symptom announced an early spring; and Elizabeth, foreseeing how much she should lose if a year so favorable for her expedition were suffered to pass by, formed the desperate resolution of undertaking it unaided, trusting for success to Heaven and her own firmness.

One morning Springer was employed in his garden; whilst seated at a little distance, Elizabeth regarded him in silence. He had not yet confided to her the secret of his misfortunes, and it was a confidence which she no longer sought. A kind of delicate pride had arisen in her soul, which had made her desirous of remaining in ignorance of the rank her parents held till the moment of her departure; and to defer her request of knowing what they had lost, until she could answer, "I go to solicit that pardon which will restore happiness to all." Until this time she had depended upon the promises of Smoloff, and on them had founded what she considered reasonable hopes of success. But when these had failed, her sanguine imagination suggested others of which she resolved to speak. Before she ventured to begin, she, however, reflected upon the numerous objections that would be advanced, and the various obstacles that would be opposed to her scheme. That they were important she was certain: Smoloff had told her so; and she was well convinced that the tenderness of her parents would even exaggerate them. What answer could be made to their remonstrances, their entreaties, their commands; when they should tell her that the blessing of revisiting their country would not be worth the terror they should suffer during the temporary loss of their child? She forgot that her father was near; and, bursting into tears, fell upon her knees to implore from Heaven that eloquence which could prevail against their arguments.

Springer, who heard her sob, turned hastily round, and running to her, raised her from the ground. "Elizabeth," said he, "what is the matter? What has happened to you? If you are afflicted, weep at least on the bosom of your father." — "O my father!" she replied, "detain me no longer here; you know my wish; O, grant it! I feel that Heaven itself calls me."

She was interrupted by the young peasant, their attendant, who, running towards them, cried, "M. de Smoloff — M. de Smoloff is here."

Elizabeth uttered a scream of delight. She took her father's hand, and, pressing it to her heart, exclaimed, "It is so; the Omnipotent himself calls me; he has sent him who will open for me the road and will remove every obstacle. O my father! your daughter will yet be able to break the chain which holds you a prisoner."

Without waiting for an answer, she flew to see Smoloff, and in the way met her mother, whom she seized by the arm, and embracing her, cried, "Come with me; he is returned: M. de Smoloff is returned."

On entering the cottage they perceived a gentleman, apparently about fifty years of age, in a military dress, accompanied by several officers. The mother and daughter started back in amazement. "This is M. de Smoloff," said the young Tartar. At these words all the hopes of Elizabeth were a second time destroyed. Her color fled; her eyes were filled with tears. Phedora, alarmed at the excess of her emotion, placed herself before her to conceal it from general observation. Happy would the afflicted mother have esteemed herself if, by the sacrifice of her own life, her daughter could have been released from the fatal passion which she no longer doubted held possession of her soul.

The governor of Tobolsk dismissed his attendants, and, turning to Springer, said, "Sir, since the time that the court of Russia deemed it prudent to condemn you to banishment, this is the first opportunity I have had of visiting this remote spot; and it is a duty now pleasing to me, since it affords me the opportunity of testifying to an exile so illustrious how sincerely I feel for his misfortunes and how deeply I regret that duty forbids me to offer the assistance and protection which otherwise I would gladly bestow." — "I expect nothing from men, sir," interrupted Springer, coldly; "I look not for their commiseration, as I hope nothing from their justice; and since my misfortunes have placed me at a distance from them, I shall pass my days contented in this desert."

"O sir!" replied the governor, with emotion, "for a man like you to live an exile from his country is a destiny indeed to be lamented!" — "There is one, sir, still more lamentable," replied Springer, "to die an exile." He said no more; for, had he added another word he might have shed a tear, and the illustrious sufferer wished to appear above his misfortunes. Elizabeth, concealed behind her mother, anxiously watched the governor, to ascertain whether his manner and countenance announced a character which would encourage her to disclose her project to him. Thus the fearful dove, before she leaves her nest, peeps from among the branches, and long and attentively surveys the heavens, to mark whether the appearance of the sky promises a serene day.

The governor remarked and knew her. His son had often spoken of her; and the portrait which his descriptions had drawn could resemble none but Elizabeth. "Madam," said he, addressing himself to her, "my son has mentioned you to me; you have made an impression upon his mind which time will never efface." "Did he tell you, sir," hastily interrupted Phedora, "that she is indebted to him for the life of a father?"

"No, madam," answered the governor; "but he told me how anxious she is to devote hers to that father and to you."

"She is," said Springer, "and her affectionate regard is the only blessing we have now left, the only blessing of which mankind has not been able to deprive us." The governor turned aside to conceal his emotion. After a short pause he addressed himself to Elizabeth. "Madam," said he, "it is two months since my son, then at Saimka, received an order from the Emperor to set off immediately to join the army, assembling in Livonia. Without a moment's loss of time he was obliged to obey; but, before his departure, he conjured me to convey to you a letter. I could not, without the most imminent danger, send it by a messenger: I could only deliver it myself, and now his commission shall be executed." Elizabeth, blushing, took the letter which he presented to her. The governor, observing the surprise of Springer and Phedora, exclaimed, "Happy are the parents from whom a daughter conceals only secrets like this!" He then recalled his attendants, and in their presence said to Springer, "Sir, the commands of my sovereign still prevent me from allowing you to receive any one here; nevertheless, if any poor missionaries, who, I am informed, must cross these deserts in their return from the frontiers of China, should come to your dwelling to beg a night's lodging, you are permitted to receive them."

After the governor had taken leave, Elizabeth still kept her eyes fixed upon the letter she held in her hand, not daring to open it. "My child," said Springer, "if you are waiting for permission from your mother and myself to read your letter, you have it." With a trembling hand Elizabeth then broke the seal; and as she perused the contents she made frequent exclamations of gratitude and joy. When she had finished, she threw herself into the arms of her parents, and exclaimed, "The moment is arrived, every circumstance contributes to favor my enterprise; Heaven approves and blesses my intention. O my parents? will you not likewise bless it?" Springer shuddered at the words she uttered; he knew the intention to which she alluded; but Phedora, who had not an idea of it, exclaimed, "Elizabeth, what means this mystery? what does that paper contain?" She made a motion as if to take it; but Elizabeth, gently withdrawing her hand, "O my mother, pardon me," said she; "I tremble to speak before you: you have not yet guessed at what I would say, and the idea of your terror disheartens me. This is now my only remaining impediment. I know not how to obviate it. O, permit me to explain myself before my father only; you are not yet prepared as he is—" "No, my child," interrupted Springer, "do not separate us: do not that which exile and misfortune has never yet effected. Come to my heart, my Phedora, and if your courage fail you at the words you are about to hear, may mine sustain your drooping spirits." Phedora, terrified, dismayed, seeing herself menaced by some dreadful calamity, but knowing not whence the stroke was to come, replied, in a tone of alarm, "Stanislaus, what can you mean? Have I not endured with fortitude every reverse of fortune? Nor will that fortitude forsake me now," added she, pressing to her heart her husband and her child; "between you it will sustain me against the worst that fate can do—" Elizabeth attempted to reply, but her mother would not hear her. "My child," exclaimed she with anguish, "ask my life, but do not ask of me to consent to our separation." These words proved that she had penetrated into the secret, and the pain of telling it to her was spared; but to induce her to consent seemed an undertaking so arduous that even the sanguine hopes of Elizabeth were daunted. Bathed in tears, trembling at the sight of her mother's agitation, Elizabeth, in broken accents, uttered only these words: "O my mother! if, for the happiness of my father, I asked of you some days only?"—"O no, not one!" exclaimed the mother in an agony; "what happiness could be worth such a price! No, not one day! O gracious Heaven! do not permit her to ask me." These words entirely subdued the courage of Elizabeth. Unable to utter what could to such an excess afflict her mother, she presented to her father the letter she had received from the governor of Tobolsk and made a sign that he should read it. He took it, and in a faltering voice read aloud the following lines, written by young Smoloff, at Tobolsk, about two months before : —

"The greatest concern I experience, on leaving Saimka, Elizabeth, proceeds from the impossibility of informing you that an indispensable obligation forces me to an absence from you. I can neither see you, write to you, nor send you the information you have asked of me, without acting in opposition to the commands of my father, and without endangering his safety. Perhaps my wish to oblige you might have induced me to have failed in my duty towards him, had it not been for the example you have shown me. But after I had so lately learned what is due to a parent, I could not expose the life of mine. To you, however, I will confess that my duty was not, like yours, performed with delight. I returned to Tobolsk with a broken heart. My father informed me that a mandate from the Emperor must transport me a thousand miles from you, and that this mandate must be obeyed immediately. I depart, Elizabeth, and you know not what I suffer. Ah ! I do not ask of Heaven that you should ever know my feelings.

"I have opened my heart to my father. I have made you known to him, and his tears have flowed at the recital of your project. I believe he will visit the district of Ischim this year, and that it will be expressly to see you. In the mean time he will, if possible, convey to you this letter. I depart with greater tranquillity, Elizabeth, since I leave you under the protection of my father. But do not, I conjure you, do not think of setting out on your expedition until my return ; I expect it will be in less than a year. I will be your conductor and your guard to Petersburg, and will present you to the Emperor. Do not fear that I will address you again on the subject of my love. No, I will but be as a friend, a brother ; and if I serve you with all the fervor of passion, I swear never to address you but in a language pure as that of innocence, as that of angels or yourself."

The following postscript was written by the governor himself : —

"No, madam, it is not my son that must conduct you. I doubt not his honor, but yours must be placed beyond the reach of suspicion. When, at the court of Russia, you exhibit instances of virtue too heroic not to be crowned with success, the breath of envy must not whisper that you were conducted thither by a lover, and thus tarnish the noblest instance of filial piety the world can boast of. In your present situation there are no protectors worthy to guide your innocence but Heaven and your father. Your father cannot accompany you, but Heaven will not forsake you. Religion will lend you her aid ; shield yourself therefore under her guidance. You know to whom I have given permission to enter your dwelling. In intrusting you with these directions, I render you the depositary of my fate. Were this letter to be made public, were it to be known that I had favored your departure, my ruin would be the inevitable result ; but I have no fear ; I know in whom I confide, and what may be expected from the heroism and honor of a daughter willing to sacrifice her life for a father."

As he finished the letter, the voice of Springer became firmer and more animated. He gloried in the virtues of his daughter and in the admiration which they excited. But the tender mother thought only of the danger of losing her. Pale, motionless, unable to weep, she regarded her child in silence, and raised her eyes to heaven. Elizabeth threw herself on her knees before them both. "O my parents !" said she, "permit me to speak : in this humble attitude should the greatest of all blessings be solicited. I presume to aspire to that of restoring you to liberty, to happiness, and to your country ; for more than a year has this been the object of my fondest hopes. The season for it approaches, and you would forbid me to attempt it. If there be a blessing greater than that which I entreat, refuse me this, I will consent ; but if there be not —" Agitated and trembling, the accents she would have uttered died unfinished on her lips ; and by looks and motions of the most earnest supplication only could she finish her prayer. Springer laid his hand upon the head of his daughter, and said not a word ; her mother exclaimed, "Alone, on foot, without help ! O no, I cannot! I cannot!" — "My mother," answered Elizabeth, eagerly, "do not, I beseech you, — do not oppose my wish. You would not, if you knew how long I have indulged it, and how much consolation I have derived from it. As soon as my reason enabled me to comprehend the cause of your unhappiness, I resolved to dedicate my life to the removal of it. Happy was the day on which I first contemplated the design of liberating my father! Blessed the hope which supported me when I saw you weep! Long ago would the affliction of witnessing your silent sorrow have overwhelmed me, had I not reflected, 'It is I who may restore that of which you may lament the loss.' If you deprive me of this hope in which all my thoughts are centred, I shall no longer attach a value to life, and my days will linger away in despair. O, pardon me for grieving you! No, if you forbid my departure, I shall not die, since my death would be an additional source of affliction to you. But I entreat of you not to oppose my happiness. Tell me not that my enterprise is impracticable. My heart replies that I can accomplish it. Heaven will supply me with strength when I go to claim justice, and with eloquence to obtain my demand. Nothing will daunt me; neither sufferings nor contempt, neither the dazzling splendor of a court nor the awful brow of majesty; nothing but your refusal." — "Cease, Elizabeth, O, cease!" interrupted Springer; "my ideas are confused; my soul till now never sunk before a noble action: till this moment it never heard of virtue too heroic for its strength to bear. I did not think myself weak. O my child! you now teach me that I am; no, I cannot consent." Encouraged by his refusal, Phedora, taking her daughter's hands, said, "Hear me, Elizabeth. If your father betrays weakness, you may well excuse it in your mother. Pardon her that she has not resolution to give you permission to display your virtue. Strange that a mother must ask her child to be less excellent! but your mother only asks it; she does not command; possessed of such greatness of soul, you ought to receive no command but from the dictates of your own heart." — "My dear mother," replied Elizabeth, "yours shall ever be held sacred. If you desire me to remain here, I hope I shall have resolution enough to obey without repining; but suffer me to hope that my scheme will yet receive your assent. It is not the result of a moment's enthusiasm, but of the reflection of many years; and it is established upon reason as well as upon affection. Does there exist any other means of rescuing my father from exile? During the twelve years that he has languished here, what friend has undertaken his justification? And were there one who dared to do it, would he dare to say as much as I should? Would he be instigated by motives similar to mine? O no; let me indulge the thought that Heaven has reserved for your child the blessing of restoring you to happiness, and do not oppose the glorious undertaking with which Heaven has designed to charge her. Tell me what it is you consider so alarming in the enterprise. Is it my temporary absence? Have I not often heard you lament that exile which forbids you the hope of bestowing me in marriage? And would not a husband have separated me from you entirely? Is it danger? There exists none; the winters of this climate have inured me to the utmost severity of the weather, and the daily exercise I have taken on these plains has enabled me to bear the fatigue of long travelling. Are you alarmed on account of my youth? It will be my support; the weak meet with general assistance. Or do you fear my inexperience? I shall not be alone; do you remember the words of the governor's letter? He permits the poor missionary to take shelter under our roof for the purpose of affording me a guide and a protector. You see that every danger, every obstacle, is removed. Nothing is wanting but your consent and your benediction." — "And you must beg your bread," exclaimed Springer, in a tone of poignant distress. "The ancestors of your mother, who formerly reigned in these territories, and mine, who were seated on the throne of Poland, will look down and see the heiress of their name begging her daily bread in that Russia which has made of their kingdoms provinces to her empire." — "If such is the royal blood that flows in my veins," replied Elizabeth, in accents of modest surprise, "if I am a descendant of monarchs, if two diadems have graced the brows of my forefathers, — I hope to prove myself worthy both of them and of you, and never to dishonor the illustrious name they have transmitted to me; but poverty will not dishonor it. Why should not the daughter of the Seids and of Sobieski have recourse to the charity of her fellow-creatures? How many, precipitated from the height of human grandeur, have implored it for themselves! Happier than they, I shall implore it only in the service of my father."

The noble firmness of Elizabeth, and the pious pride which sparkled in her eyes at the thought of humbling herself for the sake of her father, gave to her discourse such animation, and such strength and authority, that Springer was unable to resist. He felt that he had no right to prevent his daughter from displaying her heroic virtue; that he should be culpable in detaining her in the obscurity of a desert. "O my Phedora!" he cried, tenderly pressing the hand of his wife, "shall we condemn our heroic child to end her days here unknown? Shall we deprive her of the prospect of being the happy mother of children resembling herself? Take courage, my Phedora! This will be the only possible means of restoring her to a world of which she will be the ornament; let us grant the permission she solicits." At this moment the feelings of the mother triumphed over those of the wife; and for the first time did Phedora presume to resist the most sacred of human authorities. "Never, never will I give my permission; even you, Stanislaus, will entreat it in vain. I shall have courage to resist. What! shall I expose the life of my child? Shall I consent to see my Elizabeth depart, to hear on some future day that she has perished with cold and by famine, in a frightful desert, and live to deplore her loss? Can such a request be made to a mother? O Stanislaus! is it possible there can be a sacrifice I would not make to you, and a grief in which all your endeavors to console me would be vain?" She ceased to speak; her tears no longer flowed; the anguish of her mind was unutterable. Springer, unable to endure the sight of her distress, exclaimed, "My child, if your mother cannot consent, you must not go." — "No, my mother, if you desire it, I will stay," said Elizabeth, embracing her with an ecstasy of tenderness; "never will I disobey you. But perhaps the Almighty will obtain from you that which you have refused even to my father. Join with me in entreaties, my mother; let us ask of Heaven the conduct we must pursue; it is its wisdom that must enlighten, its support that must sustain us; from it proceeds all truth, and from it only can we learn submission to its decrees."

While Phedora prayed, tears again came to her relief. That piety which calms and softens human affliction, and which possesses itself of the heart to chase thence the agonies of sorrow; that divine piety which never prescribes a duty without pointing out its recompense, and which never fails to pour the balm of consolation into the souls of those who humbly invoke it, — touched the soul of Phedora. The approbation of men can obtain from the ambitious character, which places all its happiness in glory, a sacrifice of the tenderest affections, but religion alone can obtain such a sacrifice from hearts like that of Phedora, whose happiness centred solely in those she loved.

VII.

On the following day, Springer, being alone with his daughter, gave her a narration of his misfortunes. He informed her of the dreadful wars which had afflicted the kingdom of Poland, and in what manner that unfortunate nation had at last been subverted. "My only crime, my child," said he, "was too strong an attachment to my country to endure the sight of its slavery. The blood of some of its greatest monarchs flowed in my veins. Its throne might have fallen to my lot, and my services and my life were due to the country from which all my glory was derived. I defended it as I ought. At the head of a handful of noble Poles I fought, to the last extremity, against the three great powers which were combined to destroy it; and at length, overpowered by the numbers of our enemies, we were compelled to yield, under the walls of Warsaw, in sight of that great city delivered up to flames and pillage. But, though forced to submit to tyranny, at the bottom of my heart I resisted still. Ashamed to remain in my native country, which was no longer in the possession of my countrymen, I sought allies to aid me in restoring to Poland its existence and its name. Vain effort, ineffectual attempt! each day riveted faster those chains which my feeble endeavors were unable to break. The lands of my ancestors lay in that part of the country which had fallen under the dominion of Russia. I lived upon them with Phedora, and should have lived with felicity unequalled, had not the yoke of the stranger weighed heavily upon my mind. My open murmurs, and still more the number of persons who had been injured by the Russians, and who resorted to my house, roused the alarm of an arbitrary and suspicious monarch. One morning I was torn from the arms of my wife, from yours, my child, and from my home. You were then but four years of age; and your tears flowed not for your own misfortunes, but because you saw your mother weep. I was dragged to the prisons of Petersburg. Phedora followed me thither, where the only favor she could obtain was permission to share in my confinement. We lived nearly a year in those dreadful dungeons, deprived of air, and nearly of the light of heaven, but not of hope. I could not persuade myself but that a just monarch would forgive a private citizen for having endeavored to maintain the rights of his country, and that he would trust to the promise I gave of future submission. I had judged of mankind too favorably; I was condemned unheard, and was banished for life to the deserts of Siberia. My faithful companion would not abandon me; and, in accompanying me, she seemed to follow the dictates of her heart rather than those of her duty. Yes, had I been condemned to linger out my existence in the frightful darkness of the terrific Beresow, or amidst the undisturbed solitudes of the lake Baikal, or of Kamtschatka,* she would have not forsaken me. In short, had my destiny been rendered even more miserable than it now is, my Phedora would still have proved my consoling angel. To her goodness, to her piety, to her generous sacrifice, I shall ever believe I am indebted for my milder doom. O my child! it is to her that I owe all the solace of my life, while in return I have associated her in my misfortunes." — "Misfortunes, my father," said Elizabeth, "when you have loved her so tenderly, so constantly!" In these words Springer recognized the heart of Phedora, and perceived that Elizabeth, like her mother, could live contented with the man she loved. "My child," resumed he, returning young Smoloff's letter, which he had kept since the preceding evening, "if I shall one day owe to your zeal and courage the restoration of that rank and wealth which I no longer desire but for the purpose of placing you in the bosom of prosperity, this letter will remind you of our benefactor. Your heart, Elizabeth, is grateful, and the alliance of virtue can never disgrace the blood of royalty." Elizabeth colored as she received from her father the letter; and, placing it in her bosom, she answered, "The remembrance of him who pitied, who loved, and who served you shall ever be cherished by me."

For some days the departure of Elizabeth was not mentioned. Her mother had not yet consented; but, from the air of melancholy which pervaded all her actions, and from the deep dejection of her countenance, it was visible that the solicited consent was in her heart, and that all hope of resistance had forsaken her.

One Sunday evening the family was assembled at prayer, when a gentle tapping at the door disturbed them. Springer opened it, and a venerable stranger presented himself. Phedora started up, exclaiming in agony, "O Heaven! this is he who has been announced to us; it is he who comes to deprive me of my child." She hid her face with her hands; even her piety could not induce her to welcome the servant of God. The missionary entered. A long white beard descended from his breast. He was bent more by long labors than by age. The hardships of his life had worn his body and strengthened his soul. There was an expression of sorrow in his countenance : it was that of a man who had suffered much, but had experienced something consolatory ; of a man who felt that he had not suffered in vain : the whole of his appearance inspired the beholder with veneration.

* Kamtschatka is a large peninsula at the north-east extremity of Asia. It was discovered by the Russians in 1696, and made tributary in 1711. It has two volcanoes, one of which emitted considerable flames in 1762, and again in 1767, and iron mines which have been worked with success from the year 1760. Its two principal ports are Kamtschatka and Awatchka, called also Port St. Peter and St. Paul. The city of Bolchetskoiostrog, which, as the residence of the governor, is deemed the capital of Kamtschatka, contains nearly five hundred tolerably well built houses.

"Sir," said he, addressing himself to Springer, "I enter your dwelling with a joyful heart ; the blessing of God is upon this cottage, for it contains a treasure more precious than gold and pearls ; I come to solicit a night's lodging." Elizabeth hastened to fetch him a seat. "Young maiden," said he to her, "you have early trod the paths of virtue, and in the springtime of human life have left us far behind." He was preparing to seat himself, when the sighs of Phedora arrested his attention ; addressing himself to her, "Christian mother," said he, "why do you weep ? is not your child favored by the Most High ? Heaven conducts her steps, and you should consider yourself blessed far beyond the common lot of parents. If you thus grieve because the call of virtue for a short time separates you from your child, what must become of those mothers who see their offspring torn from them by the ways of vice, and lost to them for eternity ?" — "Holy father ! if I am to see her no more !" exclaimed the afflicted Phedora. — "You would see her again," he answered with animation, "in that celestial paradise which will be her inheritance ; but you will see her again on earth ; the difficulties of her undertaking are great and various, but God will protect her : he tempers the wind to the clothing of the lamb."

Phedora bowed her head in token of resignation. Springer had not yet spoken. His heart was oppressed : he could not utter a word. Elizabeth herself, who never before had felt her courage relax, began to experience sensations of weakness. The animated hope of rendering service to her parents had hitherto absorbed every idea of the grief of leaving them ; but now, when the moment was arrived that she could say to herself "To-morrow I shall not hear the voice of my father, to-morrow I shall not receive the fond caresses of my mother ; perhaps a year may pass away ere such happiness be mine again," she now felt as if the success of her enterprise could scarcely make her amends for so distressing a separation. Her eyes became dim, her whole frame was agitated, and she sunk weeping upon the bosom of her father. Ah, timid orphan ! if already you extend your arms to your protector, and, on the first approach of your undertaking, bend to the ground as a vine without support, where will you find that courage which may enable you to traverse nearly half the globe separated from them.

Before they retired to rest the missionary supped with the exiles. Freedom and hospitality presided at the board, but gayety was banished ; and it was only by the utmost effort that the exiles suppressed their tears. The missionary regarded them with tender concern. In the course of his long travels he had witnessed much affliction, and the art of bestowing consolation had been the principal study of his life. For different kinds of sorrow he pursued different methods : for every situation, for every character, he had words of comfort ; nor did he often fail to afford relief. He well knew that if it is possible to withdraw the mind from the contemplation of its own sorrows, by presenting the image of some calamity greater than the one lamented, the tears that flow through pity will soften the agony of woe. Thus, by relating the long history of his own sufferings, and of the various distressing scenes he had witnessed, he by degrees attracted the attention of the exiles, moved them with compassion for the sufferings of their fellow-creatures, and led them to reflect that their lot had been mild compared with that of many. What had not this venerable old man seen ? What could he not relate ? He, who, for sixty years, at the distance of two thousand miles from his country, in a foreign climate, and in the midst of persecutions, had labored incessantly in the conversion of savages whom he entitled brethren, and who were not unfrequently the most inveterate of his persecutors ? He had visited the court of Pekin, and had excited the astonishment of the Mandarins by the extent of his learning, and still more by his rigid virtue and his austere self-denial. He had assembled together tribes of wandering savages, and had taught them the principles of agriculture. Thus were barren wastes changed into fertile lands : thus did savages become mild and humane ; and families to whom the fond titles of father, of husband, and of son were no longer unknown, raised their hearts to Heaven in tributes of thanksgiving. All these blessings were the result of the pious labors of one man. These people did not condemn the missions of piety. They presumed not to say that the religion which dictates them is severe and arbitrary; and still further were they from affirming that men who practise that religion with such success of charity and love towards their fellow-creatures are useless and ambitious. But why not pronounce them ambitious? In devoting their lives to the service of their fellow-creatures do they not aspire to the highest of rewards? Do they not seek to please their Maker, and to gain the reward of Heaven? None of the most celebrated conquerors of the earth ever raised their aspiring thoughts so high: they were satisfied with the esteem of men and with the dominion of the world.

The good father then informed the exiles that, recalled by his superior, he was now returning on foot to Spain, his native country. On his road thither he was to pass through Russia, Germany, and France; but he seemed to think little of the journey. The man who had traversed vast deserts that yielded no other shelter from the inclemency of weather than a den, no pillow on which to rest the weary head but what a stone afforded, and whose only food had been a little rice-flour moistened with water, might well consider himself at the period of his labors on approaching to civilized nations; and Father Paul almost fancied himself in his own country, when he found himself once more among a Christian people. He related accounts of the dreadful sufferings he had endured, and of the difficulties which he had overcome, when, after passing the wall of China, he had entered the extensive territories of the Tartars.* He stated that at the entrance of the vast deserts of Songria, which appertain to China, and which serve it as a boundary on the side of Siberia, he had discovered a country abounding in rich and valuable furs. By means of this commodity it was able to maintain an extensive commerce with European nations; but no traces of their industry had as yet reached that distant spot; no merchant had hitherto dared to carry his gold, or attempt a lucrative traffic, where the missionary had ventured to plant the cross, and had distributed blessings: so true is it that charity will stimulate to enterprises from which even avarice recedes.

A bed was prepared for Father Paul in the little chamber before occupied by the Tartar peasant, who now slept, wrapped up in a bearskin, near the stove. As soon as day began to dawn, Elizabeth rose. She approached softly to Father Paul's door, and hearing that he had already risen, she requested permission to enter and converse with him in private; as she felt that she dared not speak concerning her project before her parents, much less to express her wish that they might set out, the following morning, on their journey. She related to him the history of her life: it was a simple but affecting story, which consisted chiefly of anecdotes of mutual tenderness between her parents and herself. In the long recital of her doubts and hopes she had occasion, more than once, to pronounce the name of Smoloff; but it seemed as if this name occurred only to heighten the picture of her innocence, and to show that it was not wholly through the absence of temptation she had preserved so entire the purity of her heart. Father Paul was deeply affected with the narration. He had made the tour of the globe, and had seen almost all that it contained; but a heart like that of Elizabeth was new to him.

Springer and Phedora knew not that it was their daughter's intention to leave them on the morrow; but when they embraced her in the morning, they felt that sensation of involuntary terror which all animated beings experience on the eve of a storm that threatens them. Wherever Elizabeth moved, Phedora followed her with her eyes; and she often seized her suddenly by the arm, without daring to ask her the question that hovered on her lips. But she spoke continually of employments that she had for her on the following day, and gave orders for different works to be done several days hence. Thus did she endeavor to reassure herself by her own words; but her heart was not at ease, and the silence of her daughter spoke most feelingly to it of her departure. During dinner, she said, "Elizabeth, if the weather be fine to-morrow, you shall go in your canoe with your father to fish in the lake." Her daughter looked at her in silence, while the tears involuntarily fell from her eyes. Springer, agitated by the same anxiety as Phedora, addressed himself to her hastily. "My child," said he, "did you hear your mother's desire? you are to accompany me to-morrow." Elizabeth reclined her head upon her father's shoulder, saying, in a whisper, "To-morrow you must console my mother." — Springer changed color. It was enough for Phedora. She asked no more; she was certain that the departure of her child had been mentioned; but it was a subject she wished not to hear, for the moment that it was spoken of before her must be that of giving her consent, and she indulged the hope that, till this consent was granted, Elizabeth would not dare to leave her home. Springer collected all his firmness, for he saw that, on the morrow, he must sustain the loss of his child and the anguish of his wife. He knew not whether he could survive the sacrifice he was about to make; a sacrifice to which he never could have submitted, but from the excess of love he bore his daughter. Therefore, concealing his emotion, he received the intelligence with apparent composure, and feigned to be content, in order to bestow upon her the only recompense worthy of her virtue.

How many secret emotions, how many afflicting, unobserved sensations, agitated the minds both of the parents and the child on this day of trial! Sometimes they exchanged the most tender caresses, at others they appeared a prey to the most heartfelt grief. The missionary sought to rouse their spirits, by reciting all the histories in the sacred writings in which Providence had rewarded, in an especial manner, the sacrifices of filial piety and paternal resignation. He likewise gave them hints that the difficulties of the journey would not be great, as a man of high consequence, whom he would not name, but whom they easily guessed, had furnished him with the means of rendering it easier and more pleasant than it otherwise could have been. Thus passed the day, and when night arrived, Elizabeth, on her knees, in broken accents, entreated her parents' blessing. Her father approached her. The tears streamed down his manly cheeks. His daughter held out to him her arms: he beheld, in her motion, the sign of a farewell. His heart became too much oppressed to suffer him to weep; and, laying his hands upon her head, he in silence recommended her to the protection of the Almighty, for he had not the courage to utter a word. Elizabeth, then turning round to her mother, said, "And you, my mother, will you not likewise bestow your blessing upon your child?" — "To-morrow," replied Phedora, in a voice almost stifled with the agony of grief, "to-morrow!" — "And why not to-day, my mother?" — "O yes," answered Phedora, running to her, "to-day, to-morrow, every day." Elizabeth bowed her head, while her parents, their hands joined, their eyes raised, with trembling voices pronounced a solemn benediction.

The missionary, with a cross in his hand, stood at a little distance, praying for them: it was the picture of virtue praying for innocence; and if such invocations ascend not to the throne of Heaven, what can those be which have a right to attain it?

It was now the middle of May, that season of the year when, between the deepening shades of twilight and the glimmering dawn of the day there are scarcely two hours of night. Elizabeth employed this time in making preparations for her departure. She had provided herself with a travelling-dress, and this, with a change of shoes and stockings, she packed in a bag of reindeer skin. It had been her constant practice, for nearly a year, to work at night after she had retired to her chamber, that she might get these things in readiness unknown to Phedora. During the same period of time she had reserved from each of her collations some dried fruits and a little flour, in order to defer as long as possible that moment when she must have recourse to the charity of strangers. But she was determined not to take anything from the dwelling of her parents, where little was to be found but what necessity required. The whole amount of her treasure was eight or ten copecks.* This was all the money she possessed, all the riches with which she undertook to traverse a space of more than eight hundred leagues.

"Father," said she to the missionary, knocking softly at his door, "let us now depart while my parents are asleep. Do not let us awake them; they will grieve soon enough. They sleep tranquilly, thinking that we cannot escape without passing through their chamber. But the window of this room is not high. I can easily jump out, and will then assist you in getting down." The missionary agreed to this stratagem of filial tenderness, which was to spare the parents and child the agonies of such a parting. They left the house, and as soon as they were in the forest, Elizabeth, having thrown her little wallet on her shoulder, walked a few steps hastily forward. But turning her head once again towards the dwelling she had abandoned, her sobs almost stifled her. Bathed in tears she rushed back to the door of the apartment in which her parents slept; "O Heaven!" cried she, "watch over them, guard them, preserve them, and grant that I may never pass this threshold again if I am destined to behold them no more." She then rose, and turning, beheld her father standing behind her. "O my father! are you here? why did you come?" — "To see you, to embrace you, to bless you once more; to say to you, my Elizabeth, if, during the days of your childhood, I have let one day escape without showing proofs of my tenderness, if once I have made your tears to flow, if a look, an expression of harshness has afflicted your heart, before you go pardon me for it; pardon your father, that, if he is doomed not to have the happiness of seeing you again, he may die in peace." — "O, do not talk thus!" interrupted Elizabeth. — "And your poor mother," continued he, "when she awakes, what shall I say to her? What shall I answer when she asks me for her child? She will seek you in the forest, on the borders of the lake, everywhere; and I shall follow weeping with her, and calling despondingly for our child, who will no longer hear us." At these words Elizabeth, overpowered and almost fainting, supported herself against the walls of the hut. Her father, seeing that he had affected her beyond her strength, bitterly reproached himself for his own want of fortitude. "My child," said he, in a more composed voice, "take courage; I will promise, if not to comfort your mother, at least to encourage her to support your absence with fortitude, and will restore her to you when you return hither. Yes, my child, whether the enterprise of your filial piety be crowned with success or not, your parents will not die till they have embraced you again." He then addressed the missionary, who, with his eyes cast down, stood at a little distance, deeply affected by this scene of affliction. "Father," said Springer, "I intrust to your care a jewel which is invaluable. It is more precious than my heart's blood; far, far more precious than my life. Nevertheless, with full confidence I intrust it to you. Depart, then, together; and may the angels of heaven watch over both. To guard her celestial powers will arm themselves, and that dust which formed the mortal part of her ancestors will be reanimated; the all-powerful Being, the Father and Protector of my Elizabeth, will not suffer her to perish."

Without venturing to look at her father again, Elizabeth placed one hand across her eyes, and, giving the other to the missionary, departed with him. The morning's dawn now began to illuminate the summits of the mountains and gild the tops of the dark firs; but all nature was still wrapped in profound silence. No breath of wind ruffled the smooth surface of the lake, nor agitated, with its breezes, the leaves of the trees. The birds had not begun to sing, nor did a sound escape even from the smallest insect. It seemed as if nature preserved a respectful silence, that the voice of a father, calling down benedictions on his child, might penetrate through the forest which now divided them.

I have attempted to convey an idea of the grief of the father, but my powers are inadequate to describe that of the mother. How could I delineate her sensations, when, awakened by the lamentations of her husband, she runs to him, and reading in his despondent attitude that she had lost her child, falls to the ground in a state of unutterable anguish, that seems to threaten her existence! In vain does Springer, by recalling to her mind all the miseries attendant upon a life of banishment, endeavor to calm her grief. She attends not to his voice; love itself has lost its influence, and can no longer reach her heart. The sorrows of a mother are beyond all human consolation, and can receive it from no earthly source. Heaven reserves to itself alone the power of soothing them; and if these agonizing sorrows are given to the weaker sex, that sex is formed gentle and submissive, to bow beneath the hand that chastises it, and to have recourse to the only comfort that remains.

VIII.

It was on the eighteenth of May that Elizabeth and her guide set out upon their journey. They were full a month in crossing the marshy forests of Siberia, which, at this season of the year, are subject to terrible inundations. Sometimes the peasants, whom they overtook, permitted them, for a trifling compensation, to mount their sledges; at night they took shelter in cabins so miserable that, had not Elizabeth been long inured to hardships and privation, she would scarcely have been able to take any repose.

Often was she obliged to lie down, in her clothes, upon a wretched mattress, in a room scented with the fumes of tobacco and spirits, and into which the wind penetrated through the broken windows, ill repaired with paper; and, to complete her discomfort, the whole family, and sometimes even a part of their cattle, reposed in the same miserable apartment.

Forty versts from Tinoen,* a town on the frontiers of Siberia, is a wood, in which a row of posts marks the boundary of the division of Tobolsk. Elizabeth observed them, and to her it appeared like a second parting, to leave the territory which her parents inhabited. "Alas!" said she, "what a distance separates us now!" When she entered Europe, the same melancholy reflection recurred to her. To be in a different quarter of the world presented to her imagination the idea of a distance more immense than the vast extent of country she had crossed. In Asia she had left the only human beings upon whom she had a claim, and upon whose affection she could rely; and what could she expect to find in that Europe, so celebrated for its enlightened inhabitants? what in that imperial court where riches and talents flowed in such abundance? Would she find in it any heart moved by her sufferings, softened by her afflictions, or from whose commiseration she might hope for protection? At this thought, one name presented itself to her mind. Ah! might she have dared to indulge the hope of meeting him at Petersburg, — but there was no chance. The mandate of the Emperor had sent him to join the army in Livonia.* There was not, then, the remotest probability of finding him in Europe, a quarter of the globe which seemed to her to be inhabited by him only, because he was the only person in it whom she knew. All her dependence, then, was upon Father Paul; and in Elizabeth's ideas the man who had passed sixty years in rendering services to his fellow-creatures must have great influence at the court of monarchs.

Perma† is nearly nine hundred versts from Tobolsk. The roads are good, the lands fertile and well cultivated. Young woods of birch-trees are frequently intermixed with fine and extensive fields; and opulent villages, belonging to the Russians and Tartars, are scattered about. Their inhabitants appeared to be so contented and happy that it could hardly be imagined they breathed the air of Siberia. This tract of country contains even elegant inns, abounding in luxuries hitherto unknown to Elizabeth, and which excited her astonishment.

The city of Perma, although the handsomest she had hitherto seen, shocked her from the narrowness and dirtiness of the streets, the height of its buildings, the confused intermixture of fine houses and miser-

In the vicinity of this town foxes are taken whose skins are held in such estimation that they are all sent to the court of Russia.

* Livonia is one of the four great provinces of European Russia, situated on the shores of the Baltic, which Peter the Great wrested from Sweden in 1702. Its capital is Riga.

able huts, and the closeness of the air. The town is surrounded by fens, and the country as far as Casan* (interspersed with barren heaths and forests of firs) exhibits a most gloomy aspect. In stormy seasons the lightning frequently falls upon these aged trees, which burn with rapidity, and appear like columns of the brightest red, surmounted by crowns of flames. Elizabeth and her guide, often witnesses of these flaming spectacles, were not unfrequently obliged to cross woods that were burning on each side of them. Sometimes they saw trees consumed at the roots, while their tops, which the fire had not reached, were supported only by the bark, or, half thrown down, formed an arch across the road. Others, falling with a tremendous crash one upon another, make a pyramid of flames like the piles of the ancients, on which pagan piety consumed the ashes of its heroes.

Amidst these dangers, and amidst the still more imminent ones which they encountered in the passage of rivers that had overflowed their banks, Elizabeth was never disheartened. She even thought that the difficulties of her undertaking had been exaggerated. The weather, it is true, was uncommonly fine, and she often travelled in the cars or kibitkis,† which were returning from Siberia, whither they had conveyed new exiles. For a few copecks the travellers easily obtained permission of the drivers to ride as far as they went. Elizabeth, whenever she had need of it, accepted, without hesitation, the assistance of her holy guide; for what she received from him was considered by her as the gift of Heaven.

Elizabeth and her guide, about the beginning of September, arrived at the banks of the Thama,‡ two hundred versts from Casan, having nearly accomplished half their journey. Had it been the will of Heaven that she should complete her enterprise as easily as she had succeeded in this part of her journey, she would have considered the happiness of her parents cheaply purchased. But it was her destiny to experience a sad reverse, and with the winter season that period approached which was to put her steadfastness to the severest trial, and call forth all the exertions of her filial piety, to gain for its reward a crown of immortal glory.

The health of the missionary had for several days visibly declined. It was with difficulty that he could walk, even with the assistance of Elizabeth, and supported by his staff. He was frequently obliged to rest; and when a conveyance could be obtained for him in a kibitki, the violent shocks he received from the roughness of the road exhausted the little remains of his strength, though the firm composure of his soul continued unmoved. On his arrival at Sarapol (a large village on the northern banks of the Thama), he found himself so extremely weak that it was impossible for him to think of proceeding on his journey. At this place he obtained a lodging in a miserable inn adjoining to the house of the superintendent of the district. But the only room he could be accommodated with was a sort of loft or garret, the floor of which shook under every step. The windows were unglazed, and the furniture of this wretched apartment consisted of a wooden table and a bedstead. Over the latter were strewed a few trusses of straw, upon which the missionary reposed his feeble limbs. The wind, which entered freely through the broken casements, must have banished sleep from his relief, had the pain he unremittingly endured allowed him to enjoy any repose. The most desponding reflections now presented themselves to the terrified imagination of Elizabeth. She inquired for a physician, but none was to be had; and as she perceived that the people of the house took no interest whatever in the state of the sufferer, she was obliged to depend solely upon her own efforts for procuring him relief. After fastening some pieces of the old tapestry which lined the sides of the apartment across the windows, she went out into the fields in search of certain wild herbs the virtues of which she had been taught by her mother, and of which she made a salutary beverage for the suffering missionary.

* Kasan, or Casan, a considerable town of Asiatic Russia, the capital of the province or government of the same name, is situated on the river Casanska, at no great distance from the Wolga, in latitude 55° 44′ north. It was formerly the capital of a Tartar kingdom of the same name, which the Russians took in 1554. Its suburbs extend three versts from the city. A very valuable kind of morocco leather is manufactured here, and it also carries on an extensive trade in skins.

† The Kibitki is a light travelling-carriage much used in Russia, and long enough for travellers to lie down in it at full length.

As night approached, the symptoms of his malady grew, every instant, more alarming, and the unfortunate Elizabeth could no longer restrain her tears. She withdrew to a distance, that her sobs might not disturb his dying moments; but the good father heard them, and was grieved for an affliction which he knew not how to remove; for he felt well assured that he should rise no more, and that the period of his mortal career was fast approaching. To the pious philanthropist, who had dedicated a long life to the service of his God and of his fellow-creatures, death could present no terrors, though he could not help regretting the prospect of being called away while there remained so much for him to do. "O Most High!" he inwardly exclaimed, "I presume not to murmur at thy decrees; but, had it been thy will to spare me till I had conducted this unprotected orphan to the end of her journey, my death would have been more easy."

When it grew dark, Elizabeth lighted a rosin taper, and remained seated all night at the foot of the bed to attend her patient. A little before daybreak she approached to give him some drink. The missionary, feeling that the moment of his dissolution was near at hand, lifted himself up a little in the bed, and receiving from her the cup she presented to him, raised it towards heaven, saying, "O my God! I recommend her to thy care, who hast promised that a cup of cold water bestowed in thy name shall not go unrewarded." These words carried with them the conviction of that misfortune which Elizabeth, till this moment, had affected to disbelieve. She discovered that the missionary felt his end approaching, and that she should soon be left destitute and unprotected. Her courage failed. She fell upon her knees by the side of the bed, while her eyes became dim, her respiration difficult, and a cold dew stood upon her forehead. "My God, look down with pity on her! look down with pity on her, O my God!" repeated the missionary, while he regarded her with the tenderest commiseration; but as he perceived that the violence of her anguish seemed to increase, he said, "My dear child, in the name of God and of your parents, compose yourself, and listen to me." The trembling Elizabeth stifled her sobs, and, wiping away the tears that impeded her sight, raised her eyes to her venerable guide in token of attention. He supported himself against the back of the bed, and, exerting all his remaining strength, addressed her thus: — "My child, in travelling at your age, alone, unprotected, and during the severe season that approaches, you will have to endure great hardships. But there are dangers still more alarming which must fall to your lot. An ordinary courage, that might stand firm amidst fatigues and suffering, would be unable to resist the enticements of seduction. But yours, Elizabeth, is not an ordinary courage; and, under the protection of Heaven, the allurements of a court will not have the power to change your heart. You will meet with many who, presuming upon your unprotected situation and on your distress, will seek to turn you from the paths of virtue; but you will neither put faith in their promises, nor be dazzled by the splendor which may surround them. The fear of God and the love of your parents will place you beyond all their attempts. To whatever extremity you may be reduced, never lose sight of these sacred claims, never forget that a single false step will precipitate to the grave those to whom you owe your existence." — "O father!" interrupted she, "fear not." — "I do not fear," said he; "your piety, your noble resolution, have merited implicit confidence, and I am well convinced that you will not sink under the trials to which Heaven ordains you. You will find, my child, in my cloak, the purse which the generous governor of Tobolsk gave to me when he recommended you to my care. Preserve, with the strictest caution, the secret of his agency in appointing me to conduct you. His life depends upon your circumspection. The money this purse contains will defray your expenses to Petersburg. When you arrive there, go to the Patriarch; mention Father Paul to him. Perhaps the name may not have escaped his memory; he will procure an asylum for you in some convent, and will, I doubt not, present your petition to the Emperor, and it is impossible that the Emperor can reject it.

In my expiring moments I repeat it to you, my child, that a proof of filial piety like that which you will display has no precedent. The admiring world will bestow the applause it merits, and your virtue will be rewarded upon earth, before it receives the glorious recompense which awaits it in heaven —"

He ceased; his breath began to fail, and the chilly damps of death already stood upon his brow. Elizabeth, reclining her head against the bed, wept unconstrained. After a long interval of silence, the missionary, untying a little ebony crucifix, which hung suspended from his neck, presented it to her, saying, in feeble accents, "Take this, my child; it is the only treasure I have to bestow, the only one I possess on earth; and, possessed of that, I wanted not." She pressed it to her lips with the most lively transports of grief; for the renunciation of such a treasure proved that the missionary was certain the moment of his dissolution was at hand. "Fear nothing," added he, with the tenderest compassion: "the good Pastor, who abandons not one of his flock, will watch over and protect you; and, if he deprive you of your present support, he will not fail to bestow more than he takes from you. Confide securely in his goodness. He who feeds the sparrows, and knows the number of the sands upon the sea-shore, will not forget Elizabeth."— "Father, O father!" she exclaimed, seizing the hand he held out to her; "I cannot resign myself to lose thee." — "Child," replied he, "Heaven ordains it. Submit with patience to its decrees; in a few moments I shall be on high, when I will pray for you and for your parents —" He could not finish; his lips moved, but the sounds he sought to utter died away. He fell back upon his bed, and, raising his eyes to Heaven, exerted his last efforts to recommend to its protection the destitute orphan, for whom he still seemed to supplicate when life had fled. So deeply was the force of benevolence implanted in his soul, so habitually, during the course of his long life, had he neglected his own interests to devote himself to those of others, that, at the very moment when he was to enter into the awful abyss of eternity, and to appear before the throne of his sovereign Judge, to receive the irrevocable doom, he thought not of himself.

The cries of Elizabeth induced several persons to hasten into the apartment. They demanded the cause, and she pointed to her protector extended lifeless on the straw. The rumor of the event immediately gathered a crowd around the corpse. Some who were attracted by idle curiosity regarded the youthful mourner with astonishment, as she stood weeping near the deceased. Others compassionated her distress; but the people of the house, anxious to receive payment for the miserable accommodation they had afforded, discovered with delight the contents of the missionary's cloak, which, in her grief, Elizabeth had not thought of securing. They took possession of the purse, and told her that they would restore to her what remained when they had reimbursed themselves and paid the expenses of the funeral.

Soon afterwards the Popes* arrived, followed by attendants with torches. They threw a pall over the deceased; and the unfortunate Elizabeth, obliged to let go the cold hand of her lifeless protector, which, hitherto, she had not relinquished, gave a scream of anguish as she took a last view of his venerable countenance. She threw herself on her knees in the most obscure part of the chamber, and there, bathed in tears, and covering her face with a handkerchief, as if to shut out from her sight that desolate world in which she was now to wander alone, exclaimed in a voice of stifled agony, "O thou blessed spirit, who now art reaping the reward of thy virtue in realms of happiness, abandon not the destitute being who still looks to thee for succor! O my father! O my mother! where are you at this moment, that your child is bereft of all human aid?"

The attendants now began to chant the funeral hymns, and placed the body on the bier. When the instant for its removal arrived, Elizabeth, though weak, agitated, and trembling, determined to attend, to their last asylum, the remains of him who had guided and protected her, and who, when expiring, had prayed for her welfare.

* Pope is a Greek name which signifies father. It is an appellation given to all the ministers of the Greek church. These pious personages are dressed after the manner of the East, and, though generally possessing little information, are much to be commended for their spirit of toleration to every other profession of faith.

IX.

On the right bank of the Thama, and at the foot of an eminence on which stand the ruins of a fortress constructed during the remote period of the commotions of the Baschkirs,* is a place set apart as a burial-ground for the inhabitants of Sarapol. This spot is at a little distance from the town; it is enclosed by a low hedge, and in the centre is a small wooden building which serves for an oratory, and around which heaps of earth, surmounted by a cross, mark the different receptacles of the dead. Here and there a few straggling firs extend their gloomy shade; and from beneath the sepulchral stones grow large clusters of thistles with wide-spreading leaves and blue flowers; and another weed, of which the flowers of livid yellow seem formed to blossom only over the ashes of the dead.

The train that followed the coffin of the missionary was very numerous. It consisted of people of various nations, Persians, Turkomans,† and Arabians, who had made their escape from the Kirguis, and had been received into colleges founded by Catherine the Second. With lighted tapers in their hands, they accompanied the funeral procession, blending their voices with those of the mourners, while Elizabeth, following slowly and in silence, her face covered with a veil, appeared as chief mourner, feeling no connection, in the midst of this tumultuous crowd, but with him who was no more.

When the coffin was let down into the grave, the Pope, who officiated according to the rites of the Greek church, put a small piece of money into the hand of the deceased to pay his passage to the celestial regions. He then threw over the body a few shovelsful of earth, and departed. Thus was consigned to oblivion the man who had never suffered a day to elapse without rendering services to his fellow-creatures, like the beneficent wind, which scatters wide the grains of the earth, and thus produces plenty all around. He had travelled over more than half the world, sowing the seeds of wisdom and of truth, and by that would he died forgotten. So little is fame attached to modest merit; and so little of it do men bestow, except on those who dazzle them, or on those conquerors who glory in destroying the human race to gratify their ambition. Vain worldly glory! fruitless honors! Heaven would not permit you to be thus the reward of human grandeur only, had it not reserved its own celestial glory for the recompense of virtue.

Elizabeth remained in the burying-ground until the close of day. She wept in solitude, and offered up her supplications to the Almighty, which greatly relieved her bursting heart. In afflictions like hers, a meditation between Heaven and the grave is salutary. A reflection on death will rouse our drooping spirits; a contemplation on the joys of Heaven will excite hope and consolation. Where a misfortune is beheld in its extent, the horror we have conceived of it decreases; and where such a compensation is presented, the evil annexed to it loses its weight.

Elizabeth wept, but she did not repine. She thanked God for the blessings with which the hardships of half her journey had been lessened, and did not feel that she was now entitled to complain because it was the will of Heaven to withdraw them. Bereft of her guide, of every human succor, her courage still sustained her, and the undaunted heroism of her soul was proof against despair. "My dear father, my tender mother," she exclaimed, "fear not; your child will not sink under the trials that await her." Thus did she address her parents in the language of encouragement, as if they had been witnesses of her destitute situation; and when secret terror, in spite of herself, stole in upon her soul, she would again invoke their names, and in repeating them her fears were dispelled. "O holy and now happy spirit," said she, bending her head to the newly removed earth, "art thou then lost to us before my beloved parents could express

They dwell principally in Siberia, on the banks of the Wolga and the Ural. In 1770 it was calculated that 27,000 families of them were settled in the governments of Ufa and Perma. their gratitude, and could invoke blessings on the kind protector of their child!"

When night had begun to obscure the horizon, and Elizabeth was obliged to quit this melancholy spot, desirous to leave some memorial behind her, she took a sharp flint and inscribed these words upon the cross which was erected over the grave: "The just perisheth, and no man layeth it to heart."* Then bidding a final adieu to the remains of her protector, she left the burying-ground, and returned sorrowfully to her lonely apartment in the inn at Sarapol, in which she had so dismally spent the preceding night.

On the ensuing morning, when she was about to proceed on her journey, the host gave her three rubles,† assuring her that it was all which remained in the missionary's purse. Elizabeth received them with emotions of gratitude and veneration, as if these riches, which she owed to her protector, had been sent from that heaven of which he was now an inhabitant. "Yes," exclaimed she, "my guide and my protector, your charity survives you; and though you are taken from me, it is that which supports me still."

During her solitary route her tears frequently flowed. Every object excited a bitter recollection of the friend she had lost. If a peasant or an inquisitive traveller regarded her with impertinent curiosity, or interrogated her in accents of rudeness, she missed the venerable protector who had insured respect. If, oppressed by weariness, she was obliged to seat herself near the road to rest, she dared not stop the empty sledge that passed, fearing a refusal, accompanied perhaps by insult. Besides, as she possessed but three rubles, she carefully preserved that pittance to delay the period when she must have recourse to accidental charity. Thus was she debarred from various little indulgences which the good missionary had often procured for her. She always selected the meanest habitation as that in which she asked shelter, contenting herself with the most wretched accommodations and the coarsest food.

She travelled so slowly that she was unable to reach Casan till the beginning of October. A strong wind from the north-west had prevailed for several days, and had collected so great a quantity of ice upon the Wolga* as to render the passage of that river almost impracticable. It could only be crossed by going partly in a boat and partly on foot, leaping from one piece of ice to another. Even the boatmen who were accustomed to this dangerous navigation would not undertake it but in consideration of a high reward; and no passenger ever ventured to expose his life with them in the attempt. Elizabeth, without thinking of the danger, was about to enter one of their boats; they roughly pushed her away, declaring that she could not be permitted to cross till the river was quite frozen over. She inquired how long she would probably have to wait. "A fortnight, at least," they replied. This determined her immediately to proceed. "I beseech you, in the name of Heaven I beseech you," she exclaimed, "aid me in crossing the river. I come from beyond Tobolsk, and am going to Petersburg to petition the Emperor in behalf of my father, who is now an exile in Siberia; and I have so little money that, if I am obliged to remain a fortnight at Casan, I shall have nothing left for the rest of my journey."

This affecting appeal softened the heart of one of the boatmen, who, taking her by the hand, "Come," said he, "you are a good girl; I will endeavor to ferry you over; the fear of God and the love of your parents guide your steps, and Heaven will protect you." He then took her into his boat, which he rowed half-way over; not being able to work it farther, he lifted Elizabeth on his shoulder; and, alternately walking and leaping over the masses of ice, he reached, by the assistance of an oar, the opposite bank of the Wolga, where he set her down in safety. Elizabeth expressed her acknowledgments of the kindness in the most animated terms that her grateful heart could dictate, and, taking out her purse, which contained now but two rubles and a few smaller coins, offered a trifling reward for his services. "Poor child!" said the boatman, looking at the contents of her purse, "is that all the money you have to defray the expenses of your journey hence to Petersburg? Believe me that Nicholas Kisoloff will not deprive you of a single obol! No, rather let me add to your little store; it will bring down a blessing upon me and my children." He then threw her a small piece of money, and returned to his boat, exclaiming, "May God watch over and protect you, my child!"

* The Volga, or Wolga, is one of the most celebrated rivers of Europe, called by the Tartars Idel, Adel, or Edel. It rises in the mountains of the government of Tuer, which it waters, as well as the governments of Yaroslaf, Kostroma, Nishney, Novogorod, Kasan, Simurisk, Saratof, and Caucasus, and falls into the Caspian Sea, near Astracan, after being divided into seventy branches which form several islands. Its course is nearly four thousand versts in length. Seleucus Nicanor, after him Selim II., and lastly Peter the Great, had the idea of digging a canal of communication between the Don and the Wolga in order to be able to pass from the Baltic and the Caspian to the Euxine Sea. This river abounds in fish.

Elizabeth took up the money, and regarding it with her eyes filled with tears, said, "I will preserve thee for my father; thou wilt prove to him that his prayers have been heard, and that a paternal protection has everywhere been extended to me."

The atmosphere was clear and the sky serene, but the keen breezes of a northerly wind chilled the air. After having walked for four hours without stopping, Elizabeth's strength began to fail. No human habitation presented itself to her view, and she sought shelter at the foot of a hill, the rocky summit of which, jutting over, defended her from the wind. Near this hill was an extensive forest of oaks, trees which are not to be seen on the Asiatic side of the Wolga. Elizabeth knew not what they were. They had lost some of their foliage, yet their beauty was not so much diminished but it might still have excited admiration, had she been able to view these European productions with pleasure. They, however, recalled too forcibly to her mind the immense distance which separated her from her parents: she preferred the fir, which solaced that spot where she had been reared, which had so frequently yielded shade to the days of her childhood, and under which, perhaps, her beloved parents at that instant reposed.

These and similar reflections always brought tears into her eyes. "O when shall I be again blessed with beholding them!" she exclaimed; "when shall I again hear the sound of their voices; when again return to their fond embraces?" As she spoke, she stretched her arms towards Casan, the buildings of which were still perceptible in the distant prospect; and, above the town, the ancient fortress of the Chams of Tartary* presented, from the summit of the rocks, a view grand and picturesque.

In the course of her journey Elizabeth often met with objects which affected her compassionate heart in a degree scarcely inferior to that of her own distress. Sometimes she encountered wretches chained together, who were condemned to work for life in the mines of Nertchinsk,† or to inhabit the dreary coasts of Angara.‡ At others she saw troops of emigrants, who were destined to people the new city, which was building, by the Emperor's order, on the confines of China; some on foot, and others on the cars which conveyed the animals, poultry, and baggage. Notwithstanding these were criminals who had been sentenced to a milder doom, for offences which might justly have been punished with death, they did not fail to excite compassion in Elizabeth. But when she met exiles escorted by an officer of state, persons whose noble mien called to her recollection the condition of her father, she could not forbear shedding tears at their fate. Sometimes she ventured respectfully to approach, for the purpose of offering consolation. Pity, however, was the only gift that she had to bestow. With that she soothed the sorrows of many whom she met, and by a return of pity must she now herself depend for subsistence; for, on her arrival at Volodimir,§ she had but one ruble left. She had occupied nearly three months in her journey from Sarapol to Volodimir; but, through the kind hospitality of the Russian peasants, who never take any payment for milk and bread, her little treasure had not been yet exhausted. Now, however, all began to fail; her feet were almost bare, and her ragged dress ill defended her from a frigidity of atmosphere which had already sunk the thermometer thirty degrees below the freezing point, and which increased daily. The ground was covered with snow more than two feet deep. Sometimes it congealed while falling, and appeared like a shower of ice, so thick that the earth and sky were equally concealed from view. At other times torrents of rain rendered the roads almost impassable, or gusts of wind so violent arose, that Elizabeth, to defend herself from its rude assaults, was obliged to dig holes in the snow, covering her head with large pieces of the bark of pine-trees, which she dexterously stripped off, as she had seen done by the inhabitants of Siberia.

It is situated on the little river Nertchu, which flows into the Amoor in the midst of that chain of mountains called the Nertchinskoi Mountains, which contain all sorts of mineral productions in abundance.

One of these tempestuous hurricanes had raised the snow in thick clouds, and had created an obscurity so impenetrable that Elizabeth, no longer able to discern the road, and stumbling at every step, was obliged to stop. She took refuge under a lofty rock, to which she clung as firmly as she could, that she might be enabled to withstand the fury of a storm which overthrew all around her. Whilst she was in this perilous situation, with her head bent down, a confused noise, that appeared to issue from behind the spot where she stood, raised a hope that a better shelter might be procured. With difficulty she tottered round the rock, and discovered a kibitki, which had been overturned and broken, and a hut at no great distance. She hastened to demand entrance. An old woman opened the door; and struck with the wretchedness of her appearance, "My poor child," said she, "whence dost thou come, and why art thou wandering thus alone in this dreadful weather?" To this interrogation Elizabeth made her usual reply: "I come from beyond Tobolsk, and am going to Petersburg to solicit my father's pardon." At these words, a man who was sitting dejectedly in a corner of the room suddenly raised his head from between his hands, and regarding Elizabeth with an air of astonishment, exclaimed, "Is it possible that you come from so remote a country, alone, in this state of distress, and during this tempestuous season, to solicit pardon for your father? Alas! my poor child would perhaps have done as much, had not the barbarians torn me from her arms, leaving her in ignorance of my fate. She knows not what is become of me. She cannot plead for mercy. No, never shall I again behold her, — this afflicting thought will kill me, — separated forever from my child, I cannot live. Now, indeed, that I know my doom," continued the unhappy father, "I might inform her of it; I have written a letter to her, but the carrier belonging to this kibitki, who is returning to Riga,* the place of her abode, will not undertake the charge of it without some small compensation, and I am unable to offer him any. Not a single copeck do I possess; the barbarians have stripped me of everything."

Elizabeth drew from her pocket the last ruble she possessed, and, blushing deeply at the insignificance of the trifle, asked, in timid accents, as she presented it to the unfortunate exile, "if that would be enough?" He pressed to his lips the generous hand that was held forth to succor him; and then ran to offer the money to the carrier. As with the widow's mite, Heaven bestowed its blessing on the offering. The carrier was satisfied, and took charge of the letter. Thus did her noble sacrifice produce a fruit worthy of the heart of Elizabeth; it relieved the agonized feelings of a parent, and carried consolation to the wounded bosom of a child.

When the storm had abated, Elizabeth, before she pursued her journey, embraced the old woman, who had bestowed upon her all the care and tenderness of a mother; and said in a low voice, that she might not be heard by the exile, "I have nothing left to give; the blessing of my parents is the only recompense I have to offer for your kindness; it is the only treasure I possess." — "How!" interrupted the old woman aloud. "My poor child, have you then given away all you possessed?" Elizabeth blushed, and hung down her head. The exile started from his seat, and raising his hands to heaven, threw himself upon his knees before her. "Angel that thou art," he exclaimed, "can I make no return to you, who have thus bestowed your all upon me?" A knife lay upon the table; Elizabeth took it up, cut off a lock of her hair, and said, "Sir, you are going into Siberia, and will see the Governor of Tobolsk; give him this, I beseech you, and tell him that Elizabeth sends it to her parents. He will perhaps consent to forward it to them as a token by which they may know that their daughter is still in existence." — "Your wish shall be acomplished," answered the exile, "and if, in those deserts of which I am to be an inhabitant, I am not absolutely a slave, I will seek out the dwelling of your parents, and will tell them what you have this day done for me."

To the heart of Elizabeth the gift of a throne would have afforded less delight than the prospect of thus being able to convey consolation to her parents. She was now bereft of all except the little piece of money given to her by the boatman of the Wolga. Yet she might deem herself rich, for she had just tasted the only pleasure which opulence could bestow; she had conferred happiness on a fellow-creature, had revived the desponding heart of a father, and had converted tears of sadness, shed by the orphan, into those of consolation. Such were the blessings which even a single ruble had effected.

From Volodimir to the village of Pokroff the road lies through a marshy flat, covered with extensive forests of oaks, elms, aspens, and wild apple-trees. In summer these different trees form so many groves which delight the eye; and they afford an asylum to numerous banditti. In winter, as the boughs, despoiled of their foliage, do not afford so easy a concealment, these bands of robbers are less formidable. Elizabeth, however, during her journey, heard numerous accounts of robberies that had been committed. Had she carried with her valuable property, such accounts might have been to her a source of terror; but, obliged to beg her daily bread, poverty was her passport; and the protection of Heaven enabled her to traverse the forests in safety.

A few versts from Pokroff the high road had been torn up by a hurricane, and travellers proceeding to Moscow* were obliged to make a considerable circuit through swamps occasioned by the inundations of the Wolga. These, however, were now hardened by the frost to a solidity equal to that of dry land. Elizabeth attempted to follow the route which had been pointed out to her; but, after walking for more than an hour over this icy desert, through which were no traces of a road, she found herself in a swampy marsh, from which every endeavor to extricate herself was, for a long time, exerted in vain. At length, with great difficulty, she attained a little hillock. Covered with mud and exhausted by fatigue, she seated herself upon a stone to rest, and took off her sandals to dry them in the sun, which at that moment shone in full lustre. The environs of this spot appeared to be perfectly desolate; no signs of a human dwelling were visible; solitude and silence prevailed around. Elizabeth now discovered that she must have strayed far from the road, and, notwithstanding all the courage with which she was endued, her heart failed. Her situation was alarming in the extreme; behind was the bog she had just crossed, and before her an immense forest through which no track was to be distinguished.

* Moscow, or Moskva, formerly the capital of Russia, before Peter the Great had built St Petersburg, and now the capital of the government of the same name, is one of the most considerable cities of Europe. The Earl of Carlisle, ambassador from the Court of London to Moscow, in the reign of Charles II., gives it a circumference of twelve English miles. Voltaire and Coxe enlarge this circumference to twenty miles, and state that the number of its inhabitants in 1792 amounted to 328,000 souls. But the magnificence of the buildings by no means corresponds to the size of this vast enclosure. The handsomest edifices are the cathedral, the imperial palace, and the foundling hospital instituted by Catharine II. By the side of the most superb palaces stand wretched wooden houses and miserable hovels, which made the Prince de Ligne say that Moscow appeared as if the castles of four or five hundred noblemen, with their respective villages, had been drawn there upon wheels and entered into an agreement to live together.

At length day began to close; and, notwithstanding her extreme weariness, she was obliged to proceed in search of a shelter for the night, or of some person who might have the humanity to procure her one. In vain did she wander about, sometimes following one track, and sometimes another. No object presented itself to revive her hopes, no sound reanimated her drooping spirits; that of a human voice would have filled her heart with transport. Suddenly she heard the voices of several persons, and immediately afterwards saw some men issue from the forest. Elate with hope, she hastened towards them; but, as they drew near, terror again succeeded to joy. Their savage air and stern countenances dismayed her more than the horrors of the solitude in which she had so lately been plunged. All the stories she had heard of banditti immediately rushed upon her imagination; she feared lest a judgment awaited her for the temerity with which she had indulged the idea that a special Providence watched over her preservation; and she fell upon her knees to humble herself in the presence of Divine mercy. The troop advanced, stopped before Elizabeth, and, regarding her with surprise and curiosity, demanded whence she came, and what circumstance had brought her there. With downcast eyes and a trembling voice, she replied, that she had come from beyond Tobolsk, and that she was going to Petersburg, to solicit from the Emperor a pardon for her father. She added that, having lost her road, she had nearly perished in the marshes; and that she was waiting until she had regained a little strength, to go in search of an asylum. The men were astonished; they questioned her again, and asked her what money she had to enable her to undertake so long a journey. She drew from her bosom the little coin given to her by the boatman of the Wolga. "Is that all?" they inquired. "It is all," she replied. At this answer, delivered with a candor that enforced belief, the robbers looked at each other with amazement. They were not moved; they were not softened. Rendered callous by long habits of vice, an action of such noble heroism as that of Elizabeth had no such influence over their souls; but it excited wonder. They could not comprehend what they felt necessitated to believe; and, restrained by a kind of veneration, they dared not harm the object of Heaven's evident protection; so, passing on, they said to each other, "Let us leave her; some supernatural Power protects her."

Elizabeth rose and hastened from them. She had not penetrated far into the forest before four roads, crossing each other, presented themselves to her view. In one of the angles which they formed was a little chapel, dedicated to the Virgin, and over it a direction-post inscribed with the names of the towns to which the different roads led. Elizabeth prostrated herself to offer her grateful acknowledgments to the Omnipotent Being who had preserved her: the robbers were not mistaken; she was protected by a supernatural Power.

Hope had restored to Elizabeth all her strength, and she entered again on the road to Pokroff with her usual activity. She soon regained the Wolga, which forms an angle before this village, and flows past the walls of a convent of nuns. Elizabeth solicited shelter under its venerable roof. She related the hardships she had undergone, and disclosed to the community how much she stood in need of assistance. The nuns received her with so much cordiality, and lavished upon her such affectionate attentions, that their kind solicitude reminded her of those endearments which she had been accustomed to receive from her mother. The simple and modest recital that she gave of her adventures proved a source of edification to the whole community. Her pious auditors could not find words to express the admiration they felt at that heroic perseverance which had endured so many hardships, and had sustained so many severe trials without a murmur. They lamented their inability to assist her with money for the expenses of her future journey; but their convent was poor, had no revenue, and was supported by charity only. They could not, however, suffer their guest to depart in tattered garments, and nearly barefoot. To provide her with better habiliments they stripped themselves, and each gave to her a portion of her own clothing. Elizabeth endeavored to decline the gifts, for it was of articles necessary to their own comfort that her generous benefactresses deprived themselves; but, pointing to the walls of their convent, they said, "We have a shelter, while you have none; part of the little we possess belongs to you, for you are poorer still than we."

At length Elizabeth set forward on the last stage to Moscow. She was astonished at the extraordinary bustle she now witnessed; at the immense concourse of carriages, carts, horses, and people of all ranks and ages, which was resorting to this great metropolis. As she passed onward the crowd seemed to augment. In a village where she stopped to rest she found every house thronged with travellers, who paid so high a price even for the smallest lodging, that it was with the utmost difficulty the destitute Elizabeth could obtain even the meanest shelter. Alas! how many tears did she not shed at receiving from the hand of scornful charity a little coarse food, and at being permitted to rest her weary limbs in a miserable shed, which scarcely defended her from the wind and snow; yet she was not humiliated; for she never forgot that God was the witness of her sufferings, and that the happiness of her parents was the end she had in view. Neither was she exalted; for she was too guileless to imagine that she did more than duty prescribed in devoting herself for their sake, and was too affectionate not to feel a secret satisfaction in suffering for them.

While immersed in thoughts like these, the bells of the village struck out; and from every side was resounded the name of Alexander, accompanied by loud acclamations of joy. The report of the cannon from Moscow quite alarmed her, for never before had she heard a sound so tremendous. In a timid voice she inquired the cause of these unusual sounds. "The Emperor is no doubt making his entrance into Moscow," said they. "How!" exclaimed the astonished Elizabeth, "is not the Emperor then at Petersburg?" They shrugged their shoulders with an air of pity for her ignorance, and replied, "Poor girl! do you not know that the ceremony of Alexander's coronation must take place at Moscow?" Elizabeth clasped her hands in ecstasy. Heaven had again, in an especial manner, evinced itself in her favor; it had sent the monarch, upon whom the fate of her parents depended, to meet her on the way; and had ordained that she should arrive at that period of general joy, when the hearts of monarchs recede even from the dictates of justice, in favor of those of clemency. "O my dear parents!" she exclaimed, looking back towards the home from which so great a distance separated her; "must such delightful hopes rejoice my heart alone? and while your child is happy, must you grieve in ignorance of her fate?"

In the month of March, 1801, Elizabeth made her entrance into the immense capital of Muscovy,* imagining herself at the end of her labors, and not considering that there could be still a calamity to apprehend. On her progress through the city, superb edifices, decorated with all the magnificence of royalty, presented themselves to her admiring sight, but intermixed with wretched cabins, whose untiled roofs and broken casements afforded no shelter from the inclemency of the weather. The streets and alleys of Moscow were so thronged that Elizabeth could scarcely proceed through the crowds that obstructed the passage. After some time she found herself in meadows, richly planted, and began to imagine that she was again in the country. She stopped to rest in a grand avenue formed by rows of birch-trees. An immense assemblage of well-dressed people thronged this avenue. All were conversing on the subject of the coronation. Trains of carriages passed rapidly backwards and forwards. The bells of the cathedral rang incessantly, and were answered by those of the smaller churches from all parts of the town. The sound of cannon, which were fired at regular intervals, could scarcely be distinguished amidst the overpowering tumult of this prodigious city. As Elizabeth entered the square of the Kremlin,† the crowd appeared to increase at every step she took. She timidly approached one of the great fires which were lighted on this spot, and seated herself near it. Cold, weariness, and want of food had exhausted her spirits; and the joyful hopes of the morning were converted into sadness. She had wandered through the numerous streets of Moscow, but among the splendid habitations had beheld none that offered to her an asylum. She had met people of various nations and ranks, but had looked in vain for a friend or protector. Some had inquired their way, and expressed uneasiness at having missed it; how much did she envy them! "Happy," said she, "to have a home to seek; I, who possess none, cannot lose my way; for in every place is shelter equally denied to me."

XI.

NIGHT now rapidly approached, and the cold became intense. The dejected Elizabeth had not eaten a morsel the whole day, and was nearly famished with hunger. She watched all who passed, to see whether she could discern in their countenances that expression of compassionate benevolence which might embolden her to make an appeal to their feelings. But among the whole crowd, every individual of which she observed so earnestly, no one stood in need of her assistance; therefore they had no interest in contemplating her woe-worn countenance. At last she ventured to solicit an entrance at the doors of some of the poorest dwellings, but met with rude repulse. The hope of gain, during this period of festivity, had steeled every heart against the importunities of distress. Never perhaps are mankind less inclined to liberality than at the moment of acquiring an increase of wealth.

Elizabeth returned to the fire in the square of the Kremlin. She wept in silence. Her heart was so much oppressed that she had not even the strength to eat a morsel of bread which an old woman had given to her. She was now, for the first time, reduced to so great a degree of misery that she resolved to hold forth her hand to implore alms that might be bestowed with apathy or refused with scorn. At the moment that she was about to try this last resource, an emotion of dignified pride restrained the hand she had presented. But the cold was excessive; and, in spending the night exposed to the open air, her life would be endangered, and that life she did not consider in her own disposal. This reflection overcame her pride; and, placing one hand across her eyes, she stretched out the other to the first person who passed: "In the name of the father whom you revere, of the mother whom you cherish, give to me," said she, "a trifle to procure a lodging for the night." The man whom she addressed surveyed her attentively by the light of the flame. "Young woman," he replied, "you have chosen a wretched trade; are you not able to work? At your age a livelihood may easily be obtained. God help you! I never encourage beggars." And he passed on.

The unfortunate Elizabeth raised her eyes to Heaven, as if to implore succor from thence; and, emboldened by a voice of consolation which then whispered in her heart, she ventured to repeat her appeal to the compassion of several other persons. Some passed without listening to her; others gave to her, but it was, in the whole, so little, that she could not collect enough to relieve her necessities. At last, when night was far advanced, the crowd was dispersed, and the fire nearly extinguished, some of the imperial guards, in making their rounds, discovered her. They roughly demanded why she remained abroad at so late an hour. The stern looks and fierce manners of these soldiers overpowered her with terror. Incapacitated from uttering a syllable, she burst into an agony of tears. The soldiers, little affected at seeing her weep, assembled round her, repeating, with rude familiarity, their question. The trembling girl, at last recovering sufficient courage to answer, in a voice broken with sobs, said that she came from beyond Tobolsk, to petition of the Emperor pardon for her father; "I have performed the whole journey on foot," continued she, "and, having no money, I cannot obtain a shelter for the night." LOST IN MOSCOW.

these words the soldiers burst into a loud laugh, and taxed her with falsehood. Elizabeth, more terrified than ever, sought to escape, but they would not suffer it, and insolently seized her. "O my God, O my father!" she cried in accents of horror and despair, "will not you come to my succor? have you forsaken the wretched Elizabeth?" During this debate some persons of the lower class, attracted by the noise, had assembled in groups; and by loud murmurs expressed their disapprobation at the cruelty of the soldiers. Elizabeth stretched towards them her hands, in act of supplication. "Before Heaven," said she, "I solemnly protest that I have uttered nothing but the truth. I come from beyond Tobolsk to implore pardon for my father; save me, save me; and let me not die, till, at least, I have obtained it." These words touched every heart. Several persons advanced to her assistance, and one of them, addressing the soldiers, said, "I keep the Inn of St. Basil in this square; let the girl come with me; her story appears to be true; I will give her a lodging." The soldiers, who had begun to be somewhat softened by her distress, consented to his request, and withdrew.

The grateful Elizabeth embraced the knees of her preserver. He raised her kindly from the ground, and, desiring her to follow him, led the way to his dwelling, which was at a little distance. "I have not a room to give you," said he, "there is not one in my house unoccupied; but my wife will receive you into hers for one night. She is kind and compassionate, and will readily endure so small an inconvenience to serve you." Elizabeth, trembling and agitated, followed in silence. Her guide conducted her to a small room, in which a young woman, with an infant in her arms, was seated near a stove: she rose up on seeing them. Her husband informed her from what danger he had rescued the unfortunate girl; adding, that he had promised to shelter her, at least for the night. The young woman expressed her satisfaction, and, taking Elizabeth by the hand, said, with a smile of encouragement, "Be comforted, we will take good care of you; but never stay out so late again. In large towns such as this it is very dangerous for females of your age to be found at a late hour in the streets." Elizabeth answered that she had no asylum to resort to. Every door had been closed against her. She owned her poverty without a blush, and related all the hardships she had so heroically sustained. Her hosts wept at the recital; neither of them thought of doubting her veracity. The emotions which her story excited afforded a proof that it was true. The classes of society to which they belonged are not so easily misled by brilliant fictions, these soar beyond their capacities, while over their souls, truth, in all its purity, preserves its claims entire.

At the conclusion of Elizabeth's narrative, Jaques Rossi, the innkeeper, said to her, "My influence in this town is but small, but, as far as it can be exerted for my own interest, it shall be for yours." His wife pressed his hand in token of approbation; and asked Elizabeth if she knew no one who could present her to the Emperor. "No," she replied, not wishing to mention young Smoloff, lest she should involve him in some difficulty; besides, no assistance could be expected from him, since he was in Livonia. "No matter," said the wife of Rossi, "the most powerful recommendation to our great sovereign is virtue in distress, and that will plead for you." — "Yes," interrupted her husband, "the Emperor Alexander is to be crowned to-morrow in the church of the Assumption. You must place yourself in his way, and, at his feet, must solicit the remission of your father's sentence. I will accompany and encourage you." — "O my generous benefactors!" exclaimed Elizabeth, clasping her hands with an expression of the liveliest gratitude, "Heaven beholds your kindness, and my parents will invoke blessings on you for it: you will conduct me to the feet of the Emperor, and will support me in his presence; perhaps you will be witnesses of my happiness, — of the greatest happiness a human being is capable of enjoying. If it be granted me to obtain my father's pardon, to be the joyful bearer of the happy tidings to him and to my mother, to behold their delight —"

She was unable to proceed; the idea of such felicity almost forbade the hope that it might be realized. She could not believe that her deserts entitled her to expect it. The panegyrics, however, which her host bestowed upon the clemency of Alexander; the various anecdotes they recorded in evidence of the truth upon which these commendations were founded; and the grace with which the value of those acts of mercy had been enhanced, — reanimated her spirits. Elizabeth listened to them with eagerness. She would gladly have spent the whole night in hearing them repeated; but, as it grew late, her kind hosts wished her to enjoy some repose, that she might be the better enabled to support the exertions of the morrow. Rossi retired to a small apartment at the top of the house, and his wife shared her bed with Elizabeth.

It was long before the perturbation of her mind would permit her to sleep. She was thankful to Heaven even for her sufferings, since the excess of them had heightened the value of the generous hospitality she had experienced. "Had I been less miserable," thought she, "this good man would not perhaps have taken pity on me." When overcome by sleep, visions of happiness, in various forms, fleeted before her. Sometimes fancy presented her parents, their countenances irradiated with joy; sometimes she imagined the voice of the Emperor addressing her, in terms of approbation and compliance with her entreaties; and sometimes another form presented itself to her imagination, but under characters more vague and indistinct; a mist seemed to obscure it from her sight, and the impression that it left upon her heart was the only trace that remained.

On the morrow, as soon as the thunder of the artillery, the beating of the drums, and the loud acclamations of the people, announced the dawn of the joyful day, Elizabeth, habited in a dress lent to her by her kind hostess, and leaning upon the arm of Rossi, joined the crowd which followed the procession to the large church of the Assumption, where the coronation was to be performed.

More than a thousand tapers illuminated the holy temple, which was decorated in all the splendor of Eastern magnificence. Upon a dazzling throne, beneath a canopy of rich velvet, were seated the Emperor and his youthful consort, habited in sumptuous dresses, which, displaying to advantage the beauty of their forms, gave to their appearance an air almost celestial. Kneeling before her august spouse, the Empress received from his hand the imperial diadem, and encircled her brow with this pledge of their eternal union. Opposite to the royal pair, and in the sacred chair of truth, was the venerable Plato, the Patriarch of Moscow, who, in a discourse at once pathetic and sublime, recalled to the youthful mind of Alexander the great duties annexed to royalty, and the awful responsibility imposed upon his elevated station, in return for the pomp that environed it, and the power with which it was invested. Amidst the assemblage of nations which thronged the cathedral he pointed out to him the hunters of Kamtschatka,* bringing tributes of skins from the Aleutsky Isles,† which border on America; the merchants of Archangel,‡ loaded with rich commodities which their vessels had brought from every quarter of the globe; the Samoyeds,§ a rude and unpolished people who come from the mouth of the Genissy,‖ a country condemned to the rigors

* The Kamtschadales, or inhabitants of Kamtschatka, possess a lively imagination, an excellent memory, and a peculiar readiness in imitating what they see others do. Hunting and fishing are their principal occupations. The dog is their favorite domestic animal. They travel in little carts drawn by dogs, and are in general extremely superstitious.

† The Aleutian or Aleutsky Islands. This is the name given to that chain of islands which extends from the north of Kamtschatka to the continent of America, and which, in reality, is only a branch of the mountains of Kamtschatka. They were discovered a short time after the island of Behring. The word "Aleut" signifies a bald or naked rock. Those islands which are nearest to America are known by the name of Andreanofskoi and the Fox Islands.

‡ Archangel is a considerable town of Russia, the capital of the government of the same name, situated on the White Sea, at the mouth of one of the branches of the Dwina, which forms its port, in lat. 64° 34′ N. and long. 38° 55′ E. The port of Archangel was the only one by which Russia could communicate by sea with the rest of Europe, before Peter the Great had founded St. Petersburg. Its commerce is still very important.

§ The Samoyeds are a Tartar people who inhabit the north of Russia between Asiatic Tartary and the government of Archangel along the sea-coast as far as Siberia. They subsist by hunting and fishing, like the Kamtschadales.

‖ The Yemissey, called Kem by the Tartars and Moguls, and Gub, or Khases, which signifies the Great River, by the Ostiacks, is formed by two rivers, the Kamsara and the Veikem, which take their course in Chinese Soongory. After a long of an eternal winter, where the beauteous flower of the spring and the rich produce of harvest are alike unknown; and the natives of Astracan,* whose fertile fields yield melons, figs, and grapes of exquisite flavor: he showed him, lastly, the inhabitants of the shores of the Black† and Caspian Seas, and of the great Tartary which, bounded by Persia, China, and the empire of the Moguls,‡ extending from the extremity of the western hemisphere to that of the east, occupies nearly half the globe. "Sovereign of the most extensive empire of the earth," said he, "you who are this day about to take the awful oath of presiding over the destinies of a state which includes a fifth part of the known world, bear it ever in remembrance that you have to answer at the tribunal of Divine justice for the fate of millions of your fellow-creatures; and that an injustice, through your neglect, done to the meanest among them, must be accounted for at the final day of retribution." At these words the heart of the young Emperor appeared to be sensibly affected; but there was one among the auditors whose heart was not less affected than his; that of the supplicant who was come to solicit the remission of a father's sentence.

* Astracan is a considerable town of Asiatic Russia, the capital of the government of Caucasus, which anciently formed an independent kingdom called the kingdom of Astracan. It stands on an island, which the Volga forms near its mouth in the Caspian Sea, in lat. 46° 20′ N. and long. 48° 2′ E It is said to contain more than 70,000 inhabitants, twenty-five Russian churches, two convents, many chapels belonging to the Armenians, Lutherans, and Roman Catholics, and even an Indian temple. Its circumference is three miles

‡ The empire of the Moguls is that vast empire in the East Indies founded by Tamerlane, but which, after the invasion of Kouli Khan, in 1739, became the prey of its Soubahs, Nabobs, and other Mohammedan governors. Its internal divisions have fixed the establishments of the English in Hindoostan on bases which appear immovable.

At the moment when Alexander began to pronounce the solemn oath which was to bind him to devote his future life to the happiness of his people, the enraptured Elizabeth imagined she heard the voice of mercy requiring him to break the chains of every unfortunate being within his dominions. Unable any longer to command her feelings, and, aided by a supernatural strength, she pierced the crowd, and, forcing a passage through the lines of the soldiers, rushed towards the throne, exclaiming, "Mercy! mercy!" The vehemence of her supplication interrupted the ceremony, and occasioned so much confusion that the guards advanced, and, notwithstanding her entreaties and the efforts of Jaques, dragged her out of the church. The Emperor, however, would not, on so glorious a day, be invocated in vain. He ordered one of the officers of his suite to inquire what it was that the petitioner wanted. The officer obeyed; he quitted the church in haste, and heard the imploring accent of the agonized supplicant, still endeavoring to prevail with the soldiers to allow her to return. He started, quickened his pace, saw who it was, recognized the daughter of the exile, and exclaimed, "It is she, it is Elizabeth!" Elizabeth turned: she could scarcely give credit to so much happiness; could scarcely believe that Smoloff was there to save her father. Yet it was his voice, his features; she could not be mistaken. Joy deprived her of utterance, and she stretched her arms towards him, as to a messenger sent from heaven to her relief. He rushed forward, seized her hand, and in his turn began to doubt the testimony of his senses. "Elizabeth!" he exclaimed, "is it indeed you, or do I behold a vision from heaven? Speak, whence do you come?"—"From Tobolsk."—"From Tobolsk! and have you travelled hither alone, and on foot?"—"Yes," she exclaimed, "I came to entreat pardon for my father, and they force me from the presence of the Emperor."—"I will reconduct you to his presence," interrupted the transported Smoloff; "I will present you to him: he will not resist your supplications; your prayer will be granted." Smoloff then dispersed the soldiers, and led Elizabeth back towards the church. The imperial procession was, at that instant, issuing from the great gate of the cathedral. As soon as the monarch appeared, Smoloff, holding Elizabeth by the hand, forced a passage through the guards, and threw himself with her at the Emperor's feet. "Sire," he cried, "vouchsafe to listen to the voice of suffering virtue; behold the daughter of the unfortunate Stanislaus Potowsky;* she has come from the deserts of Ischim, where her parents have for twelve years languished in exile. She has had no guide nor protector; has performed the journey on foot, begging her bread, and braving scorn and misery, snow and tempests, every danger and every fatigue, to implore of your Majesty forgiveness for her father." Elizabeth raised her clasped hands towards heaven, repeating the last words, "Forgiveness for my father!" A clamor of admiration arose from among the crowd! The Emperor himself joined in it; and deeply rooted as his prejudices had been against Stanislaus Potowsky, in an instant they were totally effaced. He could not hesitate to believe that the father of a daughter so virtuous must be innocent of the crimes alleged against him; but, had it been otherwise, Alexander would not have withheld forgiveness. "The pardon is granted," said he; "your father is free." Elizabeth heard no more; at the word "pardon" joy overpowered her, and she fell senseless into the arms of Smoloff. In this state she was carried through an immense crowd, who opened a passage, shouting with joyful acclamations of approbation at the transcendent virtue of the heroine and the clemency of the monarch, and was conveyed back to the house of the benevolent Rossi.

After recovering her senses, the first object that met her eyes was Smoloff, kneeling beside her: the first sound she heard was that of a repetition from his lips of the words used by the Emperor: "Elizabeth, the pardon is granted, your father is free." For some moments it was by looks only that she could express her joy and gratitude; but they expressed more than language could have imparted. At length, turning to Smoloff, she pronounced, in a faltering voice, the names of her father and mother. "We shall again behold them, then," said she; "we shall enjoy the sight of their happiness." These words sunk deeply into the heart of him to whom they were addressed. Elizabeth had not said that she loved him; but she had associated him with the first sentiment of her soul, with that object of felicity in which all her ideas and all her hopes so long had centred. From that happy moment Smoloff ventured to indulge a hope that she would, on a future day, consent to realize his happiness.

XII.

SEVERAL days elapsed before the deed of pardon could be drawn up and signed. Previously to its final accomplishment it was requisite to inquire into the causes of Potowsky's condemnation; and the investigation proved so favorable to the noble Polander, that equity alone would have authorized the Emperor to break the chains of the illustrious patriot. But he had listened to the dictates of clemency before he knew what those of justice required; an act of generosity which those whom he thus nobly pardoned never forgot.

One morning Smoloff called on Elizabeth at an earlier hour than he had before presumed to visit her, and presented to her a parchment with the imperial seal. "Behold," said he, "the mandate in which the Emperor commands my father to restore liberty to yours." Elizabeth seized the parchment, and, pressing it to her lips, bathed it

* There is some inconvenience in romances which are founded in history, in employing well-known names and remarkable eras. The Powtowska, or, according to the true orthography, Potocka family, was indeed one of the most illustrious in Poland, and a member of that family really fell a victim, in Russia, to his patriotic courage: but it was Count Ignacio Potocky, and not Stanislaus. He was not sent into Siberia, but confined in the dungeons of a very rigorous state prison with the brave Kosciusco, and it was the Empress Catharine II. who placed him there. He was liberated, as well as his companion in misfortune, by the son of that Empress, the Emperor Paul, who, from the first day of his reign, went to visit the noble martyrs of Polish liberty, and broke their chains.

The young girl who really accomplished two thousand four hundred English miles alone, on foot, to solicit the pardon of her father at St. Petersburg, belonged to no distinguished family. Her name was Praskowja Lupolowa. She died at Novogorod in 1810, six years after her generous devotion. Her father was exiled into Siberia in 1798.

with tears. "This is not all," continued Smoloff; "our magnanimous sovereign performs a noble action in a manner worthy of himself. He restores to your father his dignities, his rank, his property: all those honors which elevate man in the estimation of his fellows, but which can never elevate Elizabeth. The courier who is to convey the order to Tobolsk departs to-morrow, and I have obtained permission from the Emperor to accompany him." — "And may not I also accompany him?" eagerly interrupted Elizabeth. "Unquestionably," resumed Smoloff; "and from your lips only your father must learn that he is free. Presuming upon my knowledge of your sentiments, I told the Emperor that it was your wish to be yourself the bearer of the joyful intelligence. He approved the design, and charged me with the commission of informing you that you have leave to depart to-morrow in one of his carriages, attended by two female domestics; and he has sent a purse of two thousand rubles to defray the expenses of your journey." Elizabeth, fixing her eyes thoughtfully on Smoloff, replied, "From the day on which I first saw you to the present hour, I do not recollect that I have obtained a single benefit of which you have not been the author. Without your assistance I could not have obtained my father's pardon; without your generous interference never would he have beheld his country again: to you then it belongs to tell him he is free: this glorious recompense alone is adequate to your benefits." — "No, Elizabeth," replied Smoloff, "that happiness must be yours; the recompense to which I aspire is still greater." — "O Heaven!" exclaimed Elizabeth, "what higher reward can there be?" Smoloff was on the point of answering in terms expressive of the rapture he felt; but, repressing his emotion, he colored, and cast his eyes upon the ground. An interval of silence ensued; at length, in a faltering voice, Smoloff answered, "Elizabeth, I must not tell you but in the presence of your father."

From the time that Smoloff had so unexpectedly found Elizabeth, he had not suffered a single day to pass without seeing her, without remaining in her company for many successive hours, without discovering some new reason for loving her more ardently than before. But never had he deviated for a moment from the respect he owed her. She was at a distance from her parents; she looked to him alone for protection; and the valuable deposit, thus intrusted to his charge, he considered so sacred, that he could not have prevailed with himself to utter any sentiment that had the least tendency to excite emotion either in her countenance or her heart.

During the long journey they had to perform, he preserved the same respectful silence. Constantly seated by her, beholding her, hearing her, his passion continued to increase, but never overcame his resolution. He bestowed upon her always the appellation of sister; and, though his attentions were more assiduous than those of the fondest brother, they were not the less innocent; they were calculated to inspire confidence in the most scrupulous delicacy, and must have satisfied expectations the most unbounded. His sentiments were only perceptible in the attempts that he made to conceal them; friendship seemed to prompt all he uttered; in his silence alone could his love be discovered.

Before she quitted Moscow, Elizabeth liberally rewarded her generous hosts; nor on recrossing the Wolga, at Casan, was she unmindful of Kisoloff the waterman. She inquired for him, and was informed that in consequence of a serious accident he had been reduced to the lowest state of poverty, and was languishing on a sick-bed, surrounded by six children, who were in want of food. Elizabeth requested to be immediately conducted to his habitation. When he before saw her, it was in poverty, in dejection, and clothed in rags; now that he beheld her in splendor, with joy and animation sparkling in her eyes, and diffusing a brilliancy over her whole appearance, he was unable to recognize her. Elizabeth took from her purse the little coin which he had given her, and, showing it to him, brought to his memory the act of kindness he had performed; then, laying a hundred rubles upon his bed, she added, "Charity fails not to reap its reward; behold, that which you gave me Heaven now returns a hundred-fold."

Elizabeth was so eager to rejoin her parents, that she travelled night and day. On her arrival at Sarapol, notwithstanding her haste, she stopped to visit the tomb of the missionary. As this was a tribute of grateful veneration, almost equivalent to an act of filial duty, Elizabeth could not let it pass unfulfilled. She beheld once more the cross, with the inscription which she had engraved upon it. Again she wept over that grave where she had formerly shed so many bitter tears; but these she now shed were the tears of soothing consolation. She imagined that, in that celestial paradise of which he was now a blessed inhabitant, the missionary partook of her felicity; and that, in his soul, so full of benevolence, her happiness added to the happiness which he enjoyed in the bosom of his God.

But I hasten to bring my story to a conclusion, and, with Elizabeth, to reach the dwelling where the days of her absence were numbered with excessive anxiety. I will not attempt a description of the scene of joy exhibited at Tobolsk, when young Smoloff presented Elizabeth to his father; and she, in all the effusions of her grateful heart, acknowledged the blessings she owed to his assistance. Elizabeth would not consent to let her parents be informed of her approach. She learned at Tobolsk that they were well, and this information was further confirmed at Saimka. Wishing agreeably to surprise them, she proceeded with a palpitating heart to their cottage, attended only by Smoloff. What varying emotions agitated her as she crossed the forest, drew near the banks of the lake, and recognized every tree and every rock adjacent to the habitation of her parents! At last she caught sight of the paternal roof; she rushed forward; but the violence of her feelings obliged her to stop. Alas! behold the state of human nature! we seek for happiness in excess of joy; which excess, more violent in its effects than that of misery, we are not able to bear. Elizabeth, leaning upon the arm of Smoloff, faintly uttered, "If I should find my mother ill." The fear of such a calamity moderated the happiness which had overwhelmed her, and recovered all her strength. Again she ran; she reached the threshold; she heard the sound of well-known voices, and called to her parents in an ecstasy which almost deprived her of sense. The door was opened, and her father appeared. At the cry he uttered her mother rushed out, and Elizabeth, unable to support herself, fell into their extended arms. "It is Elizabeth," exclaimed Smoloff; "she is bearer of your pardon: she has triumphed over every obstacle, and has attained, from the generosity of the Emperor, even more than she had expected." These words added not to the joy of the delighted parents; every sensation was absorbed in that all-powerful one of happiness in again beholding their child. She was restored; and this was, to them, the greatest blessing on earth. Long did they remain in a delirium of joy which could admit of no increase. A few unconnected sentences escaped from their lips, but they knew not what they uttered. In vain did they seek for words to express the feelings that overpowered them; by tears and by looks only could they make themselves understood; and their strength, as well as their reason, began to fail under excess of joy.

Smoloff prostrated himself at the feet of Stanislaus and Phedora. "O," he exclaimed, "condescend in this moment of your bliss to regard me also as your child. Hitherto Elizabeth has condescended to distinguish me by the affectionate name of brother; but now, perhaps, she will permit me to aspire to a title still more endearing."

Elizabeth seized a hand of each of her parents; and regarding them with looks of the tenderest affection, she thus spoke: "Without the aid of M de Smoloff I should not perhaps have been here. It was he who conducted me into the presence of the Emperor, who advocated my cause, who solicited your forgiveness, and who obtained it. It is he who has been so zealously instrumental in restoring you to your rights, and who has reconducted me to the bosom of my beloved parents. O my mother, instruct me how to convince him of my gratitude! teach me, my father, how to requite it!" Phedora, embracing her daughter, answered, "You must convince him of your gratitude by bestowing upon him your love; a love like that which you have seen me bear to your father." Stanislaus, interrupting her, exclaimed in an accent of enthusiasm, "O my Phedora, who can appreciate the gift of a heart like thine! It is above all value. But on such an occasion as this the generosity of Elizabeth cannot be too great." Elizabeth, uniting the hand of Smoloff with the hands of her parents, said to him, with a look of fascinating innocence, and with the most modest timidity, "Will you promise me — never to forsake them!" — "O happiness!" he exclaimed, "infinitely beyond my desert. Her parents give her to me, and she consents to be mine." His rapture was such as to deprive him of further utterance; and such was the enthusiasm of his love that, at this moment, he could scarcely imagine there was in the disposal of Heaven a happiness more unmingled, a happiness which could equal that which he now enjoyed. The transports of the mother in again beholding her child; the exultation of the father, who owed to the unprecedented efforts and magnanimity of his daughter the recovery of his liberty, even the inexpressible satisfaction of Elizabeth herself, who had already fulfilled the most sacred of human duties, and who had evinced a virtue unparalleled, did not, in the estimation of Smoloff, appear in any degree comparable to the happiness for which he was indebted to love alone.

Were I to attempt a description of the days that followed, I would represent the fond parents informing their child of all the apprehensions, alarms, and anguish they had experienced during her long absence; I would represent them listening, with the alternate emotions of hope and fear, to the recital she gave of the diversified adventures of her long and perilous journey; I would recount the blessings which her father invoked on all who had been the friends and protectors of his child, and show the tender Phedora exhibiting the lock of hair, sent by Elizabeth, which she wore next her heart, and which enabled her to divert the painful solicitude of many a tedious hour; I would attempt to convey to my readers some idea of their feelings on that day when the exile who brought it presented himself at the door of the cottage, to inform them how greatly he was indebted to the generosity of their daughter; I would endeavor to paint the grief excited by the narrative of her sufferings, and the joy which they felt upon the recital of her virtues; and, finally, I would describe their departure from their rustic habitation and from the land of exile, where they had encountered so many evils, but where they had likewise experienced the greatest happiness, enhanced by the sorrows which had preceded it, and by the tears which its acquisition had cost them; like the sun whose rays are never more vivid and refreshing than when they penetrate the vapors which envelop him, and reflect their bright beams upon the fields and foliage bespangled with dew.

Pure and almost spotless as the angels, Elizabeth was destined to participate on earth a happiness resembling theirs, and like them to live in innocence and love.

Here I shall conclude; for when representations of human happiness are prolonged, they become fatiguing, because they become improbable; and the moment we lose sight of probability the narrative ceases to interest us; for we all know from experience that a perpetuity of bliss is not the lot of humanity; and even language, which is so copious and varied in its expression of sorrow, is poor and inadequate in the delineation of joy, — one day of happiness is sufficient to exhaust them all.

I have described Elizabeth as restored to her parents. By them she is conducted into Poland, the place of her nativity, and reinstated in the exalted rank occupied by her ancestors; by them she is united to the man whom she loves, to the man whom they esteem worthy of her love.

Here, then, let us close the narrative, and leave her completely happy. Were I to add one page more to my story, I should be apprehensive, from my own knowledge of the vicissitudes of human life, of the crosses, the fallacious hopes, and the fugacious as well as chimerical happiness which mark its tenor, that I might have some misfortune to recount; for temporal happiness is never of long duration.

INTRODUCTION.

JOSEPH XAVIER BONIFACE, the author of this exquisite little romance, was born in Paris, July 10, 1797. From early years devoted to literature, he distinguished himself by winning a prize for a poem from the French Academy shortly after concluding his studies, and, at the age of twenty-three, another, for an essay. The story of Picciola was written when our author was forty years old (1837), and gained the Monthyon prize of three thousand francs. There is something so piquant, so pure, so delicate, in the love of the imprisoned count for the little wild weed of the castle yard, such a human interest in his grateful affection for his other preserver, the daughter of his fellow-prisoner, and such an air of historical vraisemblance about the whole tale, that one can scarcely wonder at its having run through some twenty or more successive editions in the original French, and having been translated into various languages. It was written at its author's prime, when he was at the height of a brilliant literary career.

Picciola, as well as all of his other romances and miscellaneous writings, was published under the pseudonyme of "SAINTINE"; while the more than two hundred dramatic works which he produced, either by himself or together with other writers, bore the name of "XAVIER" as their author. SAINTINE, however, is the name most widely known, and there are few who do not suppose that to be the real name of this writer.

DEDICATION.

TO MADAME VIRGINIA ANCELOT.

After reading over my book, I tremble to offer it to you. And yet who could so well appreciate it as yourself?

You do not like voluminous novels nor long dramas. My book is neither a novel nor a drama.

The story which I am going to recount to you, madame, is simple, so simple that perhaps never did pen broach a more limited subject. My heroine is so little a thing! not that I would beforehand, in case of failure, throw the fault upon her. God forbid! If in the work there is little action, the thought is not devoid of dignity; the aim is lofty, and if I have not reached it, it is because my strength is insufficient. I am not indifferent, however, to its success, for I have made it the repository of my most profound convictions; and actuated rather by a sentiment of benevolence than of vanity, I cannot but believe, although it may be rejected and disdained by the crowd of ordinary readers, that for some it may not be without a charm, and for others not without profit.

That it is a record of facts will give it value in your eyes. To its truthfulness I can certify, and offer it to you in compensation for whatever else you may find lacking.

In your memory lives that good and gracious lady who died so few months since, the Countess of Charney, whose countenance, though veiled with sadness, was so striking from the heavenly imprint which it bore.

Her eye, so pure, so gentle, whose passing glance was a caress for those she loved, and whose lingering look caused the heart to dilate with pleasure and turn again irresistibly to seek it once more. This look, ordinarily timid as that of a young girl, you have seen brighten, become animated, burn with ardor, and betray all at once sentiments of strength, energy, and devotion. This look was the woman. This woman was the most incredible mingling of sweetness and strength, of timidity and daring. She was a lioness that a child could quiet with a word; a dove that could feel a thunderbolt without trembling, when her maternal love was called into action.

Such I knew her, and others had known her long before me, when the love that moved the springs of her being was that which she felt first for her father, then for her husband. I delight to speak to you of this noble creature. The occasions will be too rare in which I shall be able to do so. But she is not the principal heroine of my story.

In the only visit which you made her at Belleville, which she had fixed upon as her permanent home, — for the tomb of her husband was there (and now hers also), — several things seemed to surprise you. First, the presence of an old white-haired servant, seated by her side at table. You appeared, above all, astonished in hearing this servant, with manners brusque and rude, address with the familiar "thee and thou" the daughter of the Countess, and the young girl, elegant and refined, and beautiful as her mother had been, reply to the old man with deference and respect, even with affection, calling him by the title of godfather; in fact, she was his godchild.

Then perhaps you remember a dried and faded flower enclosed in a rich medallion, and the expression of sadness that overspread the features of the poor widow, when you questioned her about this relic. I believe she even left your question without response. That would have required a long time, and could not be given to an indifferent listener.

That response I am going to give you now.

Honored with the affection of this admirable woman, more than once, sitting between her and her old servant, opposite to this medallion, I have heard from both of them long and detailed narrations on the subject of that faded flower, which have deeply moved me. I have been allowed to keep for a long time the manuscripts of the Count, his correspondence, and his double journal in prison, on linen and on paper. I have not lacked abundant proofs and historic documents.

These narrations I have most carefully treasured in my memory; these manuscripts I have attentively examined; from the correspondence I have extracted precious fragments; from the journal I have drawn my inspiration; and if I succeed in imparting to your soul the sentiment which was stirred in mine by all these souvenirs of the captive, I shall have needlessly trembled for the destiny of my book.

Yet one word. I have retained for my hero his title of Count at a time when such titles had ceased to be used. It is because I have always heard him so called both in French and Italian. In my memory his name and title are one, and together they have flowed from my pen.

Expect not then, madame, in this volume, the record of events of great importance, or the adventures of a lover. I have spoken of utility, — but to whom is a love-story useful? In this sweet knowledge practice is worth more than theory, and each one has need of his own experience. That experience each one hastens to acquire for himself, and cares not to find it in books. The old, having become moralists from necessity, cry in vain, "Avoid that rock on which we were once wrecked!" Youth replies, "The sea on which you have sailed we too would brave in our turn, and we demand our right to shipwreck."

There is love in my story, but it is the love of a man for — Shall I tell you? No! Read, and you will know.

BOOK I.

CHAPTER I.

CHARLES VÉRAMONT, Count of Charney, whose name is doubtless not yet wholly forgotten by the learned of our time, and might, if sought, still be found in the records of the imperial police, was endowed by nature with an uncommon capacity for study. Unfortunately, his intellect, under scholastic discipline, had taken a disputatious turn. He was more used to discussion than to observation, and so became rather a learned man than a philosopher. At twenty-five the Count was master of seven languages; but, unlike certain learned polyglots who seem to have given themselves the trouble of acquiring foreign tongues for the express purpose of exhibiting their ignorance and emptiness to foreigners, as well as to their own countrymen, — for one can be a dolt in many languages as easily as in one, — Charney regarded his acquirements as a linguist only as preparation for other and higher studies.

While he possessed this body of servants at the command of his intellect, yet each had his duty, his special business. With his servants, the Germans, he engaged in metaphysics; with the English and Italians, in politics and legislation; with all, in history, which he could investigate to its very origin, thanks to his Hebrew, his Greek, and his Roman servants.

Nor, in devoting himself to these serious studies, did the Count neglect the accessory sciences. But at length, alarmed at the extent of the vast horizon which seemed to expand as he advanced, finding himself stumble at every step in the labyrinth in which he was involved, weary of the fruitless search after truth that was never free from doubt, he came to look upon history as a vast lie, heaped up age after age, and attempted to reconstruct the edifice on a surer foundation. He composed a new historical romance, which the learned derided from envy, and society from ignorance.

Political and legislative science furnished him with more positive groundwork. But here all Europe was calling loudly for reform; and when he tried to point out some of the worst abuses, they seemed so rooted in the social system, so many destinies built up and riveted on false principles, that he was disheartened, feeling neither strength of mind nor insensibility of heart enough to overturn in other nations what the tornado of the Revolution had not entirely uprooted in his own.

Then how many men, with as much intelligence and honesty as he, held theories totally opposed to his own. This thought humbled him more than did the errors of history, and left him in the most painful perplexity.

Metaphysics afforded him a last resource. In that world of ideas an overthrow appears less alarming, for ideas may clash without noise in imaginary space, as a German poet has said. The silent thought has a sounding echo. In the world of metaphysics Charney believed that he would not expose to risk the peace of mind of his fellow-men, but he lost his own.

The farther he advanced in the mysteries of the science, the more deeply he became enveloped in darkness and confusion. Truth, ever flying at his approach, vanished even under his step, and mockingly seemed to flicker before his eyes like a will-o'-the-wisp, which allures only to mislead. He beheld it gleaming before him, and it vanished beneath his gaze to reappear where he least expected. Untiring and unyielding, armed with patience, he followed it with stealthy steps, to seize it in its hiding-place, and in a flash it was away; he quickened his pace; at the first step it had fled. He thought at last he held it, — it was under his hand, — in his hand, — it had already slipped through his fingers, dividing and multiplying itself into a thousand delusive particles. Twenty rival truths perplexed the horizon of his mind, — false beacons that set his reason at defiance.

After being tossed about between Bossuet and Spinoza, between atheism and deism, bewildered among spiritualists, sensationalists, animists, ontologists, eclectics, and materialists, he took refuge in universal scepticism, desperately solving all doubts by universal negation.

Having set aside the doctrine of innate ideas and the revelation of theologians, as well as the opinions of Leibnitz, Locke, and Kant, Count Charney shut himself up in gross pantheism, refusing to believe in one supreme intelligence. The disorder inherent in creation, the perpetual contradictions between ideas and things, the unequal distribution of strength and fortune among mankind, fixed in his mind the conviction that blind matter alone had created all, and alone organized and directed all.

Chance became his God, annihilation the object of his hope. He adopted his new creed with rapture, almost with triumph, as if he had himself created it, thinking himself happy in being freed by a sweeping incredulity from the doubts with which he had been besieged.

The death of a relative placed him in possession of a large fortune. He bade adieu to science, and determined to live for pleasure alone. Since the installation of the consulate, society in France had been reorganized with its former habits of luxury and splendor. In the midst of the clarion of victory, which was heard from all quarters at once, Paris was intoxicated.

Charney entered the world of wealth, the genial and dazzling world, the world of learning, wit, and grace; then, in the midst of this life, at once idle and occupied, in this grand rush for pleasure, he was filled with surprise that he could not think himself happy.

To dance at the sound of music, to look upon the adornment and breathe the perfume exhaled by the beautiful women about him, seemed all that was worthy his attention.

He had sought the companionship of men noted for their learning and good sense; but how weak he found them, ignorant and steeped in error! He could only pity them.

This is one of the disadvantages of proficiency in human science; one no longer finds others at his own level; even those who know as much know it in a different way. From the pinnacle to which one has mounted, those below look small and worthless; for in the hierarchy of intelligence, as in that of power, isolation is born of greatness. To live alone is the chastisement of whoever will raise himself too high.

Our philosopher called to his aid sensual pleasures. In society, which had been so long a stranger to joy and gayety, and was still defiled by the blood-stained orgies of the Revolution, now renewing its life and outstripping at the first bound the ostentatious magnificence of the Regency, he signalized himself by the extravagance of his expenditure and his follies; but all in vain.

He had horses, equipages, an open table; he gave concerts, balls, hunting-parties; but failed to secure Pleasure as his guest. He had friends to flatter him in his triumphs, mistresses to love him in his moments of leisure; and, although he put a high price on all this, he knew neither friendship nor love.

All this parade, all these parodies of a joyous life, had not the power for a moment to cheer his heart or force from him a single smile. He endeavored in vain to allow himself to be blindly caught by the intoxicating allurements of society. The siren Pleasure, half out of the water, strove to charm the man by her beauty and her seductive voice, but the unwise glance of the philosopher plunged also, spite of himself, under the wave, to seek the scaly body and the forked tail of the monster!

Charney could neither be happy through truth nor error. To virtue he was a stranger; to vice, indifferent. He had proved the vanity of knowledge, and the bliss of ignorance was denied him. The doors of that Eden were forever closed behind him. Reason seemed to him false; pleasure, a liar. The noise of fêtes wearied him; solitude and silence were unendurable. In company he was weary of others; alone he was weary of himself. A profound sadness took possession of him.

The demon of philosophical analysis, notwithstanding his efforts to exorcise it, always held dominion over his thoughts, disenchanting what should charm his eye, tarnishing, diminishing, and extinguishing the pleasures and the luxury in which he wished to live. The praises of his friends were to him only the current coin with which they paid for the portion of his fortune which they took from him, and were only signs of their desire to feast at his banquets.

Decomposing everything, reducing everything to its first elements by this same principle of analysis, he became the prey of a singular malady, — a frightful malady, more common than is known, which attacks the proud to humiliate them. He fancied that in the fine cloth of his garments he could detect the tainted odor of the animal from which the wool was shorn; under the silk of his rich hangings he saw crawling the disgusting worm which had spun it; his elegant furniture, carpets, the binding of his books, his trinkets of mother-of-pearl and of ivory, only suggested to him the remains and cast-off garments or dwellings of some animal; death! death! embellished and made productive by the toil of a squalid artisan. Illusion was destroyed, imagination paralyzed. But to him emotion was a necessity. That love which could find no single object upon which to fix itself, he expanded to embrace all mankind. He became a philanthropist.

To be useful to the men that he despised, he gave himself up anew to politics, — not speculative, but active. He caused himself to be initiated into secret societies; he forced himself to feel again the only sort of fanaticism that remains for minds which have lost all illusions. In short, he became a conspirator; and against whom? Against the power of Bonaparte.

May it not have been that this patriotic love, this universal love which seemed to animate him, after all, at bottom, was only hatred for one single man, a man whose glory and success annoyed him?

Charney the aristocrat at last returned to the principle of equality; the proud nobleman from whom had been wrested his title of Count, which he held from his ancestors, did not choose that one should take with impunity that of Emperor, which could be held only from the sword.

It matters not what conspiracy this was. There was no lack of conspiracies at that epoch. I only know that this one was brooding from 1803 to 1804; but it was not suffered to break out. The police, that providence which watched over the destinies of the future empire, discovered it in time. Government decided to make no noise about it, not even to give it the honor of a discharge of muskets on the Plaine de Grenelle, the place of military execution. The heads of the conspiracy were surprised, seized in their own houses, condemned almost without trial, and separately distributed in the prisons, citadels, or fortresses of the ninety-six departments of consular France.

CHAPTER II.

I REMEMBER, when crossing the Alps into Italy, a tourist, travelling on foot, my knapsack on my shoulder, and alpenstock in my hand, stopping to gaze thoughtfully on a torrent near the pass of Rodoretto, swollen by the melting ice of the upper glaciers.

The noise of the waterfall, the foaming cascades throughout its course, the various colors with which the water was tinted, by turns yellow, white, and black, showing that it had forced its channel through beds of marl, lime, and slate; the enormous blocks of granite which it had laid bare but not removed, each forming the centre of another cataract, adding roar to roar, cascade to cascade; entire trees which it had uprooted, lying partly in and partly out of the water, the foliage of one half tossed by the violent wind, the other tortured by the dashing waves; fragments of the banks clothed with verdure converted into islands, which floated on the surface of the torrent, broken in dashing against the trees, as the trees were torn and bruised in passing the blocks of marble and granite; — all this roaring and clashing, all these sights and sounds confined between two narrow precipitous banks, held me a long time in agitated thought. This torrent is the Clusone.

Skirting its banks, I came with it into one of four valleys called "Protestant," in memory of the ancient Vaudois, who formerly took refuge there. Here my torrent had no longer its rapid and riotous gait, nor its hundred roaring voices. Flowing now quietly, decently, almost coquettishly, it took upon itself the air of a modest rivulet, as it caressed with its waves the walls of Fenestrella.

It was then that I first saw Fenestrella, celebrated for the forts which crown the two mountains between which the town is placed. These forts, which communicate by a covered way, had been partly dismantled during the wars of the republic. One of them, however, repaired and refortified, had become a prison of state when Piedmont was incorporated into France.

It was in this fortress of Fenestrella that Charles Véramont, Count of Charney, was confined, accused of having plotted to subvert the regular and legal government of his country, to substitute for it a régime of disorder and terror.

We see him, then, separated from men of pleasure and men of science, regretting neither; forgetting, without too much bitterness, that hope of political regeneration which for the moment had seemed to reanimate his worn-out heart; bidding an adieu, forced, it is true, but full of resignation, to his fortune, whose pomp had never had the power to dazzle him, and to his friends who wearied him; having for his abode, instead of his spacious and princely mansion, a bare and gloomy chamber, and for his only valet, his jailer.

But what matter to him the gloom and nakedness of his apartment! The necessaries of life he had, and he was weary of its superfluities. His jailer even seemed to him endurable.

His thoughts alone weighed upon him. However, what other diversion remained for him?

All correspondence with the outside world was interdicted. He was not allowed to have either books, pens, or paper. This the discipline of the prison required. In other times this would have been no privation to him, when he was only anxious to escape from the perplexities of science by which he was beset. Now a book would have given him a friend to consult, and more, an adversary to combat. Shut out from the world, he was thrown back upon himself, forced to live with his enemy, — thought.

But how bitter and oppressive is that thought which continually speaks to him of his desperate position! How lifeless and heavy for him, — for him whom Nature had overwhelmed with her gifts, whom Society had surrounded from his birth with her favors and privileges; for him, to-day a captive and miserable; for him who has so much need of protection and aid, and who believes neither in the power of God nor in the pity of men!

He tried again to rid himself of this argumentative demon which alternately froze and scorched him, when, shut up to his reveries, he was a victim to its struggles. Once more he would turn for thought to outward objects, — to the material world. But, ah, how shrunk and narrow the world that met his eyes!

The room occupied by Charney was at the rear of the citadel, in a small building raised on the ruins of an ancient fortification, formerly connected with the defensive works, but which, in the rebuilding of the fort, was rendered useless.

Four walls newly whitewashed, so that they did not even yield him the amusement of recognizing the traces of those who had before been inmates of this place of desolation; a table, at which he could do nothing but eat; one chair, whose singleness seemed ever to remind him that never would any human being sit there beside him; a trunk for his clothing; a little sideboard of painted deal, partly worm-eaten, presented a striking contrast to an elegant dressing-case inlaid with silver, which was placed upon it, the only remnant which was left him of his former luxury; a narrow bed, but clean; a pair of curtains of blue cloth which hung at his window, — a derisive superfluity, a bitter raillery, for the closeness of the bars and the high wall rising but a few feet opposite his window left him little to fear from prying eyes or the importunity of the too ardent rays of the sun. Such was the furnishing of his chamber.

Over this room was another exactly like it, but unoccupied; he had no companions in this detached portion of the fortress. The rest of his world was limited to a massive spiral stone stairway which led to a small paved court sunk in one of the ancient moats of the citadel.

In this place, for two hours each day, he took as much exercise and enjoyed as much liberty as the rules prescribed by the commandant permitted. From this court the prisoner could look upon the summit of the mountains and the vapors which rose from the plains; for the ramparts, lower at the east, allowed the air and sun to penetrate. But once more in his chamber a horizon of masonry alone met his eye, in the midst of this sublime and picturesque scenery which surrounded him. At the right rose the enchanting green hills of Saluces; at the left, the last undulations of the valleys of Aosta and the banks of the Chiara; before him were the marvellous plains of Turin; behind him the Alps rising one above another, adorned with rocks, forests, and abysses, from Mount Genevra to Mount Cenis, and he could see nothing, — nothing but a misty sky suspended over his head in a frame of stones, nothing but the pavement of his court and the bars of his prison, nothing but the high wall that faced his window, of which the wearisome uniformity was only broken towards its extremity by a small square window, at which, from time to time, through the bars, he had a glimpse of a sad and frowning face.

And this was the circumscribed world in which he must henceforward seek his diversions and find his joys. The effort taxed all his faculties.

He marked on his walls with a bit of charcoal figures and dates which recalled to him the happy events of his youth. Alas! how small the number of them! He turned from these remembrances with a sinking heart.

Then the fatal demon of scepticism returned with its desolating convictions, which he formed into phrases that he dared to inscribe on the walls, near the names of his mother and his sister.

Determined to triumph over his morbid abstraction and his torpid idleness, he tried to accustom himself to think of things puerile and frivolous; he hastened, of his own free will, to meet that brutishness which must result from a long sojourn in a prison; he plunged into it, he wallowed in it with frenzy.

The philosopher employed himself in ravelling the threads of silk or linen. The scholar made flageolets of straw, constructed vessels, ornamented with flags, from walnut-shells. The man of genius made whistles, carved boxes and openwork baskets from the stones of fruit. The revolutionist made chains and musical instruments from the elastic wire of his braces. For a while he delighted in his works; then disgust took possession of him, and he crushed them all under his feet.

To vary his occupation he carved upon his table a thousand odd designs. Never schoolboy cut his desk, or covered it with arabesques in relief or intaglio, with more patience and skill. The portal of the church of Caudebec, the pulpit of St. Gudule, at Brussels, are not decorated with a greater profusion of carved figures. There were houses on houses, fishes on trees, men taller than the steeples, boats on roofs, carriages on the water, dwarf pyramids, gigantic flies; all this, horizontal, vertical, oblique, topsy-turvy, upside down, a true hieroglyphical chaos in which he forced himself sometimes to seek a symbolical sense, a connection, a design; for he who believed in chance as the moving power of the world might easily hope to find a complete poem in the sculptures on his table, or a design of Raphael in the mottled veins of a piece of boxwood.

He taxed his ingenuity to multiply difficulties to vanquish, problems to solve, enigmas to guess, and ennui, formidable enemy, came to surprise him in the midst of these grave employments.

The man whose face he had seen at the window at the extremity of the opposite wall might have furnished him, perhaps, with more real diversion; but this other prisoner seemed to avoid his notice, retiring from the grating as soon as the Count showed any signs of observing him. Charney conceived a hatred for him.

Such was his opinion of human nature, that nothing more was necessary than this avoidance of him to convince him that the unknown was a spy employed to watch his movements even in prison, or some old enemy rejoicing over his misery and humiliation.

On interrogating the jailer, however, he saw that his suspicions were false.

"He is an Italian," said he, "a good fellow, a good Christian, for I often find him at his prayers."

Charney shrugged his shoulders. "And why is he here?" asked he.

"He attempted to assassinate the Emperor."

"Is he, then, a patriot?"

"Patriot? O no! but the poor man had a son and a daughter; now he has only a daughter, — his son is dead in Germany, — poor fellow!"

"It was a paroxysm of selfishness, then," murmured Charney.

"Zounds! you are not a father, Signor Count," replied the jailer. "If my little Antonio, who is still at the breast, had to be weaned for the good of the empire, which is not much older than he — But silence! I do not wish to lodge at Fenestrella without the keys at my girdle or under my pillow."

"And what are now the occupations of this bold conspirator?"

"He catches flies," said the jailer, with a jesting glance.

Charney no longer hated his neighbor; he despised him.

"He is then mad," cried he.

"Why mad, Signor Count? a later comer than he, you have already become a master in the art of carving in wood. Patience!"

Notwithstanding the irony of these last words, Charney resumed his manual labors, and the explanation of his hieroglyphics, — remedies, alas! impotent against the pain with which he was tormented.

In these puerilities, in this weariness, passed all one winter.

Happily for him, a new subject of interest was soon to come to his aid.

CHAPTER III.

One day, at the prescribed hour, Charney was walking in the court-yard, his head bowed, his arms crossed behind his back, pacing slowly, as if he could so make the narrow space which he was permitted to perambulate seem larger.

Spring announced its coming; a softer air dilated his lungs, and to live free and be master of the soil and of space seemed to him the goal of his desires.

He counted one by one the paving-stones of his little court, without doubt to verify the exactness of his former calculations, for it was by no means the first time he had numbered them, when he perceived there, under his eyes, a little mound of earth raised between two stones, slightly opened at the top. He stopped; his heart beat without his being able to tell why. But all is hope or fear for a captive. In the most indifferent objects, and the most insignificant events, he seeks some hidden cause which speaks to him of deliverance.

Perhaps this slight derangement on the surface might be produced by some great work underground; perhaps a tunnel, which would open and make a way for him to the fields and mountains. Perhaps his friends or his former accomplices were mining to reach him, and restore to him life and liberty.

He listened attentively, and fancied he heard a low, rumbling noise under ground; he raised his head, and the tremulous air bore to him the rapid stroke of the tocsin, and the continued roll of drums along the ramparts, like a signal of war. He started, and with a trembling hand wiped from his forehead great drops of sweat.

Was he to be free? Had France changed its master?

This dream was only a flash. Reflection destroyed the illusion. He had no accomplices, and had never had friends. He listened again; the same sounds struck his ear, but gave rise to other thoughts. This stroke of the tocsin and the roll of the drum were only the distant sound of a church-bell that he heard every day at the same hour, and the accustomed call to arms, which need only excite emotion in a few straggling soldiers of the citadel.

Charney smiled bitterly, and looked upon himself with pity, when he thought that some insignificant animal, a mole who had without doubt lost his way, or a field-mouse who had scratched up the earth under his feet, had caused him to believe for an instant in the affection of men and the overthrow of a great empire.

In order, however, to make his mind quite clear about it, stooping over the little mound, he carefully removed some of the particles of earth, and saw with astonishment that the wild agitation which had overcome him for an instant had not even been caused by a busy, burrowing, scratching animal, armed with claws and teeth, but by a feeble specimen of vegetation, with scarcely strength to sprout, weak and languishing.

Raising himself, profoundly humiliated, he was about to crush it with his heel, when a fresh breeze, laden with the perfume of honeysuckle and hawthorn, was wafted to him, as if to implore mercy for the poor plant, which, perhaps, one day would also have perfume to give him.

Another thought came to him to arrest his destructive intention. How was it possible for that little plant, so tender, soft, and fragile that a touch might break it, to raise, separate, and throw out that earth dried and hardened by the sun, trodden under foot by him, and almost cemented to the two blocks of granite between which it was pressed?

He bent over it again, and examined it with renewed attention. He saw at its upper extremity a sort of double fleshy valve, which folded over the first leaves, preserved them from the touch of anything that might injure them, and at the same time enabled them to pierce that earthy crust in search of air and sun.

Ah, said he to himself, behold all the secret! It receives from nature this principle of strength, as the young birds, who, before they are born, are armed with a bill hard enough to break the thick shell which confines them. Poor prisoner, thou possessest at least the instruments which can aid thee to gain thy freedom.

He stood gazing at it a few moments, and no longer dreamed of crushing it.

The next day, in taking his ordinary walk, he was striding along in an absent-minded manner, and nearly trod on it by accident. He drew back quickly, and, surprised at the interest with which his new acquaintance inspired him, he paused to note its progress.

The plant had grown, and the rays of the sun had caused it to lose somewhat of its sickly palor. He reflected upon the power which that pale and slender stem possessed to absorb the luminous essence with which to nourish and strengthen itself, and to borrow from the prism the colors with which to clothe itself, — colors assigned beforehand to each one of its parts. Yes, its leaves, without doubt, thought he, will be tinted with a different shade from its stem; and then its flowers, what color will they be? Yellow, blue, red? Why, nourished by the same sap as the stalk, do they not clothe themselves in the same livery? How do they draw their azure and scarlet from the same source where the other has only found a bright or sombre green? So it is to be, however; for, notwithstanding the confusion and disorder of affairs here below, matter follows a regular though blind march. Blind, indeed, repeated he; I need no other proof of it than these two fleshy lobes which have facilitated its egress from the earth, but which now, of no use in its preservation, nourish themselves still from its substance, and hang down, wearying it by their weight, — of what use are they?

As he said this, day was declining, and the chilly spring evening approached; the two lobes rose slowly as he watched them, apparently desiring to justify themselves from his reproach; they drew closer together, and enclosed in their bosom, to protect against the cold and the attacks of insects, the tender and fragile foliage which was about to be deprived of the sun, and who, thus sheltered and warmed, slept under the two wings which the plant had just softly folded over it.

The man of science comprehended more fully this mute but decided response, in observing that the outside of the vegetable bivalve had been slightly cut by the nibbling of a snail the night before, of which the traces still remained.

This strange colloquy between thought on one side and action on the other, between the man and the plant, was not to end here. Charney had been too long occupied with metaphysical discussions to surrender himself easily to a good reason.

"This is all very well," said he; "here as elsewhere a happy concurrence of fortuitous circumstances has favored this feeble creation. It was born armed with a lever to lift the soil and a buckler to protect its head, two conditions necessary to its existence; if it had happened that these had not been fulfilled, the plant must have died, stifled in its germ, like myriads of other individuals of its species, whom Nature has no doubt created, unfinished, imperfect, incapable of preserving and reproducing themselves, and who have had but an hour of life on earth. Who can calculate the number of false and impotent combinations Nature has made, before succeeding in producing one single specimen fitted to endure? A blind man may hit the mark, but how many arrows must he lose before he attains this result. For thousands of ages matter has been triturated by the double movement of attraction and repulsion; is it then strange that Chance should so many times produce the right combinations? I grant that this envelope can protect these first leaves, but will it grow and enlarge so as to shelter and preserve also the other leaves against the cold and the attacks of their enemies? Next spring, when new foliage will be born as fragile and tender as this, will it be here to protect it again? No! Nothing then has been planned in all this, nothing is the result of intelligent thought, but rather of a happy chance."

Sir Count, Nature has more than one response with which to refute your argument. Have patience, and observe that feeble and isolated production, sent forth and thrown into the court of your prison, perhaps less by a stroke of chance than by the benevolent foresight of Providence. These excrescences, in which you have divined a lever and a shield, had already rendered other services to this feeble plant. After having served it as envelope in the frozen ground through the winter, the right time having arrived, they lent it their nourishing breast, as it were, suckling it when, a simple germ, it had not yet roots with which to seek moisture from the ground, or leaves to breathe the air and the sun. You were right, Sir Count; these protecting wings which have until now brooded so maternally over the young plant, will not be developed with it; they will fall, but not till they have accomplished their task, and when their ward will have gained strength sufficient to do without their aid. Do not be anxious about its future; Nature watches over this as over its sister plants; and as long as the north-winds, the chilly fogs and snow-flakes, descend from the Alps, the new leaves yet in the bud will find there a safe asylum, a dwelling arranged for them, closed from the air by a cement of gum and rosin, which will expand according to their need, only opening under a favorable sky and atmosphere. They will not come out without a warm covering of fur, a soft cottony down which will defend them from the last frosts or any atmospheric caprices. Did ever mother watch more lovingly over the preservation of her child? Behold, Sir Count, what you might have known long since, if, descending from the abstruse regions of human science, you had deigned to lower your eyes to examine the simple works of God. The farther north your steps had turned, the more these common marvels would have manifested themselves to you. Where the danger is greater, there the cares of Providence are redoubled.

The philosopher had followed attentively all the progress and the transformations of the plant. Again he had contended with her by reasoning, and she had ever an answer for all his arguments.

"Of what use are these prickly hairs that garnish thy stem?" said he. And the next day she showed them to him covered with a slight hoar-frost, which, thanks to them, kept at a distance, had not chilled her tender skin.

"Of what use in the fine days will be your warm coat, wadded with down?"

The fine days arrived; she cast off her winter cloak to adorn herself with her spring toilet of green, and her new branches sprang forth free from these silken envelopes, henceforward useless.

"But if the storm rages the wind will bruise thee, and the hail will cut thy leaves, too tender to resist it."

The wind blew, and the young plant, too feeble yet to dare to fight, bent to the earth, and was defended in yielding. The hail came, and by a new manœuvre, the leaves rising along the stem, shielding it, pressed against each other for mutual protection, presenting only their underside to the blows of the enemy, and opposed their solid ribs to the weight of the atmospheric projectiles, — in their union was their strength; this time the plant had come forth from the combat, not without some slight mutilations, but alive and still strong, and ready to expand before the rays of the sun, which would heal her wounds.

"Is Chance then intelligent?" said Charney; "must I spiritualize matter, or materialize mind?" And he did not cease to interrogate his mute instructress; he delighted to watch her growth, and mark her gradual metamorphoses.

One day, after he had contemplated it for a long time, he was surprised to find that he had been lost in thought, that his reveries had an unaccustomed tenderness, and that his happy thoughts continued during his walk in the court. Raising his head, he saw at the barred window of the great wall the "catcher of flies," who seemed to be observing him. At first he blushed, as if the man could read his thoughts, but then he smiled, for he no longer despised him. Had he the right to do so? Was not his mind also absorbed in the contemplation of one of the lowest ranks of creation?

"Who knows," said he, "but this Italian may have discovered in a fly as much worthy of study as I in my plant?"

On returning to his chamber, that which first struck his eye was this maxim of the fatalist, inscribed by him upon the wall two months before: —

Chance is blind, and is the sole author of creation.

He took a bit of charcoal, and wrote underneath, PERHAPS!

CHAPTER IV.

CHARNEY wrote no more upon his wall, and cut upon his table only growing stems protected by their cotyledons, only leaves with their serrated edges and salient veins. He passed the greater part of his hours for exercise before his plant, examining and studying its development; and when again in his chamber, he would often, through the window-bars, still gaze upon it.

It is now the favorite occupation, the plaything, the whim, of the prisoner. Will he tire of it as he has of others?

One morning from his window he saw the jailer, in rapidly crossing the court, pass so near to his plant that it seemed in danger of being crushed by his foot. For the moment he shuddered with fear. When Ludovic came to bring him his pittance for breakfast he determined to petition him to spare the only ornament of his walk; but he found it difficult to put in form a request so simple. Perhaps the discipline of the prison required that the court should be cleared of all vegetation. It was then a favor that he would ask, and he possessed little with which to repay it. This Ludovic had already heavily taxed him, in extorting from him as much as possible, in payment for the articles that the jailer reserves the right of furnishing to the prisoners. Besides, Charney had rarely spoken to the man, whose brusque manners and sordid character repelled him. Without doubt, he would find him little disposed to be agreeable to him. His pride made him shrink from appearing by his tastes to be on the same level with the fly-catcher, for whom he had so plainly shown his contempt. Then, after all, his request might be refused; for the inferior whose position gives him for the moment the right to grant or deny a favor, almost always uses his power with harshness, not knowing that indulgence belongs to strength.

A refusal would profoundly wound the pride and the hopes of the prisoner. It was, then, only after a host of oratorical precautions, and strengthening himself with all his philosophical knowledge of human weakness, that Charney broached his discourse, previously logically arranged, to gain his object without compromising his amour propre, or rather his vanity.

He commenced by addressing the jailer in Italian, thus awakening the souvenirs of childhood and nationality. He spoke to him of his son, his little Antonio. He knew how to touch the sensitive chord of his heart, and so force him to listen. Then he took from his elegant dressing-case a small silver-gilt goblet, and desired him to present it as his gift to his child. Ludovic smiled, but refused it.

Charney, though somewhat abashed, would not consider himself defeated. He insisted by an adroit transition, saying, "I know that a toy or rattle or flower would be a more suitable gift for the child, but you can sell the cup, my good man, and with the price purchase these for him. Apropos of flowers," said he, — and behold him fairly launched into his subject.

Thus the great springs of human action — love of country, paternal love, personal interest — were all brought to bear upon the accomplishment of his object. Could more have been done if his own fate had been at stake? Judge, then, whether he already loved his plant!

"Signor Count," said Ludovic, when he had ceased to speak, "keep your goblet, lest the other bijoux in the case should miss it; you forget that my little boy, but three months old, has no need of a goblet to drink from; as to your gillyflower —"

"What! a gillyflower! Is it a gillyflower?" cried Charney, foolishly disappointed to have set his heart upon so common a flower.

"I am sure I do not know, Signor Count; to my eyes all plants are more or less gillyflowers. But since the preservation of this one is the matter in question, you are a little late in recommending it to my tender mercies. I should long ago have crushed it without any intention of hurting either you or it, if I had not noticed your tender interest in the pretty thing."

"O, that interest," said Charney, somewhat confused, "is a very simple thing."

"Tut, tut, tut, I understand that," replied Ludovic, with a wink of the eye; "occupation is a necessity to man; he must attach himself to something, and prisoners have but few objects from which to make their choice. Among our inmates here, Signor Count, are those who were once, without doubt, grand personages, and learned men (for they do not bring the small fry here). Now they amuse and occupy themselves with the most trivial things. One catches flies; there is no harm in that. Another," added he, with a wink of the eye more significant than the first, "cuts and hacks with his penknife the deal table, without considering that I am responsible for the furniture of the place."

The Count would have spoken, but Ludovic gave him no opportunity. "Some," said he, "raise canary-birds and goldfinches, and others, white mice. I respect their fancies to that degree, that I have given away a superb white Angora cat, which was the pet of my wife and myself, lest this small game should prove too strong a temptation for it; and all the cats in the world are not worth a captive's mouse."

"You are very good, Monsieur Ludovic," said Charney, annoyed that any one should suppose that his tastes could descend to such puerilities; "but that plant is to me more than a diversion."

"What matter! if it only reminds you of the tree under which your mother rocked you in your infancy, per Bacco, it may shade half the court-yard. My orders say nothing about it, so I will shut my eyes to it. Were it to become a tree. and aid you to scale the wall, that would be another thing; but we have time enough to think of that," said he, with a coarse laugh; "not that I do not wish you, with all my heart, the enjoyment of liberty and the free air, but it must come at the right time, according to rule, and with the permission of the authorities; if you should attempt to escape from the citadel —"

"What would you do?"

"What would I do? Bar your passage, though you killed me; or order the sentinel to fire on you, with no more pity than if you were a rabbit, — that is the order; but touch one of the leaves of your gillyflower, no, no! Put my foot upon it, never! I have always regarded as a consummate rascal, and unworthy to be a jailer, the man who would maliciously crush the spider of a poor prisoner; it is an ugly action, yes, — it is a crime."

Charney was at once surprised and touched to find so much sensibility in his guardian; and as his respect for him increased, his vanity was all the more determined to account by some sufficient reasons for his interest in the plant.

"My good fellow," said he, "I thank you for your good-will; I acknowledge that this plant is for me the source of a multitude of philosophical observations, full of interest. I delight to study its physiological phenomena." And as he saw by the jailer's expression that he listened without understanding, he added, "Besides, the species to which it belongs possesses medicinal virtues particularly useful in a disease to which I am subject."

He lied; but it would have cost him too much to allow the man who had just begun to rise in his esteem to think that he too had descended to the whimsical puerilities of the prison, — the only man who approached him, and who for him represented the whole human race.

"If your plant, Signor Count, has rendered you such service," replied Ludovic, as he prepared to leave the room, "you ought to show your gratitude to it by watering it sometimes; for if I had not taken care, in bringing water to you, to moisten it from time to time, the poor picciola would have died of thirst. Adieu, Sir Count."

"One instant, my good Ludovic," cried Charney, more and more surprised to find such delicate instincts enclosed in so rough an exterior, and repenting that he had until now so wronged him. "What! you interest yourself thus in my pleasures, and yet are so silent before me. I pray you accept this little present as a souvenir of my gratitude. If hereafter I can more fully acquit myself to you, count upon me."

And he again presented him the goblet. This time Ludovic took it, and while examining it with a sort of curiosity, said, "Acquit yourself of what, Signor Count? Plants ask nothing but water, and one can give them a drink without ruining one's self at the inn. If this one diverts you a little from your troubles, if it produces something of use to you, enough is said."

And he went at once and replaced the goblet in its case.

The Count stepped towards Ludovic and offered him his hand.

"O no, no!" said he, drawing back with a constrained but respectful air; "one only gives his hand to his equal or his friend."

"Well, Ludovic, be my friend."

"No, no!" said the jailer, "that cannot be, Excellenza. It is necessary to foresee all, that one may be able to fulfil his duties conscientiously to-morrow as well as to-day. If you were my friend and tried to give us the slip, should I have courage to cry to the sentinel, 'Fire!' No, I am your guardian, your jailer, your most devoted servant."

CHAPTER V.

After the departure of Ludovic, Charney reflected, and thought how, notwithstanding all his personal advantages, in all the relation between them, he had shown himself inferior to this man. To what miserable subterfuges had he resorted to surprise the heart of this simple and kindly being! he had not even hesitated to descend to a falsehood.

How thankful he was to him for the secret cares lavished upon his plant! What! this jailer, supposed capable of a refusal, when only the refraining from an unkind action was in question, had anticipated his wishes; he had been a spy upon him, not to sneer at his weakness, but to favor his pleasures. His disinterestedness forced the proud Count to acknowledge himself his debtor!

The hour for his exercise having arrived, he does not forget to share with his plant the portion of water which is allowed him. Not content with watering it, he takes care to free it from the dust which tarnishes its leaves, and the insects which attack it.

While thus occupying himself he thinks of Ludovic, and desires to know him better, to seek an explanation of the singular contrasts which the character of this man present, at the same time rude and good-natured, pitiless and tender-hearted, niggardly and disinterested.

He who had formerly been so much occupied with the study of the fall of old empires, the migration of races, the exploits and conquests of Cyrus, Alexander, and Gengis-Khan, asked nothing more of the great history of the world than the history of his jailer. By means of questions, suppositions, and logical deductions, this is what he learned from Ludovic himself.

Ludovic Ritti, a Piedmontese, was born at Nice, a compatriot and contemporary of Masséna. They were both children of the same quarter of the town, comrades in school, and out of school next-door neighbors.

Yet from their earliest youth, in accordance with their different natures, if they played horse, Ludovic was the horse and Masséna the driver; if they were to take the fruit from a neighbor's orchard, Ludovic served as the ladder by which Masséna climbed the wall, and the climber knew very well how to reserve for himself the lion's share; if they went poaching in the woods, Ludovic beat the bushes, while Masséna was the hunter.

Thus the two companions had grown up together, had been vagabonds together; then together they had enlisted as soldiers in the service of the Republic, and together they had taken their letters of naturalization, — not in the ordinary manner, by declaring themselves French, but in aiding the conquest which declared France their own country.

At this epoch, it is true, Masséna wore already the badge of general of division, while Ludovic still preserved his first woollen epaulettes : one had been born to dominion and command, the other to obedience.

Yes, obedience, passive, blind, complete, was in Ludovic a second nature, an instinctive necessity. He was a simple machine of war, moving only by the will of another. The orders of his superior officer seemed to him like the orders of God himself ; his motions were so entirely regulated by orders that in the height of the battle, even with the pistol of an enemy at his breast, he would have remained with his sabre in the air, without striking, if a signal had announced to him the end of hostilities.

Although brave, very brave, Ludovic had never allowed himself to be carried away by his ardor, and would never have broken the ranks by a foot's length. If he had not signalized himself by any striking action during his campaigns, it was because he had not received the order to do so.

If, in place of his ration of brandy, his sergeant had offered him a glass of ink to drink, saying, "It is the order," he would have swallowed it without a frown.

In the terrible year '95, in the midst of the snows of the Alps, when he and his companions marched with bare feet and empty stomachs, Ludovic quietly said, "It is the order !"

Wounded at Marengo, slightly lamed by a ball which lodged in the flesh of his thigh, Ludovic was forced to retire from the service.

Great, then, was his embarrassment. He had only gained, during his campaigns and his sojourn in Germany, Italy, and various parts of France, a marvellous facility in swearing in four or five different idioms.

Again at Nice, his native place, condemned to a sedentary life, abandoned to himself, with no impetus from without, he knew not how to arrange his movements, or what rule to impose upon his conduct.

He had no other diversion, no other pleasure, no other happiness, but to see the parade of the garrison and to march with limping step after the guard.

He went to bed every night at the beat of the tattoo ; but for his awaking, for his repasts, the drum no longer sounded for him ; for the ordinary acts of life there was no one to cry to him, "Right ! Left ! Forward !" What should he do with an existence that he must direct himself, and of which he must give himself all the trouble ? Obedience is so sweet to inactive minds ! And the habit of obedience makes it a necessity.

In order to escape from this perplexing situation, Ludovic took a grand resolution.

He married.

Into his domestic economy he carried the same passive obedience that had distinguished him in the army. As if all happiness was to come to him at the same time, the office of jailer at Fenestrella, just then becoming vacant, was given to him through the influence of his old comrade Masséna. He had then two superior officers in place of one, — his wife and his commandant.

His wife, younger than himself, passed, notwithstanding an enormous goître, for a tolerably good-looking girl when he married her ; but being of a crabbed disposition and sordidly avaricious, she had forced Ludovic, who was naturally disinterested, to overcharge the prisoners on all the articles which the jailer was allowed to furnish them. But beyond that, notwithstanding the wishes of his wife, he would not accept from them the slightest gift. This refusal could only happen in the interior of the prison, away from his wife's cognizance ; that was his own affair ; besides, it was the order.

There were, then, three distinct shades of character impressed upon Ludovic, — by his commandant, his wife, and his own instincts. Unsparing when the discipline of the citadel was in question, voilà his commandant ; avaricious with the prisoners, voilà his wife ; but good, sensible, generous, compassionate, when the commandant or the good woman of the house did not breathe upon his heart to make it hard or avaricious, voilà himself.

If a more complete portrait of Ludovic Ritti is desired, he was forty years of age, his complexion dark, his beard thick, his shoulders broad, his frame strong, and of middle height.

Picture him to yourself crossing, with a somewhat uncertain step, the courts of the citadel, smoking a short black pipe, letting slip frequently an oath, French, Provençal, Italian, or German, slightly winking his eye when he wished to give himself a malicious air, quickly brightening at the mention of the name of his son Antonio, or at the thought of a good action, and you know as much of him as Charney himself could learn.

One day soon after, at the appointed hour, Charney was at his post near his plant, when he saw a heavy black cloud obscuring the sun, hanging like a gray, floating dome over the towers of the fortress. Soon large drops of rain began to fall; he started to go quickly under shelter, when hailstones, mingled with the rain, pattered on the pavement of the court. La povera, whirled and twisted by the storm, seemed on the point of being uprooted from the earth; her wet leaves, fretting one against the other, trembling with the tossing of the wind, uttered, as it were, plaintive murmurs and cries of distress.

Charney paused. He remembered the reproaches of Ludovic, and looked eagerly around for some object with which to protect his plant; he found nothing; the hailstones became larger and fell more quickly, and threatened its destruction. He trembled for her, for her whom he had seen so lately resist so well the violence of the wind and the hail; but now he loved his plant too well to suffer it to run any risk of injury for the sake of getting the better of it in an argument.

Taking, then, a resolution worthy of a lover, worthy of a father, he drew near, he placed himself before his protégée, and interposed himself as a wall between her and the wind; he bent over her, serving as a shield against the shock of the hail; and there, motionless, panting from his struggles with the storm, from which he sheltered her, protecting her with his hands, with his body, with his head, with his love, he waited till the cloud had passed.

The storm was over. But might not a similar danger menace it when he, its protector, was held from it by bolts and bars. Moreover the wife of Ludovic, followed by a large dog, sometimes came into the court. This dog in his gambols might, with one snap of his mouth or a stroke of his paw, destroy the darling of the philosopher. Charney spent the rest of the day in meditating upon a plan, and the next day prepared to put it in execution.

The small portion of wood allowed him was scarcely enough for his comfort in this climate, where the evenings and mornings are so chilly. What matter? Has he not the warmth of his bed? he can retire earlier and rise later. In this way, sparing his wood, he soon amassed enough for his purpose. When Ludovic questioned him about it, he said, "It is to build a palace for my mistress." The jailer winked his eye, as if he understood; but he did not.

During this time Charney split, shaped, and pointed his sticks, laid together the most supple branches, preserved carefully the flexible osier which was used to tie together his daily bundle of fagots. Then he found the lining to his trunk to be of a coarse, loosely woven fabric, which he detached, and from it drew the coarsest and strongest threads. His materials thus prepared, he set himself bravely to work as soon as the laws of the jail and the scrupulous exactness of the jailer would allow.

Around his plant, between the pavement of the court, he carefully inserted sticks of various sizes, making them firm at their base by a cement composed of earth, gathered bit by bit here and there in the interstices between the stones, and of plaster, and saltpetre purloined from the old moat of the castle. The principal framework thus arranged, he interlaced it with light twigs, thus making a sort of hurdle, capable, in case of need, of protecting la povera from any blow, or the approach of the dog.

He was greatly encouraged during his work to find that Ludovic, who at the commencement, shaking his head with a low grumbling sound of evil augury, had seemed uncertain whether to allow him to continue his work, had now decided in his favor; and sometimes, while quietly smoking his pipe, leaning against the door at the entrance of the court, he would smilingly watch the inexperienced worker; occasionally taking his pipe from his mouth to give him some counsel, which Charney did not always know how to profit by.

But, inexpert as he was, his work progressed. In order to complete it, he impoverished himself, by robbing his scanty bed of straw with which to make a sort of matting to use when needed for the protection of his tender plant from the sharp gusts of Alpine wind which threatened it on one side, or the midday rays of the sun reflected from the granite.

One evening the wind blew violently. Charney from his window saw the court strewed with bits of straw and little twigs The matting of straw and the twigs had not been firmly enough bound to resist the wind. He promised himself to repair the misfortune the next day; but the next day when he descended it was all rebuilt. A hand more skilful than his had firmly interlaced the straw and the branches, and he knew well who to thank in his heart.

Thus, against all peril, thanks to him, thanks to them, the plant was sheltered by rampart and roof; and Charney became more and more warmly attached to it, watching with delight its growth and development, as it unceasingly opened to him new marvels for admiration.

Time gave firmness and solidity to the plant; the covering of the stem, at first so delicate, gave, from day to day, assurance of increasing fitness to endure, and the happy possessor of the plant was seized with a curious and impatient desire to see it blossom.

At last, then, he desired something, — this man of a worn-out heart and frozen brain; this man, so priding himself in his intellect, stoops from the proud heights of science to be absorbed in the contemplation of an herb of the field.

But do not hasten to accuse him of puerile weakness or of lunacy. The celebrated Quaker, John Bertram, after having passed long hours in examining the structure of a violet, determined to devote the powers of his mind to the study of the vegetable wonders of nature, and so gained a place among the masters of science.

If a philosopher of India became mad in seeking to explain the phenomena of the sensitive plant, perhaps Charney, on the contrary, will learn from his plant true wisdom. Has he not already found in it the charm which has the power to dissipate his ennui and enlarge his prison?

"O the flower! the flower!" said he; "that flower whose beauty will expand only for my eyes, whose perfume will exhale for me alone, what form will it take? What shades will color its petals? Without doubt it will offer me new problems to solve, and throw a last challenge to my reason. Well! let it come! Let my frail adversary show herself armed at all points; I will not shrink from the contest. Perhaps only then shall I be able to comprehend, in her completeness, that secret which her imperfect formation has thus far hidden from me. But wilt thou flower, — wilt thou show thyself to me one day in all the glory of thy beauty and its adornment, Picciola?"

Picciola! that is the name by which he called her, when, in the necessity of hearing a human voice, he conversed aloud with the companion of his captivity, while lavishing upon her his cares. Povera Picciola! (poor little one) such had been the exclamation of Ludovic, moved with pity for the poor little thing, when it had nearly died for want of water. Charney remembered it.

"Picciola! Picciola! wilt thou flower soon?" repeated he, while carefully opening the leaves at the extremities of the stems, to see if there was any promise of blossom. And this name, Picciola, was very pleasant to his ear, for it brought to his mind at once the two beings who peopled his world, — his plant and his jailer.

One morning, when, at the hour of his daily promenade, he interrogated Picciola, leaf by leaf, his eyes were suddenly arrested by something peculiar in its appearance; his heart beat violently, he laid his hand upon it, and the blood suffused his face. It was a long time since he had experienced so keen an emotion. That which he saw was at the end of the main stem, a new excrescence, green, silky, of a spherical form, covered with delicate scales placed one upon the other, like the slates upon the rounded dome of a kiosk.

He cannot doubt, — it is the bud, — the flower will soon be here.

CHAPTER VI.

The fly-catcher, who often came to his window, seemed to take pleasure in watching the Count, so busy about his plant. He had seen him mix and prepare his mortar, braid his mats, tie his osiers, and at last erect his palisades, and, prisoner like him, and for a yet longer time, he could easily sympathize in thought with the entire preoccupation of the philosopher.

And now, at that same barred window, another face, fresh and smiling, appears. It is the face of a woman, — a young girl, with an air at the same time timid and lively; the carriage of her head and the sparkle of her eyes showed that her vivacity was only tempered by her modesty; her glance, full of soul and expression, was partly veiled by her long, drooping lashes. Standing in the shadow of the heavy grating, her head bent in an attitude of revery, her fair hand leaning upon the bars for support, one might easily take her for a personification of captivity. But when she raises her brow and the light falls upon it, the harmony and serenity of her features, and the richness and freshness of her complexion, give assurance that she has been nurtured in liberty of action and in the free air, and not under bolt and bar.

Is she, then, one of those angels of charity who visit those who are sick and in prison? No; filial love has, until now, wholly filled her heart; it is from that love that she has drawn her strength and even her beauty. Daughter of Girhardi, the Italian, the catcher of flies, she had left the fêtes and gay promenades of Turin, to take up her residence in the little town of Fenestrella; not, at first, that she might see her father, for that permission was not granted her, but that she might breathe the same air with him, and be near him, while thinking of him. Now she has obtained, by persistent entreaties, liberty to visit him from time to time, and that is the reason that she is joyous, animated, and beautiful.

Curiosity has led her to the window which looks upon the court; a sentiment of interest holds her there, notwithstanding she fears to be noticed by the prisoner. Let her be reassured; Charney will not see her; at this moment Picciola and her incipient bud wholly absorb his attention.

The following week, when the young girl came again to visit her father, as she went towards the window to look at the other prisoner, Girhardi said, "For three days he has not been near his plant; the poor man must be very ill."

"Ill!" said she, with emotion.

"I have seen physicians crossing the court, and from what Ludovic tells me, they seem to agree only on one point, — that he may die."

"Die!" exclaimed the young girl, with dilated eye, and terror rather than pity expressed in her face. "O the unfortunate man! how I pity him!" Then, fixing upon her father a look of solicitude and anguish, "Then one can die here; or, rather, can one live? It is, without doubt, the confinement of the prison and the pestilential air that rises from the old moats that have caused his illness," cried she, clasping the old man in her arms; for while speaking of Charney she thought only of her father.

Girhardi strove to console her, while she covered his hand with tears.

At this moment Ludovic entered. He brought to the "catcher of flies" a new capture which he had made for him. It was a golden-winged beetle, which he presented with a triumphant air. Girhardi smiled, thanked him, and, when unobserved by Ludovic, gave the insect its liberty; it was the twentieth individual of the same species that Ludovic had brought him within a few days.

He profited by the opportune entrance of Ludovic to inquire after Charney.

"By my patron saint!" said Ludovic, "I do not forget him any more than the others, and until God shall take him into his own keeping, he is my care; so I have just been watering his plant."

"Ah, but of what use is that if he will never see it flower?" sadly asked the young girl.

"Ah! young lady," said Ludovic. Then he added with his customary wink of the eye, emphasizing his words with a motion of his raised forefinger, "Our seigneurs, the physicians, think that the poor man is on his back forever; but I, the seigneur jailer, do not believe it; I have my secret."

And turning on his heel he went out, after having tried to put on his rough voice and his stern face to notify the young girl that only twenty-two minutes remained of the time allotted for her visit. In exactly twenty-two minutes he returned and executed the order.

The illness of Charney was only too real. One evening, on re-entering his room after having paid his visit to Picciola and bestowed upon her his daily care, he was attacked by a slight faintness. His head heavy and his limbs trembling, he threw himself upon his bed, disdaining to call any one to his aid, and trusting to sleep to cure him.

But instead of sleep came pain ; and the next day, when the Count wished to rise, a stronger power than his will nailed him to his pallet. He closed his eyes, and resigned himself to his weakness.

In the face of danger the calm of the philosopher and the pride of the conspirator returned. He would have thought himself dishonored by a murmur or a complaint, or an appeal for aid to those who had caused his sequestration from the world. He simply gave some directions to Ludovic, with regard to the care of his plant in case he should be indefinitely kept a prisoner in his bed, — in this double incarceration which came to aggravate his original captivity. Physicians were called in, and he refused to answer their questions. It seemed to him that, his life being no longer his own, he was no more responsible for its preservation than for the administration of his confiscated property, and that it belonged to those who had appropriated all to watch over all.

At first the physicians insisted upon an answer ; but finding him persistently silent, they determined in future only to interrogate his disease.

The symptoms of the disease replied to each one with diverse meaning, for each of them held to a different system. In the dilation of the pupil and the purple hue of his lips, one saw certain symptoms of a putrid fever ; the other, of inflammation of the bowels ; and the last (for there were three of them) decided that it was a case of apoplexy or paralysis, from the color of the neck and temples, the coldness of the extremities, the rigidity of the features, and declared that the silence of the patient was only to be attributed to the commencement of congestion of the brain.

Twice the colonel in command of the citadel came to visit the prisoner in his chamber. The first time he asked him if he had any request to make ; he even offered to change his lodging if he thought that the situation was the cause of his illness. The Count only replied by a negative sign.

The second time he came accompanied by a priest. Charney, given over by the physicians, it was the duty of the commandant to prepare the prisoner to receive the last offices of religion.

If in the offices of the Church there is one function more august and sacred than another, it is that of the priest of prisons, — this priest the only spectator whose presence sanctifies the scaffold ; and yet the scepticism of our age has not feared to make him the object of its bitter railleries. "Steeled by habit," they say, "these men are no longer capable of emotion, they cannot weep with the guilty, and in their exhortations and their consolations, incessantly expressing the same thoughts, professional routine destroys inspiration."

What matter if the phrases are the same ? Does the same man listen to them twice ? A professional routine, do you say ? But this profession — they have chosen it — they endure it. They, with hearts pure and virtuous, choose to live among hardened spirits, who reply perhaps to their words of peace and hope and brotherly kindness by words of insult and contempt. They might, as well as you, have lived in the enjoyments and luxuries of this world ; they bring themselves in contact with rags, and breathe the humid and infected air of dungeons. Born, also, with sensitive hearts, and with that horror of blood and of death which belongs to human nature, they voluntarily condemn themselves to see, a hundred times in their lives, rise and fall the bloody knife of the guillotine. Are these, then, voluptuaries, and dare we so freely censure them ?

In place of this man of sorrows, devoted beforehand and forever to functions so trying, — in the place of this man who has voluntarily made himself the companion of the executioner, bring a new priest for each new criminal.

Yes, without doubt his emotions will be more excited, he will weep more, but he will console less. His words, if indeed he is able to speak, will be broken with sobs. Will he be master of himself and of his thoughts ? Will not his too keen emotion render him incapable of fulfilling his duty, and will the sight of his weakness give the culprit strength courageously to give his life to society in expiation of his crime?

If the fortitude of the new consoler is such that on the first trial he shows neither emotion nor weakness, you may be sure that he is a thousand times more insensible by nature than the other by habit.

Do you, then, wish to abolish this office of priest of prisons? Ah, take not their last friend from those who are condemned to die! In mounting the scaffold let the repentant culprit have a cross before his eyes, that so he may not see the fatal axe; or, at least, let his last look show him, by the side of the minister of man's justice the minister of God's mercy!

Thank Heaven, the priest called to the bedside of Charney, one truly worthy of his name, had not such painful duties to perform. A man of enlarged mind, he comprehended, from the silence and immobility of the sick man, and still more from the desolating inscriptions that he read upon the walls, how little he had to hope from this proud spirit.

He passed the night in prayer at his bedside, only interrupting his pious office to aid Ludovic in the cares which he lavished upon the sufferer, awaiting with patience a favorable moment when he could lighten, with a ray of hope, these profound shadows of incredulity.

During this critical night the blood, determining to the brain, caused a violent delirium, so that for more than an hour it required the united efforts of the priest and the jailer to prevent the patient from throwing himself out of bed. And while he struggled in their arms, in the midst of a crowd of incoherent words, of sentences without connection, of wild apostrophes, the words, "Picciola! poor Picciola!" were uttered again and again by Charney.

"I must go! I must go! the moment has come!" murmured Ludovic, "yes, it has come," repeated he, with impatience; "but how can I leave the chaplain alone to struggle with this madman! And perhaps in an hour it will be too late! O Holy Virgin! I believe that he is becoming calmer, — yes, he closes his eyes, his arms drop. If, on my return, he is not dead, hurrah, hurrah, hurrah!"

In fact, the delirium of the patient had subsided; Ludovic charged the priest to watch over him, and quickly disappeared from the chamber.

In that chamber, dimly lighted by the feeble glimmer of a flickering lamp, no sound was heard but the irregular respiration of the dying man, the murmured prayers of the priest, and the whistling of the wind from the Alps between the prison-bars. Twice only the sound of a human voice mingled with these monotonous sounds. It was the Qui vive? of the sentinel when Ludovic passed and repassed the postern in entering his lodge and returning to the room of the sick man.

Scarcely a half-hour had passed when he re-entered, carrying in his hand a cup of steaming liquid.

"I came near killing my dog," said he, as he came in. "He commenced howling, which is an evil omen. But how is he? has he made any sign? But at any rate I have here that which will quiet him. I have just tasted it, — it is bitter enough, — pardon, father, but taste it yourself."

The priest gently put aside the offered cup.

"Well, after all, it is not for us; a pint of muscatel, with plenty of slices of lemon, would be better suited to sustain us during the chilly night; is it not so, signor chaplain? But this is for him, for him only. He must drink it, — he must drink every drop of it, — that is the prescription."

And as he spoke he poured the liquid from one cup to another, blowing it to cool it, and when he thought it at the proper temperature, he forced Charney to swallow it, while the priest supported his head. Then, covering him closely, "We shall soon see the effect," said he, "and, at any rate, I don't stir from here until the thing is settled. All my birds are caged, and will not fly away. What do you say, signor chaplain?" — "I ask pardon, father," said he, in answer to an almost imperceptible gesture of reprimand from his more discreet companion. And Ludovic stationed himself, silent and immovable, by the side of the bed, his eyes fixed upon the dying man, holding his breath in his anxious watching for the coming event.

Not perceiving any effect, he repeated the dose, and again watched in silence. Still perceiving no change in the condition of the patient, he began to be alarmed lest by his imprudence he had hastened his death. He paced the room, stamping his foot, snapping his fingers, and menacing with clenched fist the cup which had contained the liquid.

Suddenly he stopped to gaze upon the pale and rigid face of Charney. "I have killed him," said he, with a frightful oath, a mixture of French, Italian, and Provençal.

At the sound of such language the priest raised his head, but Ludovic, paying no attention to his silent reproof, continued to walk, to stamp his feet, to swear, to snap his fingers again and again; then at last, worn out with action and emotion, he sank on his knees beside the priest, murmuring his mea culpa, and fell asleep in the midst of a prayer.

At dawn of day he still slept, — the chaplain still prayed. A burning hand placed on the head of Ludovic caused him to start from sleep.

"Something to drink," said the sick man.

At the sound of this voice, which he had feared never to hear again, Ludovic opened wide his eyes, and gazed with stupefaction upon Charney, whose face was moist, and his body in a bath of perspiration. Whether nature, aided by the vigorous temperament of the prisoner, had brought about a salutary crisis, or the double dose administered by Ludovic was gifted with a sudorific power, this profuse perspiration seemed to have at once restored the sick man to life and reason. He gave orders himself as to the means to be used for his restoration. Then, turning to the priest, who still knelt humbly at the bedside, —

"I am not dead yet, sir, you see," said he. "If I recover, as I hope that I shall, I beg you to say for me to my trio of doctors, that it is not to them that I render thanks, and that they may spare me their visits and their science, senseless and lying, like all others. I understood enough of their discourse to know that to a happy chance alone am I indebted for my recovery."

"Chance," murmured the chaplain, his eyes fixed upon the sentence inscribed upon the wall; "chance is blind, and the sole author of creation." Then, pronouncing solemnly the last word that Charney himself had added, —

"Perhaps!" said he, and went out.

CHAPTER VII.

In the intoxication of delight, Ludovic seemed plunged in a stupor of ecstasy upon hearing the Count speak; not that he paid the least attention to the meaning of his words, — that was of no consequence, — but his dying man spoke, put together ideas, lived! This was the cause of his emotion, and of his overflowing satisfaction and pride. After several moments of silent wonder he exclaimed, "Vivat! vivat! what a wonder! He is saved! thanks to whom?" And he waved in the air the empty earthen cup, kissing it, and addressing to it the most tender words in his vocabulary.

"Thanks to whom?" said the prisoner; "thanks to your good care, my honest Ludovic, perhaps. But if I am really cured the doctors will none the less attribute it to their prescriptions and the priest to his prayers."

"Neither they nor I shall have the glory of it," replied Ludovic, more and more excited. "As to the chaplain, — who knows? his prayers could only do good; but the other, the other!"

"Who, then, is this savior, this unknown protector!" said Charney, with a sort of indifference, for he thought that Ludovic attributed his cure to some saint.

"It is not a protector," said he, "but a protectress."

"Ah, you mean the Madonna?"

"No, it is not the Madonna, Signor Count. She who has saved you from death is first and before all, the Signora Picciola! the Signorina Picciolina! Piccioletta! my goddaughter. — yes, my goddaughter, for it is I who first gave her her name, — her name of Picciola! Have you not said so? Is she not then my godchild? and am I not her godfather? and proud I am of it, per Bacco!"

"Picciola!" cried the Count, starting up and resting his elbow on his pillow, a look of most lively interest reanimating his countenance. "Explain, my good Ludovic, explain yourself."

"You may affect astonishment," replied he, with a wink of his eye, "as if it was the first time she had rendered you this service. When you are attacked by this disease to which you are subject, is it not always with this plant that you are cured? You told me so, and, thank God, I remembered it; for it seems that Picciola had more knowledge of the case in one of her leaves than all the square-capped doctors of Montpellier and of Paris combined. Yes, my little goddaughter in this affair would have defied a whole regiment of doctors, — four battalions, four hundred men in each! In proof of it, your three ignoramuses gave way, in beating a retreat, throwing the blanket over your face as if you were a dead man; while Picciola, — ah, the brave little plant! may God preserve her seed! (as for me, I shall take care not to forget the receipt, and if ever my little Antonio falls ill, he shall drink a broth and eat a salad of it, though it is as bitter as chiccory,) — she had only to show herself, and behold! a complete victory! Since you are cured, yes, cured, for now you open your eyes wide, — you laugh. Ah! vivat l'illustrissima Signora Picciola!"

Charney took pleasure in the noisy and loquacious joy of his worthy guardian. His return to life, and the idea of owing it to that same plant which had already charmed the long hours of his captivity, gave birth in him to a lively sentiment of happiness, and brought a smile to his still feverish lips, when suddenly a cruelly painful idea crossed his mind.

"But how, my good Ludovic," said he, "has this plant contributed to my cure? How did you use it?" and a kind of terror agitated him as he asked the question.

"Nothing more simple," quietly replied the jailer; "a pint of water over a good fire — three bubbles — the decoction is made; that is all."

"Good God!" cried Charney, sinking back upon his pillow and pressing his hand to his brow, "you have destroyed it! I cannot reproach you, my good Ludovic, but O my poor Picciola! what shall I do? what will become of me without her?"

"Come, come, calm yourself," said Ludovic, coming near him, and assuming a voice almost paternal, to console the captive, overpowered with grief, like a child from whom one is about to take a favorite plaything. "Be calm, and do not uncover yourself as you are doing. Listen to me," added he, all the time occupied in adjusting the coverings and remedying the general disorder of the bed, caused by the abrupt movements of the sick man. "Should I have hesitated to sacrifice an herb to save a man? What do you think? However, I could not decide to kill her at one blow, and plunge the whole of her into the kettle. Besides, that would have been useless. I only begged a loan from her. With my wife's scissors I clipped a quantity of leaves of which she had no need; some little branches without buds, — for now she has three buds! ha! that is handsome of her! The operation was well done, and she did not die of it. On the contrary, she seems in better health, and you also. Now you must be good, be quiet, keep in perspiration, get wholly well, and you shall see her again"

Charney bent upon him a look of gratitude, and offered him his hand. This time Ludovic did not draw back, but pressed the hand of the Count with emotion, tears starting in his eyes; but all at once, reproaching himself without doubt for this infraction of the invariable rule of conduct which he had marked out for himself, the muscles of his face lengthened, his voice took a harsher tone; then, holding all the time in his hands the hand of the prisoner, but trying to deceive him as to the motive of his first movement, he said, "You see how you are uncovering yourself again"; and as if with only a professional interest, he covered the arm of the Count with the blankets; then, after new instructions given in an official tone, he left the chamber, humming a familiar air.

CHAPTER VIII.

That day and the following an extreme state of exhaustion, the natural result of the great crisis and violent perspiration, rendered Charney incapable of moving or thinking; but after the third day a sensible amelioration was perceptible, and if, vanquished still by weakness and illness, he was obliged to keep his bed, at least he could look forward to a time not far distant when he would be able to rise, walk, take again his ordinary promenade, and see once more his companion and his benefactress.

For to her all his thoughts were directed. He could not explain to himself by what singular circumstances this feeble vegetation, thrown under his feet in the court of the prison, had cured him of his ennui, — he whom the splendor of the world and of fortune had failed to divert, — and snatched him from death, to which human science had condemned him.

In his inability to apply the full force of his reasoning powers to solve this mysterious point, it was with a sentiment of superstition that he attached himself more and more to his Picciola. He could not ground his gratitude to this inert and insensible being upon any basis of reflection or intention; yet he could not but give her his affection in exchange for the boon she had bestowed upon him. Imagination works where reason cannot; his became excited, and his love for Picciola grew into a sort of worship.

He persuaded himself that a supernatural tie linked them one to the other, — that there exist in matter secret attractions and incomprehensible sympathies which ally the man to the plant. He who refuses to acknowledge God is in danger of falling, perhaps, into the belief of the puerilities of fetichism and astrology. Picciola is his star, his madonna, his talisman!

Why is it that one sees men illustrious by their learning or their genius deny Providence, and yet at the same time show themselves to be the slaves of superstition? It is that, blinded by human pride, they would ascribe to themselves all their glory and their strength; but the instinctive religious sentiment stifled in their heart, diverted from its natural channel, nevertheless finds the light, but suffering the imprint of their mistaken ideas. The homage which they arrest in its flight to heaven falls back to earth to find its object. They pretend to judge and not believe; and their genius, narrow in its greatness, contracting their horizon, permits them to see only a few of the combinations of the grand whole. They neglect the whole for the detail, because they believe themselves able in isolating the detail to measure it and submit it to the analysis of their feeble reason, not perceiving the point of junction where it is bound to the rest of the created world; for creation, the earth, the heavens, the stars, the whole universe, are they not one being, immense, complete, varied to infinity, which lives and palpitates under the puissant hand of God?

Thus Charney, his imagination perhaps still excited by the fever, sees in nature only Picciola, and to find analogies he arouses his memory and asks of it the history of miraculous plants, from the moly of Homer, the palm of Latona, the ash of Odin, to the golden herb which shines before the eyes of the peasant of Brittany, or the flower of the thorn which preserves the shepherdess of La Brie from evil thoughts. He recalls the fig-tree of the Romans, the Teutatés of the Celts, worshipped under the figure of an oak, the vervain of the Gauls, the lotos of the Greeks, the beans of the Pythagorians, the mallow of the Persian fire-worshippers, the mandragora of the Hebrew priests, the marvellous effects of the seal of Solomon, and the hazel wand. He remembers the azure campac of the Persians, which grew for them only in Paradise; the sipakora, the fruit of which gives to the eater two hundred years of life; the touba-tree, overshadowing with its gigantic branches the celestial abode of Mahomet; the kaki, that other divine plant, each flower of which is gifted with a soul. He recalls the magic camalata, the verdant amrita, on which the Indians see hung fruits of ambrosia; the red tree of Kounboum, on each leaf of which appears in relief one of the numerous characters of the alphabet of Thibet, — vegetable poem which changes and extends itself from season to season, — eternal song in honor of Buddha, the Indian Christ.* He attaches a symbolic sense to that usage of the Japanese, who give to their divinities for a pedestal a heliotrope or water-lily, and assign the birth-place of love to the bosom of a corolla. He approves that propensity of the Chinese to imitate in their clothing, their head-dresses, their habitations, the form of their liserons and their campanulas. He admires the religious scruples of the Siamese, who go so far as to forbid the destruction of certain plants, and even protect them against mutilation. He hears Charlemagne, legislator and philosopher, from the height of his western throne, recommend to his people the culture of flowers; he even comes to comprehend the tenderness which, according to Elien and Herodotus, Xerxes felt for a plane-tree, caressing it, pressing it in his arms, sleeping with delight under its shadow, decorating it with bracelets and collars of gold, and lamenting bitterly when it was necessary to leave it.

* According to the learned missionaries, Huc and Gabet, who, in the years 1844, 1845, and 1846, visited Tartary, Thibet, and China, the tree of Kounboum, or of the ten thousand images, is not a symbol but a reality. It exists still in the same state, and they affirm — they, Catholic priests, consequently interested to do justice to all pious Buddhist deceit — that, "after having examined it with the most careful attention, it was impossible for them to discover the least fraud."

That which heretofore excited his raillery and contempt, and abased weak humanity before him, now exalts it in his eyes; for he knows what grave teachings can come from a stem or a branch; and in the customs of idolatry he sees now only the gratitude which gave them birth. Has not a feeble reed provided man with his first arrow, his first pen, his first instrument of music, — his three great means of conquest?

In this state of mind, already convalescent, Charney was sitting one morning in his chamber, which he had not yet left since his illness, absorbed in thought, when suddenly the door opened, and Ludovic, with a radiant face, entered.

"It is in flower!" said he.

"What! Picciola?"

"Yes, Picciola, Piccioletta, my godchild."

"In flower!" exclaimed Charney, his eye sparkling, and his face suffused; "in flower!" and springing towards the staircase, "I must see her," said he.

In vain the honest jailer assured him that it would be imprudent for him to go out so soon, that he must be patient for a day or two, that it was not late enough in the day, that the air was cool, that a relapse was sure to be fatal; all was useless. All that he could gain was Charney's consent to wait until the sun was high enough to be present at the fête.

That hour, how slowly it creeps! and yet he occupies it as well as he can. For the first time since his imprisonment he thinks of his toilet; yes, of his toilet, of his adornment in honor of Picciola, — of Picciola in blossom! His garments were tumbled, his hair in disorder, his beard long; he put all that to rights. A mirror, until that moment forgotten, is drawn from his dressing-case; he shaves himself carefully, — and all to see her in blossom.

This is the convalescent's first breathing of the air, the visit of the invalid to his physician, of the debtor to his benefactress, the lover to his mistress.

When his toilet was completed, as he stood with his eyes fixed upon the glass, he was astonished to find, notwithstanding his illness, his eye less dull, his expression less dejected, his brow less furrowed, than heretofore. He is reminded that he is still young, and recognizes the truth that if there are bitter and poisonous thoughts which mar even the envelope that contains them, there are others gifted with a power to reanimate it.

At the appointed moment Ludovic presented himself, and supported the Count to aid him in descending the steep steps of the winding stone staircase. When the invalid entered the little court, the influence of the pure air and the light of heaven, or the sensitive condition of the nervous system belonging to convalescents, produced on him the impression that the whole air was pervaded with the perfume of his flower, and to her he attributed all his sweet and fresh sensations of returning life.

Of what use is the sweet perfume of flowers? Do they themselves enjoy it? No. Is it for the pleasure of the animals? Who has ever seen a sheep or a dog stop before a rose to breathe its sweetness? It is for man alone, then, that they pour forth their fragrant treasures. Why? To make him love them, perhaps.

Charney was not so far wrong, after all, in believing in a mysterious force which draws man to the plant.

Now Picciola presented herself to him in all the prestige of her beauty. She displayed to him her brilliant and delicately shaded corolla; white, purple, and rose were blended in her large petals, bordered with a silvery fringe, through which the rays of the sun glancing gave the effect of a luminous halo around the flower. Charney gazed upon it with delight; he feared lest his breath should tarnish it, or the touch of his hand blight it. He thought no longer of analyzing it or studying it; he admired and enjoyed its beauty and its odor. But soon another thought came to his mind, and the flower no longer fixes his eye. He sees the traces of mutilation along the stem, — branches broken, leaves mangled by the touch of the scissors. The wounds are not yet healed. Then he feels that to her he owes his life. A sentiment more vivid and sweeter than admiration fills his heart, and the benefactions of Picciola make him forget her beauty and her perfume.

CHAPTER IX.

During the following days the convalescent had the right, by the direction of the physicians, to take his promenade in the court at the hour that best suited him, and also to prolong it according to his desire. This gave him the opportunity to resume with ardor his interrupted studies.

Desiring to record in writing his observations upon the plant, from the first day to the present moment, he attempted to entice Ludovic to procure for him pen, ink, and paper. He was prepared to see him at first frown, put on his air of importance, require much pressing, and in the end yield, either from the interest which he felt in his invalid and his goddaughter, or from the desire of gain; for this time it was a question of something to be furnished to a prisoner.

But it was not so. Ludovic at once received his proposition very good-naturedly.

"Certainly, Signor Count, nothing is easier," said he, turning aside to give a few whiffs to his pipe, to prevent it from becoming extinguished; for he always ceased to smoke when with Charney, to whom the odor of tobacco was disagreeable. "I am far from making any objection. But all those little things are under the key of the governor, and not under mine. If you wish for them, you have only to address him a petition to that effect, and you may get them."

Charney smiled, and was not discouraged.

"But to write that petition, the very things that I ask for are necessary, — ink, pen, and paper."

"That is true, Signor Count, that is true," replied the jailer. "This is the way this matter of a petition is generally managed," added he, with a knowing air, his head thrown back, his arms crossed behind his back, — "I go to the governor and tell him that you have a request to make, without explaining what, — that is not my business, but yours and his. If he cannot come himself to talk with you, he will send one of his men. That man will hand you a pen and a paper, stamped and signed, one sheet only; you write on it, he standing by; he places his seal upon it before you; you return him the pen, he carries away the letter, and all is done."

"But, Ludovic, it is not to the governor that I wish to be under obligation, but to you."

"To me! then you do not know my orders," said the jailer, resuming his harsh and severe manner.

He drew a long inspiration from his pipe, exhaled the smoke slowly, as if to keep the Count at a distance, turned to the "right about," and went out. The next day, when Charney returned to the subject, he would do nothing but wink his eye and wag his head.

Too proud to humble himself to ask a favor of the governor, but too desirous of accomplishing his object to abandon it at once, from a toothpick the prisoner made a pen; his razor, as well as it could, transformed itself into a penknife; soot, dissolved in water, and a golden cup from his dressing-case served him as ink and inkstand; and fine white cambric handkerchiefs, remnants of his past luxury, took the place of paper.

It was thus that Charney, when separated from Picciola, could still occupy himself in writing the result of his observations.

How interesting and astonishing they were! What a pleasure it would have been to him to impart them to an attentive ear!

His neighbor, the catcher of flies, seemed to him worthy to receive his confidences; this face, which had seemed to him at first so sullen and frowning, he had seen since expand with good-nature and brighten with intelligence. When, from his little window, the old man watched him and his Picciola, with a half-curious, half-dreamy gaze, Charney felt himself attracted towards him. A wave of the hand, a smile, had even been exchanged between them, but the régime of the prison interdicted them from addressing a word to each other, even to inquire after their health. The explorer of the marvels of nature was therefore obliged to keep to himself all his precious discoveries.

Among the multitude of these must be mentioned the singular ability that he discovered in his flower to turn towards the sun, and face it through all its daily course, so as to appropriate more fully its life-giving rays; and when the sun hid itself behind clouds, and the rain threatened, her petals instantly closed to shelter her, like a vessel furling its sails before the storm.

"Is heat then so necessary to her?" thought Charney, "and why? And why does she fear a slight shower which would refresh her? O, I have confidence in her now; she will explain all to me."

Picciola had already been to him a beneficent physician; she could in need act as compass and barometer; she was going to serve him as timepiece. For by dint of constantly inhaling her fragrance, he thought he could perceive that it varied at different periods of the day. At first this phenomenon seemed to him an illusion of the senses; but his reiterated experiments assured him of its reality, and he soon became able to designate with certainty the hour of the day by the odor of the plant.*

The flowers had multiplied, and towards evening Picciola breathed forth her sweetest perfumes. What a delight it was then to the happy captive to draw near to her. By means of several planks, which he owed to the munificence of Ludovic, he had constructed a little bench, supported on four solid sticks, pointed at their extremity, and driven into the interstices of the pavement. A rough plank made a back against which he could lean when he wished to think and forget himself in living in the atmosphere of his plant. There he felt more at ease than he had ever done in former times on his silken couches; there he would pass hours in meditation, recalling the days of his youth, which had fled without happiness and without affection, lost in vain chimeras, in a premature disenchantment.

It happened often, during these thoughts of the past, that he fell into profound reveries, half waking, half sleeping, — a condition of apathetic torpor of the body, during which his over-excited imagination peopled the court of his prison with delightful images.

Then he fancied himself again at those fêtes, where at one time ennui had pursued him, where he lavished upon others the pleasures which he alone had no power to enjoy.

He saw, in imagination, on a winter night, the illuminated façade of his old hôtel in the Rue de Verneuil. The noise of a thousand carriages sounded in his ear; by the light of torches they entered his circular court, each depositing in its turn at the steps of the peristyle, covered with carpets and decorated with hangings, the fashionable belles of the day, wrapped in thick furs, under which rustled robes of silk; the beaux of the court, with pointed hats, high cravats, and bunches of ribbons at the knee; distinguished artists, with bare throats and short hair, and costume half Greek, half French; generals with plumes and tricolored sashes; men of science and men of letters, with or without the distinctive collar of green. A crowd of lackeys were on all sides, defying, under their new liveries, the old-fashioned decrees of the Convention.

In his salons he saw again, in inextricable confusion, all that was illustrious, or odd and eccentric, at that epoch. The Roman toga and the Greek chlamys brushed against the dress-coat and the military uniform; pumps with rosettes, boots, gold-laced or with spurs, trod the same floor as the buskin of the soldier and that of the actor. Men of the law, the pen, the sword, moneyed men, ministers, contractors, artists, and governors, whirled in this eddy, side by side with the members of the Directory. An actor is seen by the side of a bishop; a ci-devant noble near a ci-devant pauper; the aristocracy and the democracy joining hands; wealth and science walking arm-in-arm. Such was society forming anew, rallying all its elements around a common centre, each one feeling itself too weak to form a circle of its own. Thus it is with school-children, drawn together by similarity of age and the need of pleasure; as they grow older they separate themselves little by little from their playfellows, constrained, without knowing it, by the powerful system of social order.

Charney smiled as he contemplated this phantasmagoria of manners, rank, and costumes. That which had been before for him a fruitful and bitter source of contemptuous thoughts of humanity, now only aroused in him mockery of his own follies and wasted efforts.

* The English botanist, Sir James Smith, notices this same peculiarity in the Anthirrhinum repens. — Flora Britannica, Vol. II. p. 858.

Suddenly brilliant orchestras broke into loud, animating, and varied measures, and the ball opened. The remembered airs produced a more lively impression upon his senses than when he really heard them. The light scintillating from innumerable lustres, their prismatic reflection in the mirrors, the soft and perfumed air of the ball-room or the banquet-hall, the odor of the viands, the noisy gayety of the guests, the whirl of the waltzers who rustled against him in passing, the light and frivolous words that crossed and mingled in confusion around him, the echo of mirthful laughter, — all produced a sensation of joyousness which was new to him.

Then graceful and elegant women, with ivory shoulders and swan-like necks, arrayed in sumptuous robes, gauzes embroidered with gold, sparkling with gems, passed before him, smiling as they greeted him. He recognized them, for they were the constant guests and the ornaments of his splendid soirées, when, rich and free, he was cited as one of the fortunate ones of the earth.

There shone without rivals the proud Tallien, arrayed in the classic robes of Greece, and wearing jewels and rings of untold value even upon the toes of her beautiful naked feet, scarcely imprisoned in light golden sandals ; the charming Récamier, whom Athens would have made a divinity ; and last, the gentle and lovely Josephine, formerly Countess de Beauharnais, who by the charm of her gracefulness often passed for the most beautiful of the three.

Even beside these, many others shone with dazzling freshness, grace, and coquetry.

How fascinating they were to-day to Charney, in their youth and beauty ! How much more attractive and lovely than heretofore ! How happy he felt himself to be able to make a choice among such charming women !

He endeavored to do so ; and after glancing hesitatingly at one and another, all at once in the midst of them he distinguished one, not with uncovered shoulders or ornaments of diamonds.

Simple in attire and in her bearing, she stood with drooping head, and seemed to shrink from notice. She was a young girl, in a simple dress of white, with nothing to heighten her beauty but her native grace and the blushes that suffused her cheeks. Charney did not know her, and yet, as he contemplated her, the others seemed to fade and disappear ; a gentle emotion took possession of him which he could not account for.

But how much was his emotion heightened when he saw in her dark hair one flower. her sole ornament ! That flower, — it is the blossom of his plant ! the flower of his prison !

He extended his arms towards the young girl ; suddenly everything became dim before his eyes ; once more the music of the orchestra struck upon his ear with redoubled force ; then the young girl and the flower seemed to melt one into the other ; the open and fragrant petals encircled the lovely face, and soon hid it entirely.

Already the walls of the ball-room, despoiled of their hangings, became obscure, and in their place was naught but a cloud of vapor. The lustres, gradually extinguished, detached from the ceiling, described a curve of light, fading away at the lower extremity of the cloud. Heavy pavements replaced the smooth and polished floor. Cool reason returned in the place of delirium ; memory kills the illusion, reality destroys the dream.

The prisoner opens his eyes ; he is sitting on his bench, his feet on the pavement of the court ; his flower is before him, and the sun is sinking below the horizon.

The first few times that he was attacked by this sort of vertigo, Charney was filled with wonder. It was always when he was seated on his bench, near his plant, that he fell into these soothing reveries. After a little reflection, he explained to himself the phenomenon. Science had taught him that the odor exhaled by some flowers causes sometimes a slight and voluptuous asphyxia. Now he understands how close are the relations between him and his plant, and the almost magic influence exercised by her upon him.

The brilliant fêtes at which he had in imagination been present, Picciola had given him.

But that young girl, so modest and pure, whose unexpected presence had stirred in him a new and delightful emotion, who is she ? Has he ever seen her before ? And, like the other beautiful women, is she not a reminiscence of his past? His memory can recall nothing like her. Is it then, on the contrary, a revelation of the future? But has he a future, and ought he to believe in revelations? No! the young girl of the white robe and modest blushes, the young girl at once so simple and so attractive, who eclipsed and outshone her brilliant rivals, is Picciola! — Picciola personified in a dream.

Well, she shall be his love! He has no difficulty in recalling the graceful form and ingenuous features that the vision had borne. From henceforth it is with this sweet image that he will lull his reveries, that he will fill the void in his heart and his brain; at least, before that lovely maiden, smiling phantom evoked to break his solitude, the doors of his prison will be forced to open; she can visit him, come and sit beside him, walk with him, follow him, smile upon him, love him! She will live in his life, in his breath, in his love; he will speak to her in his thought, and, closing his eyes, see her; they will be one, he will be two!

Thus to the cherished studies of the captive of Fenestrella succeeded the not less absorbing charm of illusion, and he plunged deeper and deeper into that sphere of poetry from which one can only emerge, like the bee from the bosom of flowers, laden with perfume and with a harvest of honey. Side by side with his real life, he lived his life of imagination, the complement of the other, and without which man enjoys but half the gifts of the Creator.

Now his time is divided between Picciola the plant and Picciola the maiden. After reason and labor, he has pleasure and love.

CHAPTER X.

Pursuing his investigating experiments on the process of inflorescence, Charney was each day more and more enraptured by the orderly prodigies of Nature. But his eyes were unable to penetrate into many mysteries so minute as to be indiscernible to the naked eye. He was fretting under this inability, when Ludovic presented him from his neighbor, the Italian conspirator, a powerful magnifying-glass, by the aid of which he had been enabled to count eight thousand ocular facets on the cornea of a fly. Charney was overwhelmed with joy.

Thanks to this instrument, parts of the plant before imperceptible sprang forth to his sight, a hundred times their ordinary size. Then he made, or hoped to make, great strides in the path of discovery.

He analyzed in detail the external envelope of his flower; he learned that the brilliant color of the petals, their crimson spots, the stripes of velvet or of watered satin which adorn their base, or fringe their outline, are not there only to delight the eye by their beauty, but also to divide or reflect the rays of the sun, to diminish or augment their force, according to the necessities of the flower during the grand process of fructification.

These shining and varnished surfaces are doubtless glandulous collections of absorbent vessels, charged with the duty of breathing the air, the light, and humid vapors, for the nourishment of the seeds; for without light, no color; without air and heat, no life. Moisture, heat, light, — behold, then, of what vegetation, the marvel of the earth, is composed, and behold also what it restores to the earth at its death.

Without his knowledge, often during these hours of study and revery, Charney had two attentive spectators, who watched all his movements, and by sympathy shared all his emotions,— Girhardi and his daughter. The latter, educated by a deeply religious father, living a contemplative and secluded life, presented one of those natures in which all lofty and holy principles are united. With her beauty, her virtues, the graces of her mind and person, she could not fail to have had admirers; gifted with a sensibility deep and expansive, she seemed formed to be peculiarly susceptible to the sentiment of love; but if some passing fancies had, when she was in the gay society of Turin, for an instant ruffled the serenity of her spirit, they had all been absorbed in one great grief, — the captivity of her father.

Was it possible for her to love with the freedom of a happy heart, she who in her double worship, religious and filial, saw her Saviour on the cross and her father in prison? Not that the fair daughter of Turin abandoned herself easily to sadness and melancholy. All her duties were a pleasure, all her sacrifices a delight. But is it among the happy ones of the world that she finds her pleasure? Where she can dry a tear and awaken a smile, there is her place, there her pride, there her triumph! One alone at Fenestrella has been the recipient of her soothing care.

But since she has seen Charney, she has felt for him both interest and compassion. He is a captive like her father, and is near her father. He has nothing in the world to love but a plant; and how much he loves it!

Perhaps the noble countenance and fine person of the Count enhanced the pity of the young girl; but if she had known him in the time of his prosperity, when he was surrounded by the false shows of happiness, she would not have distinguished him from others. That which charmed her in him was his isolation, his misfortune, his resignation. She has instinctively bestowed upon him her friendship and even her esteem. For in her ignorance she has placed misfortune among the virtues.

This admirable girl, as bold when a good deed was to be done as she was timid before a bold glance, ignorant of the danger, constantly encouraged and stimulated her father in his advances towards Charney.

At last, one day Girhardi, showing himself at the window, not content with the usual salutation of the hand to the Count, motioned him to approach as near as possible, and moderating the tone of his voice, as if in apprehension of being overheard, he entered into the following dialogue with him.

"I have perhaps good news to tell you, sir."

"And I, sir, have thanks to render for the microscope you have been so kind as to lend me."

"I cannot even claim the merit of the idea; it was my daughter's thought."

"You have a daughter, and they accord you the favor of seeing her?"

"Yes, I am a father, and I bless God every day. My poor child took a great interest in you, my dear sir, when you were ill, and since, in watching you lavish so much care upon your plant. Have you never noticed her at the grating?"

"In fact — I believe —"

"But in speaking to you of my daughter I forget to tell you the great news. The Emperor is about to return to Milan, where he is to be crowned King of Italy."

"King of Italy! Ah! then, sir, he will be still more your master and mine. As to the microscope," pursued Charney, who had not been much diverted from his first thought by the great news, not suspecting a sequel to it, "you have deprived yourself of it for a long time; pardon me, you will permit me to retain it a little longer to complete some experiments; however, I will return it to you, if —"

"I do not need it; I have others," said the Italian, with a benevolent smile, divining from the tone of Charney's voice how much it would cost him to part with the instrument; — "keep it, sir, keep it as a souvenir of a companion in captivity, who feels for you, I beg you to believe, a lively interest."

Charney would have expressed his gratitude to the generous man, but he interrupted him.

"But let me finish that which I have to tell you"; and, lowering his voice, "it is said that pardons will be given in honor of the Emperor's new crown. Have you friends at Milan or Turin? Is there any way of inciting them to action?"

The Count sadly gave a negative sign, and said, "I have no friends."

"No friends," repeated the old man, with a glance full of commiseration; "do you then distrust your fellow-men? Friendship is not wanting to those who have faith in it. But I have friends, friends whom even adversity has not shaken; they might perhaps do for you what they cannot yet do for me."

"I will ask nothing from General Bonaparte," replied the Count, in a hard, proud tone, in which surged up all his old bitterness.

"Hush! speak lower! I think I hear footsteps, — but no —"

There was a moment's pause; then the Italian continued, with an inflection of voice by which the rebuke was softened as if in passing the lips of a father, —

"Dear companion, you are still exasperated. I had believed that the studies to which you have devoted yourself for several months had appeased in you that hatred which God reprobates, and which perverts a man's whole being. Have not the kindly virtues of your flower healed the wounds of an unkind world? This Bonaparte that you seem to hate I have perhaps more reason to complain of than you, for my son died for having served him."

"And you attempted to avenge your son!" interrupted Charney, with warmth.

"I see that these false rumors have reached even you," said the old man, raising his noble head to heaven, as if to call God to witness. "I revenge myself by a crime! No; but in the first moments of my grief, it is true, I could not control myself; and while the people of Turin saluted the conqueror with acclamations of joy, I mingled with their 'vivats' my cries of despair. I was arrested; I had a knife about me. Base wretches, in order to curry favor with their master, found no difficulty in persuading him that I had some design against his life. They called me an assassin, and I was only an agonized father who had just learned the death of his son. Well! I can understand that Bonaparte was deceived, and that he is not a bad man; he has not put you or me to death. If he restores my liberty, that will be to repair only one error in my case; however, I should bless him, — not that I cannot endure my captivity. Full of faith in Providence, I am resigned to all. But my prison weighs upon my daughter; it is for her that I wish to be free, to put an end to her exile from the world, that she may participate in the pleasures that belong to youth. Is there no being who interests you, no loving woman who weeps for you, and for whom you would be happy to sacrifice the pride with which your oppression inspires you? Come, authorize my friends to speak in your behalf."

Charney smiled. "No woman weeps for me," said he. "Why should I wish for the world where I was less happy than I am here? But were I to find there friends, fortune, and happiness, I yet would say no! a thousand times no! if to gain it I must humble myself before the power which I have plotted to overthrow."

"Then you cut yourself off from all hope."

"Never will I salute with the title of Emperor him who was my equal."

"Take care that you do not foolishly sacrifice your future to a sentiment prompted perhaps more by vanity than patriotism; — but hark," again said Girhardi, "for this time I am not mistaken; some one is coming; — adieu."

And he drew back from the grated window.

"Thanks, thanks for the microscope," cried Charney, before he had entirely disappeared from sight.

At that moment the door of the little court creaked on its hinges, and Ludovic entered, bearing the daily allowance of the prisoner. Seeing him pensive and distrait, and not wishing to disturb him, he contented himself with rattling the dishes which he carried, to let him know that his dinner was ready. After arranging all in the chamber of the prisoner, he retired, saluting as he passed Monsieur and Madame, — the man and the plant, as he said sometimes.

"The microscope is mine," thought Charney, "but how have I merited the kindness of this stranger?" and seeing Ludovic crossing the court, — "even this man has gained my esteem; under the rough exterior beats a noble heart, I am sure. There are, then, men good and tender-hearted, but where do they come to take refuge?"

He seemed to hear a voice reply, — "It is because misfortune has taught you to appreciate a kindness, that men seem to you less worthy of your contempt. What have these two men done? One has watered your plant for you without your knowledge, the other has furnished you with the means of analyzing it and knowing it better."

"O," said Charney to himself, "the heart is not mistaken; there is on their part true generosity."

"Yes," replied the voice, "but it is because that generosity is exercised towards you, that you render them justice. If Picciola had not been born, of these two men one would have been now in your eyes an imbecile old man, devoted to degrading occupations; the other a coarse being, actuated by mean and sordid avarice. In your world of other days, did you love any one or anything, Sir Count? No; your heart, as your thought, was given up to isolation. Here, it is because you love Picciola that these two men have loved you; it is through her that they have come to you."

And Charney regarded by turns his plant and his precious microscope. Napoleon, Emperor of the French, King of Italy! That terrible formula, one half of which had formerly sufficed to make him a furious conspirator, scarcely now made any impression upon his mind.

What to him are the triumphs of the new ruler of the nation and of the liberties of Europe? An insect buzzing menacingly about his flowers caused him more distress and care than all the invasions of the new empire!

CHAPTER XI.

He resumed his labors; armed with his glass, now his own, he reiterated his observations and extended the field of his discoveries, until enthusiasm fairly took possession of him. It must be said, however, that, inexperienced as he was in analysis, ignorant of first principles, and without sufficiently powerful instruments, sometimes insensibly the spirit of system and of paradox mingled with his spirit of inquiry.

Thus he invented a thousand theories upon the circulation of the sap, upon the manner in which it rises, diffuses itself, is transformed, without suspecting its double current; likewise, upon the variety in the coloring of the plant, the different aroma of the stem, the leaves, and the flowers, upon the gum and the resins distilled by plants, also upon the wax and honey drawn from them by the bees. At first he found answers to all his questionings; but the theories of to-day overthrew those of yesterday, and he was delighted with his impotence, since it forced him to exercise all the faculties of his mind and imagination, and prevented him from looking forward to the end of this attractive occupation.

One day he triumphed in recording the most important of his observations.

He had heard heretofore, but only with a mocking spirit, of the loves of flowers, that ingenious and sublime discovery of Linnæus. Aided by his microscope, he gave himself up entirely to this new series of studies; he watched patiently, and penetrated at last these mysteries.

He perceived a movement of life and love in all parts of the flower, which seemed for an instant to feel the animation of thinking, loving human beings! Astonished, confounded, Charney thought himself still dreaming. By analogy, rising from the plant to the animal, he embraced the entire scale of creation in its harmony, in its immensity! He felt as if the whole secret of the universe was in his possession! His eyes grew dim; the instrument fell from his hand; the astonished philosopher fell back upon his rustic seat, crossed his arms, then, after long meditation, addressing himself to his plant, "Picciola," said he, "I had in other days the whole world in which to roam. I had numerous friends, — I was surrounded by learned men of all sorts, — and never one of these savans has taught me as much as thou; not one of my friends, or rather of the men who usurped that title, has rendered me the good offices that I have received from thee. In this circumscribed spot, where thou livest between two stones, pacing back and forth near thee, without losing sight of thee, I have thought more, felt more, observed more, than in all my extended travels through Europe. How blind was I! When thou, so pale, so feeble, so languishing, didst present thyself to me, I expected nothing from thy coming, — and it was a companion who came to me, — a book which was opening to me, — a world which revealed itself to my eyes! This companion has soothed my weariness, and made it disappear; she has lent a new charm to that existence which she was destined to preserve; she has taught me to know men, and reconciled me to them. This book teaches me to despise none; it convicts me of my ignorance, and abuses my pride; it forces me to believe that knowledge, like virtue, is only to be acquired by humility; that it is necessary to descend in order to rise; that the first step of that immense ladder, whose top we think to reach, is buried in the ground, and it is there that we must commence. It is the book of light! Written in living characters, in a language yet mysterious for me, it offers me sublime enigmas to solve, of which each word is a consolation. This world is that of truth, one and absolute; it is intelligent creation; it is the summary and criterion of the eternal and celestial world, the revelation of that infinite law of love which governs the universe, which by gravitation holds atoms and suns, which links in one band the plant and the stars, the insect which crawls on the ground, and the man who raises his brow to heaven to find — his Creator, whoever he may be."

Charney, violently agitated, paced rapidly the court; thought succeeded to thought in his brain; conviction struggled in his conscience; then he returned to Picciola, gazed upon her with emotion, raised his eyes for a moment to heaven, and murmured these words, —

"Powerful God! source invisible whence flows all harmony, all life, too much false science has obscured my reason, too many sophisms have hardened my heart, so that thou canst not easily penetrate it. I cannot yet hear thee, but I call thee; I cannot see thee, but I seek thee."

Entering his chamber, he read on the wall, —

"God is naught but a word!"

He added, — "That word, may it not solve the grand enigma of the universe?"

There was here still an expression of doubt; but was not to doubt, for that haughty spirit, to denounce his former negation and to turn back in the false path which he had been pursuing? Now, it is no longer to himself alone that he looks for theories to support his already tottering philosophy; he has no longer faith only in his own strength and reason, and yielding himself to those new emotions in which he finds so sweet a charm; it is to Picciola that he turns for a belief — a God — a support. And anew he interrogates her with fervor, that the remainder of obscurity which environs him may be dissipated.

CHAPTER XII.

Thus passed his days. After many hours wholly devoted to study and analysis, he sought agreeable relaxation and pastime in turning from Picciola the plant to Picciola the maiden.

When the perfume of his flowers was wafted to him in abundance, when his head was heavy and his eyes closed to shut out the dazzling sunlight, he would say to himself, "Picciola will give a fête to-day."

Then, yielding himself to his reveries, he immediately fell into that state, half sleeping, half waking, peopled with visions that a ray of reason was still able to direct.

Oh! is not this one of the most intoxicating enjoyments that man can know, — the power to direct his dreams, and live at will in that other life, where the events succeed each other with such rapidity, where ages cost but one hour of existence, where a magic reflection seems to color all the actors in the drama which is passing, where the emotions only are real? There, all stern reality disappears, leaving only the pure essence of things.

Do you wish for music? Harmonious concerts are wafted to your ear without the grating sound of the preparatory tuning of instruments, the distorted faces of the musicians, or the ungraceful forms of their instruments; this is the life of the soul without the body, — pleasure without regrets, the rainbow without the storm.

Charney abandoned himself to his illusions. Faithful to the sweet image of Picciola, it was her that he called; she it was that presented herself to him always in the same form, with the same grace, — young, modest, charming, — appearing to him sometimes in the midst of his former companions of science or pleasure, sometimes near the sole beings that he had loved, his mother and sister, long since dead. She renewed for him scenes full of tenderness, ineffable memories of youth and home, — her presence adding to them new sweetness

Sometimes she introduced him suddenly into a modest mansion which was pervaded with an air of comfort and good taste. The guests he met here were unknown to him, but they welcomed him with smiles, and he at once felt himself at home as at the paternal fireside.

After having recalled to life his extinct family, his joys of the past, she evoked yet another family which might exist for Charney, and bring to him joys in the future. He could not explain it to himself, but at his waking he was inspired with a new confidence in his destiny, and he regularly kept a record on his journal of fine cambric of the events of his dreams, — the only happy events of his life save his captivity.

It happened however that, once, Picciola, in one of these fêtes where he was accustomed to find near her happiness and calm, caused him a sudden fright. Afterwards he could never recall it without believing in revelations and the truth of presentiments.

This is what happened. The perfume of the plant indicated the sixth hour of the evening They had never been more powerful; thirty opened flowers combined to produce that magnetic atmosphere under the influence of which Charney slumbered.

In his dream, separating himself from the crowd, he was breathing the air on a green esplanade, where his darling phantom alone had followed his steps. Picciola advanced smiling towards him, and he in a contemplative attitude was admiring the supple grace of the young girl, the light undulations of the drapery of her white robe which indicated the harmony of her movements, and the waves of her dark hair, adorned as usual by his beloved flower. Suddenly he saw her pause, — she totters, — she extends to him her arms, — the seal of death is on her brow! He would spring towards her, — an obstacle against which he struggles in vain holds him chained, — he utters a cry and awakes. Awake, he hears another cry respond to his own, — yes, a cry, — the voice of a woman.

Nevertheless, Charney finds himself in the court, on his bench, near his plant; but now it is to his wide-opened and bodily eyes that a second apparition of a young girl appears at the little grated window: at first this pensive and lovely face, half in shadow, seems to undulate in a vague indistinctness; but gradually it becomes clear to him, and he sees her penetrating gaze fixed upon him; he rises, approaches, and all at once the sweet vision disappears, or rather the young girl flies.

Rapid as was her flight, Charney had caught a glimpse of her features, her hair, her form, her white robe. He stood motionless; he thought that his awaking was not complete, and that the insurmountable obstacle which in his dream separated him from Picciola was the prison-grating.

Ludovic at that moment hastened towards him with an air of great alarm, and finding him still agitated, said, —

"Signor Count, has your illness attacked you again? Parbleu! we must send for the doctors again, for it is the order; but be easy; Madame Picciola and I, in spite of them, will undertake your cure."

"I am not ill," replied Charney, scarcely recovered from his emotion. "Who has made you think —"

"The fly-catcher's daughter, — she saw you, heard you cry, and hastened to call me."

Charney became thoughtful. It then came to his mind for the first time that a young girl was sometimes in that part of the fortress.

"The resemblance which I fancied between the stranger and Picciola is only an illusion of my senses, a common and simple optical effect," said he to himself. "Often thus by a phenomenon of vision the eye retains for some time the image of the object upon which it has been resting. It is a strange thing, though, to see this sweet vision pass from the illusory to the real life, — from the dream to the awakening. The image of Picciola, however, was not perfectly reproduced in the young girl of the prison, — she wore no flower in her hair."

While comparing them he recalled what Giuhardi had told him of the interest his daughter had felt in him. She had pitied him during his illness; it was to her that he owed the possession of his precious microscope; she was interested in his labors and his studies; even now, in hastening to send Ludovic to him, she had given another evidence of her good-will.

And Charney, his heart filled with gratitude, felt impelled to manifest it. But how?

Not without hesitation, not without reproaching himself, as if in this moment he rendered himself guilty by a profanation, he broke, and gathered silently and with a trembling hand, a flower from his plant.

"Formerly," said Charney to himself, "how prodigally have I wasted gold to adorn with pearls and diamonds brows vowed to shame and falsehood. To how many deceitful women and lying friends have I thrown my fortune, caring for nothing but the impulses of my own heart, which I gave to be trampled under their feet as under my own. Ah, if the worth of an object depends upon the value that the owner attaches to it, I swear that never was offered by me a gift more precious than this which I take from thee to-day, Picciola!" And placing the little branch in the hands of the jailer, "My good Ludovic, present this from me to the daughter of my venerable fellow-captive.

Say to her that I thank her for her interest in me, and that the Count de Charney, poor and a prisoner, possesses nothing of more worth to offer her."

Ludovic received the flower with an air of stupefaction. He had come to enter so fully into the love which the prisoner felt for his plant, that he could not conceive that so slight a service could gain for the daughter of the fly-catcher a mark of such munificence.

"Well, after all, by the head of Saint Pascal!" said he, as he went out, "they have only seen my godchild from a distance; they will have a chance to judge now whether she is lovely, and whether her odor is sweet."

CHAPTER XIII.

As for Charney, the time was near at hand when he would have to make many other sacrifices of that kind, for the epoch of fructification had arrived for Picciola. Some of her flowers had already lost their brilliant petals; the stamens, having become useless, had fallen, as heretofore the cotyledons, when the first leaves, having arrived at the age of strength, were able to do without their care. The ovary containing the germ of the seeds commenced to swell under the enlarged calyx. The maternal flowers despoiled themselves of their brilliancy as women grow indifferent to showy adornment when the sacred cares of maternity devolve upon them.

Charney prepared for new observations, the grandest and most sublime, without doubt, that he had yet made, for they attach to the duration of created races, to the reproduction of life.

Already, in analyzing a bud which had been detached from the stem by the bite of an insect, he had had a glimpse of this primitive germ, this feeble embryo, which owes its development to the loves of the flowers. Admirable foresight! wonderful arrangement of Nature which science has yet been unable to explain! Now it is the birth of the completed being that is in question, of that seed whose narrow envelope contains the entire plant, — phenomenon for which the others have only been the preparation. The moment has come for the observer to watch the gestation of the vegetable egg through all its epochs, in the bud, in the brilliantly arranged flower, under the calyx discrowned of its petals. It would be necessary for him again to mutilate Picciola; but will she not easily repair her losses? On all sides, at the joints of the stems, under the axillas of the leaves, new shoots announce a future flowering; of these Charney will take tender care.

To morrow, then, he will commence his work.

The next day he took his place on his seat with the gravity of a man who undertakes difficult experiments whose success may be long delayed. At the first glance at his plant he was surprised at the state of languor manifest in all its parts. The flowers, drooping on their stems, seemed no longer to have power to turn toward the sun, and the leaves seemed to have lost their lustrous verdure.

Charney thought at first that a violent storm was gathering, and immediately prepared his mats to defend Picciola from the too rude attacks of wind or hail. But the sky is cloudless, the air serene, and the song of the lark is heard from afar in the blue space.

His brow contracts with anxiety. After a moment's reflection he exclaims, "It is water that she needs!" He runs to bring some from his chamber, and kneeling before his plant, raising the lower leaves to moisten its root, he is struck motionless with consternation. His gaze remains fixed on the ground; he lets the water-pitcher fall, and seems stupefied by what he sees. He discovers the source of the evil. Picciola is dying!

While she has multiplied her flowers and her perfumes for his study and pleasure, her stem also has expanded. Crowded at its base between two stones of the pavement, strangled under a double pressure, the stem had swollen just above the point where it emerges from the ground, but the friction against the rough edges of the granite had soon mangled it, and the nourishing sap of the plant was exuding from several fissures.

Picciola lacks earth; exhausted, without sap, she will die if prompt succor is not given her. She is dying! Charney sees it. There is but one means of saving her, — that is, to lift the pavements which press upon her; but can he do it? Without tools his efforts will be vain.

He sprang towards the little door of entrance, and, knocking vehemently, called Ludovic. At last he appeared.

At the recital and the sight of the disaster, he stood confounded; but notwithstanding his tenderness for his goddaughter, he responded to the prayers of Charney — who besought him with frantic supplications to lift the pavements — only by these words, which he accompanied with a long-drawn sigh and a shrug of the shoulders, —

"And what of my orders, Signor Count?"

This time the prisoner offered him not only one bijou from his precious dressing-case, but the entire case with all that it contained. Ludovic drew himself up, folded closely his arms upon his breast, and putting on the air and manner of the jailer, and his tone half Provençal, half Piedmontese, said, —

"Per Bacco! Were you to offer me a fortune, — I am an old soldier, and I know my duty, — address yourself to the commandant."

"No!" exclaimed Charney; "rather will I tear my hands in pieces in lifting and breaking the stones."

"We shall see; at all events, do as you please." And Ludovic, who in entering had held his thumb over his pipe, keeping it behind him while addressing the prisoner, replaced it brusquely between his lips, relighting it by a strong inspiration, and turned to go out. Charney detained him.

"My good Ludovic, you whom I have always found so compassionate, can you do nothing for me, — nothing for her?"

"Tonnerre!" said he, trying by oaths to defend himself from the emotion which was taking possession of him; "let me alone, you and your cursed gillyflower! I ask pardon of the poor thing, it is no fault of hers that you are so diabolically obstinate. What! you have the heart, then, to let her die thus without help?"

"But what is to be done?"

"Address yourself to the commandant, I tell you."

"Never!"

"Well, if you won't do it yourself, let me speak to him."

"I forbid you to do it," cried Charney.

"How! you forbid me!" replied the jailer. "What! am I to receive orders from you? If I choose to speak to him — No! I will not speak to him. After all, what business is it of mine? Let her die, let her live, what do I care? Good night."

"But your commandant, would he understand me?" said the Count, suddenly softening.

"Why not? Do you take him for a barbarian? Explain it nicely to him with pretty phrases, — not too long, you are a savant, now is the time to use your learning. Why should not he understand your love for your plant? I understood it very well. Besides, make yourself easy; I shall be there. I will tell him what a good medicine it is for all sorts of ailments, he has not good health, — he has the rheumatism now, — that is lucky, — he will understand better —"

Charney hesitated still. Ludovic, with a wink of his eye, pointed to the fainting Picciola. The Count gave a sign of assent, and Ludovic went out.

In a few minutes a man, in costume half civil, half military, brought to the prisoner an escritoire and a sheet of paper bearing the stamp of the commandant. Then, as Ludovic had told him, the man stood by while Charney wrote his request; took it from him, sealed it, saluted him, and carried away the escritoire.

You smile perhaps with contempt in seeing the pride of the noble Count humbled so easily, and that haughty will yield at the sight of a fading flower. Have you then forgotten what Picciola is to the prisoner? Do you know what effect isolation and captivity will produce upon the proudest and most determined spirit? This act of weakness with which you reproach him, did he descend to it when he himself was broken down by suffering, deprived of air, of liberty, crushed between the stones of his prison, as his plant between two pavements? No! But between her and him are established mutual relations, sacred engagements: she has saved him from death; now in his turn he must save her!

The aged Girhardi saw Charney pacing the little court with agitated step and gestures of impatience and expectation. How slow the answer seemed to him in coming! Three hours had passed since his message to the governor, and the plant became every moment more exhausted by the loss of its sap. Charney would have seen his own blood flow more calmly.

The old man attempted to console him and give him hope. More experienced in the knowledge of plants and their maladies, he showed him how he might close the wounds of Picciola, and preserve her from at least one of the dangers with which she was menaced.

According to his advice, Charney, with a mixture of moss, finely chopped straw, and moistened earth, composed a mastic which he applied to the wound. His handkerchief, torn into strips, furnished him with ligatures to keep it in place. In this occupation another hour passed; but the answer came not.

When Ludovic entered the court at the usual dinner-hour, his brusque and business-like countenance announced no good news. He scarcely deigned to answer the questions of the prisoner, even by short and sharp replies. "Diavolo! can't you wait? You are in a great hurry. Give him time to write."

He seemed to have a presentiment of the rôle he would have to play, and prepared himself in advance.

Charney could not dine. He strove to control his impatience while waiting the sentence of life or death for Picciola; and to strengthen his courage, he constantly reiterated to himself that the governor could not, without being a most cruel man, refuse him so simple a request.

His impatience increased, however, more and more with the delay; he was surprised at it, as if the commandant could have no other affairs so pressing as that. At the slightest sound his eyes turned towards the little door by which he expected to receive his message.

The evening came, — no answer! Night, — nothing! He could not close his eyes.

CHAPTER XIV.

The next day that response, so earnestly expected, was at last brought to him. The commandant said, in a dry and laconic style, that no change could be made in the walls, fosses, or fortifications of the citadel, without the express authorization of the governor of Turin; that on the demand of Monsieur Charney, he would refer the matter to his Excellency; "for," added he, "the very pavement of a prison court is a wall."

Charney stood confounded, after reading this message. To make the preservation of a flower a question of state! a displacement of fortifications! wait the decision of the governor of Turin! wait an age, when a day's delay was death! Would not this governor in his turn refer it to the minister, the minister to the senate, the senate to the Emperor? Ah, how at this moment his contempt for men was reawakened! Ludovic seemed to him only the agent of the executioner. At the cry of his despair one responds in formal official language, the other urges his military orders.

Charney drew near to the invalid, whose brilliancy was tarnished, whose color was fading. He gazed upon her with sadness. It was the happiness, the poetry, of his life which was departing. Her perfume indicated a mistaken hour, like a watch whose mainspring is broken; each corolla, folded upon itself, has ceased to turn to the sun.

In the midst of these heart-breaking reflections, the voice of his fellow-captive reached him again.

"Dear sir," said the good old man, with his paternal accent, lowering his tone, and pressing his face close to the bars, to be as near him as possible, "if she dies, and I fear she must, what will you do alone, all alone? What occupations can interest you after that which has such a charm for you? You too will die from ennui. Solitude, once interrupted, becomes afterwards so heavy. You will not be able to endure it. It is as it would be with me, if they should now separate me from my daughter, that guardian angel whose smile has power to console me for all. As for your plant, the wind from the Alps has brought you the seed, or a bird in passing has dropped it from his beak into the court; but even if the same circumstance should bring you another Picciola, it would only be to renew your regret for the loss of the first, for from the beginning you would only look forward to its death from the same cause. Believe me, my dear sir, and consent that my friends act for you. Yield at last. Your liberty may be more easily obtained than you think. I hear already of many traits of clemency and generosity in the new Emperor. He is even now at Turin, and Josephine accompanies him."

He pronounced the name of Josephine as if the certainty of success attached to it.

"At Turin?" exclaimed Charney, raising quickly his head, which had before been bent upon his breast.

"At Turin for the last two days," replied the old man, delighted to see that his good advice was not rejected as it had been before.

"And what is the exact distance from Fenestrella to Turin?"

"By the main road, through Giaveno and Avigliano, nearly seven leagues."

"And in how short a time can the journey be accomplished?"

"Four or five hours at the least; for just now the route is obstructed by troops, baggage-wagons, and the carriages of all who are to be present at the approaching fêtes. The road which winds through the valley, following the river, is longer, without doubt, but I believe it will take less time."

"Tell me, sir, if through your communication with the world outside it would be possible for you to find some one who would go to Turin to-day, — this very morning?"

"My daughter can procure a messenger."

"And you say that General Bonaparte, the First Consul —"

"The Emperor," gently interposed Girhardi.

"Yes, the Emperor, — the Emperor is yet at Turin; you are sure?" continued Charney, absorbed in one great resolution. "Yes, I will write to him, I will address a petition to — the Emperor."

He dwelt upon this word, as if to strengthen himself in the course he had resolved upon.

"O, God be praised!" cried the old man, "for it is from him comes the good thought when human pride yields. Yes, write; address to him a petition for pardon. Fossombroni, Cotenna, and Delarue, my friends, will support you strongly, as they would me, with the Minister Marescalchi, the Cardinal Caprara, and even Melzi, who has just been appointed keeper of the seals of the new kingdom. My dear companion, perhaps we shall be released from this prison together, the same day, — you to recommence an active and full life; I to accompany my daughter wherever she wishes to go."

"Pardon, monsieur, pardon if I do not seem entirely satisfied with the mediators that you so kindly and disinterestedly offer me. My esteem and gratitude are yours; but it is to the Emperor himself that my petition must be sent this evening, if possible, — to-morrow morning, at latest. Can you be sure of a faithful messenger?"

"As faithful as myself," said the old man, after a moment's reflection.

"Yet one more question," said Charney: "do you not fear that you may be compromised by the signal service that you are going to render me?"

"The pleasure of doing you a service prevents all fear, dear sir. If I can in the least contribute to solace your misfortune, let come what will, I know how to submit to the decrees of Heaven."

Charney felt himself stirred to the depths of his heart by these simple words. He raised his eyes moistened with tears to the old man.

"How I wish that I might press your hand!" said he; and he raised his arm towards the little window. Girhardi stretched his down through the grating; but it was in vain, — he could not reach the hand that was extended to him. Then, inspired by one of those sentiments of tenderness so active in the heart of a recluse, he untied quickly his cravat, and retaining one end, threw the other to Charney, who seized it with eagerness, and a loving vibration of this insensible linen conveyed from one to the other their mutual emotion.

"I will save thee," whispered Charney, as he passed near Picciola.

Returning to his chamber, he took the finest and whitest of his handkerchiefs, carefully pointed his toothpick, renewed his ink, and set himself to his task. His petition completed, not without sharpest pangs of his rebellious pride, he fastened it to a little cord which hung from the window of the Italian, and which was immediately drawn up.

An hour after, the person charged with the task of conveying it to the Emperor, accompanied by a guide, took the route through the valley, following the right bank of the Doria Riparia. Both were on horseback; but they hastened in vain, for unexpected obstacles retarded them. Recent rains had washed away the road; in many places the river had overflowed, and torrents united the river and the lake. Already the forges of Giaveno shone redder in the horizon, warning them that the light of day would soon fail them. Too happy then to return to the main road, they gained, not without difficulty, the magnificent avenue of Rivoli, and late in the night arrived at Turin.

There they learned that the Emperor-King had just left for Alexandria.

BOOK II.

CHAPTER I.

The next morning at dawn of day the city of Alexandria was arrayed in festal garb. An immense population swarmed in the streets decked with flags and tapestry, flowers and streamers. The crowd pressed from the town-hall, where were Napoleon and Josephine, to the arch of triumph erected at the extremity of the town, which they must pass in visiting the illustrious plains of Marengo.

On the road from Alexandria to Marengo the same multitude of people, the same cries, the same blare of trumpets.

Never pilgrimage to Notre-Dame de Lorette, never the ceremonies of the jubilee at Rome, had drawn crowds such as this, which flowed towards the scarcely cold field of battle.

Here was to be performed the most important of the fêtes of the day. The Emperor Napoleon was to be present to witness a simulated combat, in commemoration of the victory gained in this same place five years before by the First Consul Bonaparte.

Tables and mountebanks' booths line the route. People eat, drink, and witness comedies in the open air. They even preach there; for more than one improvised pulpit is seen between the theatre and the alehouse Monks, mingling with the crowd, or holding themselves apart at the sides of the road, not content with giving their benediction to those who pass, exhort them to quietness and sobriety, and sell them little ivory crosses, and rosaries that have been blessed.

In the long and only street of the village of Marengo all the houses, transformed into inns, present a tumultuous image of stir and confusion.

At all the windows, to attract and tempt the passers-by, are hung smoked hams, Italian sausages, garlands of partridges and quails, chaplets of croquets and confectionery. They press in and out, they crowd and jostle each other, — Italian, French, citizens, and soldiers; the heaps of macaroni, the pyramids of cakes and pastry, disappear in the hands of purchasers.

In dark and narrow stairways a double line, ascending and descending, push and jostle. Some, the better to shield their provisions from the rapacity of their neighbors, hold them with upraised arms high above their heads, and in the darkness a longer or more skilful arm relieves them of the dainty burden, — whether a buttered loaf, figs, oranges, a ham, a larded quail, or even a pie in its crust, or a savory stew in its tureen, — the dish and its contents, all is taken. There are cries and jokes and prolonged laughter, from the upper to the lower stair. The thief of the ascending line, satisfied with his plunder, wheels about to descend. His victim in the descending stream, constrained to make a new purchase, turns to ascend; and the whole line, broken by the sudden and irregular flux and reflux, turning of necessity upon itself, in the midst of shouts of laughter, oaths, blows dealt at hazard, is thrust partly into the street, and partly into the rooms where the drinkers are singing already at the top of their voices.

Moving about among the tables loaded with dishes and the benches crowded with guests, one sees hostess and maids, — the one with gay-colored apron, powdered hair, and the coquettish poniard, at that time the fashionable ornament, — the others in short petticoats, long braided tresses, naked feet and neck, brow and ears laden with gilded ornaments.

To these animated pictures of the road and the village, of the chamber and the street, — to this hum, these cries, these laughs, this din of words, rattling of glasses and plates, other pictures, other noises, will soon succeed.

In an hour the village will tremble with the thunder of cannon, — cannon almost harmless, it is true, breaking only windows. The street will resound with the cries of soldiers worked up to a warlike furor according to orders ; and every house will be enveloped by the smoke of musketry produced by harmless powder.

Then beware of pillage, if the provisions have not been placed in safety ; beware, too, of the barefooted maid ! for the mimic war apes sometimes the real in its license. It also imitates it in the brilliancy of its display ; and no spectacle could be more majestic and imposing than that now preparing in the fields of Marengo.

Already a magnificent throne, surrounded with tricolored standards, is raised on one of the few hillocks which are on the plain. Already troops of all arms of the service, of all varieties of uniform, are deploying to take their places. The trumpet musters the cavalry ; the roll of the drum seems to spread itself over the whole surface of the ground, which trembles under the artillery and ammunition wagons. The aides-de-camp, in their brilliant uniforms, pass and repass, galloping in all directions. The banners float in the wind, which at the same time causes the undulation of that moving sea of feathers, aigrettes, and tricolored plumes ; the sun, that unfailing guest at the fetes of Napoleon, that radiant illuminator of the pomps of the empire, shone unclouded, and turned to fire the gold of the embroideries, the bronze of the cannon, the helmets, the casques, and the sixty thousand bayonets with which the field bristled.

Soon the troops arriving with hurried march on the field of their operations, the crowd of curious spectators, flowing back, described an immense circle of retreat, as the ripples of the ocean are overwhelmed by an enormous wave, while a few horsemen charging against the lingering groups rapidly clear the field.

The village is deserted, — the gay tents struck, — the booths taken down, — the songs and cries have ceased. On all sides are to be seen men interrupted in their sports or their repast, and women terrified by the flash of the sabres or the neighing of the chargers, running and dragging their children after them.

As the eye glances along the lines of that army, one can recognize without difficulty, by the countenances of the soldiers, those to whom the General-in-Chief, Marshal Lannes, has assigned beforehand the part of vanquished or victors. The General himself is seen, followed by a numerous staff, reconnoitring the field on which he five years before so valiantly distinguished himself, distributing to each one his rôle.

In repeating the principal movements of the terrible day of the 14th of June, 1800, they will take care to omit the mistakes which were committed, for this is a strategic flattery, a madrigal with cannon-shots, that they are to offer the new Emperor and King.

Now the troops form in line, deploy, fall back, according to the word of command, when military symphonies are heard on the route from Alexandria ; vague murmurs swell and increase from the assembled multitude, which, protected by the streams of the Tanaro, Bormida, the Orba, or the ravines of Tortona, form the waving and living girdle of this arena.

All at once the drums beat a salute, cries and vivats rise from all sides in the midst of clouds of dust, sabres flash in the sunlight, muskets are shouldered and clank as by a unanimous movement, and a brilliant chariot, drawn by eight horses caparisoned and blazoned with the arms of France and Italy, convey to the foot of their throne Josephine and Napoleon.

After having received the homage of all the Italian deputations, the envoys of Lucca, Genoa, Florence, Rome, and even Prussia, Napoleon, impatient of inactivity, springs upon his horse, and soon the entire plain is illumined with fire and covered with smoke.

Such were the sports of the young conqueror. War for his pastime, war for the accomplishment of his high destiny. It was a necessity to that fiery spirit, born for dominion, to whom the conquest of the world alone would have brought leisure.

An officer designated by Napoleon explained to Josephine, as she sat solitary upon her throne, half frightened by the spectacle, the meaning of the various evolutions, and the object of all the manœuvres. He showed her the Austrian General Melas driving the French from the village of Marengo, routing them at Pietra-Buona, at Castel-Ceriolo ; and Bonaparte suddenly arresting him in the midst of his triumph with only nine hundred men of the Consular Guard. Now he fixes her attention upon one of the most decisive moments of the battle. The republicans are giving way, but Desaix appears on the road from Tortona. The terrible Hungarian column, under the orders of Zach, begins to move, and marches to meet him.

But while the officer is speaking, Josephine's attention is diverted by a slight disturbance near her. Having asked the cause, she learns that a young girl, after having imprudently cleared the line of military operations, at the risk of being a thousand times crushed by a charge of cavalry or the wheels of artillery wagons, occasions this disturbance by her obstinate determination, notwithstanding the resistance of the guard and the remonstrances of the ladies of her suite, to penetrate even to her Majesty.

CHAPTER II.

On learning that the Emperor had quitted Turin for Alexandria, the daughter of Girhardi, — for it is she, she herself, who, followed by a guide, has been the bearer of the petition of Charney, — Theresa, was at first overcome and almost discouraged. But she remembered that she held in her hands the joy, the only hope, of a poor captive. The Count was entirely ignorant as to the person who had undertaken the dangerous errand. Without regard to time or fatigue, at the risk of arriving too late, she persevered, and signified to the guide that the end of their journey must be, not Turin, but Alexandria.

"Ho ! ho !" said the guide, scratching his ear ; "that is twice as far as we have come already."

"Well, we must start immediately."

"I am going to start immediately, Signora," replied he, quietly, "but it will be to turn my back to Turin as well as to Alexandria. On the road to Rivoli I have a cousin whose daughter is about to be married ; he will have to lodge me and my horses gratis ; that is so much gained, to say nothing of the wedding-feast."

In answer to her exclamations, he said, "I do not refuse to wait till morning, and then conduct you back to Fenestrella, as was agreed. Will that suit you ? No ? A pleasant journey to you, Signora."

All her efforts to make him change his resolution were useless ; his Piedmontese obstinacy was immovable.

But having undertaken this work of devotion, Theresa would not look back. Decided to continue her route alone, she begged the hostess of the inn where she had alighted to procure her, without a moment's delay, the means of conveying her most rapidly to Alexandria. The hostess sent her servants to the city ; they went from the gate of Suza to that of Po, from the new gate to that of the palace ; but carriages, public and private, beasts of burden and saddle-horses, had gone, or were engaged a long time in advance, on account of the festivities at Alexandria.

Theresa was in despair at this fatal contretemps. Absorbed in revery, with drooping head, she stood upon the step of the inn, not fearing to be recognized in her native town, thanks to the darkness, when the sound of wheels, made gay by bells attached to the mules, was heard. At the door where she was standing drew up two strong mules, with one of those itinerant dealer's wagons, the deep and capacious boxes of which, closed and padlocked, were closely packed with goods for sale, leaving only room for a narrow seat of leather, partly sheltered by an awning of oil-cloth.

The man and his wife, owners of the vehicle and its merchandise, alighted, giving audible grunts of satisfaction, stamping their feet, stretching their arms, to restore the circulation and awake themselves from their drowsiness. They greeted the hostess as an old acquaintance, and established themselves at once in the two corners of the chimney, warming their hands and feet at the fire of vine sticks which crackled on the hearth ; then, having ordered the mules to be put in the stable, congratulating each other on having arrived at the end of their day's journey, they ordered supper, and talked of getting to bed as soon as possible.

The hostess, too, was preparing for rest. The yawning servants were closing the doors and windows, and Theresa still stood bowed down with disappointment, thinking of the time which was gliding away, the hope which was fading, the flower which was dying.

"A night, a whole night," said she to herself; "and the unhappy Count will be counting the minutes while I sleep; and to-morrow perhaps it will be impossible for me to find a conveyance."

She fixed a long and earnest look upon the two travellers eating their supper, as if her last resource was in them. She was ignorant what route they were to take, — whether they would or could take charge of her; and the poor girl, little accustomed to find herself alone, thus thrown upon herself among strangers, dared not ask. Impelled by her anxiety, withheld by her timidity, one foot forward, her lips parted, she remained in her place mute and undecided, when suddenly a servant presented her with a lighted candle and a key, pointing with her finger to the door of the chamber she was to occupy.

Recalled to a sense of her position and forced to decide, Theresa gently put aside the servant, and stepping toward the table where the couple were seated, said in a trembling voice, "Pardon my question; what route do you take from Turin?"

"The road to Alexandria, my pretty girl."

"To Alexandria! It is my good angel that has brought you here."

"Your good angel has brought us over very bad roads then, Signora," said the woman; "we are tired to death."

"But how can we serve you?" said the merchant.

"A pressing affair calls me to Alexandria; will you take me there?"

"Impossible," said the woman.

"O, I will pay you well, — two pieces of St. John Baptist! ten livres of France."

"It is difficult," replied the husband. "In the first place, the seat is narrow — it is scarcely possible for three to sit upon it. It is true that you will not take much room. But there is another difficulty. We are going to the market of Revigano, near Asti, and not to Alexandria, and that is only halfway."

"Well," said the young girl, "take me to the gates of Asti; but start to-night, immediately."

"Impossible! impossible!" exclaimed the couple. "We do not sell either our sleep or our fatigue."

"I will double the sum," interposed Theresa, in a low voice.

The husband looked at his wife with a questioning gesture.

"No, no," said she, "it will make us ill. Besides, Losca and Zoppa need rest. Do you want to kill them?"

"Four pieces!" murmured the husband, — "four pieces!"

"Losca and Zoppa are worth more than that."

"Double price for half the way!"

"What of that? one sequin of Venice is worth a double parpaiole of Genoa."

Nevertheless, the idea of the four pieces, the bait of a gain so easily made, soon produced its effect upon the wife as upon the husband; and after some resistance on one side, and reiterated supplications and prayers on the other, the mules were again put before the wagon.

Theresa, wrapped in her mantle for protection from the chilly night air, arranged herself as well as she could on the seat between the man and woman. Just as the clocks were striking eleven, they drove from the door of the inn.

In her impatience to accomplish the object of her journey, and return good news to Fenestrella, Theresa wished to feel herself borne by coursers rapid as the wind; but the heavy wagon lumbered slowly along the road; the mules paced steadily on, step by step, raising slowly one foot after the other, and the regular tinkling of their bells seemed to add to the nonchalant air of their movements. For some time she said nothing, hoping that they would become excited when warmed with motion, or that the whip of the driver would quicken their pace; but seeing that, instead of any such prompting, he was satisfied with an occasional clicking of the tongue, she took courage to say to him that it was of the greatest importance that she should arrive as soon as possible at Asti, in order that she might reach Alexandria in the morning.

"My good child," replied her new guide, "it does not please me any more than you to spend the night in counting the stars, but a merchant must look after his merchandise. My load is crockery, that I am taking to sell at Revigano, and if my mules were to trot they would make potsherds of all my stock."

"What, sir, you are a crockery merchant?" cried Theresa in a tone of consternation.

"A china merchant," said the wife.

"Alas, alas!" sighed she, "but at least you can go a little faster."

"Do you wish to ruin me?"

"I am in such haste to arrive."

"And what of us, my good girl? Is that a reason why we should break everything?"

By way of concession, however, for a few minutes the crockery merchant increased the frequency of his clickings of the tongue; but the mules were too well accustomed to their pace to change it so easily.

Theresa then began to reproach herself bitterly for not having inquired before, how long it would take to reach Asti; she reproached herself above all for not having gone herself, in Turin, to seek, with the knowledge that she had of the city, a more prompt means of conveyance; now there was nothing to do but to be resigned.

The wagon jogged along at the same pace. Losca and Zoppa went neither faster nor slower; only, choosing the unpaved side of the road, the travellers were relieved from the racket of the wheels upon the stones. The merchant and his wife, who until now had been exchanging conjectures as to their probable success at the fair of Revigano, relapsed into silence. Theresa, in the darkness and stillness, notwithstanding the numbness of her feet from the cold, lulled by the monotonous tinkling of the bells, was overcome with drowsiness. Her head, at first nodding from one side to the other, seeking a pillow sometimes on the shoulder of the man, and then on that of his wife, sunk at last heavily upon her breast.

"Lean upon me, my poor girl," said the merchant, "and good night to you."

She followed his counsel, arranged herself as she best could, and slept so soundly that the light of dawning day first caused her to open her eyes. Astonished to find herself in the open air and on the high road, she roused herself, and, looking about, perceived with surprise and terror that the wagon no longer moved, and seemed for a long time to have been motionless in this place.

The merchant, his wife, the mules themselves, all slept profoundly, and the tinkling of the bells was hushed.

Theresa saw not far behind her the tops of several steeples, and through the morning mists, causing on the horizon fantastic groupings, she saw what she fancied were the roofs and towers of the Superga, the château of Mille-Fleurs, of La Vigne and La Reine, the church of the Capuchins, and all the magnificent buildings on the heights of Turin.

"Merciful Heaven!" cried she, "where are we? Day is breaking, and we are scarcely out of the suburbs."

The merchant, awaked by her cries, after rubbing his eyes, hastened to reassure her.

"We are approaching Asti," said he, "and the steeples which you see behind you are those of Revigano. There is nothing to scold Losca and Zoppa for; they only fell asleep, and they had need enough of it. I hope they have not taken advantage of my sleep to trot."

Theresa smiled. He gave an unexpected crack of his whip, which aroused at once his wife and his mules.

At the gate of Asti the worthy man took leave of the young girl, after assisting her to alight, and signing the sign of the cross on the twenty francs which he received from her, turned straight about, taking the road for Revigano.

Half the route was then accomplished. But Theresa no longer hoped to arrive for the early levee of the Emperor.

"However," thought she, "an Emperor will rise late."

O how gladly she would have plunged again below the horizon the sun, which announced its coming by the increasing light. It seemed to her that everything about her ought to feel the same haste which agitated her, — that she would see the whole population of Asti astir, in preparation for a journey to Alexandria, and in that multitude of vehicles of all sorts she would surely obtain a place, were it even in a cart.

What then was her astonishment, upon her entrance into the town, to find the streets deserted and silent. The sun, just risen, illuminated only the roofs of the highest houses and the domes of the churches.

She remembered that one of her maternal relatives had lived in Asti for many years. He might be of great use to her; and seeing, on the ground floor of a small house, a bright light shining through the latticed window, she ventured to knock and inquire where this relative lived.

The casement opened; a harsh, shrill voice answered that the individual in question had lived for the last three months at his country-house, and the casement was closed again.

A sense of the loneliness of her situation in the deserted streets overwhelmed her, and seeing an image of the Virgin in a niche in the wall, before which a lamp was burning, she threw herself upon her knees before it, and rose from her prayer for help and protection with renewed courage. Scarcely had she risen when the sound of approaching footsteps was heard, and in a moment a man appeared.

"Direct me, sir, I pray you," said she to him, "where to find a carriage that will take me to Alexandria."

"You are too late, my good girl," replied the stranger; "all the carriages and carts have been engaged this three days"; and he passed on.

A second came towards her. At the same question from Theresa he stopped, and, regarding her with a hard and angry glance, muttered, "You, too, love the French, then. Cursed race!" and hastened on more rapidly than the other.

The poor girl stood for some time thoroughly intimidated, but regained courage to ask her question for the third time, on seeing a young workman come out from a house, singing as he went to his work.

"Ah, ah, Signora!" said he, with a good-natured air, "you want to see a battle! But there is no place there for pretty girls. Believe me, you had better stay with us. There is a fête to-day, and the best dancers will quarrel which shall have you for partner in the Contadina. You are worth a quarrel. A little war in your honor, eh? will not that tempt you?"

And he advanced towards her with a familiar bow, but at one indignant glance from her he resumed his song and pursued his way. A fourth, a fifth, passed her in their turn. Theresa no longer interrogated them, but watched carefully the gates as they opened, and the carriages standing in the court-yards. At last, not without difficulty, and by special favor, she was allowed to take the place, as far as Annone, of a passenger whose seat was engaged from there to Alexandria. At Annone, and again at Felizzano, she encountered a variety of difficulties, but she triumphed over all.

Knowing before she arrived at Alexandria that the Emperor had left there, she did not delay a moment, but on foot joined the crowd pressing towards Marengo.

Jostled on every side by the rabble, taking advantage of every break in the crowd skirting the edges of the road, she lost no opportunity of gaining ground on those in advance of her. Inattentive to the noise of the trumpets, to the shows of the jugglers, in the midst of this crowd of pleasure-seekers, who rushed from side to side, singing, shouting, leaping with joy in clouds of dust, Theresa made her way, the only stranger to the festivities of the day, with anxious face and eye fixed and preoccupied, occasionally raising her hand to wipe the drops from her brow, the gravity of her countenance presenting a strange contrast to the joyous faces around her.

Her whole will and energy are concentrated upon making her way. Scarcely during all this time does the thought of the end which she wishes to attain present itself to her mind.

But a sudden halt imposed upon the crowd by the stopping of the front ranks forced her to slacken her pace, and thought returned. She thought of her father, who would soon begin to be tormented with anxiety in her prolonged absence, for the guide who had abandoned her at Turin could not gain admission to him to explain the cause; of Charney, cursing the choice of a messenger, perhaps, and accusing her of carelessness and forgetfulness; then, with a sudden fear, she put her hand in her bosom, as if by some chance she might have lost the petition. Then her father presented himself anew to her eyes; the old man reproaching himself for having yielded to her entreaties, believing his daughter lost through his fault. At the thought of this adored father tears filled her eyes, but her painful revery was suddenly interrupted by shouts of merriment. A large circle had formed just behind her, around which the crowd seemed to eddy. Theresa turned, and instantly her hands were seized by one on each side; and, notwithstanding her resistance, her fatigue, and above all her indisposition to any gayety of the sort, she found herself constrained to appear as an active participator in a grand farandole, which went whirling along the road, recruiting, as it went, all the pretty girls and young men, who willingly took part in it.

This was not the least painful annoyance of the journey; but her courage did not yet abandon her, for she believed she was near the end.

She at length succeeded in disengaging herself from this singular situation, and, making a final effort to open a way through the mass in front of her, she arrived at last in sight of the plain; her astonished eye, after wandering a moment over that splendid army covering the field of Marengo, was suddenly illuminated as it rested with delight upon the little hill upon which was erected the imperial throne.

All her strength, all her courage, all her ardor, returned; but how to arrive there through those thousands of men and horses, — could she think of it? But that which at first had seemed an obstacle proved rather an aid.

The foremost ranks of the crowd pouring in torrents from Alexandria, pressed by those behind, made an irruption on to the plain that seemed as if they would take possession of the field of battle.

A small body of cavalry instantly galloped towards the spot, and the glistening of their naked sabres and the rush of the horses quickly forced them back within their limits. All evacuated the ground as quickly as they had gained it, — all, with the exception of one person.

In a little hollow on the plain flowed a spring, surrounded by a small grove of trees and a hedge of hawthorn. Theresa, pale and trembling, directing her steps by instinct towards the throne, had been thrust forward by the crowd to the edge of the grove. Terrified by this violent impulsion, fearful of being crushed against the trees, closing her eyes like the child who believes the danger past when he no longer sees it, she threw her arms around the trunk of a poplar, and rested so for some time, motionless, her ears filled with the hum of the retreating crowd and the rustling of the foliage.

The retreating movement was so rapid at the approach of the soldiers, that when Theresa raised her head and looked about, she found herself alone, all alone, separated from the army by the clump of trees and the hawthorn hedge, and from the multitude by a thick cloud of dust raised by the last undulation of the fleeing wave.

Not hesitating to penetrate the hedge, she found herself in the grove of trees. In a few moments, her emotion becoming somewhat calmed, she could take cognizance of her surroundings.

Shaded by about twenty poplar and aspen trees, the spring, welling with a little bubbling noise out of the ground carpeted with moss and ivy, gave birth to a little rivulet, whose course over the plain could be traced by the tufts of blue forget-me-nots and clusters of white ranunculus which embroidered its banks. The coolness and moisture of the air aided to dispel the agitation and trouble of the terrified girl. It seemed to her that she had found an oasis of coolness and quiet, and that the belt of hawthorn was her shield against the dust, the heat, and the confusion.

For an instant there seems to be silence on the plain; she hears neither the word of command of the officers, the huzzas of the crowd, nor the neighing of the horses. She is conscious of a singular movement overhead, — a continuous twittering and fluttering in the trees. She looks up and sees the branches of the poplars and aspens covered with an innumerable quantity of sparrows, finches, linnets, and even the larger pigeons and blackbirds, driven by the noise and tumult, like the young girl, to seek shelter in this solitude of verdure. One would think that fear had paralyzed them both in wing and voice; not a cry, not a song, was heard from one of the little creatures so crowded upon the branches which bent under their weight that one might say the poplars and aspens bore feathers rather than leaves. Even when regiments of cavalry, with the noise of clarions, advanced and stationed themselves in the same place from which the crowd had just been driven, the birds did not abandon their asylum. Sharpening their bills and fluttering their wings, they anxiously waited the end of all this confusion; and it was this movement that had attracted the attention of Theresa.

However, the soldiers, which cut off all communication with the road, soon occupied all her thoughts.

"It is only a harmless combat," said she to herself; "and if I have been imprudent, God knows the object of my efforts; he will protect me." Directing then her attention through the opposite side of this island of verdure, she saw at the distance of about three hundred paces the throne of Napoleon and Josephine. The intervening space was sometimes occupied by the manœuvres of troops, and sometimes left clear so that a passage across was possible.

Theresa takes courage, — the moment has come, — she presses aside the hedge to pass through, when a sense of the disorder of her toilet fills her with shame and confusion. Her tresses, unbraided and dishevelled, are floating over her shoulders; her hands and face are soiled with dust. To present herself thus before the sovereigns of France and Italy would be to insure her repulse, and compromise, perhaps, the success of her mission.

She re-enters the thicket, unties her straw hat, shakes out her dark hair, smooths and rebraids it, and adjusts her dress; then kneeling at the spring, she bathes her hands and face, and bowing herself still lower, offers to Heaven a fervent prayer for her father and for Charney.

Ah! was not this a charming little picture, set as by chance in the centre of a grand battle-piece of Salvator Rosa, this chaste toilet of a young maiden, made in the midst of an army?

While Theresa was watching anew for a favorable moment to attempt to cross the field, suddenly from all sides were heard the detonations of artillery. The earth seemed to tremble under her feet, and the birds perched upon the trees, with cries of terror, made their disordered and bewildered flight for the woods of Valpedo and shady groves of Voghera.

The battle had commenced!

Theresa, stunned by the noise of cannon, terrified by all this tumult, stood in a sort of stupor, with her eyes fixed upon the throne, which, by turns, was visible for a moment, and then was hidden by a curtain of lances and bayonets.

After a half-hour, during which every thought was obliterated by a sense of amazement and terror, the energy of her soul resumed its force. She examined calmly the obstacles she must vanquish to reach the throne, and decided that they were not insurmountable.

Two columns of infantry, formed in two lines, of which the double base rested upon the thicket, had just opened a sharp fire of musketry upon each other. She hoped to be able, under cover of this cloud of smoke, to make her way unnoticed. While she hesitated, a troop of hussars, burning with thirst, invaded her asylum. Then she hesitated no longer; modesty gave new life to her courage. She rushed forth, running between the two columns of infantry; and when the smoke began to clear away, the soldiers raised a cry of surprise on perceiving in the midst of them the white robe and straw hat of a woman, — a beautiful young girl, who, notwithstanding their cries, pursued her way. At this moment a squadron of cavalry galloped up to support one of the lines. Theresa just escaped being thrown down and crushed by the captain's seizing her in his arms; and without inquiring by what chance a young girl was in the field of battle, he gave her in charge of two soldiers to convey her to the spot where were grouped Josephine's attendants.

One of the horsemen raised her to the saddle behind him, and it was thus that she approached the place where the ladies of the suite of the Empress, accompanied by several aides-de-camp and the deputies of the cities of Italy, were stationed.

Arrived there, at last so near the goal, it was impossible that her enterprise should fail. She had surmounted too many difficulties to be vanquished by the last. When, on her demand to speak to the Emperor, she was told that he was in the field at the head of his troops, "Then," cried she, with firmness, "I wish to see the Empress"; but one was not more easy than the other. To free themselves from her importunity they endeavored to intimidate her, but in vain. They told her that she must wait till the end of the evolutions; she refused to do so, and insisted upon forcing her way to the throne. They held her; she struggled, and raised her voice with such vehemence that it attracted the attention of Josephine.

CHAPTER III.

WHILE Josephine was giving her orders, an opening in the crowd showed her Theresa, imploring, restrained by strong arms, yet resisting. At a gracious sign from the Empress, which every one about her knew how to interpret, they released the captive, who, finding herself free, sprang forward, threw herself on her knees, panting, at the foot of the throne, and drawing quickly from her bosom a handkerchief, which she waved in the air, cried, "Madame, madame, a poor prisoner! —"

Josephine could not understand the meaning of this handkerchief offered to her.

"Do you wish to present a petition to me," said she.

"This is it, madame, this is it, — the petition of a poor prisoner." And the tears sprang from the eyes of the supplicant, while a smile of hope illuminated her countenance. The Empress replied to her by another smile, gave her her hand, forced her to rise, and bending towards her with a manner full of kindness, said, "Come, come, my child, be reassured. He interests you very much, then, this poor prisoner?"

Theresa blushed, and cast down her eyes.

"I have never spoken to him," replied she, "but he is so unhappy! Read, madame!"

Josephine unfolded the handkerchief, moved to pity in thinking how much misery and privation this linen, so painfully written upon with an artificial ink, bore witness to; then, stopping at the first line, —

"But it is addressed to the Emperor."

"What matter? Are you not his wife? Read, read, madame, in mercy, read! It is so urgent!"

The combat was at its height. The Hungarian column, although under fire from the artillery of Marmont, renewed its forward movement. Zach and Desaix were face to face, and the result of their encounter was to decide the salvation or the loss of the army.

The cannon thundered on every side; the field of battle was aflame; the shouts of the soldiers, mingled with the clang and roar of battle, caused an agitation of the air as if a tempest was raging.

The Empress read that which follows: —

"SIRE: Two stones less in the court of my prison will not shake the foundations of your empire, and such is the only favor that I ask of your Majesty. It is not for myself that I ask your protection; but in this desert of stones, where I am expiating my offences against you, one single being has brought some solace to my pain, one single being has thrown some charm upon my life. It is a plant, sire, which has spontaneously sprung up between the pavements of the court where I am permitted sometimes to breathe the air and see the sky. Accuse me not of delirium or folly. This flower has been for me an object of study so sweet and so consoling! My eyes fixed upon this plant have been opened to the truth; to it I owe reason, repose, life, perhaps. I love it as you love glory.

"At this moment my poor plant is dying for want of space in the ground, — it is dying, and I cannot succor it; the commandant of Fenestrella would send my complaint to the governor of Turin, and when they have decided, my plant will be dead. Therefore, sire, I address you, — you who by one word can do all, can save my plant. Permit the lifting of these two stones, which weigh upon me as upon it. Save it from destruction, — save me from despair! Give the order; it is the life of my plant that I ask of you. I implore, I entreat you upon my bended knees, and I swear to you that on my heart shall be inscribed the record of your goodness.

"Why should it die? It has, I acknowledge, lightened the punishment that your powerful hand has inflicted upon me; but it has also humbled my pride, and brings me now a suppliant to your feet. From the height of your double throne look down upon us. Can you comprehend what ties may bind a man to a plant in this isolation which leaves for a man only a vegetative existence? No, you cannot know, and may God guard you from ever knowing what effect imprisonment may produce upon the firmest and proudest spirit. I do not complain of my captivity; I support it with resignation; prolong it, let it continue through my life; but mercy for my plant!

"Remember, sire, that this mercy that I implore of your Majesty is in vain if it is not granted immediately, — even to-day. You may hold the sword suspended for a time over the head of the condemned one, and raise it at last to grant him pardon. But nature follows other laws than the justice of man; two days more, and even the Emperor Napoleon can do nothing for the flower of the captive of Fenestrella.

"CHARNEY."

At that moment a storm of artillery rent the air; a dense smoke, cut into circles and lozenges of fire by the flashes of the discharge, covered the field of battle with a vast network of light and shade; then the firing ceased, and it seemed as if a hand stretched from on high removed suddenly this curtain of cloud which hid the combatants. Then a magnificent spectacle broke upon the sight. That brilliant charge in which Desaix had lost his life was made. Zach and his Hungarians, encountered in front by Boudet, harassed on the left flank by the cavalry of Kellerman, were thrown into disorder, when the intrepid Consul, re-establishing at once his new line of battle from Castel-Ceriolo to Saint-Julien, resumed the offensive, overthrew the Imperialists at every point, and forced Mélas to sound a retreat.

This sudden change of position, these grand movements of the army, this flux and reflux of men obeying the voice of one leader, he alone immovable in the midst of that apparent disorder, — there was something in all this which could not but impress the coldest imagination. From the groups of spectators around the throne burst acclamations and vivats, which at last drew the Empress from the profound meditation in which she was plunged. For of these latter and most brilliant manœuvres and imposing tableaux passing before her, the future queen of Italy had seen nothing, as she sat, lost in thought, with her eyes fixed upon this singular petition, which she looked at, but no longer read.

Her first glance was to reassure the young girl standing before her, who also had been lost in revery.

Joyous, enchanted by this smile so full of sweet promises, Theresa, certain of success, kissed again and again, with warmest gratitude, that hand at once so frail and so strong, on which glittered the nuptial ring of Napoleon. Then, leaving the throne, she joined the group of women, and, as soon as the plain was free, she sought a church or chapel where in silence she might shed her tears and offer up her thanksgivings.

CHAPTER IV.

WAS it not natural that the Empress-Queen should be seized with a sentiment of the liveliest pity in reading this petition? Ought not every word to have roused all her sympathy? For she was a worshipper of flowers. It was her science, her passion; and often had she forgotten in her beautiful conservatories of Malmaison the éclat and the ennui of power in watching a bud as it opened or studying the structure of a corolla. There often she was more happy in contemplating the purple of the cactus than the purple of her imperial mantle; and the perfume of her magnolias was to her more intoxicating than the poisonous flatteries of her courtiers. There she loved to reign, uniting under one sceptre a thousand floral subjects from all quarters of the globe. She knew them, — she classified them, — she ranged them in regiments according to order and race; and when a new subject presented itself to her for the first time, she knew by analyzing how to question it of its age and habits, and to learn from itself its name and family; then it was placed in the group of its brothers to take its natural rank; for there each tribe had its flag, each family its guidon.

Following the example of Napoleon, she respected the laws and customs of a vanquished people. Plants of all countries found again in the hot-houses of Malmaison their natural soil and their native climate. It was a world in miniature. One saw there in a circumscribed space meadows and rocks, the soil of virgin forests, and the sand of the desert; banks of clay and marl, lakes, cascades, and inundated strands; one might pass from the heat of the tropics to the refreshing climate of the temperate zone. There all the different races grew and developed side by side, only separated by walls of verdure or frontiers of glass.

When Josephine here held her review, the sight of certain flowers gave birth to sweetest reveries. The hydrangea had but recently borrowed the name of Hortensia from her daughter. Thoughts of glory also were suggested to her; for, after the triumphs of Bonaparte, she too claimed her share of the spoils of war, and souvenirs of Italy and Egypt grew and blossomed under her eyes. The soldenella of the Alps, the violet of Parma, the adonis of Castiglione, the carnation of Lodi, the willow of the Orient, the cross of Malta, the lily of the Nile, the hibiscus of Syria, the rose of Damietta, — such were her conquests. And these, at least, France still retains.

In the midst of all her treasures she had her favorite flower, her flower of adoption, her beautiful jasmine of Martinique, the seed of which she had gathered, sown, and cultivated; it recalls to her her native land, her childhood, her ornaments and crowns of her girlhood, the paternal roof, and her early wedded love.

Ah, how well she comprehends the fears of the unhappy man for his plant! How much he must love it, — his only one! And how could she but be touched by the fate of the poor prisoner? The widow of Beauharnais had not always dwelt in a consular or imperial palace. She has not forgotten her own days of captivity. Then this Charney, Josephine remembers him in society, — so calm, so proud, so listless in the midst of the pleasures of the world, a scorner of the sweetest human affections. What has so changed him? Who has had power to unbend this haughty spirit? Thou who didst refuse to bend the knee even before thy God art now a suppliant crying for mercy for thy plant! Ah, it shall be preserved to thee!

In this state of mind, the last manœuvres of the troops, all this vain simulation of battle, caused her only impatience and annoyance; for every moment lost might peril the existence of the flower of the captive.

The moment that Napoleon, surrounded by his generals, came to rejoin her, stirred with the excitement of the warrior, and expecting her felicitations, she received him — her eye flashing, and her voice clear and ringing, as if it was a question of a new victory, and it was her turn to put forth all the activity of a commander — with the exclamation, "Sire, an order for the governor of Fenestrella! An express messenger on the instant!" And she held the handkerchief stretched with both hands, that he might read it immediately.

Napoleon, after surveying her from head to foot, with an astonished and displeased air, turned on his heel and passed on. One would have said that he completed his review in her, — simply that she was the last to pass under inspection.

According to his usual habit, he then went to visit the field of battle, which no blood had reddened, and where lay upon the ground only the unripe harvest. The wheat and corn were trampled and cut to pieces. In some places the earth, deeply ploughed and torn, bore witness to the evolutions of the artillery; here and there were scattered the gauntlets of the dragoons, plumes and epaulets; then a few limping foot-soldiers and foundered horses, — that was all.

At one time, however, the affair had threatened to become more grave. The soldiers occupying the village of Marengo, in the character of Austrians, hesitated in performing their rôle of "vanquished," and prolonged their resistance beyond the time indicated in the programme. An active irritation was the result. The two regiments were of different corps, and were imbued with garrison rivalries. Insult and provocation resulted in the crossing of bayonets. A terrible collision seemed inevitable. Nothing but the utmost authority of the generals prevented the mock fight from becoming a real combat. At last they consented to fraternize in exchanging gourds; but the gourds were empty; to fill them they entered forcibly the cellars of the village. Excess ran riot; but at the cries of Vive l'Empereur! all was placed to the account of enthusiasm. After repeated parleys and health-drinkings, the "Austrians" consented to beat a reeling retreat, and the French victors made their entrance into Marengo, dancing the farandola, singing the Marseillaise, mingling with their shouts their old but now forbidden cry of Vive la république! Then all was placed to the account of drunkenness.

The troops having again formed in line, Napoleon distributed the cross of honor among the old soldiers who five years before had fought in the same place. In their turn the principal Cisalpine magistrates received decorations from him. Then, with Josephine, he laid the first stone of a monument destined to perpetuate the memory of the battle of Marengo. After which the Emperor, the Empress, the ambassadors, the magistrates, the people, and the army, returned to Alexandria.

And the fate of Picciola was not yet decided!

CHAPTER V.

On the evening of that day Josephine and Napoleon, after the official dinner at which they had been present, were in one of the apartments which had been prepared for them in the Hôtel de Ville of Alexandria, — the one dictating letters to his secretary, pacing the room and rubbing his hands with an air of satisfaction; the other before a lofty mirror admiring, with naive coquetry, the elegance of her robes and the splendor of the jewels with which she was adorned.

When the secretary was dismissed, Napoleon seated himself, and, leaning both his elbows upon a table covered with crimson velvet fringed with gold, rested his head on his hands and fell into a revery, the subject of which was far from painful, judging from the expression of his face.

But Josephine soon wearied of the silence which ensued. He had already once that day treated her rudely in the matter of the petition; and aware that she had been maladroit in too much precipitation, she determined again to choose the moment more wisely. She believed that now the right time had come; and seating herself on the other side of the table opposite her husband, she, too, leaned upon her elbows and, like him, affected an air of abstraction; soon their eyes met with a smile.

"What are you thinking of?" said Josephine to him, with a caressing tone and look.

"I am thinking," said he, "that the diadem is very becoming to you, and that it would be a great pity if I had neglected to place one in your jewel casket."

The smile of Josephine gradually faded, while that of Napoleon became more decided, for he loved to combat the painful apprehensions which always took possession of her when she contemplated the height to which they had lately risen. Noble woman! it was not for herself that she trembled.

"Are you not better pleased to see me Emperor than General?" pursued he.

"Certainly; as Emperor you have the right to grant mercy, and I have a favor to ask of you."

Now it was on the face of the husband that the smile faded, to brighten on the face of the wife. Knitting his brows, he prepared himself to be firm, fearing that the influence which Josephine exercised upon his heart might lead him into some foolish weakness.

"Again, Josephine! You have promised me not to attempt in this way again to interrupt the course of justice. Do you think that the right to exercise mercy is granted us only to satisfy the caprices of our hearts? No; we ought to use it only to soften the too rigorous punishment of the law, or to repair the errors of the tribunal. Always to extend the hand of forgiveness to one's enemies is only to augment their number and their insolence."

"Nevertheless, sire," replied Josephine, with difficulty restraining a burst of laughter, "you will accord me the favor that I implore of your Majesty."

"I doubt it."

"And I do not doubt it. First and before all I demand the removal of two oppressors! Yes, sire, let them be displaced; let them be driven out, forced away, if necessary!"

And, speaking thus, she covered her mouth with her handkerchief, for, seeing the astonished face of Napoleon, she could no longer restrain her mirth.

"How? you urge me to punish! you, Josephine? And who are the guilty ones?"

"Two paving-stones, sire, which are in the way, in a court-yard."

And the laughter so long restrained broke forth in a merry peal.

He rose quickly, and, crossing his arms behind him, regarded her with an air of doubt and surprise.

"How? what do you mean? Two paving-stones! Are you jesting?" — "No," said she; and rising, she approached him, and with her graceful Creole nonchalance leaning her two clasped hands on his shoulder, said, "On these two stones depend a precious existence. Listen to me, sire; I invoke all your good-will while I speak."

She then recounted to him the whole story of the petition, and all that she had learned from the young girl concerning the prisoner (whose name, however, she did not mention), and of the devotion of the poor child; and in speaking of the prisoner, of his flower, and the love which he bore it, the words flowed from her lips gracious, tender, caressing, full of charm and of that eloquence in which her heart so naturally expressed itself.

In listening the Emperor smiled, and the smile was born of admiration of his wife.

CHAPTER VI.

CHARNEY counted the hours, the minutes, the seconds. It seemed to him that the minutest divisions of time were heaping themselves one upon another to weigh upon and crush his flower. Two days had passed; no messenger brought him any tidings. Girhardi, restless and anxious, knew not what to think of this silence and delay; he suggested obstacles, answered for the zeal and devotion of the person charged with the message (without naming his daughter), and strove to rekindle in the heart of his companion a hope that was fast fading in his own. "Theresa, my child, what may have happened to thee?" said he to himself in despair.

The third day passed without bringing to him his daughter.

During the fourth day Girhardi did not show himself at the little window of the court. Charney could not see him; but had he listened attentively he might have heard the prayers, mingled with sobs, which the poor father addressed to Heaven to avert this new and terrible blow.

A black veil seemed to have been suddenly drawn over this wretched place, which, until now, even in the absence of liberty, had been visited by occasional rays of joy and happiness.

The plant drew nearer and nearer its end; and Charney, inconsolable, stood by, watching the death-agony of Picciola. He had a double cause of affliction,—the loss of the object of his affection, the charm of his life, and to have humiliated himself for naught. What! should his haughty head be bent in vain? Should he on his knees beg a favor, and be repulsed?

As if everything conspired against Charney, Ludovic, until now so communicative, so genuine, seemed to avoid even addressing a word to him. Taciturn and surly, he came and went in the performance of his duties, smoking his pipe, scarcely glancing at him, apparently vexed with him for his misfortune.

The truth was, that Ludovic, as soon as he knew of the refusal of the commandant, foresaw the time when he should find himself placed between his duty and his inclination. Duty must prevail, and he put on an air of brutality and ill-nature to give himself courage.

This mode of action is common with persons unrefined by education. They repress the generous impulses of their hearts when it is necessary for them to do harsh deeds, instead of softening the harshness by an expression of kindly feeling. It had been by deeds, not words, that Ludovic had always shown the goodness of his heart. Now that deeds of kindness were interdicted, he spoke no word. The secret pity which he felt for the man to whom his office compelled him to administer the tyranny of those in authority manifested itself in anger with the man himself. He forced himself to appear insensible in becoming the agent of a pitiless order. If so he could draw upon himself hatred, so much the better,—his duty would be easier. There must be war between the victim and the executioner,—between the captive and the jailer.

When the hour for the prisoner's dinner arrived, Ludovic saw Charney standing beside his plant in profound and mournful contemplation. He did not now, as formerly, advance gayly, saluting his god-daughter with caressing titles, and asking after the health of Monsieur and Madame; he crossed the court with a rapid step, affecting to suppose that Charney was in his chamber, and that he must hasten to carry him his dinner. But at a movement of Charney their eyes met, and Ludovic stood still, struck with surprise at the change that so few days had wrought in the countenance of the prisoner.

Watching and anxiety had furrowed his brow; his colorless lips and face, his wasted cheeks, gave him a broken air, which the disorder of his hair and beard made still more marked. Spite of himself, Ludovic was stirred by pitiful emotion during this survey; but all at once, recalling, without doubt, his grand resolutions, he glanced from the man to the plant, winked ironically, shrugged his shoulders with a mocking gesture, whistled an air, and was about to take his departure, when, with a mournful but expressive voice, Charney said to him, "Ludovic, what have I done to you?"

"To me?—to me?—nothing," replied the jailer, troubled by the tone of reproach, and more moved than he wished to appear.

"Then," said the Count, advancing towards him and seizing his hand, "let us save her! there is yet time, and I have found the means. Yes; it cannot trouble the commandant: indeed, he need know nothing of it. Procure for me some earth and a box,—we will raise the stones,—but only for an instant. Who will know it? We will transplant—"

"Tut, tut, tut!" said Ludovic, brusquely drawing away his hand; "to the devil with your flower! It has made trouble enough for all of us, to begin with you, who will fall ill again. Make a drink of her; that is all she is good for now."

Charney regarded him with a glance of indignation and scorn.

"If only you were concerned," continued Ludovic; "it is your affair, and that is all; but the poor old man that you have deprived of his daughter,—he will never see her again. and to you he will owe it all."

"His daughter! How?" cried the Count.

"Ay, how, to be sure!" continued the other, setting his basket of provisions on the ground, crossing his arms, and taking the attitude and air of a man who is going to scold vigorously; "one whips the horses, and does not wish the carriage to roll on! One strikes the dagger, and is surprised at the wound! What nonsense! You wished to write to the Emperor, and you did so; very well,—it is against the orders of the commandant, and he will punish you when he hears of it; that is right enough. But you needed a messenger to carry your letter, since you could not carry it yourself. This messenger was the young lady."

"What! that young girl—she—"

"You may affect astonishment; did you suppose your correspondence with the Emperor was to be by telegraph?—the telegraph has other work to do. At all events, the commandant has discovered all;—I do not know how,—by the guide, perhaps, for the young lady could not travel the route alone. Now the gate of the citadel is closed to her; she and her father must live apart. Whose fault is it?"

Charney buried his face in his hands. "Unfortunate old man!" said he; "his only consolation!—And does he know?—"

"He has known all since yesterday. Judge how much he loves you.—But your dinner is getting cold."

And Ludovic raised the basket, and conveyed it into the chamber of the prisoner.

The Count sank overwhelmed upon his bench. For an instant he felt that he himself would crush Picciola with one blow, and so end all; but his courage failed. Then a ray of hope shot through his mind. "That poor young girl, who has so generously devoted herself to the cause of Picciola, and whose zeal in seeking succor for an unfortunate has met so cruel a reward, may have returned. Perhaps she was admitted to the Emperor. Yes, it is so! Without doubt she has succeeded, and it is that which has irritated the commandant against her. If he has in his hands the order for the liberation of Picciola, why is it delayed? He must obey the Emperor's will! O, blessings on thee, noble girl! Unfortunate child, separated from thy father on account of me! O, the half of my life, how gladly would I give it for thee, for thy happiness! I would give it only that the door of this prison might be opened to thee!"

CHAPTER VII.

Scarcely half an hour had elapsed, when two civil officers wearing the national scarf, accompanied by the commandant of Fenestrella, presented themselves before Charney, and invited him to ascend to his chamber. When there, the commandant spoke.

He was a corpulent man, with a round bald head and thick gray mustache. A scar, from his left eyebrow to his upper lip, seemed to divide his face in two. A long blue coat, with broad skirts, buttoned to the throat, top-boots over his pantaloons, his hair slightly powdered, curling at the side, spurs to his boots (without doubt a mark of distinction, for the rheumatism as well as the exigencies of the place made him in fact the first prisoner in the citadel), — such was the exterior of this personage, whose only weapon was a cane.

Appointed to the custody of political prisoners, most of whom belonged to distinguished families, he prided himself on his fine manners, notwithstanding his frequent loss of temper, and on his fine language, in spite of accustomed grammatical errors. He held himself erect, had a voice strong and emphatic, made many flourishes in saluting, and scratched his forehead when speaking.

With these qualities, Colonel Morand, commandant of Fenestrella, yet passed for a fine specimen of a military man.

From the tone of courtesy with which he addressed him, and the official air of his two companions, Charney believed that they had brought an order of mercy for Picciola.

The commandant wished him to say whether he had ever used him unhandsomely in the exercise of his functions, by want of care or abuse of power.

This preamble was a good augury. Charney certified all that the commandant desired.

"You know, monsieur," continued the commandant, "that during your illness all cares were lavished upon you; if it did not please you to submit to the prescriptions of the physicians, it was neither their fault nor mine. I thought that your convalescence would be hastened by the freer use of air and exercise, and almost entire liberty was accorded you to come and go in your court at your pleasure."

Charney thanked him by an inclination of his head, but his impatience showed itself in the compression of his lips.

"Nevertheless, monsieur," pursued the commandant, in the tone of a man whose feelings have been wounded, and whose consideration has been unappreciated, "you have infringed the laws of the fortress, of which you could not have been in ignorance. You have almost compromised me in my relations with the Governor of Piedmont, General Menou, and even with the Emperor himself, in causing to be placed before him a petition — "

"Placed before him! he has then received it?" interrupted Charney.

"Yes, monsieur."

"Well?" said the unfortunate man, trembling with hope.

"For this breach of discipline," said the commandant, "you are to be transferred to one of the cells of the old bastion, and to be kept in solitary confinement for one month."

"But as to the petition," cried Charney, endeavoring still to combat the cruel reality which was dispelling his last illusions, — "what did the Emperor say?"

"The Emperor does not trouble himself about such nonsense!" was the disdainful reply.

Charney sank into the only chair with which his chamber was furnished, and from that moment seemed unconscious of all that was passing around him.

"That is not all," said the commandant: "your means of communication known, your relations with the world outside discovered, it is natural to suppose that your correspondence may be more extensive. Have you written to others beside his Majesty?"

The commandant waited in vain for a reply, and resumed, in a dryer tone, —

"A visit of inspection has been ordered, and these gentlemen, delegated by the Governor of Turin, will proceed at once to perform the duty in your presence, as the law commands. Before the execution of the order, do you desire to make any revelations? Any such can only act favorably on your case."

The same silence on the part of the prisoner.

The commandant frowned till his bald head was wrinkled to the top, and, turning towards the officials, said, "Proceed, messieurs."

The two then commenced a most vigorous examination, from the chimney to the mattress of the bed, and even the linings of the clothes of the prisoner.

During this time the commandant paced slowly back and forth in the narrow chamber, striking, one by one, with the end of his cane, each plank of the floor, to judge whether it might not cover some secret excavation for the concealment of important papers, or even preparations for an escape. He recalled to mind Latude and others, who had escaped from the Bastile. Three moats, deep and wide, walls ten feet in thickness, gratings, counterscarps, ramparts bristling with cannon, sentinels at every postern and on every parapet, had been of no avail against the perseverance of a man armed with a cord and a nail.

Fenestrella was far from presenting such a girdle of strength and security. Since 1796 only part of the fortifications had been kept in repair, and it was only guarded by a few sentinels outside of the outer walls.

After researches as prolonged as it was possible to make in so small a room, nothing suspicious was found except a little glass bottle containing a black liquid, doubtless the ink of the prisoner.

Interrogated as to the means employed by him to obtain this ink, he turned on his chair towards the window, and commenced drumming on the glass with his fingers, making no reply to the question.

The dressing-case remained to be examined. They demanded the key. He let it fall, rather than gave it to them.

Colonel Morand no longer showed the same courtesy of look and manner. He was nearly suffocated with rage. With purple face and flashing eyes, maddened by the confined space of the chamber, he constantly buttoned and unbuttoned his coat with trembling hands, as if to give vent to the transport of anger which possessed him.

Suddenly, by a spontaneous movement, the satellites of justice, occupied in taking an inventory of the contents of the dressing-case, holding it in one hand and examining it with the other, came quickly to the window, to bring the full light of day to bear upon it, and, with joyous faces, exclaimed with one voice, "We have it! we have it!"

Then drawing out from under the double bottom a quantity of handkerchiefs covered with fine and close writing, they were sure that they had discovered proofs of a vast conspiracy.

At the sight of the profanation of his precious archives, Charney rose, extended his arm as if to snatch them, opened his mouth; then, suddenly calming himself, he again sat down, and remained immovable, without having pronounced a word.

But this first expressive start had sufficed to cause the commandant to attach a high importance to the capture.

By his order the handkerchiefs were at once deposited in a bag, sealed, and labelled; the bottle and even the toothpick were confiscated. A report was prepared, and Charney requested to sign it, to attest its exactitude. With this request, by a gesture, he refused to comply.

Record is made of this refusal, and his immediate transfer to the cell of the old bastion is ordered.

Ah, how painful, vague, and confused were the thoughts that crowded his brain, but one sentiment of grief overpowered all others in the heart of the stricken man. He had not even given a mocking smile at the triumph of these men in carrying off the record of his observations on his plant, thinking them materials for law proceedings and proofs of conspiracy. Alas, he was to be forever separated from his souvenirs! The lover from whom are taken the letters and the portrait of his adored mistress whom he will never see again can alone understand the profound anguish of the prisoner. To save Picciola he had compromised his pride, his honor; he had broken the heart of an old man and darkened the life of a young girl; and of all which had made life of any value to him nothing remained, not even the lines traced by him recording his sacred studies.

CHAPTER VIII.

The intercession of Josephine had not, then, been as effective as it had at first promised to be. After her gentle pleading for the plant and the prisoner, when she placed in Napoleon's hand the handkerchief containing the missive, he recalled the offence to his pride given by the malapropos distraction of the Empress during the exhibition of the morning at Marengo, and the signature of Charney increased the disagreeable impression.

"Has the man become insane?" said he; "what comedy does he pretend to play with me? A Jacobin botanist! I shall not be surprised to hear Marat go into ecstasies over the beauties of nature, or to see Couthon present himself at the convention with a rose in his buttonhole."

Josephine would have raised her voice to object to the title of Jacobin so carelessly given to the Count, but at this moment a chamberlain came to announce to the Emperor that the generals, the ambassadors, as well as the deputies of the Italian provinces, awaited him in the hall of reception. He hastened to join them. When there, inspired more by their presence than by the contents of the petition, he took occasion, from the name of the petitioner, to break forth with great violence against idealists and philosophers; returning again to the Jacobins, declaring that he knew very well how to subdue and bring them to seek for mercy. And he raised his voice with a tone of menace and resolution, not that he was really as much excited as he wished to make it appear, but, always ready to take advantage of circumstances, he wished that his words should be heard and repeated, especially by the Prussian ambassador present in the assembly. It was his proclamation of his divorce from the principles of the Revolution.

To please the master each one added something to the speech. The Governor of Turin, above all, Jacques-Abdallah Menou, forgetting, or rather denying, his former principles, broke out into violent attacks upon the Brutuses of the clubs and taverns of Italy and France, and there was soon in the imperial circle a unanimous chorus of virulent imprecations against conspirators, revolutionists, and Jacobins, such that Josephine began to tremble before the terrible storm which she had raised.

Recovering somewhat from her alarm, she approached the ear of Napoleon, and in a half-laughing tone said, —

"Sire, why all this violence? It is not a matter of Jacobins and revolutionists, but of a poor flower who has never conspired against any one."

The Emperor shrugged his shoulders. "Do you believe that I am duped by such idle talk?" cried he. "This Charney is a dangerous man, and not a fool. The flower is the pretext; the end, the raising of the stones. It is an escape that he is planning. Menou, see that he is well guarded. And how has he been able to send his petition without its passing through the hand of the commandant? Is this the sort of surveillance that exists in the prisons of state!"

The Empress tried once more to defend her protégée.

"Enough, Madame," said the master.

And Josephine, abashed and discouraged, was silenced, and dropped her eyes under the look with which he regarded her.

Menou, vexed by the reprimand of the Emperor, had not been sparing of his reproaches to the commandant of Fenestrella, and he in his turn had hastened to treat with rigor the two prisoners to whom he owed such sharp rebuke.

Girhardi, already separated from his daughter, — who, with a heart full of hope, had only come in sight of the gates of the fortress to be met with an order to quit immediately the territory of Fenestrella, to return there no more, — had that morning been subjected, like Charney, to a domiciliary visit; but there had resulted from it nothing that could compromise him.

But emotions more painful than those resulting from the taking away of his manuscript were reserved for the Count.

When, to pass to the cell of the bastion, he descended to the court-yard, following the commandant and his two acolytes, whether Colonel Morand had not noticed it in passing before, or that he wished to be revenged for the obstinate silence of Charney during his visit, his anger seemed to be redoubled at the sight of the slight scaffolding erected around the plant.

"What is all this?" said he to Ludovic. "Is it thus that you watch your prisoners?"

"That, my Colonel," replied he, hesitating, with a sort of groan, with one hand taking his pipe from his mouth and with the other touching his cap with a military salute, "that is the plant, you know, which is so good for the gout and other maladies."

Then, letting his right arm fall to his side, with his left he replaced his pipe in its habitual place.

"Truly," resumed the Colonel, "if these gentlemen were allowed to have their way, the chambers and the courts of the citadel would become gardens, menageries, shops. Come! out of the way with this weed at once, as well as all this rubbish about it!"

Ludovic regarded in turn the plant, Charney, and the commandant; then attempted to murmur some words of justification.

"Be quiet, and obey instantly," cried the Colonel.

Ludovic removed his pipe from his mouth, extinguished it, shook out the ashes, laid it upon a ledge of the wall, and prepared to execute the order. He divested himself of his coat and cap, and rubbed his hands together as if to gain courage. All at once, as if he acquired new strength from the anger of his chief, he seized and threw away the mattings of braided straw; he tore them to pieces and dispersed them about the court with a sort of rage. Next in turn came the twigs which had served as supports for the matting; these he pulled up one after the other, broke them over his knee, and trod them under his feet. It seemed as if his old affection for Picciola had turned to hate, and that he was wreaking his vengeance upon her.

During this time Charney stood motionless, with his eyes fixed eagerly upon his plant, thus left shelterless, as if with his gaze he would still protect it.

The day had been cool and the sky cloudy. The stem had raised its head somewhat since the day before, and from the withered branches had sprung several little verdant shoots. It seemed as if Picciola were gathering all her strength to die.

What! Picciola, his Picciola! his world of reality and his world of illusions, the pivot on which turned his life, that which irradiated his thoughts, — all to be annihilated! And he, poor captive, the expiation of whose crime Providence had suspended, was to be suddenly arrested in his progress towards true knowledge. How should he henceforth occupy his sad leisure? What will fill the void in his heart? Picciola, the desert hitherto peopled by thee is to become again a desert. No more projects, no more study, no more intoxicating dreams, no more observations to record, nothing more to love! O, how narrow will his prison seem! how heavy the air which he will breathe! It will be only a tomb, — the tomb of Picciola! This golden branch, this sibylline bough which has had power to exorcise the evil demons with which he was possessed, will be no longer there to defend him against himself. Can he live again his old life of an incredulous philosopher face to face with his bitter thoughts? No! sooner die than enter again into that chilling night from which she has drawn him!

At this moment Charney saw a shadow pass the little grated window. It was the old man.

"Ah," said he to himself, "I have snatched from him his only blessing; I have deprived him of his daughter! Without doubt he comes to curse me and to rejoice in my torment."

As he glanced up he could see that he was clasping the bars of the window with his feeble hands, which trembled with emotion. Charney did not dare to raise his eyes to ask from the bottom of his heart pardon of the only man whose esteem he cared to possess; he feared to see on that noble countenance the justly merited expression of reproach or disdain; and when their eyes did meet, the look of tender compassion with which the poor father (forgetting his own griefs to sympathize with those of his companion in misfortune) regarded him, touched the depth of his heart, and two tears, the only ones that he had ever shed, sprang from his eyes.

These tears were sweet to him, but his pride caused him to dash them quickly away. He would not be suspected of cowardly weakness by the men who surrounded him.

Of all the witnesses of this scene, the two officials alone, indifferent spectators, seemed to understand nothing of the drama which they witnessed. They looked by turns at the prisoner, the old man, the commandant, the jailer, — were astonished at the lively and diverse emotions imprinted on each face, and whisperingly wondered whether some important hiding-place was not concealed underneath this plant so carefully barricaded.

However, the fatal work proceeded. Directed by the Colonel, Ludovic attempted to throw down the supports of the rustic bench; but they resisted his efforts.

"An axe, take an axe," cried the Colonel.

Ludovic took one; it slipped from his hands.

"Finish immediately!" said the Colonel.

At the first blow the seat cracked; at the third it fell to the ground. Then Ludovic bent over the plant standing alone in the midst of the debris.

The face of the Count was wan and dejected; the sweat stood in large drops upon his brow.

"Monsieur, monsieur, why kill it? It will soon die itself," cried he at last, descending again to the character of suppliant.

The Colonel looked at him, smiled ironically, and in his turn made no reply.

"Then," said Charney, with violence, "I will crush it! I will tear it up myself!"

"I forbid you to touch it!" said the commandant, with his harsh voice, extending his cane before Charney as if to place a barrier between the prisoner and his darling. Then, in obedience to an imperative order from him, Ludovic seized Picciola with his two hands, and was about to uproot it from the earth.

The Count, struck dumb with grief, stood gazing at it.

At the base of the stem, near the lowest branches, where the sap still flowed, a little blossom, fresh and brilliant, was just opening. Already the others hung drooping upon their withered stems. This one alone still had life; it alone was not wounded, crushed, stifled, by the grasp of the large, rough hands of the jailer. The corolla, slightly shaded by a few leaves, was turned towards Charney. He fancied that its perfume was exhaled towards him, and through eyes dim with gathering tears, he seemed to see it bud, expand, and die. The man and the plant exchanged a last farewell look.

If at this moment, when so many passions and interests were centred in a humble plant, strangers had suddenly entered that prison-court, where the heavens shed only a sombre and dim light, would they not have judged from the picture that met their view, — these emissaries of justice with their tricolored scarfs, this military chief issuing his pitiless orders, — that they were witnessing some secret and bloody execution, — that Ludovic was the executioner, and Charney the criminal to whom his sentence had just been read? And is it not so? They come! these strangers enter! Behold them!

One is an aide-de-camp of General Menou; the other a page of the Empress. The dust with which they are covered shows with what haste they have travelled.

They came but just in time.

At the noise which announced their entrance, Ludovic relaxed his grasp of Picciola, raised his head, and he and Charney, both with pale faces, gazed at each other.

The aide-de-camp delivered to Colonel Morand an order from the Governor of Turin; the Colonel read it, and with a hesitating movement took two or three turns in the court-yard, striking his cane on the ground, — compared the missive which he had just received with that of the day before, — then at last, after raising his eyebrows again and again in token of great astonishment, he put on a semi-courteous air, approached Charney, and graciously gave into his hands the letter of the General.

The prisoner read aloud what follows: —

"His Majesty the Emperor and King has transmitted to me the order, Monsieur the Commandant, to inform you that he consents to the request of Monsieur Charney relative to the plant which is growing between the pavements of the prison-court. Those which incommode it must be raised. I charge you to see to the execution of this order, and to consult upon the subject with Monsieur Charney."

"Vive l'empereur!" cried Ludovic.

"Vive l'empereur!" murmured another voice, which seemed to issue from the wall.

During the reading the commandant stood leaning upon his cane; the two men of the scarfs, unable to find the key to all this, seemed confounded, and sought in their own minds some connection between these events and the conspiracy which they had imagined. The aide-de-camp and the page wondered why such haste had been necessary. At last the page, addressing himself to Charney, said, "There is a postscript from the Empress."

And Charney read on the margin: —

"I recommend Monsieur Charney to the kind care of Colonel Morand. I shall be particularly obliged to him for all that he can do to alleviate the condition of his prisoner. "JOSEPHINE."

"Vive l'impératrice!" cried Ludovic.

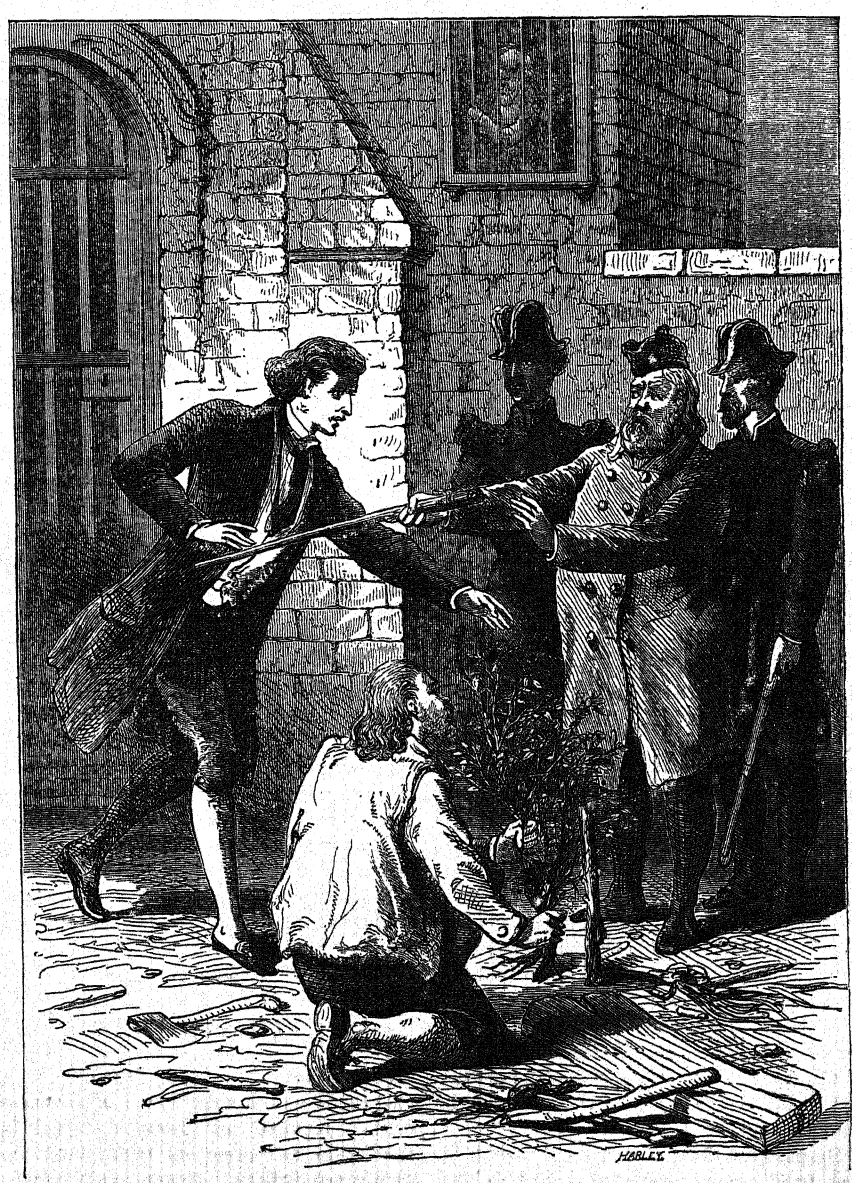
Charney kissed the signature, and held the paper several minutes before his eyes.



PICCIOLA IN PERIL.

BOOK III.

CHAPTER I.

THE commandant of Fenestrella resumed all his courtesy towards the protégée of her Majesty, the Empress and Queen. Not only was Charney not removed to the cell of the bastion, but he was allowed to reconstruct all the frames for sheltering Picciola, who now, languishing from her semi-transplanting, more than ever needed them.

Colonel Morand had so well calmed his rage against the man and the plant, that every morning Ludovic was sent with a message from him, asking if Charney desired anything, and inquiring after the health of Picciola.

Taking advantage of this good-will, Charney obtained from his munificence pens, ink, and paper, in order to record anew from memory his studies and observations on vegetable physiology; for the letter of the Governor of Turin did not annul the right of search and seizure. The two emissaries of justice had carried away his archives on cambric, and after a profound examination, declaring that they were unable, notwithstanding their efforts, to find the key of this correspondence, they had despatched it all to Paris, to the minister of police, there to be studied, analyzed, deciphered, by experts.

But a far more important privation, a loss which he could not supply, was imposed upon Charney.

The commandant, revenging upon Girhardi the reproaches of General Menou concerning his careless surveillance, had banished him to another part of the fortress. This separation, which threw the old man into complete isolation, weighed upon the heart of Charney with bitter self-condemnation, and nullified the effect of the favors of the Colonel to himself.

He passed a great part of the day with his eyes fixed upon the grating and the closed window. In imagination he again beheld the good old man at the moment when with great effort he pressed his arm through the lower bars, vainly endeavoring to touch a friendly hand; he saw his petition to the Emperor grazing the wall, as, tied to the end of a cord, it mounted to that window, from him to Girhardi, from Girhardi to Theresa, from Theresa to the Empress; and behind these bars again shone forth the look of pity and pardon which had so lately come to him with such sustaining power in the midst of his anguish; and he heard the cry of joy burst from a broken heart when the message of mercy to Picciola had at last come.

It is to him, to them, that he owes that mercy, and for that mad attempt which could only benefit him, they alone had been punished, — cruelly punished. Poor father! poor daughter!

In imagination he often saw her again in the same place where he had seen her for one moment on his awaking from that painful dream which to him predicted the death of his plant. On that day, in the confusion of his thoughts, he had seemed to recognize in her all the features of the Picciola of his dreams; and it is thus that he now pictures her.

As the prisoner was nourishing these sweet visions, with his eyes turned to the former residence of Girhardi, something stirred behind the dim and dusty glass; the little window was opened, — a woman appeared at the grating. Her skin was brown and swarthy; she had an enormous goitre, and evil, avaricious eyes. It was the wife of Ludovic.

From that time Charney saw no more bright visions in looking at the little window.

CHAPTER II.

FREED from her fetters, surrounded by good earth, with a large frame of pavement, Picciola repaired her disasters, raised her head again, and came out triumphant from all her tribulations. Nevertheless, she had lost her flowers, with the exception of the last little blossom which had opened at the base of the stem.

In the swelling seed which ripened in the calyx, Charney foresaw new and sublime discoveries. For now there could be full development; there was more than enough earth for Picciola. She might become a mother, and see her children grow up under her shadow.

In watching it, he was seized with a desire to know the true name of this companion with whom he had passed such happy hours.

"What! shall I not give to Picciola, the poor foundling, the name with which science or custom has dowered her beforehand, in common with her sisters of the mountains and plains?"

The next time the commandant visited him, Charney spoke to him of his desire to possess a work on botany. Without refusing his demand, the Colonel, wishing to screen himself from responsibility, referred the matter to the Governor of Piedmont. Menou hastened, not only to send him one work upon the subject, but despatched an enormous pile of volumes from the library of Turin, to aid the prisoner in his researches,—"hoping," wrote he, "that her Majesty, the Empress and Queen, well versed herself in this sort of knowledge, as in many others, would not be displeased to know the name of that flower in which she had shown such a lively interest."

At the sight of this mass of science, which Ludovic, bending under the weight of the burden, brought to him, Charney smiled.

"Is there, then, need of such heavy artillery," said he, "to induce my flower to give me her name?"

Nevertheless, it was with a sentiment of real pleasure that he once more held a book in his hand. He turned over the leaves with that thrill of curiosity which in old times he had felt when the mysteries of science were his chief interest. The only knowledge that he desired and coveted now was concerning flowers, the knowledge of Nature in her most lovely expression of herself.

"If ever I am released from this prison," said he to himself, "I will be a botanist. There, no more scholastic controversies and pedantries, which mislead instead of enlightening. Nature must show herself always the same to her disciples, always true though changing, always beautiful though unadorned."

And he interrogated the newly arrived volumes, asking them also their names and titles. There were the "Species Plantarum" of Linnæus, the "Institutiones rei herbariæ" of Tournefort, the "Theatrum Botanicum" of Bauhin, the "Phytographia," the "Dendrologia," the "Agrostographia" of Plukenet, of Aldrovande, and of Scheuchzer; besides many others, both French and Italian.

Although somewhat dismayed at this formidable mass of science, Charney was not discouraged, and, as a preparation for his premeditated researches, he opened first the smallest of the volumes to look at the index, to see how great a variety of denominations a vegetable could bear.

He would have liked to choose in this floral calendar between Alcea, Alisima, Andryala, Bromelia, Celosia, Coronilla, Euphrasia, Helvella, Passiflora, Primula, Santolina, or other names sweet to the lips, harmonious to the ear.

All at once the fear presented itself that his plant might bear a harsh and ungraceful name, a name with a masculine or neuter termination, which would be at variance with all his ideas concerning his little friend and companion.

What would become of the young girl of his dreams if he was obliged to apply to her such a designation as Hydrocharis, or Satyrium, or Gossypium, Cynoglossum, or Cucubalus, Cenchrus, Ruscus! or even some common name more barbarous still; as, Rest-ox, Flytrap, Sow-bread, Poor-man's-herb, Crane's-bill, Dog's-tooth, Hare's-ear, Fox's-tail, Snapdragon, Goat's-beard, or Hart's-tongue? Would it not be enough to disenchant him forever? No! he would not risk such a trial.

Spite of himself, however, he took up in turn each volume, turned over the leaves, and went into ecstasies over the innumerable marvels of nature, but was irritated by the love of system in men, which had made of that study, heretofore so attractive to him, the hardest, most technical, most involved of the sciences.

For eight days he devoted himself to the analysis of his plant, in order to learn her name, but without success.

In this chaos of strange words, tossed from one system to another, bewildered in the midst of this vast and ponderous synonymy, —a veritable iron network covering the science of botany as if to hide its charms, and weighing upon it almost to the point of suffocation, —in vain he consulted all the authors, one after the other, descending from class to order, from order to genus, from genus to species, from species to variety, constantly losing the trace, and ending by cursing his unfaithful guides always at variance with each other, not only concerning the general nomenclature, but sometimes also as to the name and functions of each organ of the plant.

In the midst of his investigations, a thousand times repeated, the little flower, the only flower, interrogated petal by petal, examined even to the depth of its calyx, suddenly became detached under the hand of the analyzer, the dissector, and fell, carrying with it all projects for the study of the seed and all hope of fructification.

Charney, filled with dismay, stood for a time speechless, then apostrophizing with an agitated voice and a wrathful look the volumes which lay open upon his knees and around him, —

"Why did I ever think of consulting you?" cried he. "She shall be called Picciola! nothing but Picciola, the prisoner's plant, his consolatrice, his friend. What need has she of another name, and why do I wish to know any other? Fool that I am! is there no remedy for this thirst for knowledge? Can one never be cured of it?"

And following an angry impulse, he seized the books one after the other, and dashed them to the ground. A bit of paper fell from the leaves of one of them and fluttered into the court. Charney picked it up, and found that it contained these few words, recently written, and in the handwriting of a woman: —

"Hope, and tell your neighbor to hope, for I do not forget either of you."

CHAPTER III.

Charney read and reread twenty times this note, of which the meaning could not be doubtful; for, among women, one only had been for him all heart, all devotion: and that woman he had scarcely seen; he did not know the sound of her voice; and if suddenly she should stand before him, he would not recognize her. But by what means had she been able to elude the vigilance of his Arguses and get this letter to his hands? "Tell your neighbor to hope!" Poor daughter, who dared not name her father! Poor father, to whom he could not even show this souvenir of his daughter!

In thinking of this good old man, whose burden of sorrow he had been the means of making so heavy, and whose pain he was not permitted to assuage, Charney was broken-hearted with regret, and in his sleepless nights the image of the unhappy Girhardi was ever before him.

During one of these nights an unusual noise was heard in the chamber above his, which had, till then, been unoccupied; this filled his mind with conjectures, each one more strange than the other.

In the morning, Ludovic entered his chamber with an air of business, and although he endeavored to compose his countenance with discretion, his eyes, sparkling and animated, announced some great news.

"What is the matter?" said Charney to him; "and what happened last night in the room above?"

"O, nothing, Signor Count, nothing, except that there arrived yesterday several new prisoners, and the chambers which have been vacant will now be occupied. Yes," pursued he, with an affected tone of consideration, "it will be necessary for you to share the enjoyment of your court-yard with a companion in captivity; but do not be troubled, we receive here only good honest men: (when I say honest men, I mean there are no thieves among them.) But here comes the new man to make you his installation visit."

At this unexpected announcement, Charney rose, filled with surprise, but hardly knowing whether to be pleased or annoyed by this change, when he looked up and saw at the door of his room Girhardi!

Without a word they sprang to meet each other; their clasped hands bore witness to their joy, and through their eyes their souls met.

"Well, well," said Ludovic, laughing, "I see that the acquaintance will be soon made"; and he went out, leaving the two together in a transport of delight.

After this moment of most expressive silence, "Who, then, has reunited us?" said Charney.

"It is my daughter, I cannot doubt it. How can I be mistaken? All the happiness that has come to me in my life has been through her."

Charney bowed his head with a confused air, and his hands pressed again those of the old man. Then drawing from his dressing-case a little paper, he presented it to him, saying, "Do you know this handwriting?"

"It is hers!" cried Girhardi; "it is the writing of my daughter, of my Theresa! No, she has not forgotten us, and there has been no delay in the fulfilment of promise, since we are now reunited. But how did you receive this?"

Charney told him, — and then, without thinking, made a movement as if to take possession of it again; but seeing Girhardi hold it with hands trembling from emotion, reading it slowly word by word, letter by letter, kissing it a hundred times, he felt that it no longer belonged to him, and with the thought came a sharp pang of regret which he could not explain to himself.

After the first moments, in which they talked of Theresa, with all possible conjectures as to her fate and the place where she might be, Girhardi, looking with a sentiment of curiosity about the chamber of his host, stopped before each of the inscriptions on the wall.

The modification of two of them by added words, the new-comer had no doubt was owing to the influence of the plant, and he could easily appreciate the importance of the part it had played in its effect upon the prisoner.

One of the sentences contained these words: —

"Mankind are on the earth, as they will hereafter be under it, — side by side, but without any bond of union. For the body, the world is a populous arena, where one is jostled on all sides; for the heart, it is a solitary desert."

Girhardi took a bit of charcoal and added, — "If one has not a friend!"

Then turning gently to his companion, he opened to him his arms.

Still under the influence of the thoughts which had stirred his inmost soul, with palpitating heart and moistened eyes, Charney threw himself upon the offered breast, and the two sealed the holy pact of friendship by a long and earnest embrace.

The next day they breakfasted together tête-à-tête in Charney's room, one seated on the bed, the other on the chair, having between them the little carved table, upon which, beside the double ration of the prison, was a fine lake-trout, lobsters from the Cenise, a bottle of excellent Mondovi wine, and an appetizing morsel of Milesian cheese, known throughout Italy under the name of rubiola. This was a feast for captives! But Girhardi did not lack money, nor the commandant complaisance, since his new orders.

Their conversation was full of confidence and sweetness.

Charney had never so enjoyed the pleasures of the table; never had repast seemed to him so delicious. If exercise and the waters of Eurotas served as seasoning to the black broth of the Spartans, the presence and conversation of a friend adds still more to the flavor of the most simple dishes.

Confidences naturally followed. The two already loved each other so well, though knowing each other so slightly. Without questions, without hesitations, without preamble, simply as the fulfilment of the contract of friendship entered into the day before, Charney recounted his pride and self-satisfaction in his studies, and the ridiculously vain folly of his youth. The old man then spoke, and confessed also the errors of his early life.

CHAPTER IV.

GIRHARDI was born in Turin, where his father possessed extensive works for the manufacture of arms.

Through Piedmont, ideas, as well as merchandise, had always passed from France to Italy and from Italy to France. Of the one, as of the other, some remained by the way. The breath of France had blown upon his father: he was a philosopher, a disciple of Voltaire, a reformist. The breath of Italy had blown upon his mother: she was a dévote to excess. As to him, poor child, — loving, respecting, listening to them both with the same confidence, — he necessarily partook of the two natures. Republican, dévot, he dreamed of the united reign of religion and liberty, — a charming alliance, without doubt, but to be arranged according to his ideas ; and he was twenty. Then, one was young at twenty years.

He hastened to pledge himself to both parties.

At that time the Piedmontese nobility enjoyed certain privileges humiliating to other classes of society. They alone, for example, could occupy a box at the theatre, and — would one believe it ? — dance at a public ball ! for the dance was held to be an aristocratic exercise, and the common people were only allowed to be present as spectators.

At the head of a band of young men of the people, Giacomo Girhardi one day openly braved this singular privilege. He boldly formed a plebeian quadrille in the midst of the quadrilles of the nobles. The patrician dancers were indignant ; the plebeian dancers and spectators raised vociferous cries in claiming the dance for all. To that seditious clamor, other cries of "liberty" succeeded ; and in the tumult which followed, after twenty challenges offered and refused, not from cowardice but from pride, the imprudent Girhardi, carried away by the ardor of his youth and his ideas, struck a blow upon the cheek of one of the proudest and most highly titled of his adversaries.

The insult was serious. The powerful family of San Marsano swore to be avenged ; the chevaliers of Saint Maurice, even those of the Annunciade, in short, all the nobility of the country, who, in their peril, became one body, — each one felt himself insulted in his own proper person.

By the order of his father, Giacomo took refuge with one of his relatives, vicar of a small village in the principality of Masserano, in the environs of Bielle. But, notwithstanding his flight, he was condemned, for contumacy, to five years' exile from Turin.

The unwise importance given to the affair, which was called "the dancing conspiracy," made a hero of Giacomo in the eyes of his companions. Some regarded him as the avenger of the people ; others, as one of those dangerous innovators who dream of a universal republic ; and while at court the giver of blows was denounced as one of the most active members of the democratic party, the poor young factionist was quietly aiding the vicar in his parish duties, a constant attendant at church, and a devout communicant.

This troubled commencement of a life which promised to flow so calmly influenced for a long time the fate of Giacomo Girhardi. The old man paid dearly for the follies of the young man, for upon his arrest for his pretended crime against the First Consul, his accusers did not fail to lay great stress upon the judgment which had long ago been passed upon him as a disturber of the peace and an ungovernable republican.

From the time of his leaving Turin, and during his exile, that love of equality which he had received from his father was extinguished within him, and the religious sentiments which he inherited from his mother developed more and more.

He soon carried them to excess ; and his relative, the good and worthy ecclesiastic, whose intentions were excellent, but whose views were perhaps somewhat contracted, instead of trying to calm his enthusiasm, excited and encouraged it, hoping to make for him of Christian humility a buckler against the impetuosity of his character. Later he saw how unwise his course had been.

Giacomo had but one desire, made but one vow, — to be a priest.

To ward off this blow, which would deprive them of their only son, his father and mother withdrew him from the tutelage of the vicar, and taking advantage of his affection for them, they persuaded, or rather constrained him by supplications and tears, to marry.

Giacomo married ; but his marriage resulted very differently from their expectations. His wife was young and beautiful, and he inspired her with the most tender affection. He used his influence over her heart, and all the power of his impassioned eloquence, not to set before her the joys of home, but the delights of a religious life. He succeeded completely, — so well, that his young wife retired to a convent, and he returned to the environs of Bielle.

At a short distance from the village rose a chain of mountains, the last spur of the Pennine Alps. At the base of Mount Mucrone, the most elevated of these mountains, was a little valley, sombre and dark, enveloped in mist, bristling with rocks, bordered by precipices seeming from a distance to answer to Dante's description of the mouth of hell. But as one approached nearer, the rocks showed themselves decked with verdure pleasing to the sight; the precipices were declivities with gentle slopes, where flowering shrubs formed a ladder of vegetation; the little hills were covered with natural thickets; the mists, changing in hue with the rays of the sun, by turns white, rose-colored, violet, at last wholly disappeared. Then one perceived, at the bottom of the lovely valley, a lake five hundred feet wide, fed by springs, and from which sprang, with murmuring music, the little river of Oroppa, which, after flowing a short distance, encircles one of the hills of the chain at the summit of which is a church erected at great cost, and dedicated by the piety of the people to the Virgin Mary. This church is the most celebrated in the country.

If we believe the legend, Saint Eusebius, on his return from Syria, deposited in this isolated place the statue in wood of the Virgin, carved by Saint Luke the Evangelist, that it might be preserved from the profanations of the Arians.

In this little valley, on the point of these rocks, on the slopes of these precipices, on the banks of this lake and this river, on this mountain, in this church, at the foot of this statue, Giacomo Girhardi passed five years of his life, forgetting the whole world, his friends, his family, his wife, his mother, for the Virgin of Oroppa!

Not knowing that credulity is not faith, that superstition leads to idolatry, that all excess alienates from God, it was not the heavenly Mary, the mother of Christ, that he adored, but his image of the Virgin, the virgin of the mountain. His days and nights passed in prayer and tears at the feet of this image, repenting of imaginary sins. In vain the good vicar, alarmed by this fanatical enthusiasm, sought to bring him to reason, — everything was useless. In order to divert his mind from this ardent and dangerous preoccupation, he proposed that he should visit other places dedicated to the Virgin; but what to him were our Lady of Loretto, or Saint Mary of Bologne or of Milan? What he adored was that particular block of wood, black and worm-eaten, and not the holy mother there so unworthily represented.

What this sentiment lost in depth it gained in breadth. The Virgin of Oroppa was surrounded by a retinue of saints. Giacomo had invested these with all celestial power, all the attributes of the Deity. One he asked to dissipate the clouds charged with hail, which from the heights of Mount Mucrone sometimes descended upon the valley; another, to soften the regrets of his mother, or sustain his wife in her trials; one was to watch over his sleep, another to defend him from the tempter; and so on. His devotion became an impure polytheism, and his mountain of Oroppa an Olympus where God alone had no place.

Imposing upon himself the harshest penance and privations, he fasted, lacerated himself, remained sometimes three days without nourishment; and the physical exhaustion which ensued was honored by him with the name of spiritual exaltation. He had visions and revelations. He believed with certain Quietists that by subduing his material nature he could make his soul visible. He destroyed his health and lost his reason.

One day he heard a voice from on high ordering him to undertake the conversion of the heretic Vaudois, a remnant of whom still existed not far from him in the Valais. He immediately started, passing through the country watered by the Sesia, and reached the summit of the Alps on the side of Mount Rosa; but, suddenly overtaken by the blocking snows of winter, in the midst of a company of herdsmen, it became necessary for him to pass several months under shelter of the roof of a large châlet.

This châlet, called "the Stables," was an oblong square five hundred feet long, open only to the south, made impervious to the air on every other side by strong planks of pine, filled in with mosses and lichens cemented by gums and resin. Here, in the rigorous season, men, women, and children, with the flocks they tended, all dwelt under the sceptre of the oldest man of the tribe. In the centre of the dwelling was a large hearth constantly supplied with fuel, over which hung an immense caldron, in which were cooked, alternately and sometimes together, for the community, dried vegetables, bacon, mutton, quarters of the chamois, and the flesh of the Alpine marmot; which was accompanied, during the repast, by bread made of chestnuts, and for wine a sourish fermented liquor made from whortleberries and a mountain grape.

Here, varied occupations — the care of the flocks and the children, the preparation of cheeses, spinning the hemp, making farming implements (with which in the short summer of this climate to induce the thin soil of the rocks to be productive), the garments of sheep-skin, the baskets of bark, little fancy articles carved in sycamore or larch wood, to be sold in the towns — kept busy all the inhabitants of the châlet, an industrious and cheerful population, who mingled their songs and laughter with the sound of the axe, the wheel, and the hammer. There, labor seemed sweet; study and prayer were looked upon as a duty and pleasure. They sang pious hymns with well-trained and melodious voices; the older instructed the younger in reading and arithmetic, the most apt in music, and even a little Latin; for the civilization of the high Alps, like its vegetation, seems to be preserved under the snow, at least among this tribe; and it is not uncommon to see in the early spring schoolmasters and minstrels descend from these châlets, imparting instruction and pleasure to those in the valleys.

The hosts of Giacomo were Vaudois. The circumstances seemed favorable for his plans of conversion, but at the first word upon the subject of his mission, the chief of the family, an old man of eighty years (less respected for his years than for the virtues and good works which had marked each day of his life), imposed silence.

"Our fathers," said he to him, "endured exile, dispersion, even death, rather than consent to the worship of images; hope not then to bring about that in us which ages of persecution failed to accomplish in them. Stranger, you are forced to dwell for a time under our roof; pray in your manner, we will pray in ours; but unite your efforts to ours in a common labor, for here, shut out from the stir and diversions of the world, idleness will kill you. Be our companion, our brother, as long as the snows imprison us. When the roads are open, you may quit us, if it pleases you, without blessing the hearth that has warmed you, without even turning back with a gesture of farewell to those who have lodged and nourished you. You will owe us nothing, for you will have worked with us; and if the balance should be on our side, God will pay us."

Obliged to submit, Giacomo lived five months the companion of these honest men. During five months he witnessed their virtues; for five months, morning and evening, he heard the prayers which they addressed to God alone. His mind, no longer excited by the sight of the objects of his exclusive worship, became calm; and when the prison-doors that the ice had closed were opened by the sun, at the aspect of the sun and Nature in her magnificent expression of herself in these Alpine heights, the idea of the eternal and all-powerful Creator entered his heart with vivid power, and there resumed its rightful throne.

The arrival of the first birds, the sight of the first plants, springing already in bud from beneath the snow, the hum of swarms of bees, all excited in him transports of joy and love.

An entire volume would not suffice to paint the innumerable and varied sensations through which Giacomo passed. During his sojourn at the "Stables" the good old chief had formed a strong affection for him; he knew little of books, but he had joined his own observations to those his fathers had taught him, and he delighted to explain the Creator by the creation. From this asylum which he had entered, his brain filled with ideas of intolerance and fanaticism, the converter came out himself converted. The habit of labor, the sight of the family, turned the thoughts of Giacomo to the duties which remained for him to fulfil.

Girhardi hastened to the convent of his wife.

A complete romance might be written in recounting the means which he employed to reconquer the heart which he once repulsed.

But, to be brief, after unheard-of efforts to wrest his wife from the cloistral life, to undo himself the effects of his former teachings, Giacomo Girhardi, restored to reason, to happiness, to true faith, became the best of husbands, and, after a few years, the happiest of fathers.

Twenty-five years of wisdom and virtue redeemed his errors.

After his return to Turin, in the midst of his own friends, he established by his industry a business worthy of him. He possessed a considerable fortune, which his labor would have augmented still more, had not his benevolence formed a channel through which his wealth flowed away. To do good was so sweet to him! The love of his fellow-men filled his heart with joy, and the study of nature added an inexhaustible charm to his life.

Animated nature excited his most curious investigations; and as God is great even in the most minute of his works, the religious philosopher chose insects for his study in preference to any other works of the sublime Artificer.

By reason of this interest, during his days of captivity, Ludovic had given him the singular cognomen of "the fly-catcher."

CHAPTER V.

THE two captives had no secrets from each other. After having rapidly recounted to each other the principal events of their lives, they went over them again in detail, to tell each other of the various emotions to which the events had given rise.

They spoke also of Theresa; but at this name Charney felt the blood mount to his cheek, and the old man himself became pensive; a moment of silence, sad and solemn, always followed the name of the absent angel.

More commonly their recitals were interrupted by some grave discussion on a point of morals, or by observations on the eccentricities of human nature. Girhardi's mild and benevolent philosophy made happiness consist in the love of one's neighbor; and Charney, sometimes disagreeing with him, could not understand how this indulgence and tenderness for men could be retained, notwithstanding the injustice and persecutions that the virtuous Piedmontese had suffered at their hands.

"But," said he to Girhardi, "did you not curse these men, when, after having basely calumniated you, they deprived you of your liberty and the sight of — your child?"

"Ought the fault of the few to fall upon all? Even those who injured me, who knows? — deceived by appearances, blinded by political fanaticism, perhaps they did it in good faith! Believe me, my friend, we must think of the evil that has been done us, with the idea of pardon at the bottom of the heart. Which of us does not need it for himself? Which of us has not mistaken error for truth? The Apostle John has said that God is love. O, how beautiful and true is that saying! Yes, it is in loving that one rises nearer to God, and receives strength from him to bear misfortune. If I had entered my prison with thoughts of hatred against humanity, I should, without doubt, have died of despair! but, no, God be praised, such painful sentiments were far from me. The recollection of so many friends remaining faithful in my misfortunes, of so many hearts which suffered in my suffering, strengthened my love to mankind, and the most trying feature of my captivity was that the sight of a human being was forbidden me."

"What!" said Charney, "was your treatment so harsh and rigorous?"

"When I was first arrested," continued his friend, "I was carried to the citadel of Turin and placed in a solitary dungeon, where even my jailer could not communicate with me. My food was conveyed to me by means of a revolving box, and during one long month nothing came to interrupt that mute solitude. One must know what I then experienced to comprehend how certainly, notwithstanding the reveries of our philosophers, the state of society is the natural state of the human race, and what horrors are endured by the unfortunate one condemned to isolation. Not to see a man! to live without a glance from other eyes, without a voice to strike the ear, without touching another hand! not to be able to rest the brow, the breast, the heart, but on cold and insensible objects! It is frightful! and the strongest reason must succumb. One month, one eternal month, passed by thus for me. The month had hardly commenced when the sound of the step of my jailer, as he came every other day to renew my food, caused me inexpressible joy. I watched for the moment with anxiety. I always called good-day to him through the iron door which separated us, but he never answered me. I strove during the rotation of the box to catch a glimpse of his face, his hand, even his dress; I could never succeed. Had his countenance been marked by cruelty and vice, I should have found it beautiful.

Had he extended his arm to me even to repulse me, I would have blessed him; but nothing! nothing! I only saw him the day of my transfer to Fenestrella.

"I had then for sole diversion, for my only pleasure, my only companions, spiders, which I watched for hours. I made of them friends by crumbling my bread for them. Rats were not wanting in my dungeon, but these animals had always roused in me an invincible aversion. Nevertheless, I fed them, although defending myself from their approach and contact. The care which I took of my spiders, even the terror with which my poor ugly rats inspired me, did not serve to divert my mind, and despair took possession of me in thinking of my daughter."

Charney started at the name. Girhardi understood what was passing in his mind, and hastened to continue, resuming an air of serenity.

"But a piece of good fortune soon came to me. The light penetrated into my gallery by a window strongly barred by a cross of iron (and it was before this cross of my prison that I said my morning and evening prayers); a shed was in front of this window, so that I could only see a portion of a wall that seemed to connect two bastions. Above me was the donjon of the citadel. One day — merciful Providence, how I thanked thee for it! — the shadow of a man was cast on the part of the wall which I could see. The man I could not see, but I conjectured his movements by those of his shadow. That shadow came and went; it was that of a soldier recently put as sentinel on the platform of the donjon. I could distinguish the shape of his coat, his epaulets, the projection of his cartridge-box, the point of his bayonet, the waving of his feather. How can I tell you, my friend, of the joy that filled my heart? I was no longer alone: a companion had come to me! The next day, and the following days, the shadow of the soldier again appeared upon the wall; his shadow or that of another. But it was always a man, one of my kind, who moved, who lived, there, almost under my eyes! I watched, I followed the alternate coming and going of the shadow; I made myself one with it by marching the length of my gallery as it marched, turning when it turned. When the sentinel was relieved, I said adieu to the departing one, and good-day to the new comer whose turn of duty it was. I knew the corporal; I distinguished soon all my military guardians by their outline. Shall I confess it? for some I formed an inexplicable preference. From their attitude, their gait, the quickness or slowness of their motions, I formed conjectures as to their age, their character, their sentiments. One hastened his steps, changed his gun quickly from hand to hand, or kept time with the motion of his head as if humming an air; without doubt he was young and of a lively disposition, and while singing dreamed of love. Another passed with bent brow, stopped sometimes, resting his two arms on his gun for some moments in an attitude of melancholy; he thought doubtless of his absent mother, of his native village, of all that he had left behind him. He lifted his hand to his face, perhaps to brush away a tear. For some of these dear shadows I felt a true affection; I was interested in their fate, I formed wishes for them, I prayed for them. New tendernesses were born in my heart, and consoled it. Believe me, my friend, we must love our fellow-men; only through that comes happiness."

"Excellent man," said Charney, deeply moved, "who would not love you? Why did I not know you sooner? How different my life would have been! But ought I to complain? Have I not found here what the world never gave me,— a devoted heart, a strong support, virtue, truth, you and Picciola?"

For amid all these confidences Picciola was not forgotten. The two friends constructed together near her a seat larger and more comfortable than the first. Here, seated side by side, and with Picciola in front of them, they felt that they were a company of three. They called this seat the bench of conference. It was there that the simple modest man was eloquent in order to be persuasive, was persuasive in order to be useful; and in him the gift of natural eloquence and the power of persuasion were not wanting. This bench was at the same time the scholar's bench and the teacher's desk; there sat side by side the professor and the pupil,— the professor was he who knew the least, but knew the best; the professor was Girhardi,— the pupil, Charney,— the book, Picciola.

CHAPTER VI.

THEY were seated in their accustomed place. The autumn approached, and Charney, losing all hope of the reflowering of his plant, talked with his friend of his regret for the fall of the last flower. Girhardi, to supply to him the loss of his observations upon the seed, unfolded to him many of the wonders concerning the fructification of plants.

There, as elsewhere, the imprint of a Divine hand was seen in all the acts of Nature. Girhardi recounted how the seeds of many plants, whose large leaves and close foliage would prevent their dispersion, were provided with a feathery tuft, so that the wind might more easily waft them away; how others, enclosed in an elastic pod which bursts with a sudden spring at the moment of their maturity, were thus thrown to a distance. These plumes and springs are feet and wings which God has given them, that each one may choose his place, and germinate in the warmth of the sun.

What eye can follow in their rapid flight through the air the membranous seed of the elm, the maple, the pine, the ash, circling in the atmosphere amid myriads of other seeds, floating with their own buoyancy, and seeming to hasten to meet the birds whose hunger they are to appease?

The old man explained also how aquatic plants, destined to ornament the banks of streams or deck the borders of lakes, are endowed with a form which enables them to float upon the water, that they may thus be planted upon the edges of the banks, or pass from one side of the stream to the other; how, when their weight compels them to sink, it is because they will best grow in the bed of the stream or in the mud of the morass; how others, without seeds, multiply themselves by their roots, by their offshoots reproducing themselves like polyps, and thus put to use the superabundance of life which animates them; thus the rushes and reeds spring like an army of lances from the bosom of stagnant waters, and those beautiful water-lilies, who with feet in the mud beneath spread upon the surface of the water their large glossy leaves, and their snowy white or golden blossoms.

"These wonders exist," exclaimed Charney, "and so few deign to observe them!"

This was one of the lessons of the old man.

"My friend," said Charney one day to his companion, as they were seated together on the bench of conference, "can the insects which you have made your favorite subject of study offer you as many marvels to observe as my Picciola to me?"

"Quite as many," replied the professor. "Believe me, you will not thoroughly appreciate your Picciola until you have made acquaintance with the little animated beings who come sometimes to visit her and hover and buzz about her. Then you will see the many affinities, the secret laws which bind the insect to the plant, as the insect and the plant to the rest of creation; for all springs from one Will, all is governed by one Intelligence. From this unity of design arises that harmony, that general accord, which we cannot apprehend in its vast whole, but which, nevertheless, exists."

Girhardi was proceeding to develop his thought, when, suddenly pausing, his eyes fixed upon Picciola, he kept silence for several minutes.

"Of what are you thinking, my friend?" said Charney.

"I think," replied the professor, "that Picciola is going to aid me in answering the question you asked me just now. Look at this butterfly; while I speak, it forces your plant to contract an engagement with it. Yes, for it has deposited its hope of posterity in the keeping of one of her branches."

Charney bent down to verify the fact. The butterfly flew away after having covered its eggs with a gum which fastened them firmly to the stem of the plant.

"Well," said Girhardi, "do you think it is by chance or at random that it has thus come to give in charge to Picciola this precious deposit? Believe it not! Nature has assigned to each species of plant a species of insect. Every plant has his guest to lodge and nourish. Now consider how wonderful is the action of this butterfly. It was first a caterpillar; when a caterpillar, it was nourished by a plant like this; afterwards it underwent many transformations; as a butterfly, faithless to its first love, it has flown from flower to flower, gathering sweets from each. When the moment of maternity is come to her, who never knew her mother and will never see her children (for her work is accomplished, and she is about to die), — to her whom experience has taught nothing, — she comes to confide her eggs to a plant like that which has nourished her in another form and in another season. It knows that little caterpillars will come from these eggs, and for them it has forgotten its own vagrant habits as a butterfly. Who then, has taught it this? who has given it memory, reason, and the ability to recognize this plant, the foliage of which differs to-day from what it was in the spring? Practised eyes are mistaken sometimes; but the insect never!"

Charney expressed his astonishment.

"That is not all," interrupted Girhardi; "examine now the branch chosen by him; it is one of the oldest and strongest, for the new shoots, feeble and tender, might be frozen and destroyed by the winter's cold, or broken by the wind, — this it knows also; — once more, who has taught it?"

"But," said Charney, "pardon me, my friend, are you not deluding yourself by some preconceived opinion or system?"

"Silence, sceptic!" cried the old man, with one of his meaning smiles. "Perhaps you will believe that which you see. Listen to me. Picciola will play her part in her turn. It is no longer a question of the foresight of the insect, but of that of Nature, of one of those laws of harmony of which I spoke to you, which forces the plant to accept the legacy of the butterfly. Next spring we can together verify the prodigy," said he, repressing a sigh addressed to his daughter. "Then, when the first leaves of Picciola show themselves, the little larvæ enclosed in the eggs will hasten to break their shells. You know, without doubt, that the buds of different plants do not open at the same time; so the eggs of different species of butterflies do not open the same day; but here a law of unity regulates the development of the plant as of the insect. If the worm appeared before the leaves, they would find nothing to feed upon; if the leaves became firm and strong before the birth of the little caterpillars, they would be unable to bite them with their feeble teeth. It could not be so, — Nature never makes a mistake. Each plant in its progress keeps pace with the march of the insect that it is charged to nourish; the one opens its buds when the other breaks its eggs; and having grown and become strong together, together they unfold their flowers and their wings!"

"Picciola! Picciola!" murmured Charney, "you have not yet told me all."

Thus, in these sweet teachings, day succeeded to day. At evening the captives, embracing each other, said adieu, and retired to their chambers to sleep or to think, often unknown to each other, upon the same object, — the daughter of the old man. What has become of her since the order of the commandant had forcibly exiled her from the prison of her father?

Theresa had first followed the Emperor to Milan; but she learned there by experience that it is sometimes more difficult to penetrate through an antechamber than through an army. However, the friends of Girhardi, excited anew by her, redoubled their efforts, and promised before long to obtain his release from captivity. Theresa, encouraged and tranquillized, returned to Turin, where a relative offered her an asylum.

The husband of that relative was librarian of the city. It was he that Menou charged with the selection of books to send to the fortress of Fenestrella. From the nature of these books Theresa had no doubt for whom they were destined. Therefore the insertion in one of the volumes of the little note, whose mystical form prevented any danger of its compromising either her father or her protégé.

She did not know then that her father and Charney lived more than ever separated from each other; and when she learned it from the messenger who had been employed to convey the volumes, terrified at the effect of perhaps complete isolation upon the old man, one sole purpose filled her heart, — to obtain the reunion of the two captives; and she was at last made happy by its accomplishment.

Some time after, when, presented by Madame Menou to the Governor of Piedmont, she came to offer her thanks to him, and to pour out before him her gratitude, the old general, touched by her beauty and by the unction of filial tenderness which she displayed, laid aside for a moment his ordinary harshness, and, taking her kindly by the hand, said, "Come and see me from time to time, or, rather, come to see my wife. Perhaps in the course of a month I may have some good news for you."

Theresa imagined that the favor to be accorded her was that she might return to Fenestrella, to pass part of her days in prison with her father, and threw herself at the feet of the general, thanking him again and again with a face radiant with happiness.

On a beautiful day in October, which recalled the springtime, Girhardi and Charney were sitting on their bench. Both, silent and pensive, were leaning on the arms at each extremity of the rustic seat. One might have thought them indifferent to each other, but that occasionally the eyes of the Count rested with an expression of interest and inquietude upon his companion, who was absorbed in a profound revery. The countenance of Girhardi rarely assumed so sad an expression. Charney might easily be mistaken as to the cause of his sadness.

"Yes, yes," said he, suddenly breaking this long silence, "captivity is horrible! horrible! when it is not merited. To live separated from the object of one's affection, — is this life?"

Girhardi looked up, roused himself from his meditative mood, and said, —

"Separation is the great trial of life; is it not so, my friend?"

"I your friend!" replied the Count; "do I deserve that name? Is it not I that have separated you from her? Can you forget it? Ah, do not deny it, — you are thinking of your daughter, and, in thinking of her, you cannot turn your eyes towards me. I understand too well that, when these thoughts come to you, the sight of me is odious to you."

"You are strangely mistaken as to the cause of my revery," said Girhardi. "Never, perhaps, has the thought of my daughter been more full of sweetness and consolation than to-day, for she has written to me, — I have a letter from her."

"Is it possible! She has written you! they have permitted it!"

And Charney drew near the happy father with an impulse of delight; but instantly repressing it, said, "But the letter has brought you some sad news."

"No; quite the contrary."

"Then why this sadness?"

"Alas! what would you have, my friend? it is always so. A regret always mingles with our sweetest hopes. Our joys here below throw their shadow before them, and it is the shadow that first meets our eyes. You spoke of separation; here is the letter, read it, and you will understand why, by your side, a sentiment of sadness takes possession of me."

Charney took the letter, and held it for some time without opening it. He sat with his eyes fixed upon Girhardi, as if he would divine from the countenance of his dear companion the contents of the letter; then he examined the superscription and recognized, with emotion, the handwriting. At last, unfolding the paper, he attempted to read it aloud; but his voice trembled, and his lips refused to utter the words. After a few sentences, he finished the letter in silence.

This is what he read: —

"My good Father: Press a thousand kisses upon this letter which you hold in your hand. I have kissed it a thousand times, and there is in it a harvest for your lips to reap."

"Ah, dear child, how gladly have I done so!" murmured Girhardi.

"It is for you, as for me, an intense satisfaction, is it not, that we are permitted again to correspond? For this permission we owe General Menou eternal gratitude. It is he who has put an end to this silence, which separated us even more than the distance between us. Blessings upon him! Henceforward our thoughts, at least, can fly to each other. I can tell you my hopes, and they will sustain you; you can tell me your griefs, and in weeping over them I shall feel that I am near you. But, my good father, if a greater favor was reserved for us, — O, I pray you, stop for a moment here and prepare yourself for the sudden joy that I have to communicate. My father, if I should be once more permitted to return to you! — to see you from time to time, to hear your voice, to surround you with my care! For two years this was happiness enough for me, and then captivity seemed light to you! If this hope is realized, soon I shall re-enter those walls from which I have been exiled."

"She will come! what! here? be with you?" exclaimed Charney, with a cry of joy.

"Read on, read on," replied, sadly, the old man.

Charney reread the last phrase, and continued: —

"Soon I shall re-enter those walls from which I have been exiled; this makes you happy, truly happy, I am sure. Dwell a moment on this comforting thought. Your daughter, your Theresa, begs it. Do not hasten to finish this letter; a too vivid emotion is sometimes dangerous. Is not what I have said sufficient for you? If an angel had descended from heaven charged to fulfil your wishes, you would not have dared to ask more. I, too exacting perhaps, before he took his flight back, should have interceded for your liberty, for your complete deliverance. At your age it is so cruel to live deprived of the sight of your native land. The banks of the Doria are so beautiful, and in your gardens of La Colline the trees planted by my dead mother and my poor brother have grown so well. There, their memory lives more than in any other spot. Then you must so long for your friends, your friends whose generous efforts have so well aided my feeble endeavors. O father, father! the pen burns my fingers, — my secret is about to escape me; I have already betrayed it, without doubt. Arm yourself, I pray you, with all your strength and steadfastness, while I tell you of the happiness which awaits us. In a few days I shall rejoin you, no more to soften your captivity, but to bring it to an end; no more to be with you at stated hours, and within the walls of a prison, but to bring you away with me, free and proud! yes, proud: you will have the right to be so, for it is not mercy that your faithful friends Delarue and Cotenna have obtained for you, it is justice, reparation.

"Adieu, my good father. O, how much I love you, and how happy I am!

"THERESA."

There was not in the letter one word, one single word of remembrance for Charney. This word he had sought with a pang of disappointment throughout the letter; but notwithstanding his pain at the omission, it was a cry of joy that burst from him as he finished reading.

"You will be free!" cried he; "you will repose under the shadow of green trees, and look upon the sun!"

"Yes," said the old man, "I am going — I am going to leave you; and this is the shadow that my joy throws before it, to obscure it."

"That matters not!" replied Charney, proving by the vehemence of his delight and his generous forgetfulness of himself how worthy he had become of a friendship. "You will be restored to her at last. She will cease to suffer for my fault; you will be happy, and I shall feel no longer this terrible weight which oppresses my heart. During the little time that remains to us together, we can at least speak of her."

These last words were spoken in the arms of his friend.

CHAPTER VII.

THE prospect of approaching separation seemed to redouble the mutual tenderness of the two captives. Always together, they were never weary of their long and profitable conversations on the bench of conference.

There was, nevertheless, a certain grave subject which Girhardi attempted sometimes to broach, and which Charney avoided. The old man felt too deeply its importance to allow himself to be easily discouraged; for he felt that if he succeeded he should leave Charney with less regret.

One day the occasion to speak of it was given by Charney's saying to him: "Do you not wonder at the chance which has brought us together here, — we who, separated from each other by birth in different lands, and having imbibed different prejudices, had by different routes arrived at the same denial of the Deity?"

"On this last point I cannot agree with you," replied Girhardi, smiling; "to forget is not to deny."

"Granted; but which of us was the most blind, the most to be pitied?"

"You," said the old man without hesitation; "yes, you, my friend. All excess may lead man to ruin; but in superstition there is belief, there is passion, there is life. In incredulity there is death. The one is the river turned from its natural channel: it inundates, it submerges, it removes the fertile earth; but it impregnates itself with its substance, carries it away with it, and afterwards may repair the disasters which it has caused. The other is drought, sterility. It burns, it kills; it converts the nutritious earth into sand, and of the opulent Palmyra makes a ruin in a desert! Infidelity, not content with separating us from our Creator, relaxes the bonds of society, and even those of the family; in depriving man of his dignity, it leaves him in isolation and abandonment, alone with his pride! — I have well said, a ruin in a desert!"

"Alone with his pride," murmured Charney, as he sat, his elbow resting on the arm of the seat, his head on his hand; "the pride of human knowledge! Why does man take pleasure in destroying the elements of his happiness in wishing to examine into and analyze them? Even though he owes this happiness to an untruth, why seek to raise the mask and hasten to meet the destruction of his illusions? Is truth to him so sweet? Does knowledge satisfy his desires? Fool! such was I. I am only a worm, said I then to myself, a worm destined to annihilation; but raising my head on my dunghill, I was proud of this knowledge. I disbelieved in happiness, in virtue, in everything good. But before annihilation, my scepticism was arrested, — I believed! My degradation I gloried in, because I had discovered it. And was it not a worthy subject for self-applause? In exchange for this discovery I had only given my kingly mantle, my treasure of immortality."

The old man pressed the hand of his companion, and said to him: "The worm, after having crawled upon the ground, after having fed upon bitter leaves, after creeping through the slime of the marsh and the dust of the roads, will construct his chrysalis, a temporary coffin, from which he will only come forth transformed and purified, to fly from flower to flower and live upon their perfumes; then, spreading forth two brilliant wings, it will raise itself towards heaven. The history of the worm is ours."

Charney made a gesture of dissent.

"Unbeliever!" replied Girhardi, reproving him by a smile tinged with sadness, "you see your malady was greater than mine; its cure takes a longer time. Have you then forgotten the lessons of Picciola?"

"No," said Charney, with a grave and earnest voice; "I believe in a God! I believe now in that First Cause which Picciola has revealed to me, — in that eternal power which so wonderfully plans and rules the whole universe. But in your comparison of the worm, the immortality of man is implied, and what proof is there of that?"

"What proof?" exclaimed Girhardi, — "man's thought. It is always of the future, and carries him unceasingly forward. His life is spent in hoping and wishing; he is always turning, in spite of himself, toward this unknown pole which attracts him. Is this most glorious possession a fruit of the earth? Among what people has not a belief in the future existed? And why should not that hope be accomplished? Shall the thought of man go beyond the power of God? What proof is there? I will not invoke the authority of revelation and the Holy Scriptures. Although convincing for me, for you they are without force, as the wind which propels the ship has no power to move the rock, for the rock has no sails to receive it. But, my friend, shall we believe in the immortality of matter, and not in the immortality of the mind, which enables us to form opinions concerning matter? What! shall virtue, genius, love, come to us through the affinities of certain insensible earthly molecules? Shall that which cannot think have power to make us think? Can brute matter have created intelligence when intelligence directs and governs matter? Then the stones ought to think, ought to love. Speak, speak, — answer!"

"That matter might be endowed with ideas, Locke seemed inclined to suppose," replied Charney; "but he contradicts himself, for he rejects innate ideas, while admitting intuitive knowledge." Then, interrupting himself, he said, with a laugh, "Take care, my friend! Would you allure me again into this labyrinth, on unstable ground, of metaphysics?"

"I understand nothing of metaphysics," said Girhardi.

"And I not much," replied Charney; "not, however, because I have not given time enough to it. But let us leave a discussion which can only be unfruitful or fatal. You are convinced; guard your convictions. I can understand that they are dear to you; I might shake them."

"You cannot do it, and I accept the contest."

"But what have you to gain by such a discussion!"

"To bring you to a belief full of consolation. You cited Locke just now; I know but one thing about him, and that is, that always, even on his death-bed, he declared that the only real happiness for man was in a pure conscience and in the hope of another life."

"I can conceive how sweet it is to pour out beforehand for one's self a draught of immortality; but my reason refuses to let me partake of it. Believe me, it is better that we should talk of it no more."

For a time both sat in a constrained silence.

Suddenly something, after circling in the air above their heads, alighted upon the plant before them. It was a greenish insect, a beautiful striped coleoptera, with white and waving bands and a narrow corselet.

"See, my friend! a diversion comes for us," said Charney. "Disclose to me yet more of the marvels of creation."

Girhardi took the insect, with certain precautions, examined it carefully, paused for reflection, then suddenly his countenance brightened as with the hope of triumph. One would have said that an irresistible argument had fallen to him from heaven. Commencing in his ordinary tone of professor, which became more and more exalted as the secret object of the lesson penetrated his discourse, —

"I, the catcher of flies," said he, with a smile, "ought, I see, to confine myself to the department of my modest studies. I am not a learned man."

"The most enlightened, the most thoroughly furnished mind," replied Charney, "soon finds the limits of its strength and its resources in attempting to penetrate too far into the mysteries of things here below. Against these secrets genius wears itself out, dashes itself to pieces without extracting a spark of the true light."

"We ignorant ones," replied the old man, "go to the end by the shortest and easiest road; we simply open our eyes, and God reveals himself to us in the sublimity of his works."

"On that point we are agreed," said Charney.

"Let us then pursue our route. A plant has sufficed to make you comprehend that intelligence which governs the world; a butterfly has enabled you to catch a glimpse of the law of universal harmony; now this pretty coleoptera, who has life and motion, and whose organization is superior to that of the butterfly, perhaps will conduct us still farther. You have yet read only one page of the immense book of Nature; I am going to turn over another leaf."

Charney drew near, and with an air of earnest attention examined the insect which the old man showed him.

"You see this little creature. With the power to create, all human genius could not add anything to his organization, so perfectly is it adapted to his need, and to the purpose for which he is created. He has wings to transport him from place to place, a shell or sheath above his wings to protect them and defend him against injury from contact with any hard substance; his breast is provided with a cuirass, his eyes with a network of mail, so that neither the thorn of a rose nor the sting of an enemy shall deprive him of sight. He has antennæ with which to interrogate obstacles that present themselves; living by the chase, he has rapid feet with which to pursue his prey, mandibles of iron with which to devour it, or to dig in the earth for a dwelling, or a deposit for his booty or his eggs. If a dangerous enemy ventures to attack him, he holds in reserve an acrid and corrosive fluid with which to defend himself. An instinct born with him teaches him from the first the means to provide his food, to construct his habitation, to make use of his tools and his armor. And do not think that other insects are less favored than he; all have received their share in this magnificent distribution of the gifts of Nature. The imagination is overwhelmed in perceiving the multiplicity of means employed by Providence to insure the existence and duration of these lower ranks in creation. Now let us compare, and you will see that this frail creature suffices to establish the immense line of demarcation which separates man from the brute. Man has been thrown naked into the world; feeble, incapable of flying like the bird, running like the stag, or creeping like the serpent; without means of defence, in the midst of terrible enemies armed with claws and stings; without means to brave the inclemency of the seasons, in the midst of animals protected by fleece, by scales, by furs; without shelter, when all others have their den, their hole, their shell; without arms, when all about him are armed against him. And yet he has demanded of the lion his cave for a lodging, and the lion retires before his eye; he has despoiled the bear of his skin, and of it made his first clothing; he has plucked the horn from the bull, and this is his first drinking-cup; then he has dug even into the bowels of the earth to seek there the instruments of his future strength; from a rib, a sinew, and a reed, he has made arms; and the eagle, who, seeing him at first in his weakness and nakedness, prepares to seize him as his prey, struck in mid-air, falls dead at his feet, only to furnish a feather to adorn his head. Among animals, is there one who under such conditions could have preserved life? Let us for a moment separate the workman from his work, God from Nature. Nature has done all for this insect, nothing for man. It is that man should be the product of intelligence rather than of matter; and God, in granting him this celestial gift, this ray of light from the divine fire, created him feeble and unprotected that he might make use of it; that he might be constrained to find in himself the elements of his greatness."

"But, my friend," interrupted Charney, "of what value, then, is this so-called divine faculty to our species? Superior to the animals in some respects, we are their inferiors in many others; and is not that insect himself, whose marvels you have just detailed to me, worthy to excite our envy, and to give birth rather to a sentiment of humility than of pride?"

"No," replied Girhardi; "for the animals in their essential operations have never varied. Such as they are, such they have always been; that which they know they have always known. If they have been born perfect, it is because there is in them no possibility of progress. They do not act from their own will, but from that which the Creator has given them. Thus, since the commencement of the world, the beavers have constructed their abode on the same plan; the worm and the spider have spun and wove their cocoon and web after the same forms; the cells of bees have always been of the regular hexagon; and the ant-lions have in all time traced without compass their circles and spirals. The character of their industry is regularity, uniformity; that of human industry is diversity, for it is the result of free and creative thought. Judge now! Of all created beings man alone has reflection, invention, the idea of duty and of hidden causes, contemplation, enthusiasm, love. He alone determines by reason, and not by instinct; he alone has any idea of the universe in its whole; he alone has the knowledge of another world; he alone knows life and death."

"Without doubt," said Charney; "but, once more, is this which distinguishes him from the animal so much for his advantage? Why has God given us a reason which misleads, knowledge which deceives us? With our high intelligence we are often objects of pity to ourselves. Why is the only privileged being the only one liable to error? Why have not we the instinct of animals, or animals our reason?"

"Because," replied Girhardi, "they are not created for the same end. God does not require from them virtues. Accord to them reason, the liberty of choice in their dwellings and their nourishment, and you destroy the equilibrium of the world. The Creator has willed that the surface of this globe, and even its depths, should be filled with animated beings, that life should be everywhere. And therefore, in the plains, in the valleys, in the forests, from the summit of the mountains to the depth of the mines, on the trees as on the rocks, in the seas, the lakes, the rivers, the streams, on their banks as in their beds, in the sands as in the marsh, in all climates, under all latitudes, from one pole to the other, — all is peopled, all moves with harmony, as one whole. In the depths of the desert, as on a blade of grass, the lion and the ant are each at the post which has been assigned them. Each one has his part, each one his place marked beforehand; each one moves in his appointed circle; each one is enchained within his limits; for it was necessary that each square of this immense chessboard should be filled; and it is so; none can depart from his place without death. Man alone goes everywhere and lives everywhere. He travels the oceans and the deserts; he plants his tent upon the sands, or constructs his palace on the borders of the sea; he lives amid the snows of the Alps or the fervors of tropic heat; he has the world for a prison."

"But if this world is governed by God," said Charney, "why are there so many crimes in the bosom of human society, why so many disasters in nature? I admire with you the sublime distribution of created beings; my reason is overwhelmed before that mighty whole; but when my eyes turn towards man —"

"My friend," interrupted the sage, "do not accuse God of the errors of man, nor of the eruption of the volcano. He has imposed upon matter eternal laws, and his work is accomplished although a vessel founder in a storm, or a city disappear in the convulsions of an earthquake. What matter to him a few lives more or less? Does he believe in death? But to our souls he has left the care of self-government; it is proved by the independence of our passions. I have shown you the animal creation obeying the instinct which leads them, having only blind tendencies, possessing only qualities inherent in their species; man alone is the parent of his virtues and his vices; to him alone is given free will, for to him alone is this earth a place of trial. The tree of good which we cultivate with so much care here below will only blossom in the skies. O, think not that God can change the heart of the wicked without doing it; that he can let the just suffer without reserving for him a reward! Why should he then have created us? If in this world we must receive the reward of our virtues or our crimes, all prosperity would be honorable, and a stroke of lightning would be an infamous death!"

Charney was filled with surprise in hearing this man, so simple, through his convictions become so eloquent; he watched with admiration his noble face, through which shone the beauty of his pious soul, and, notwithstanding himself, he was moved and impressed.

"But," murmured he, "why has not God given us the certainty of our future?"

"Has he willed it? Ought he to have willed it?" replied the holy man, rising with dignity and laying his hand affectionately on the shoulder of his companion. "Uncertainty perhaps was necessary to abase the pride of our reason. What would virtue be if its reward was sure beforehand? What would become of our free will? The mind of man is immense, and not infinite it is at the same time great and restricted, — great, that it may comprehend its dignity and be enabled to rise to God in the contemplation of God in his works; restricted, that it may feel its dependence upon God. Man here below has only glimpses of his future; faith does the rest. My God! my God!" cried Girhardi, clasping his hands with fervor, and raising towards heaven eyes filled with tears, "give me thy strength to lift up this man who desires to find thee! Lend me thy aid to restore to this immortal soul the wings which it knows not that it possesses! Let my words be persuasive as my heart is convinced! But why is an advocate necessary to plead the cause when all Nature brings her unanimous testimony? Is even so much necessary? A flower, an insect, sufficed to proclaim thy omnipotence and reveal to him his future destiny. Let that plant finish its work! Is it not, my God, like all thy creatures, illumined by thee, and endowed with life by the breath that emanates from thee?"

The old man then seemed to forget himself in silent thought; without doubt his thoughts were prayers; and when he turned again to his companion, he found him with his hands clasped on the back of the rustic bench, his head bowed upon them, and on his countenance the expression of holy meditation.

CHAPTER VIII.

In the purified heart of Charney the blood flowed more calmly; his broader views made that heart the home of more gentle, consoling, and loving thoughts. Like the good Girhardi, he felt in his spirit the need of that expansion that comes from the sentiment of tenderness. He delighted to think of those whom he could feel were bound to him by any tie of gratitude or friendship. The Empress, Girhardi, and Ludovic were the first to people this new world; then two female shadows were faintly sketched at either end of this rainbow of love, which followed the storm, as one sees in altar-pieces two seraphim with bending heads, floating robes, and wings half spread, as if to mark the limits of an Eden.

One of these shadows was the fairy of his dreams, the young maiden Picciola, that sweet image born of the perfumes of his flower; the other the angel of his prison, his second providence, Theresa Girhardi.

By a strange inconsistency the former, which had only an ideal existence, always appeared to him under a fixed, distinct form; he could see the contraction of her brow, the sparkle of her eye, her smile. As she had appeared to him in his dream, so he had always recalled her image since. As to Theresa, — whom he had only once glanced at, and then with his brain still under the influence of his dream, — with what features could he invest his thought of her? The face of the seraph was veiled, and if Charney would forcibly lift the veil, it was always the face of Picciola that was revealed, — Picciola, as it were, duplicating herself to receive the homage destined for her rival.

One morning the prisoner, though wide awake, felt himself a prey to this singular hallucination. The day was breaking; he had already risen, and was thinking of Girhardi, whose adieus of the previous evening had breathed the most touching regret in the thought of his approaching separation from his friend. Charney, after many wakeful hours of sad anticipation, had risen and was pacing his chamber, when, mechanically turning his eyes towards the bench of conference, where the evening before he had talked with the father of his daughter, he saw, through the gray morning fog of autumn, the figure of a young girl seated on this same bench. She was alone, leaning upon the arm of the seat, and apparently contemplating the plant before her. Immediately he thought of Theresa and of her arrival.

"It is she," said he; "I shall see her for a moment, and then never again! And my dear companion will go with her."

As he spoke she turned her head towards him, and the face which he saw was his ideal image of Picciola.

Astounded, he passed his hand over his brow, his eyes, his garments, the cold bars of his window, to convince himself that this time it was not a dream.

The young girl rose, advanced a few steps towards him, and, blushing and smiling, made a timid gesture of salutation. Charney replied not to the gesture nor the smile. With fixed eyes he regarded this graceful form as it crossed the court-yard; it was the same that had appeared to him as Picciola in the fêtes of his dreams, the same that constantly haunted his thoughts and reveries. Believing that he was attacked with the delirium of fever, he threw himself upon his bed to recover his senses.

A few minutes after his door opened, and Ludovic entered.

"Alas, alas! good and bad news both, Signor Count," cried he. "One of my birds is going to fly, not over the walls, but by the door. So much the better for him, so much the worse for you."

"What! does he go to-day?"

"I believe not, Signor Count. However, it cannot be long delayed, for the papers have been signed in Paris, they say, and are on the way to Turin; at least, the young lady told her father so before me."

"What!" cried Charney, half rising from his bed, "has she arrived? Is she here?"

"She arrived at Fenestrella last evening, with a permission in due form to enter the fortress, but unfortunately the orders do not allow the drawbridge to be lowered so late for a woman; so she was obliged to put off her visit till this morning. I knew she was there, but I took good care to say nothing to the old man; he would not have closed his eyes all night, and the time would have seemed so long, if he had known his daughter was so near him. This morning she was up before the sun, and waiting in the fog at the gate of the citadel."

"But," interrupted Charney, astonished and confounded, "did she not remain some time in the court-yard, seated on the bench?"

And rushing to the window, he looked eagerly into the court, but turned again to Ludovic, saying, "She is no longer there."

"Certainly she is no longer there," replied Ludovic, "but she has been there. Yes, she rested there while I went up to prepare the good man for her visit; for one can die of joy, you know. Joy is like strong spirits; a little drop is good once in a while, but it will not do to empty the gourd at one draught. Now they are together, contented enough; and I, seeing them so happy, felt heart-broken, Signor Count, in thinking of you, who will so soon be without a companion; and so I have come to remind you that Ludo-vic and Picciola will still be with you. She begins to lose her leaves; but that is the effect of the season; she must not be despised for that."

And he went out without waiting for an answer from Charney.

Not yet recovered from his surprise and emotion, he sought to explain his singular vision. He decided at last that the sweet image of Picciola, the young girl, must have been that of Theresa, of whom he had had a glimpse through the little grated window, and that, without his knowledge, it was impressed upon his brain and reproduced in his dreams.

While he was thus reasoning with himself, the murmur of two voices reached him from the stairway; in addition to the well-known step of his friend, he could distinguish a light and furtive footfall which seemed to glide over the stones, scarcely touching them. The measured sound ceased at his door. He trembled, but Girhardi entered alone.

"She is here," said he, "and awaits us near the plant."

Charney followed in silence, unable to articulate a word, his heart filled with a sort of constraint rather than pleasure.

Was it embarrassment in presenting himself before a woman to whom he owed so much and could pay nothing? Was it the remembrance of the manner in which he had received her smile and salute that morning? Was it that, as the separation approached, his courage and resignation failed? Whether it was owing to these or other causes, when he was presented to her, one would never have recognized the polished Count de Charney; the ease of the man of the world, the self-possession of the philosopher, gave place to a confused awkwardness, to which doubtless was owing the apparent coolness and circumspection with which Theresa clothed her words and her manner.

Notwithstanding all Girhardi's efforts to bring about a pleasant relation between his daughter and his friend, the conversation, for a time was only upon commonplace topics. Recovered somewhat from his first agitation, Charney saw in the calmness of Theresa's expression only indifference, and easily persuaded himself that, in the service she had rendered him, she had only obeyed her natural love of adventure, or the wishes of her father.

He went so far as almost to regret that he had seen her, fearing to lose the charm with which in his reveries he had heretofore invested her.

While the three were seated on the bench, Girhardi gazing upon his daughter, and Charney occasionally making an indifferent remark, in a movement which Theresa made towards her father, a large medallion, suspended about her neck and hidden in her dress, escaped. Charney could see on one side the white hair of the old man, and on the other a withered flower carefully preserved under the glass. It was the flower which he had sent to her by Ludovic.

She had carefully preserved his flower, then, — treasured it with the hair of her father whom she adored! The flower of Picciola no longer ornamented the hair of the young girl; it reposed upon her heart!

This discovery made an entire change in Charney's sentiments.

He scanned her features anew, as if she had been metamorphosed, and he might discover there what had not before been visible. Her face, turned towards the old man, was illuminated by a double expression of tenderness and serenity; she was beautiful then with the beauty of Raphael's virgins, with the beauty of a loving and pure soul. Charney gazed on this lovely profile, in which harmonized strength and sweetness, energy and modesty. It was long since he had looked upon a human face so glowing with youth, beauty, and virtue. He was intoxicated by the sight, and fixing his eyes earnestly on the medallion, murmured, "You did not, then, despise my poor gift?"

But low as was the tone in which he spoke, Theresa turned quickly towards him: her first movement was to replace the locket in her dress; but she, in her turn, was aware of the change in the Count's expression, and as their eyes met the blood mounted in the faces of both.

"What is the matter, my child?" said Girhardi, seeing her disturbance.

"Nothing," said she; but instantly correcting herself, as if she scorned to deny a pure and honorable sentiment, — "It is this medallion; see, my father, this is your hair"; then, turning to Charney, "This is the flower, monsieur, that you sent me; I have kept it, and I shall keep it forever!"

There was in her words and the sound of her voice, and in that delicate instinct which led her to address her explanation as well to her father as to the stranger, so much frankness and modesty, an expression so tender and chaste, that Charney felt himself touched as he had never been before.

The rest of the day passed in the effusions of a friendship which each minute seemed to enhance. Apart from the secret attraction which sometimes draws us to another, intimacy grows with a rapidity proportioned to the time we may have to spend with our new friend.

Charney and Theresa had never spoken to each other till to-day, but they had each thought much of the other, — and they would perhaps have so few hours together! When Charney, by an instinct of etiquette and good breeding, rose to retire, saying that after so long a separation he would leave the father and daughter alone to enjoy their happiness, she exclaimed, "Are you going?" detaining him by a look, and Girhardi by a gesture. "Are you then a stranger to my father — or to me?" added she, with a charming tone of reproach.

To convince him that his presence was no restraint upon them, she entered into the detail of all her adventures since she left Fenestrella and the means employed by her to reunite the two captives. Having finished her recital, she begged Charney to commence his, and to relate the employment of his days, and his observations on Picciola.

He then entered upon the history of his earlier days in prison, his ennui, and his manual labors, the welcome appearance of his plant, and its progressive development, while Theresa with interested and intelligent questions stimulated his narrative.

Girhardi, seated between the two, holding in one hand the hand of his daughter, so lately restored to him, and in the other that of the friend he was so soon to leave, listened to them both, looking first at one, then at the other, with mingled feelings of joy and sadness. But at one time the old man drew his hands together, and by the same movement those of Charney and Theresa. Then the two young people, agitated, embarrassed, with quickened heart-beats, became silent. At last the young girl, without any appearance of prudery or affectation, gently withdrew her hand, and placing it upon her father's shoulder, leaned her head carelessly upon it, in a charming manner, and smiling, turned her eyes towards Charney to invite him to continue his discourse.

Drawn on and encouraged by her ease and interest, he even went on to relate his dreams beside his plant. They were, as I have said before, the real events of his life in his solitude. He spoke of the young girl, so lovely and charming, in whom Picciola the plant was personified; and while, with ardent enthusiasm, he sketched the portrait, Theresa's eyes drooped, her smile faded, and her breast heaved as she listened.

The narrator took care not to name the true model of this sweet image; but finishing the history of the misfortunes of his plant, he recalled the instant when the dying Picciola, by the order of the commandant, was to be uprooted before his eyes.

"Poor Picciola!" exclaimed Theresa, with irrepressible emotion, "thou belongest also to me, dear little one, for I contributed to thy deliverance."

And Charney, transported with joy, thanked her in his heart for that adoption which established a sacred tie between them.

CHAPTER IX.

How joyfully would Charney have renounced liberty, fortune, the world, if his days might have flowed thus in prison between Theresa and her father! This young girl he loved as he had never loved before. This sentiment, until now a stranger to his soul, took possession of it, — a sentiment at once violent and gentle, bitter and sweet, like an acid fruit, which, though sharp to the taste, leaves a sweet flavor in the mouth. It revealed itself to him by throbs of a new joy, by transports of a tenderness which embraced God, mankind, and all nature. His brain, his heart, his whole being, seemed to dilate with the hopes, projects, and raptures which swelled within him.

The next day the three were seated in the court beside the plant; the two friends on the bench, Theresa opposite to them, on a chair which Ludovic had provided. She had brought some woman's work, a bit of embroidery; and as she bent over it, — the soft flush of happiness and satisfaction on her face, a bright and playful expression about her mouth, her head following the motion of her needle, — she occasionally raised her eyes and smiled in meeting those of her father or Charney, sometimes throwing in a playful remark in the course of their grave discussion. At last she rose, and interrupted the conversation of the two thinkers, by throwing her arms around her father and kissing his brow. The conversation was not resumed. Charney fell into deep thought.

"Is he beloved by Theresa?" In asking himself that question, two different sentiments agitated him: he feared to believe; he trembled to doubt!

She had preserved the flower he gave her, and promised to keep it always; she was agitated, the evening before, when his hand touched hers; her emotion had been evident during his recital of his impassioned dreams; but these words, spoken in a voice so tender, were said in the presence of her father. What meaning could he give to these charming evidences of pity, interest, and devotion? Had she not given him proofs of interest before this interview, before they had exchanged looks or words? Fool! madman! to believe so easily that he had found a place in that heart, so wholly filled with filial tenderness, and to mistake for the palpitations of love the modest agitation of a maiden!

What matter? he loved her; he would always love her, and henceforth substitute for an ideal image, now insufficient, this angelic reality.

But this love must be hidden in the recesses of his own breast; to ask her to share it would be a crime. Why poison so fair a future? Does not fate decree that they shall live apart, — she, free and happy, adorning a world where she will soon find one on whom to bestow her heart, — he, alone, in prison, where he must ever live with Picciola and his eternal souvenirs of a few happy hours?

His resolution is taken; from this day, from this moment, he will affect indifference towards Theresa, or at least he will disguise his love in the false semblance of a calm and tranquil friendship. Woe to him, woe to both, if she loves him.

Full of this sage determination, he was aroused from his reflections by an animated discussion between Girhardi and his daughter; she insisting upon the probability that his release would be immediate, he preparing her for the possibility of the close of the year finding him still in prison.

"I know so well court delays," said he; "so little suffices to suspend justice or the good-will of men in power."

"If it is so," said the young girl, "I will return to-morrow to Turin, to hasten the execution of their promises."

"What need of so much haste?" replied her father.

"What! do you then prefer your narrow chamber and this dismal court-yard to your beautiful villa and grounds at La Colline?"

This apparent disposition of Theresa, this sort of impatience which she manifested to leave Fenestrella, ought to have been a satisfaction to Charney in proving to him that he was not beloved, and that there was no cause to fear the danger that he had determined to avoid. However, that which should have so satisfied his prudent resolutions, on the contrary, so troubled him as to make him altogether forget the rôle which he had assigned himself. He neither affected indifference nor a calm and tranquil friendship. His irritation and annoyance were evident in his manner; but Theresa did not appear to notice it, except occasionally to banter him upon his silence and his coolness, and again took up the argument to prove that, if the expected decree was delayed, she ought as soon as possible to go to General Menou, and even, if necessary, to Paris, to lay the case before the Emperor.

Ordinarily so quiet and reserved, she seemed suddenly to be actuated by a spirit of loquacity and raillery.

"What is the matter with you this morning?" said her father, astonished to see her treat the subject in this way before the poor captive, whom they were so soon to leave alone.

Charney knew not what to think of her.

The truth is, that Theresa, on her side, had passed through the same train of thought as Charney. She was aware, not that love was making his entrance to her breast, but that it had long ago taken up its abode there. Like Charney, she was willing to take for herself its risks and perils, but like him she dreaded them for the one beloved. And the delight of loving, the fear of being loved, threw her into this state of inconsistency with her own natural self, and was the cause of this incessant flow of words in which her heart sought to forget itself.

But soon, with one accord, they both ceased all these efforts, all this constraint to disguise their real sentiments. In listening to the account which Girhardi related of the many prisoners he had known, who, after their pardon had been publicly announced, waited many months for their release, they yielded themselves with delight to the sweet belief that it would be so now. One would have said, in listening to their plans and projects for the next and many following days, that this prison was to be their home for life, and that, united there with their guardian angel, the captives had but one thing to fear, — the liberation of one without the other.

The three being restored to serenity, the philosophers resumed their conversation, Theresa her embroidery and her merry interruptions.

The last rays of the sun illuminated the little court and the face of Theresa; the breeze played in her soft curls and in the folds and ribbons of her dress. Laying down her work, and raising her head, she shook back her hair and seemed to yield herself to an intoxicating draught of air, light, and happiness.

At this moment the door of the court was opened. Colonel Morand, followed by an officer and Ludovic, came to announce to Girhardi his liberation. Girhardi was to leave the fortress immediately; a carriage was in waiting outside of the gate to convey him and his daughter to Turin.

At the entrance of the commandant, Theresa had risen, but immediately sank again into her chair, and, with one glance at Charney, all color and smiles faded from her face. But Charney remained on his seat with bowed head, while they presented Girhardi with the papers which restored to him his honor and liberty.

The preparations for departure could not be long. Already Ludovic had descended from the chamber of the ex-prisoner with his trunks. The officer waited to accompany them to Turin.

The hour of separation had come.

Theresa rose again, and appeared to be occupied with folding her embroidery, and putting it in her bag; then she attempted to put on her glove, but her trembling hands made it impossible.

Charney then, calling up all his resolution, went towards Girhardi, and threw himself into his arms.

"Adieu, my father!"

"My son! my dear son!" faltered the old man. "Have courage; count on us; — adieu, adieu!"

He pressed him again and again to his breast, and suddenly withdrawing from him turned to Ludovic, and, to hide his emotion, gave him several useless recommendations concerning his care of him who was to be left alone. Ludovic did not reply, but gave his arm to the old man, who he saw needed support.

During this time Charney had approached Theresa, to take leave of her. Leaning with one hand on the back of her chair, her eyes fixed on the ground, she stood thoughtful, motionless, as if nothing had been said of leaving.

When she saw Charney near her, rousing from her revery, she looked earnestly at him for a moment without speaking. He was pale and dejected, and words failed him. Suddenly the young girl, forgetting her resolutions, extending her arms toward the captive's plant, said, "I call our Picciola to witness —" But she could articulate no more.

One of her gloves which she held in her hand fell to the ground; Charney picked it up, pressed a kiss upon it, and silently returned it to her.

Theresa took the glove, wiped with it the tears which were streaming from her eyes, and then returning it with a last smile to Charney, said, "Till we meet again," and drew her father outside the little court.

A long time had passed since the gate was closed between him and them, but Charney still sat, as if turned to stone, convulsively pressing to his heart Theresa's little glove.

CONCLUSION.

A PHILOSOPHER has said that greatness must be abandoned before it can be appreciated; he might have said it with equal truth of fortune, happiness, and all those enjoyments to which one becomes so easily habituated.

Never had the prisoner appreciated the wisdom of Girhardi, the virtues and charms of his daughter, till after the departure of his two friends. For him a profound depression succeeded to the intoxication of a few days. The efforts of Ludovic, and the care which Picciola demanded, had no power to rouse him; but at length the germs of mental and moral strength which he had derived from his studies brought forth their fruit, and the crushed man rose.

In the struggle his soul learned new lessons.

At first he rejoiced in his solitude, which enabled him to think uninterruptedly of his absent friends; later, he saw with joy some one come to occupy the vacant seat of the wise old man.

Of his new companions, the first and the most assiduous was the chaplain of the prison, that good priest that he had once so rudely repulsed. Informed by Ludovic of the state of melancholy into which the prisoner had fallen, he presented himself, forgetting his former treatment, and was received with gratitude by Charney.

More kindly disposed towards mankind, Charney soon came to love this one, and the rustic seat became once more the bench of conference.

The philosopher exalted the marvels of his plant and of nature, and recounted the teachings of Girhardi; the priest, without entering into the discussion of dogmas, told him of Christ; and each became stronger in leaning upon the other.

The second visitor was the commandant of the fortress, Colonel Morand. Known better, he was a good enough man; his heart was in a military casing, that is to say, he was only hard to those in his little world, by order. He almost reconciled Charney to subordinate tyrants.

At last Charney said adieu to the priest and the Colonel. One day, when he least expected it, the prison-doors opened for him.

On his return from Austerlitz, Napoleon, importuned by Josephine (who, in her turn, probably submitted to the importunities of another interceding for the prisoner of Fenestrella), caused an account to be rendered to him of the seizure made by the officers in their visit of search. They brought to the Emperor the cambric manuscripts, until then deposited in the archives of the Minister of Justice. He read them over carefully, and declared loudly that the Count of Charney was a madman, but a harmless one.

"He who can so abase his thoughts as to be absorbed in a weed," said he, "may make an excellent botanist, but not a conspirator. I grant his pardon. Let his estates be restored to him, and let him cultivate them himself, if such is his good pleasure."

Charney, in his turn, left Fenestrella; but he did not go alone. Could he be separated from his first, his constant friend? After having her transplanted into a large case of good earth, he took Picciola in triumph with him; his Picciola, — Picciola, to whom he owed reason; Picciola to whom he owed his life; Picciola, from whose bosom he had drawn consoling faith; Picciola, through whom he had learned friendship and love; Picciola, in short, through whom he was to be restored to liberty!

As he was about to cross the drawbridge, a large rough hand was extended towards him.

"Signor Count," said Ludovic, trying to conceal his emotion, "give me your hand; now we can be friends, since you are going, since you leave us; since we shall see you no more, — thank God! —"

Charney interrupted him, "We shall see each other again, my dear Ludovic! Ludovic, my friend!"

And after having embraced him, and pressed his hand again and again, he left the citadel.

He had crossed the esplanade, left behind him the hill on which the fortress is built, crossed the bridge over the Clusone, and turned into the road to Suza, when a voice from the ramparts reached him, crying, "Adieu, Signor Count! adieu, Picciola!"

Six months after, one sunny day in spring, a rich equipage drew up at the gates of the prison of Fenestrella. A traveller alighted, and inquired for Ludovic Ritti.

It was his former captive, who came to pay a visit to his friend the jailer. A young lady leaned lovingly on the arm of the traveller. That young lady was Theresa Girhardi, Countess of Charney.

Together they visited the court, and the chamber where once abode ennui, scepticism, désillusion.

Of all the despairing sentences which had been inscribed upon the white walls, one alone remained: —

"Learning, wit, beauty, youth, fortune, — all are powerless to give happiness."

Theresa added, "without love."

The kiss which Charney pressed upon her brow gave confirmation to the truth of what she had written.

Before leaving, the Count asked Ludovic to be godfather to his first child, as he had been to Picciola. Then saying farewell, the husband and wife returned to Turin, where Girhardi awaited them in his country-seat of La Colline.

There, near the house, in a rich parterre, brightened and warmed by the rays of the rising sun, Charney had ordered his plant to be placed, alone, that no other might interfere with its development. By his order no hand but his might touch it or care for it. He alone would watch over it; it was an employment, a duty, a debt, imposed upon him by his gratitude.

How rapidly the days flowed by! Surrounded by extensive grounds, on the borders of a beautiful river, under a genial sky, Charney tasted the wine of this world's happiness. Time added a new charm, new strength to all these ties; for habit, like the ivy of our walls, cements and consolidates that which it cannot destroy. The friendship of Girhardi, the love of Theresa, the blessings of all who lived under his roof, — nothing was wanting to his happiness, and yet that happiness was to be made still greater. Charney became a father.

O, then his heart overflowed with felicity. His tenderness for his daughter seemed to redouble that which he felt for his wife. He was never weary of gazing upon and adoring them both. To be separated a moment from them was pain.

Ludovic arrived to fulfil his promise. He wished to visit his first godchild, that of the prison. But alas! in the midst of these transports of love, of the prosperity and happiness with which La Colline abounded, the source of all these joys, of all this happiness, la povera Picciola, was dead, — dead for want of care!

INTRODUCTION.

WILLIAM BECKFORD, the author of the following celebrated Eastern tale, was born in 1760, and died in the spring of 1844, at the advanced age of eighty-four years. It is to be regretted that a man of so remarkable a character did not leave the world some record of a life offering points of interest different from that of any of his contemporaries, from the peculiarly studious retirement and eccentric avocations in which it was chiefly passed.

"Vathek," — the superb "Vathek," which Lord Byron so much admired, and on which he so frequently complimented the author, — "Vathek," the finest of Oriental romances by the pen of a "Frank," was written and published before our author had completed his twentieth year, it having been composed at a single sitting! For three days and two nights did the indefatigable author persevere in his task. He completed it, and a serious illness was the result. Few other literary men have ever equalled this feat of rapidity and genius.

"Vathek" was originally written in French, of which its style is a model. The translation which follows is not by the author himself, though he expressed perfect satisfaction with it. It was originally published in 1786. For splendor of description, exquisite humor, and supernatural interest and grandeur, it stands without a rival in romance.

Much of the description of Vathek's palace, and even the renowned "Hall of Eblis," was afterwards visibly embodied in the real Fonthill Abbey, of which wonders almost as fabulous were at one time reported and believed.

Fonthill Abbey, which had been destroyed by fire and rebuilt during the lifetime of the elder Beckford, was on account of its bad site demolished, and again rebuilt under the superintendence of our author himself, assisted by James Wyatt, the architect, with a magnificence that excited the greatest attention and wonder at the time. The total outlay upon Fonthill, including the edifice, furniture, articles of virtu, &c., must have been enormous, not much within the million. A writer in the "Athenæum" mentions £ 400,000 as the sum. Beckford informed Mr. Cyrus Redding that the exact cost of building Fonthill was £ 273,000.

The distinguishing architectural peculiarity of Fonthill Abbey was a lofty tower two hundred and eighty feet in height. This tower was prominently shadowed forth in "Vathek," and shows how strong a hold the idea had upon the author's mind. Such was his impatience to see Fonthill completed, that he had the works continued by torchlight, with relays of workmen. During the progress of the building the tower caught fire, and was partly destroyed. The owner, however, was present, and enjoyed the magnificent burning spectacle. It was soon restored, but a radical fault in laying the foundation caused it eventually to fall down, and leave Fonthill a ruin in the lifetime of its founder.

Beckford was in person scarcely above the middle height, slender, and well formed, with features indicating great intellectual power. He was exactly one year younger than Pitt, the companion of his minority.

The last years of his life were passed at Bath, where he united two houses in Lansdown Crescent by an arch thrown across the street, and containing his library, which was well selected and very extensive. Not far off he again erected a tower, a hundred and thirty feet high, of which the following description was given, at the time of his decease, by a correspondent of the "Athenæum":—

"Mr. Beckford, at an early period of his residence there, erected a lofty tower, in the apartments of which were placed many of his choicest paintings and articles of virtu. Asiatic in its style, with gilded lattices and blinds, or curtains of crimson cloth, its striped ceilings, its minaret and other accessories, conveyed the idea that the being who designed the place and endeavored to carry out the plan was deeply imbued with the spirit of that lonely grandeur and strict solitariness which obtains through all countries and among all people of the East. The building was surrounded by a high wall, and entrance afforded to the garden in which the tower stood by a door of small dimensions. The garden itself was Eastern in its character. Though comparatively circumscribed in its size, nevertheless were to be found within it solitary walks and deep retiring shades, such as could be supposed Vathek, the mournful and the magnificent, loved, and from the bowers of which might be expected would suddenly fall upon the ear sounds of the cymbal and the dulcimer. The building contained several apartments crowded with the finest paintings. The doors of the rooms were of finely polished wood, the windows of single sweeps of plate glass, the cornices of gilded silver; every part, both within and without, bespeaking the wealth, the magnificence, and the taste of him who had built this temple in dedication to grandeur, solitariness, and the arts."

From the summit of this tower Mr. Beckford — and he alone without a telescope — could behold that other tower of his youthful magnificence, Fonthill, on which he loved to gaze, with feelings which it would be difficult to describe. His eyesight was wonderful: he could gaze upon the sun like an eagle; and on the day that the great tower at Fonthill fell, he missed it in the landscape long before the news of the catastrophe reached Bath.

In conclusion, we have only to add that our author in his lifetime had all that wealth can give, and in his grave his memory will retain that which no wealth can purchase. His genius yet lives, and "Vathek" will, whilst English literature lasts, never want readers, and, while good taste flourishes, admirers.

AUTHOR'S PREFACE.

THE original of the following story, with some others of a similar kind, collected in the East by a man of letters, was communicated to the editor above three years ago. The pleasure he received from the perusal of it induced him at that time to transcribe, and since to translate it. How far the copy may be a just representation it becomes not him to determine. He presumes, however, to hope that, if the difficulty of accommodating our English idioms to the Arabic, preserving the correspondent tones of a diversified narration, and discriminating the nicer touches of character through the shades of foreign manners be duly considered, a failure in some points will not preclude him from all claim to indulgence, especially if those images, sentiments, and passions, which, being independent of local peculiarities, may be expressed in every language, shall be found to retain their native energy in our own.

VATHEK.

VATHEK, ninth Caliph * of the race of the Abassides, was the son of Motassem, and the grandson of Haroun Al Raschid. From an early accession to the throne, and the talents he possessed to adorn it, his subjects were induced to expect that his reign would be long and happy. His figure was pleasing and majestic; but when he was angry, one of his eyes † became so terrible that no person could bear to behold it; and the wretch upon whom it was fixed instantly fell backward, and sometimes expired. For fear, however, of depopulating his dominions, and making his palace desolate, he but rarely gave way to his anger.

Being much addicted to women and the pleasures of the table, he sought by his affability to procure agreeable companions; and he succeeded the better, as his generosity was unbounded and his indulgences unrestrained; for he was by no means scrupulous: nor did he think, with the Caliph Omar Ben Abdalaziz,‡ that it was necessary to make a hell of this world to enjoy Paradise in the next.

He surpassed in magnificence all his predecessors. The palace of Alkoremmi, which his father Motassem had erected on the hill of Pied Horses, and which commanded the whole city of Samarah,* was in his idea far too scanty; he added, therefore, five wings, or rather other palaces, which he destined for the particular gratification of each of his senses.

In the first of these were tables continually covered with the most exquisite dainties, which were supplied both by night and by day according to their constant consumption; whilst the most delicious wines, and the choicest cordials, flowed forth from a hundred fountains, that were never exhausted. This palace was called "The Eternal, or Unsatiating Banquet."

The second was styled "The Temple of Melody, or the Nectar of the Soul." It was inhabited by the most skilful musicians and admired poets of the time, who not only displayed their talents within, but, dispersing in bands without, caused every surrounding scene to reverberate their songs, which were continually varied in the most delightful succession.

The palace named "The Delight of the

† The author of "Nighiaristan" hath preserved a fact that supports this account; and there is no history of Vathek in which his terrible eye is not mentioned.

Khondemir relates, in his life of Motassem, that this prince, to terminate the disputes which were perpetually happening between the inhabitants of Bagdat and his Turkish slaves, withdrew from thence; and, having fixed on a situation in the plain of Catoul, there founded Samarah. He is said to have had in the stables of this city a hundred and thirty thousand pied horses; each of which carried, by his order, a sack of earth to a place he had chosen. By this accumulation an elevation was formed that commanded a view of all Samarah, and served for the foundation of his magnificent palace. — Herbelot, pp. 752, 808, 985. Anecdotes Arabes, p. 413.

Eyes, or the Support of Memory," was one entire enchantment. Rarities collected from every corner of the earth were there found in such profusion as to dazzle and confound, but for the order in which they were arranged. One gallery exhibited the pictures of the celebrated Mani, and statues that seemed to be alive. Here a well-managed perspective attracted the sight; there, the magic of optics agreeably deceived it; whilst the naturalist, on his part, exhibited in their several classes the various gifts that Heaven had bestowed on our globe. In a word, Vathek omitted nothing in this particular that might gratify the curiosity of those who resorted to it, although he was not able to satisfy his own; for he was, of all men, the most curious.

"The Palace of Perfumes," which was termed likewise "The Incentive to Pleasure," consisted of various halls, where the different perfumes which the earth produces were kept perpetually burning in censers of gold. Flambeaus and aromatic lamps were here lighted in open day; but the too powerful effects of this agreeable delirium might be avoided by descending into an immense garden, where an assemblage of every fragrant flower diffused through the air the purest odors.

The fifth palace, denominated "The Retreat of Joy, or the Dangerous," was frequented by troops of young females, beautiful as the Houris,* and not less seducing, who never failed to receive with caresses all whom the Caliph allowed to approach them; for he was by no means disposed to be jealous, as his own women were secluded within the palace he inhabited himself.

Notwithstanding the sensuality in which Vathek indulged, he experienced no abatement in the love of his people, who thought that a sovereign immersed in pleasure was not less tolerable to his subjects than one that employed himself in creating them foes. But the unquiet and impetuous disposition of the Caliph would not allow him to rest there: he had studied so much for his amusement in the lifetime of his father as to acquire a great deal of knowledge, though not a sufficiency to satisfy himself; for he wished to know everything; even sciences that did not exist. He was fond of engaging in disputes with the learned, but liked them not to push their opposition with warmth. He stopped the mouths of those with presents, whose mouths could be stopped; whilst others, whom his liberality was unable to subdue, he sent to prison to cool their blood,—a remedy that often succeeded.

Vathek discovered also a predilection for theological controversy; but it was not with the orthodox that he usually held. By this means he induced the zealots to oppose him, and then persecuted them in return; for he resolved, at any rate, to have reason on his side.

The great prophet Mahomet, whose vicars the Caliphs are, beheld with indignation from his abode in the seventh heaven the irreligious conduct of such a vicegerent.

"Let us leave him to himself," said he to the Genii,* who are always ready to receive his commands; "let us see to what lengths his folly and impiety will carry him; if he run into excess, we shall know how to chastise him. Assist him, therefore, to complete the tower which, in imitation of Nimrod, he hath begun; not, like that great warrior, to escape being drowned, but from the insolent curiosity of penetrating the secrets of heaven: he will not divine the fate that awaits him."

The Genii obeyed; and when the workmen had raised their structure a cubit in the daytime, two cubits more were added in the night. The expedition with which the fabric arose was not a little flattering to the vanity of Vathek. He fancied that even insensible matter showed a forwardness to subserve his designs; not considering that the successes of the foolish and wicked form the first rod of their chastisement.

Not formed of clay, like mortal women, they are deemed in the highest degree beautiful, and exempt from every inconvenience incident to the sex.—Al Koran, passim.

* Genn or Ginn, in the Arabic, signifies a Genius or Demon,—a being of a higher order and formed of more subtile matter than man. According to Oriental mythology, the Genii governed the world long before the creation of Adam. The Mahometans regarded them as an intermediate race between angels and men, and capable of salvation: whence Mahomet pretended a commission to convert them. Consonant to this we read that, "When the servant of God stood up to invoke him, it wanted little but that the Genii had pressed on him in crowds, to hear him rehearse the Koran."—Herbelot, p. 357. Al Koran, ch. 72.

His pride arrived at its height when, having ascended, for the first time, the eleven thousand stairs of his tower, he cast his eyes below and beheld men not larger than pismires, mountains than shells, and cities than beehives. The idea which such an elevation inspired of his own grandeur completely bewildered him; he was almost ready to adore himself; till, lifting his eyes upwards, he saw the stars as high above him as they appeared when he stood on the surface of the earth. He consoled himself, however, for this transient perception of his littleness, with the thought of being great in the eyes of the others, and flattered himself that the light of his mind would extend beyond the reach of his sight, and transfer to the stars the decrees of his destiny.

With this view the inquisitive prince passed most of his nights on the summit of his tower, till he became an adept in the mysteries of astrology, and imagined that the planets had disclosed to him the most marvellous adventures, which were to be accomplished by an extraordinary personage, from a country altogether unknown. Prompted by motives of curiosity, he had always been courteous to strangers; but from this instant he redoubled his attention, and ordered it to be announced by sound of trumpet, through all the streets of Samarah, that no one of his subjects, on peril of his displeasure, should either lodge or detain a traveller, but forthwith bring him to the palace.

Not long after this proclamation, there arrived in his metropolis a man so hideous that the very guards who arrested him were forced to shut their eyes as they led him along. The Caliph himself appeared startled at so horrible a visage; but joy succeeded to this emotion of terror when the stranger displayed to his view such rarities as he had never before seen, and of which he had no conception.

In reality, nothing was ever so extraordinary as the merchandise this stranger produced. Most of his curiosities, which were not less admirable for their workmanship than their splendor, had, besides, their several virtues described on a parchment fastened to each. There were slippers which enabled the feet to walk; knives that cut without the motion of the hand; sabres which dealt the blow at the person they were wished to strike; and the whole enriched with gems that were hitherto unknown.

The sabres, whose blades emitted a dazzling radiance, fixed more than all the Caliph's attention, who promised himself to decipher at his leisure the uncouth characters engraven on their sides. Without, therefore, demanding their price, he ordered all the coined gold to be brought from his treasury, and commanded the merchant to take what he pleased. The stranger complied with modesty and silence.

Vathek, imagining that the merchant's taciturnity was occasioned by the awe which his presence inspired, encouraged him to advance, and asked him, with an air of condescension, "Who he was? whence he came? and where he obtained such beautiful commodities?"

The man, or rather monster, instead of making a reply, thrice rubbed his forehead, which, as well as his body, was blacker than ebony; four times clapped his paunch, the projection of which was enormous; opened wide his huge eyes, which glowed like firebrands; began to laugh with a hideous noise, and discovered his long amber-colored teeth bestreaked with green.

The Caliph, though a little startled, renewed his inquiries, but without being able to procure a reply. At which, beginning to be ruffled, he exclaimed, "Knowest thou, varlet, who I am, and at whom thou art aiming thy gibes?" Then, addressing his guards, "Have ye heard him speak? is he dumb?"

"He hath spoken," they replied, "though but little."

"Let him speak, then, again," said Vathek, "and tell me who he is, from whence he came, and where he procured these singular curiosities, or I swear, by the ass of Balaam, that I will make him rue his pertinacity."

This menace was accompanied by the Caliph with one of his angry and perilous glances, which the stranger sustained without the slightest emotion, although his eyes were fixed on the terrible eye of the prince.

No words can describe the amazement of the courtiers, when they beheld this rude merchant withstand the encounter unshocked. They all fell prostrate with their faces on the ground, to avoid the risk of their lives, and continued in the same abject posture till the Caliph exclaimed in a furious tone :—

"Up, cowards! seize the miscreant! see that he be committed to prison, and guarded by the best of my soldiers! Let him, however, retain the money I gave him; it is not my intent to take from him his property: I only want him to speak."

No sooner had he uttered these words than the stranger was surrounded, pinioned with strong fetters, and hurried away to the prison of the great tower, which was encompassed by seven empalements of iron bars, and armed with spikes in every direction, longer and sharper than spits.

The Caliph, nevertheless, remained in the most violent agitation. He sat down, indeed, to eat, but of the three hundred covers that were daily placed before him, could taste of no more than thirty-two.

A diet to which he had been so little accustomed was sufficient of itself to prevent him from sleeping: what, then, must be its effect when joined to the anxiety that preyed upon his spirits? At the first glimpse of dawn he hastened to the prison, again to importune this intractable stranger; but the rage of Vathek exceeded all bounds on finding the prison empty, the gates burst asunder, and his guards lying lifeless around him. In the paroxysm of his passion he fell furiously on the poor carcasses, and kicked them till evening without intermission. His courtiers and viziers exerted their efforts to soothe his extravagance, but, finding every expedient ineffectual, they all united in one vociferation:—

"The Caliph is gone mad! the Caliph is out of his senses!"

This outcry, which was soon resounded through the streets of Samarah, at length reached the ears of Carathis, his mother: she flew in the utmost consternation to try her ascendency on the mind of her son. Her tears and caresses called off his attention, and he was prevailed upon by her entreaties to be brought back to the palace.

Carathis, apprehensive of leaving Vathek to himself, caused him to be put to bed; and seating herself by him, endeavored by her conversation to heal and compose him. Nor could any one have attempted it with better success; for the Caliph not only loved her as a mother, but respected her as a person of superior genius. It was she who had induced him, being a Greek herself, to adopt all the sciences and systems of her country, which good Mussulmans hold in such thorough abhorrence.

Judicial astrology was one of those systems in which Carathis was a perfect adept. She began, therefore, with reminding her son of the promise which the stars had made him; and intimated an intention of consulting them again.

"Alas!" sighed the Caliph, as soon as he could speak, "what a fool have I been! not for the kicks bestowed on my guards, who so tamely submitted to death, but for never considering that this extraordinary man was the same the planets had foretold; whom, instead of ill-treating, I should have conciliated by all the arts of persuasion."

"The past," said Carathis, "cannot be recalled; but it behooves us to think of the future: perhaps you may again see the object you so much regret; it is possible the inscriptions on the sabres will afford information. Eat, therefore, and take thy repose, my dear son. We will consider to-morrow in what manner to act."

Vathek yielded to her counsel as well as he could, and arose in the morning with a mind more at ease. The sabres he commanded to be instantly brought; and poring upon them through a green glass, that their glittering might not dazzle, he set himself in earnest to decipher the inscriptions; but his reiterated attempts were all of them purgatory: in vain did he beat his head and bite his nails; not a letter of the whole was he able to ascertain. So unlucky a disappointment would have undone him again, had not Carathis, by good fortune, entered the apartment.

"Have patience, son!" said she. "You certainly are possessed of every important science, but the knowledge of languages is a trifle, at best; and the accomplishment of none but a pedant. Issue forth a proclamation that you will confer such rewards as become your greatness upon any one that shall interpret what you do not understand, and what it is beneath you to learn. You will soon find your curiosity gratified."

"That may be," said the Caliph: "but in the mean time I shall be horribly disgusted by a crowd of smatterers, who will come to the trial as much for the pleasure of retailing their jargon as from the hope of gaining the reward. To avoid this evil it will be proper to add that I will put every candidate to death who shall fail to give satisfaction; for, thank Heaven, I have skill enough to distinguish between one that translates and one that invents."

"Of that I have no doubt," replied Carathis; "but to put the ignorant to death is somewhat severe, and may be productive of dangerous effects. Content yourself with commanding their beards to be burnt: beards, in a state, are not quite so essential as men."

The Caliph submitted to the reasons of his mother, and sending for Morakanabad, his prime vizier, said: —

"Let the common criers proclaim, not only in Samarah, but throughout every city in my empire, that whosoever will repair hither, and decipher certain characters which appear to be inexplicable, shall experience the liberality for which I am renowned; but that all who fail upon trial shall have their beards burnt off to the last hair. Let them add, also, that I will bestow fifty beautiful slaves and as many jars of apricots, from the isle of Kirmith, upon any man that shall bring me intelligence of the stranger."

The subjects of the Caliph, like their sovereign, being great admirers of women and apricots from Kirmith, felt their mouths water at these promises, but were totally unable to gratify their hankering, for no one knew which way the stranger had gone.

As to the Caliph's other requisition, the result was different: the learned, the half learned, and those who were neither, but fancied themselves equal to both, came boldly to hazard their beards, and all shamefully lost them.

The exaction of these forfeitures, which found sufficient employment for the eunuchs, gave them such a smell of singed hair as greatly to disgust the ladies of the seraglio, and make it necessary that this new occupation of their guardians should be transferred into other hands.

At length, however, an old man presented himself, whose beard was a cubit and a half longer than any that had appeared before him. The officers of the palace whispered to each other as they ushered him in: —

"What a pity such a beard should be burnt!"

Even the Caliph, when he saw it, concurred with them in opinion; but his concern was entirely needless. This venerable personage read the characters with facility, and explained them verbatim, as follows: —

"We were made where everything good is made; we are the least of the wonders of a place where all is wonderful; and deserving the sight of the first potentate on earth."

"You translate admirably!" cried Vathek. "I know to what these marvellous characters allude. Let him receive as many robes of honor, and thousands of sequins of gold, as he hath spoken words. I am in some measure relieved from the perplexity that embarrassed me!"

Vathek invited the old man to dine, and even to remain some days in the palace. Unluckily for him he accepted the offer, for the Caliph, having ordered him next morning to be called, said: —

"Read again to me what you have read already; I cannot hear too often the promise that is made me, the completion of which I languish to obtain."

The old man forthwith put on his green spectacles, but they instantly dropped from his nose on perceiving that the characters he had read the day preceding had given place to others of different import.

"What ails you?" asked the Caliph; "and why these symptoms of wonder?"

"Sovereign of the world," replied the old man, "these sabres hold another language today from that they yesterday held."

"How say you?" returned Vathek. "But it matters not! tell me, if you can, what they mean."

"It is this, my lord," rejoined the old man: "Woe to the rash mortal who seeks to know that of which he should remain ignorant, and to undertake that which surpasseth his power!"

"And woe to thee!" cried the Caliph, in a burst of indignation; "to-day thou art void of understanding: begone from my presence; they shall burn but the half of thy beard, because thou wert yesterday fortunate in guessing. My gifts I never resume."

The old man, wise enough to perceive he had luckily escaped, considering the folly of disclosing so disgusting a truth, immediately withdrew, and appeared not again.

But it was not long before Vathek discovered abundant reason to regret his precipitation; for though he could not decipher the characters himself, yet, by constantly poring upon them, he plainly perceived that they every day changed; and, unfortunately, no other candidate offered to explain them. This perplexing occupation inflamed his blood, dazzled his sight, and brought on a giddiness and debility that he could not support. He failed not, however, though in so reduced a condition, to be often carried to his tower, as he flattered himself that he might there read in the stars, which he went to consult, something more congruous to his wishes. But in this his hopes were deluded; for his eyes, dimmed by the vapors of his head, began to subserve his curiosity so ill that he beheld nothing but a thick dun cloud, which he took for the most direful of omens.

Agitated with so much anxiety, Vathek entirely lost all firmness; a fever seized him, and his appetite failed. Instead of being one of the greatest eaters, he became as distinguished for drinking. So insatiable was the thirst which tormented him, that his mouth, like a funnel, was always open to receive the various liquors that might be poured into it; and especially cold water, which calmed him more than every other.

This unhappy prince, being thus incapacitated for the enjoyment of any pleasure, commanded the palaces of the five senses to be shut up; forebore to appear in public, either to display his magnificence or administer justice; and retired to the inmost apartment of his harem. As he had ever been an indulgent husband, his wives, overwhelmed with grief at his deplorable situation, incessantly offered their prayers for his health, and unremittingly supplied him with water.

In the mean time the Princess Carathis, whose affliction no words can describe, instead of restraining herself to sobbing and tears, was closeted daily with the Vizier Morakanabad, to find out some cure or mitigation of the Caliph's disease. Under the persuasion that it was caused by enchantment, they turned over together, leaf by leaf, all the books of magic that might point out a remedy, and caused the horrible stranger, whom they accused as the enchanter, to be everywhere sought for with the strictest diligence.

At the distance of a few miles from Samarah stood a high mountain, whose sides were swarded with wild thyme and basil, and its summit overspread with so delightful a plain that it might be taken for the Paradise destined for the faithful. Upon it grew a hundred thickets of eglantine and other fragrant shrubs; a hundred arbors of roses, jessamine, and honeysuckle; as many clumps of orange trees, cedar, and citron, whose branches, interwoven with the palm, the pomegranate, and the vine, presented every luxury that could regale the eye or the taste. The ground was strewed with violets, harebells, and pansies, in the midst of which sprung forth tufts of jonquils, hyacinths, and carnations, with every other perfume that impregnates the air. Four fountains, not less clear than deep, and so abundant as to slake the thirst of ten armies, seemed purposely placed here to make the scene more resemble the garden of Eden, which was watered by the four sacred rivers. Here the nightingale sang the birth of the rose, her well-beloved, and at the same time lamented its short-lived beauty; whilst the turtle deplored the loss of more substantial pleasures, and the wakeful lark hailed the rising light that reanimates the whole creation. Here, more than anywhere, the mingled melodies of birds expressed the various passions they inspired, as if the exquisite fruits, which they pecked at pleasure, had given them a double energy.

To this mountain Vathek was sometimes brought, for the sake of breathing a purer air, and especially to drink at will of the four fountains, which were reputed in the highest degree salubrious, and sacred to himself. His attendants were his mother, his wives, and some eunuchs, who assiduously employed themselves in filling capacious bowls of rock crystal, and emulously presenting them to him. But it frequently happened that his avidity exceeded their zeal, insomuch that he would prostrate himself upon the ground to lap up the water, of which he could never have enough.

One day, when this unhappy prince had been long lying in so debasing a posture, a voice, hoarse but strong, thus addressed him:—

"Why assumest thou the function of a dog, O Caliph, so proud of thy dignity and power?"

At this apostrophe he raised up his head and beheld the stranger who had caused him so much affliction. Inflamed with anger at the sight, he exclaimed, —

"Accursed Giaour!* what comest thou hither to do? Is it not enough to have transformed a prince, remarkable for his agility, into one of those leather barrels which the Bedouin Arabs carry on their camels when they traverse the deserts? Perceivest thou not that I may perish by drinking to excess, no less than by a total abstinence?"

"Drink, then, this draught," said the stranger, as he presented to him a phial of a red and yellow mixture; "and to satiate the thirst of thy soul as well as of thy body, know that I am an Indian, but from a region of India which is wholly unknown."

The Caliph, delighted to see his desires accomplished in part, and flattering himself with the hope of obtaining their entire fulfilment, without a moment's hesitation, swallowed the potion, and instantaneously found his health restored, his thirst appeased, and his limbs as agile as ever.

In the transports of his joy Vathek leaped upon the neck of the frightful Indian, and kissed his horrid mouth and hollow cheeks as though they had been the coral lips and the lilies and roses of his most beautiful wives; whilst they, less terrified than jealous at the sight, dropped their veils to hide the blush of mortification that suffused their foreheads.

Nor would the scene have closed here had not Carathis, with all the art of insinuation, a little repressed the raptures of her son. Having prevailed upon him to return to Samarah, she caused a herald to precede him, whom she commanded to proclaim as loudly as possible: —

"The wonderful stranger hath appeared again; he hath healed the Caliph; he hath spoken! he hath spoken!"

Forthwith all the inhabitants of this vast city quitted their habitations, and ran together in crowds to see the procession of Vathek and the Indian, whom they now blessed as much as they had before execrated, incessantly shouting, —

"He hath healed our sovereign; he hath spoken! he hath spoken!"

* Dives of this kind are frequently mentioned by Eastern writers. Consult their tales in general, and especially those of "The Fisherman," "Aladdin," and "The Princess of China."

Nor were these words forgotten in the public festivals, which were celebrated the same evening to testify the general joy, for the poets applied them as a chorus to all the songs they composed.

The Caliph, in the mean while, caused the palaces of the senses to be again set open, and as he found himself prompted to visit that of taste, in preference to the rest, immediately ordered a splendid entertainment, to which his great officers and favorite courtiers were all invited. The Indian, who was placed near the prince, seemed to think that as a proper acknowledgment of so distinguished a privilege, he could neither eat, drink, nor talk too much. The various dainties were no sooner served up than they vanished, to the great mortification of Vathek, who piqued himself on being the greatest eater alive, and at this time in particular had an excellent appetite.

The rest of the company looked round at each other in amazement, but the Indian, without appearing to observe it, quaffed large bumpers to the health of each of them, sung in a style altogether extravagant, related stories at which he laughed immoderately, and poured forth extemporaneous verses which would not been thought bad but for the strange grimaces with which they were uttered. In a word, his loquacity was equal to that of a hundred astrologers; he ate as much as a hundred porters, and caroused in proportion.

The Caliph, notwithstanding the table had been thirty times covered, found himself incommoded by the voraciousness of his guest, who was now considerably declined in the prince's esteem. Vathek, however, being unwilling to betray the chagrin he could hardly disguise, said in a whisper to Bababalouk,* the chief of his eunuchs: —

"You see how enormous his performances in every way are; what would be the consequence should he get at my wives? Go! redouble your vigilance, and be sure look well to my Circassians, who would be more to his taste than all of the rest."

The bird of the morning had thrice renewed his song, when the hour of the divan * sounded. Vathek, in gratitude to his subjects, having promised to attend, immediately arose from table, and repaired thither leaning upon his vizier, who could scarcely support him, so disordered was the poor prince by the wine he had drunk, and still more by the extravagant vagaries of his boisterous guest.

The viziers, the officers of the crown and of the law, arranged themselves in a semicircle about their sovereign, and preserved a respectful silence, whilst the Indian, who looked as cool as if come from a fast, sat down without ceremony on a step of the throne, laughing in his sleeve at the indignation with which his temerity had filled the spectators.

The Caliph, however, whose ideas were confused and his head embarrassed, went on administering justice at haphazard, till at length the prime vizier,† perceiving his situation, hit upon a sudden expedient to interrupt the audience, and rescue the honor of his master, to whom he said in a whisper :—

"My lord, the princess Carathis, who hath passed the night in consulting the planets, informs you that they portend you evil, and the danger is urgent. Beware, lest this stranger, whom you have so lavishly recompensed for his magical gewgaws, should make some attempt on your life: his liquor, which at first had the appearance of effecting your cure, may be no more than a poison of a sudden operation. Slight not this surmise ; ask him, at least, of what it was compounded ; whence he procured it ; and mention the sabres, which you seem to have forgotten."

Vathek, to whom the insolent airs of the stranger became every moment less supportable, intimated to his vizier, by a wink of acquiescence, that he would adopt his advice, and at once, turning towards the Indian, said :—

"Get up, and declare in full divan of what drugs the liquor was compounded you enjoined me to take, for it is suspected to be poison ; add also the explanation I have so earnestly desired concerning the sabres you sold me, and thus show your gratitude for the favors heaped on you."

Having pronounced these words in as moderate a tone as a Caliph well could, he waited in silent expectation for an answer ; but the Indian, still keeping his seat, began to renew his loud shouts of laughter, and exhibit the same horrid grimaces he had shown them before, without vouchsafing a word in reply. Vathek, no longer able to brook such insolence, immediately kicked him from the steps, instantly descending repeated his blow, and persisted with such assiduity as incited all who were present to follow his example. Every foot was aimed at the Indian, and no sooner had any one given him a kick than he felt himself constrained to reiterate the stroke.

The stranger afforded them no small entertainment ; for, being both short and plump, he collected himself into a ball and rolled round on all sides at the blows of his assailants, who pressed after him, wherever he turned, with an eagerness beyond conception, whilst their numbers were every moment increasing. The ball, indeed, in passing from one apartment to another, drew every person after it that came in its way, insomuch that the whole palace was thrown into confusion, and resounded with a tremendous clamor. The women of the harem, amazed at the uproar, flew to their blinds to discover the cause, but no sooner did they catch a glimpse of the ball than, feeling themselves unable to refrain, they broke from the clutches of their eunuchs, who, to stop their flight, pinched them till they bled, but in vain ; whilst themselves, though trembling with terror at the escape of their charge, were as incapable of resisting the attraction.

The Indian, after having traversed the halls, galleries, chambers, kitchens, gardens, and stables of the palace, at last took his course through the courts, whilst the Caliph, pursuing him closer than the rest, bestowed as many kicks as he possibly could, yet not without receiving now and then one, which his competitors, in their eagerness, designed for the ball.

Carathis, Morakanabad, and two or three old viziers whose wisdom had hitherto withstood the attraction, wishing to prevent Vathek from exposing himself in the presence of his subjects, fell down in his way to impede the pursuit, but he, regardless of their obstruction, leaped over their heads, and went on as before. They then ordered the muezins to call the people to prayers, both for the sake of getting them out of the way, and of endeavoring by their petitions to avert the calamity; but neither of these expedients was a whit more successful. The sight of this fatal ball was alone sufficient to draw after it every beholder. The muezins themselves, though they saw it but at a distance, hastened down from their minarets and mixed with the crowd, which continued to increase in so surprising a manner, that scarce an inhabitant was left in Samarah, except the aged, the sick confined to their beds, and infants at the breast, whose nurses could run more nimbly without them. Even Carathis, Morakanabad, and the rest, were all become of the party.

The shrill screams of the females who had broken from their apartments, and were unable to extricate themselves from the pressure of the crowd, together with those of the eunuchs jostling after them, terrified lest their charge should escape from their sight, increased by the execrations of husbands urging forward and menacing both; kicks given and received; stumblings and overthrows at every step, — in a word, the confusion that universally prevailed rendered Samarah like a city taken by storm, and devoted to absolute plunder.

At last the cursed Indian, who still preserved his rotundity of figure, after passing through all the streets and public places, and leaving them empty, rolled onwards to the plain of Catoul, and traversed the valley at the foot of the mountain of the four fountains.

As a continual fall of water had excavated an immense gulf in the valley, whose opposite side was closed in by a steep acclivity, the Caliph and his attendants were apprehensive lest the ball should bound into the chasm, and, to prevent it, redoubled their efforts, but in vain. The Indian persevered in his onward direction, and, as had been apprehended, glancing from the precipice with the rapidity of lightning, was lost in the gulf below.

Vathek would have followed the perfidious Giaour, had not an invisible agency arrested his progress. The multitude that pressed after him were at once checked in the same manner, and a calm instantaneously ensued. They all gazed at each other with an air of astonishment; and notwithstanding that the loss of veils and turbans, together with torn habits, and dust blended with sweat, presented a most laughable spectacle, there was not one smile to be seen; on the contrary, all with looks of confusion and sadness returned in silence to Samarah, and retired to their inmost apartments, without ever reflecting that they had been impelled by an invisible power into the extravagance for which they reproached themselves: for it is but just, that men who so often arrogate to their own merit the good of which they are but instruments, should attribute to themselves the absurdities which they could not prevent.

The Caliph was the only person that refused to leave the valley. He commanded his tents to be pitched there, and stationed himself on the very edge of the precipice, in spite of the representations of Carathis and Morakanabad, who pointed out the hazard of its brink giving way, and the vicinity to the magician that had so severely tormented him. Vathek derided all their remonstrances; and having ordered a thousand flambeaus to be lighted, and directed his attendants to proceed in lighting more, lay down on the slippery margin, and attempted, by the help of this artificial splendor, to look through that gloom which all the fires of the empyrean had been insufficient to pervade. One while he fancied to himself voices arising from the depth of the gulf, at another he seemed to distinguish the accents of the Indian; but all was no more than the hollow murmur of waters, and the din of the cataracts that rushed from steep to steep, down the sides of the mountain.

Having passed the night in this cruel perturbation, the Caliph at daybreak retired to his tent, where, without taking the least sustenance, he continued to doze till the dusk of evening began to come on; he then resumed his vigils as before, and persevered in observing them for many nights together. At length, fatigued with so successless an employment, he sought relief from change. To this end he sometimes paced with hasty strides across the plain; and, as he wildly gazed at the stars, reproached them with having deceived him; but lo! on a sudden the clear blue sky appeared streaked over with streams of blood, which reached from the valley even to the city of Samarah. As this awful phenomenon seemed to touch his tower, Vathek at first thought of repairing thither to view it more distinctly, but feeling himself unable to advance, and being overcome with apprehension, he muffled up his face in his robe.

Terrifying as these prodigies were, this impression upon him was no more than momentary, and served only to stimulate his love of the marvellous. Instead, therefore, of returning to his palace, he persisted in the resolution of abiding where the Indian vanished from his view. One night, however, while he was walking as usual on the plain, the moon and the stars at once were eclipsed, and a total darkness ensued. The earth trembled beneath him, and a voice came forth, the voice of the Giaour, who, in accents more sonorous than thunder, thus addressed him: —

"Wouldst thou devote thyself to me? adore, then, the terrestrial influences, and abjure Mahomet. On these conditions I will bring thee to the palace of subterranean fire: there shalt thou behold, in immense depositories, the treasures which the stars have promised thee, and which will be conferred by those intelligences whom thou shalt thus render propitious. It was from thence I brought my sabres; and it is there that Soliman Ben Daoud reposes, surrounded by the talismans that control the world."

The astonished Caliph trembled as he answered, yet in a style that showed him to be no novice in preternatural adventures: —

"Where art thou? Be present to my eyes; dissipate the gloom that perplexes me, and of which I deem thee the cause. After the many flambeaus I have burnt to discover thee, thou mayest at least grant a glimpse of thy horrible visage."

"Abjure, then, Mahomet," replied the Indian, "and promise me full proofs of thy sincerity; otherwise thou shalt never behold me again."

The unhappy Caliph, instigated by insatiable curiosity, lavished his promises in the utmost profusion. The sky immediately brightened, and by the light of the planets, which seemed almost to blaze, Vathek beheld the earth open, and at the extremity of a vast black chasm, a portal of ebony, before which stood the Indian, still blacker, holding in his hand a golden key, that caused the lock to resound.

"How," cried Vathek, "can I descend to thee, without the certainty of breaking my neck? Come, take me, and instantly open the portal."

"Not so fast," replied the Indian, "impatient Caliph! Know that I am parched with thirst, and cannot open this door till my thirst be thoroughly appeased. I require the blood of fifty of the most beautiful sons of thy viziers and great men, or neither can my thirst nor thy curiosity be satisfied. Return to Samarah; procure for me this necessary libation; come back hither, throw it thyself into this chasm, and then shalt thou see!"

Having thus spoken, the Indian turned his back on the Caliph, who, incited by the suggestion of demons, resolved on the direful sacrifice. He now pretended to have regained his tranquillity, and set out for Samarah amidst the acclamations of a people who still loved him, and forebore not to rejoice when they believed him to have recovered his reason. So successfully did he conceal the emotion of his heart, that even Carathis and Morakanabad were equally deceived with the rest. Nothing was heard of but festivals and rejoicings. The ball, which no tongue had hitherto ventured to mention, was again brought on the tapis. A general laugh went round; though many, still smarting under the hands of the surgeon, from the hurts received in that memorable adventure, had no great reason for mirth.

The prevalence of this gay humor was not a little grateful to Vathek, as perceiving how much it conduced to his project. He put on the appearance of affability to every one; but especially to his viziers, and the grandees of his court, whom he failed not to regale with a sumptuous banquet, during which he insensibly inclined the conversation to the children of his guests. Having asked, with a good-natured air, who of them were blessed with the handsomest boys, every father at once asserted the pretensions of his own; and the contest imperceptibly grew so warm, that nothing could have withholden them from coming to blows but their profound reverence for the person of the Caliph. Under the pretence, therefore, of reconciling the disputants, Vathek took upon him to decide; and with this view commanded the boys to be brought.

It was not long before a troop of these poor children made their appearance, all equipped by their fond mothers with such ornaments as might give the greatest relief to their beauty, or most advantageously display the graces of their age. But whilst this brilliant assemblage attracted the eyes and hearts of every one besides, the Caliph scrutinized each in his turn with a malignant avidity that passed for attention, and selected from their number the fifty whom he judged the Giaour would prefer.

With an equal show of kindness as before, he proposed to celebrate a festival on the plain, for the entertainment of his young favorites, who, he said, ought to rejoice still more than all at the restoration of his health, on account of the favors he intended for them.

The Caliph's proposal was received with the greatest delight, and soon published through Samarah. Litters, camels, and horses were prepared. Women and children, old men and young, — every one placed himself in the station he chose. The cavalcade set forward, attended by all the confectioners in the city and its precincts. The populace, following on foot, composed an amazing crowd, and occasioned no little noise. All was joy; nor did any one call to mind what most of them had suffered when they first travelled the road they were now passing so gayly.

The evening was serene, the air refreshing, the sky clear, and the flowers exhaled their fragrance. The beams of the declining sun, whose mild splendor reposed on the summit of the mountain, shed a glow of ruddy light over its green declivity, and the white flocks sporting upon it. No sounds were audible, save the murmurs of the four fountains, and the reeds and voices of shepherds, calling to each other from different eminences.

The lovely innocents, proceeding to the destined sacrifice, added not a little to the hilarity of the scene. They approached the plain full of sportiveness; some coursing butterflies, others culling flowers, or picking up the shining little pebbles that attracted their notice. At intervals they nimbly started from each other, for the sake of being caught again, and mutually imparting a thousand caresses.

The dreadful chasm, at whose bottom the portal of ebony was placed, began to appear at a distance. It looked like a black streak that divided the plain. Morakanabad and his companions took it for some work which the Caliph had ordered. Unhappy men! little did they surmise for what it was destined.

Vathek, not liking that they should examine it too nearly, stopped the procession, and ordered a spacious circle to be formed on this side, at some distance from the accursed chasm. The body-guard of eunuchs was detached, to measure out the lists intended for the games, and prepare ringlets for the lines to keep off the crowd. The fifty competitors were soon stripped, and presented to the admiration of the spectators the suppleness and grace of their delicate limbs. Their eyes sparkled with a joy which those of their fond parents reflected. Every one offered wishes for the little candidate nearest his heart, and doubted not of his being victorious. A breathless suspense awaited the contest of these amiable and innocent victims.

The Caliph, availing himself of the first moment to retire from the crowd, advanced towards the chasm, and there heard, yet not without shuddering, the voice of the Indian; who, gnashing his teeth, eagerly demanded: —

"Where are they? where are they? Perceivest thou not how my mouth waters?"

"Relentless Giaour!" answered Vathek, with emotion, "can nothing content thee but the massacre of these lovely victims? Ah, wert thou to behold their beauty, it must certainly move thy compassion!"

"Perdition on thy compassion, babbler!" cried the Indian. "Give them me! instantly give them, or my portal shall be closed against thee forever!"

"Not so loudly," replied the Caliph, blushing.

"I understand thee," returned the Giaour, with the grin of an ogre; "thou wantest to summon up more presence of mind. I will for a moment forbear."

During this exquisite dialogue, the games went forward with all alacrity, and at length concluded, just as the twilight began to overcast the mountains. Vathek, who was still standing on the edge of the chasm, called out with all his might : —

"Let my fifty little favorites approach me, separately ; and let them come in the order of their success. To the first I will give my diamond bracelet ; to the second my collar of emeralds ; to the third my aigret of rubies ; to the fourth my girdle of topazes ; and to the rest, each a part of my dress, even down to my slippers."

This declaration was received with reiterated acclamations ; and all extolled the liberality of a prince who would thus strip himself for the amusement of his subjects and the encouragement of the rising generation.

The Caliph in the mean while undressed himself by degrees ; and raising his arm as high as he was able, made each of the prizes glitter in the air ; but, whilst he delivered it with one hand to the child, who sprang forward to receive it, he with the other pushed the poor innocent into the gulf, where the Giaour, with a sullen muttering, incessantly repeated "More ! more !"

This dreadful device was executed with so much dexterity, that the boy who was approaching him remained unconscious of the fate of his forerunner ; and as to the spectators, the shades of evening, together with their distance, precluded them from perceiving any object distinctly. Vathek, having in this manner thrown in the last of the fifty, and expecting that the Giaour, on receiving him, would have presented the key, already fancied himself as great as Soliman, and consequently above being amenable for what he had done ; when, to his utter amazement, the chasm closed, and the ground became as entire as the rest of the plain.

No language could express his rage and despair. He execrated the perfidy of the Indian, loaded him with the most infamous invectives, and stamped with his foot as resolving to be heard. He persisted in this demeanor till his strength failed him, and then fell on the earth like one void of sense. His viziers and grandees, who were nearer than the rest, supposed him at first to be sitting on the grass at play with their amiable children ; but at length, prompted by doubt, they advanced towards the spot, and found the Caliph alone, who wildly demanded what they wanted.

"Our children ! our children !" cried they.

"It is assuredly pleasant," said he, "to make me accountable for accidents. Your children, while at play, fell from the precipice that was here ; and I should have experienced their fate, had I not been saved by a sudden start back."

At these words the fathers of the fifty boys cried out aloud ; the mothers repeated their exclamations an octave higher ; whilst the rest, without knowing the cause, soon drowned the voices of both with still louder lamentations of their own.

"Our Caliph," said they, — and the report soon circulated, — "our Caliph has played us this trick, to gratify his accursed Giaour. Let us punish him for his perfidy ! let us avenge ourselves ! let us avenge the blood of the innocent ! let us throw this cruel prince into the gulf that is near, and let his name be mentioned no more !"

At this rumor and these menaces, Carathis, full of consternation, hastened to Morakanabad, and said : —

"Vizier, you have lost two beautiful boys, and must necessarily be the most afflicted of fathers ; but you are virtuous ; save your master !"

"I will brave every hazard," replied the vizier, "to rescue him from his present danger ; but afterwards will abandon him to his fate. Bababalouk," continued he, "put yourself at the head of your eunuchs, disperse the mob, and if possible bring back this unhappy prince to his palace."

Bababalouk and his fraternity, felicitating each other in a low voice on their disability of ever being fathers, obeyed the mandate of the vizier, who, seconding their exertions to the utmost of his power, at length accomplished his generous enterprise, and retired, as he resolved, to lament at his leisure.

No sooner had the Caliph re-entered his palace, than Carathis commanded the doors to be fastened ; but perceiving the tumult to be still violent, and hearing the imprecations which resounded from all quarters, she said to her son : —

"Whether the populace be right or wrong, it behooves you to provide for your safety ; let us retire to your own apartment, and from thence, through the subterranean passage known only to ourselves, into your tower ; there, with the assistance of the mutes who never leave it, we may be able to make some resistance. Bababalouk, supposing us to be still in the palace, will guard its avenues for his own sake; and we shall soon find, without the counsels of that blubberer, Morakanabad, what expedient may be the best to adopt."

Vathek, without making the least reply, acquiesced in his mother's proposal, and repeated as he went:—

"Nefarious Giaour! where art thou? hast thou not yet devoured those poor children? where are thy sabres, thy golden key, thy talismans?"

Carathis, who guessed from these interrogations a part of the truth, had no difficulty to apprehend in getting at the whole as soon as he should be a little composed in his tower. This princess was so far from being influenced by scruples, that she was as wicked as woman could be, which is not saying a little, for the sex pique themselves on their superiority in every competition. The recital of the Caliph therefore occasioned neither terror nor surprise to his mother; she felt no emotion but from the promises of the Giaour, and said to her son:—

"This Giaour, it must be confessed, is somewhat sanguinary in his taste, but the terrestrial powers are always terrible; nevertheless, what the one has promised and the others can confer, will prove a sufficient indemnification. No crimes should be thought too dear for such a reward. Forbear, then, to revile the Indian; you have not fulfilled the conditions to which his services are annexed. For instance, is not a sacrifice to the subterranean Genii required? and should we not be prepared to offer it as soon as the tumult is subsided? This charge I will take on myself, and have no doubt of succeeding by means of your treasures, which, as there are now so many others in store, may without fear be exhausted."

Accordingly, the princess, who possessed the most consummate skill in the art of persuasion, went immediately back through the subterranean passage, and presenting herself to the populace from a window of the palace, began to harangue them with all the address of which she was mistress, whilst Bababalouk showered money from both hands amongst the crowd, who by these united means were soon appeased. Every person retired to his home, and Carathis returned to the tower.

Prayer at break of day was announced, when Carathis and Vathek ascended the steps which led to the summit of the tower, where they remained for some time, though the weather was lowering and wet. This impending gloom corresponded with their malignant dispositions; but when the sun began to break through the clouds, they ordered a pavilion to be raised as a screen from the intrusion of his beams. The Caliph, overcome with fatigue, sought refreshment from repose, at the same time hoping that significant dreams might attend on his slumbers; whilst the indefatigable Carathis, followed by a party of her mutes, descended to prepare whatever she judged proper for the oblation of the approaching night.

By secret stairs, known only to herself and her son, she first repaired to the mysterious recesses in which were deposited the mummies that had been brought from the catacombs of the ancient Pharaohs. Of these she ordered several to be taken. From thence she resorted to a gallery, where, under the guard of fifty female negroes, mute, and blind of the right eye, were preserved the oil of the most venomous serpents, rhinoceros' horns, and woods of a subtle and penetrating odor, procured from the interior of the Indies, together with a thousand other horrible rarities. This collection had been formed for a purpose like the present, by Carathis herself, from a presentiment that she might one day enjoy some intercourse with the infernal powers, to whom she had ever been passionately attached, and to whose taste she was no stranger.

To familiarize herself the better with the horrors in view, the princess remained in the company of her negresses, who squinted in the most amiable manner from the only eye they had, and leered with exquisite delight at the skulls and skeletons which Carathis had drawn forth from her cabinets, whose key she intrusted to no one; all of them making contortions and uttering a frightful jargon, but very amusing to the princess; till at last, being stunned by their gibbering, and suffocated by the potency of their exhalations, she was forced to quit the gallery, after stripping it of a part of its treasures.

Whilst she was thus occupied, the Caliph, who, instead of the visions he expected, had acquired in these unsubstantial regions a voracious appetite, was greatly provoked at the negresses; for, having totally forgotten their deafness, he had impatiently asked them for food; and seeing them regardless of his demand, he began to cuff, pinch, and push them, till Carathis arrived to terminate a scene so indecent, to the great content of these miserable creatures, who, having been brought up by her, understood all her signs, and communicated in the same way their thoughts in return.

"Son! what means all this?" said she, panting for breath. "I thought I heard, as I came up, the shrieks of a thousand bats, tearing from their crannies in the recesses of a cavern, and it was the outcry only of these poor mutes, whom you were so unmercifully abusing. In truth, you but ill deserve the admirable provision I have brought you."

"Give it me instantly!" exclaimed the Caliph; "I am perishing for hunger!"

"As to that," answered she, "you must have an excellent stomach if it can digest what I have been preparing."

"Be quick," replied the Caliph. "But O, heavens! what horrors! What do you intend?"

"Come, come," returned Carathis, "be not so squeamish, but help me to arrange everything properly, and you shall see that what you reject with such symptoms of disgust will soon complete your felicity. Let us get ready the pile for the sacrifice of to-night, and think not of eating till that is performed. Know you not that all solemn rites are preceded by a rigorous abstinence?"

The Caliph, not daring to object, abandoned himself to grief, and the wind that ravaged his entrails, whilst his mother went forward with the requisite operations. Phials of serpents' oil, mummies, and bones, were soon set in order on the balustrade of the tower. The pile began to rise, and in three hours was as many cubits high. At length darkness approached, and Carathis, having stripped herself to her inmost garment, clapped her hands in an impulse of ecstasy, and struck light with all her force. The mutes followed her example: but Vathek, extenuated with hunger and impatience, was unable to support himself, and fell down in a swoon. The sparks had already kindled the dry wood; the venomous oil burst into a thousand blue flames; the mummies, dissolving, emitted a thick dun vapor; and, the rhinoceros' horns beginning to consume, all together diffused such a stench, that the Caliph, recovering, started from his trance and gazed wildly on the scene in full blaze around him. The oil gushed forth in a plenitude of streams; and the negresses, who supplied it without intermission, united their cries to those of the princess. At last the fire became so violent, and the flames reflected from the polished marble so dazzling, that the Caliph, unable to withstand the heat and the blaze, effected his escape, and clambered up the imperial standard.

In the mean time the inhabitants of Samarah, scared at the light which shone over the city, arose in haste, ascended their roofs, beheld the tower on fire, and hurried half naked to the square. Their love to their sovereign immediately awoke; and apprehending him in danger of perishing in his tower, their whole thoughts were occupied with the means of his safety. Morakanabad flew from his retirement, wiped away his tears, and cried out for water like the rest. Bababalouk, whose olfactory nerves were more familiarized to magical odors, readily conjecturing that Carathis was engaged in her favourite amusements, strenuously exhorted them not to be alarmed. Him, however, they treated as an old poltroon, and forebore not to style him a rascally traitor. The camels and dromedaries were advancing with water, but no one knew by which way to enter the tower. Whilst the populace was obstinate in forcing the doors, a violent east-wind drove such a volume of flame against them as at first forced them off, but afterwards rekindled their zeal. At the same time, the stench of the horns and mummies increasing, most of the crowd fell backward in a state of suffocation. Those that kept their feet mutually wondered at the cause of the smell, and admonished each other to retire. Morakanabad, more sick than the rest, remained in a piteous condition. Holding his nose with one hand, he persisted in his efforts with the other to burst open the doors and obtain admission. A hundred and forty of the strongest and most resolute at length accomplished their purpose. Having gained the staircase by their violent exertions, they attained a great height in a quarter of an hour.

Carathis, alarmed at the signs of her mutes, advanced to the staircase, went down a few steps, and heard several voices calling out from below: —

"You shall in a moment have water!"

Being rather alert, considering her age, she presently regained the top of the tower, and bade her son suspend the sacrifice for some minutes, adding: —

"We shall soon be enabled to render it more grateful. Certain dolts of your subjects, imagining, no doubt, that we were on fire, have been rash enough to break through those doors, which had hitherto remained inviolate, for the sake of bringing up water. They are very kind, you must allow, so soon to forget the wrongs you have done them; but that is of little moment. Let us offer them to the Giaour. Let them come up: our mutes, who neither want strength nor experience, will soon despatch them, exhausted as they are with fatigue."

"Be it so," answered the Caliph, "provided we finish, and I dine"

In fact, these good people, out of breath from ascending eleven thousand stairs in such haste, and chagrined at having spilt, by the way, the water they had taken, were no sooner arrived at the top than the blaze of the flames and the fumes of the mummies at once overpowered their senses. It was a pity! for they beheld not the agreeable smile with which the mutes and the negresses adjusted the cord to their necks: these amiable personages rejoiced, however, no less at the scene. Never before had the ceremony of strangling been performed with so much facility. They all fell without the least resistance or struggle; so that Vathek, in the space of a few moments, found himself surrounded by the dead bodies of his most faithful subjects, all of which were thrown on the top of the pile.

Carathis, whose presence of mind never forsook her, perceiving that she had carcasses sufficient to complete her oblation, commanded the chains to be stretched across the staircase, and the iron doors barricaded, that no more might come up.

No sooner were these orders obeyed, than the tower shook; the dead bodies vanished in the flames, which at once changed from a swarthy crimson to a bright rose-color. An ambient vapor emitted the most exquisite fragrance; the marble columns rang with harmonious sounds, and the liquefied horns diffused a delicious perfume. Carathis, in transports, anticipated the success of her enterprise; whilst the mutes and negresses, to whom these sweets had given the colic, retired to their cells grumbling.

Scarcely were they gone, when, instead of the pile, horns, mummies, and ashes, the Caliph both saw and felt, with a degree of pleasure which he could not express, a table covered with the most magnificent repast: flagons of wine and vases of exquisite sherbet floating on snow. He availed himself without scruple of such an entertainment; and had already laid hands on a lamb stuffed with pistachios, whilst Carathis was privately drawing from a filigreed urn a parchment that seemed to be endless, and which had escaped the notice of her son. Totally occupied in gratifying an importunate appetite, he left her to peruse it without interruption; which, having finished, she said to him in an authoritative tone: —

"Put an end to your gluttony, and hear the splendid promises with which you are favored!" She then read as follows: —

"Vathek, my well-beloved, thou hast surpassed my hopes: my nostrils have been regaled by the savor of thy mummies, thy horns, and, still more, by the lives devoted on the pile. At the full of the moon cause the bands of thy musicians and thy tymbals to be heard; depart from thy palace surrounded by all the pageants of majesty, thy most faithful slaves, thy best beloved wives, thy most magnificent litters, thy richest laden camels; and set forward on thy way to Istakhar. There await I thy coming. That is the region of wonders. There shalt thou receive the diadem of Gian Ben Gian,* the talismans of Soliman, and the treasures of the pre-Adamite Sultans: there shalt thou be solaced with all kinds of delight. But beware how thou enterest any dwelling on thy route, or thou shalt feel the effects of my anger."

* By this appellation was distinguished the monarch of that species of beings whom the Arabians denominate Gian or Ginn, that is Genii; and the Tarik Thabari, Peres, Feez, or Faeries.

The Caliph, who, notwithstanding his habitual luxury, had never before dined with so much satisfaction, gave full scope to the joy of these golden tidings, and betook himself to drinking anew. Carathis, whose antipathy to wine was by no means insuperable, failed not to supply a reason for every bumper, which they ironically quaffed to the health of Mahomet. This infernal liquor completed their impious temerity, and prompted them to utter a profusion of blasphemies. They gave a loose to their wit, at the expense of the ass of Balaam, the dog of the seven sleepers, and the other animals admitted into the paradise of Mahomet. In this sprightly humor they descended the eleven thousand stairs, diverting themselves as they went at the anxious faces they saw on the square, through the oilets of the tower, and at length arrived at the royal apartments by the subterranean passage. Bababalouk was parading to and fro, and issuing his mandates with great pomp to the eunuchs, who were snuffing the lights and painting the eyes of the Circassians. No sooner did he catch sight of the Caliph and his mother, than he exclaimed,—

"Ha! you have then, I perceive, escaped from the flames; I was not, however, altogether out of doubt."

"Of what moment is it to us what you thought or think?" cried Carathis: "go, speed, tell Morakanabad that we immediately want him; and take care how you stop by the way to make your insipid reflections."

Morakanabad delayed not to obey the summons, and was received by Vathek and his mother with great solemnity. They told him with an air of composure and commiseration that the fire at the top of the tower was extinguished, but that it had cost the lives of the brave people who sought to assist them.

"Still more misfortunes!" cried Morakanabad with a sigh. "Ah, commander of the faithful, our holy prophet is certainly irritated against us! it behooves you to appease him."

"We will appease him hereafter," replied the Caliph, with a smile that augured nothing of good. "You will have leisure sufficient for your supplications during my absence; for this country is the bane of my health. I am disgusted with the mountain of the four fountains, and am resolved to go and drink of the stream of Rocnabad.* I long to refresh myself in the delightful valleys which it waters. Do you, with the advice of my mother, govern my dominions, and take care to supply whatever her experiments may demand; for you well know that our tower abounds in materials for the advancement of science."

The tower but ill suited Morakanabad's taste. Immense treasures had been lavished upon it, and nothing had he ever seen carried thither but female negroes, mutes, and abominable drugs. Nor did he know well what to think of Carathis, who, like a chameleon, could assume all possible colors. Her cursed eloquence had often driven the poor Mussulman to his last shifts. He considered, however, that if she possessed but few good qualities, her son had still fewer, and that the alternative, on the whole, would be in her favor. Consoled, therefore, with this reflection, he went in good spirits to soothe the populace and make the proper arrangements for his master's journey.

Vathek, to conciliate the spirits of the subterranean palace, resolved that his expedition should be uncommonly splendid. With this view he confiscated on all sides the property of his subjects, whilst his worthy mother stripped the seraglios she visited of the gems they contained. She collected all the seamstresses and embroiderers of Samarah, and other cities, to the distance of sixty leagues, to prepare pavilions, palanquins, sofas, canopies, and litters, for the train of the monarch. There was not left in Masulipatan a single piece of chintz; and so much muslin had been bought up to dress out Bababalouk and the other black eunuchs, that there remained not an ell in the whole Irak of Babylon.

During these preparations, Carathis, who never lost sight of her great object, which was to obtain favor with the powers of darkness, made select parties of the fairest and most delicate ladies of the city; but in the midst of their gayety she contrived to introduce serpents amongst them, and to break pots of scorpions under the table. They all bit to a wonder, and Carathis would have left them to bite, were it not that to fill up the time she now and then amused herself in curing their wounds with an excellent anodyne of her own invention; for this good princess abhorred being indolent.

Vathek, who was not altogether so active as his mother, devoted his time to the sole gratification of his senses, in the palaces which were severally dedicated to them. He disgusted himself no more with the divan or the mosque. One half of Samarah followed his example, whilst the other lamented the progress of corruption.

In the midst of these transactions, the embassy returned which had been sent in pious times to Mecca. It consisted of the most reverend moullahs,* who had fulfilled their commission, and brought back one of those precious besoms which are used to sweep the sacred caaba; a present truly worthy of the greatest potentate on earth!

The Caliph happened at this instant to be engaged in an apartment by no means adapted to the reception of embassies, though adorned with a certain magnificence, not only to render it agreeable, but also because he resorted to it frequently, and stayed a considerable time together. Whilst occupied in this retreat, he heard the voice of Bababalouk calling out from between the door and the tapestry that hung before it: —

"Here are the excellent Mahomet Ebn Edris al Shafei and the seraphic Al Mouhadethin, who have brought the besom from Mecca, and with tears of joy entreat they may present it to your Majesty in person."

"Let them bring the besom hither; it may be of use," said Vathek, who was still employed, not having quite racked off his wine.

"How!" answered Bababalouk, half aloud and amazed.

"Obey," replied the Caliph, "for it is my sovereign will; go instantly! vanish! for here will I receive the good folk who have thus filled thee with joy."

The eunuch departed muttering, and bade the venerable train attend him. A sacred rapture was diffused amongst these reverend old men. Though fatigued with the length of their expedition, they followed Bababalouk with an alertness almost miraculous, and felt themselves highly flattered as they swept along the stately porticos, that the Caliph would not receive them like ambassadors in ordinary, in his hall of audience. Soon reaching the interior of the harem (where, through blinds of Persian they perceived large soft eyes, dark and blue, that went and came like lightning), penetrated with respect and wonder, and full of their celestial mission, they advanced in procession towards the small corridors that appeared to terminate in nothing, but, nevertheless, led to the cell where the Caliph expected their coming.

"What! is the commander of the faithful sick?" said Ebn Edris al Shafei, in a low voice to his companion.

"I rather think he is in his oratory," answered Al Mouhadethin.

Vathek, who heard the dialogue, cried out, "What imports it you how I am employed? approach without delay."

They advanced, and Bababalouk almost sunk with confusion, whilst the Caliph, without showing himself, put forth his hand from behind the tapestry that hung before the door, and demanded of them the besom.*

Having prostrated themselves as well as the corridor would permit, and even in a tolerable semicircle, the venerable Al Shafei, drawing forth the besom from the embroidered and perfumed scarfs in which it had been enveloped and secured from the profane gaze of vulgar eyes, arose from his associates, and advanced with an air of the most awful solemnity towards the supposed oratory; but with what astonishment, with what horror was he seized!

Vathek, bursting out into a villanous laugh, snatched the besom from his trembling hand, and, fixing upon it some cobwebs that hung suspended from the ceiling, gravely brushed away till not a single one remained.

The old men, overpowered with amazement, were unable to lift their beards from the ground; for as Vathek had carelessly left the tapestry between them half drawn,

* Those among the Mahometans who were bred to the law had this title; and from their order the judges of cities and provinces were taken.

they were witnesses to the whole transaction. Their tears gushed forth on the marble. Al Mouhadethin swooned through mortification and fatigue, whilst the Caliph, throwing himself backward on his seat, shouted and clapped his hands without mercy. At last, addressing himself to Bababalouk : —

"My dear black," said he, "go, regale these pious poor souls with my good wine from Schiraz; and as they can boast of having seen more of my palace than any one besides, let them also visit my office courts, and lead them out by the back steps that go to my stables." Having said this, he threw the besom in their face, and went to enjoy the laugh with Carathis.

Bababalouk did all in his power to console the ambassadors, but the two most infirm expired on the spot; the rest were carried to their beds, from whence, being heart-broken with sorrow and shame, they never arose.

The succeeding night, Vathek, attended by his mother, ascended the tower to see if everything were ready for his journey, for he had great faith in the influence of the stars. The planets appeared in their most favorable aspects. The Caliph, to enjoy so flattering a sight, supped gayly on the roof, and fancied that he heard, during his repast, loud shouts of laughter resound through the sky, in a manner that inspired the fullest assurance.

All was in motion at the palace: lights were kept burning through the whole of the night; the sound of implements and of artisans finishing their work, the voices of women and their guardians who sung at their embroidery, — all conspired to interrupt the stillness of nature, and infinitely delight the heart of Vathek, who imagined himself going in triumph to sit upon the throne of Soliman.

The people were not less satisfied than himself; all assisted to accelerate the moment which should rescue them from the wayward caprices of so extravagant a master.

The day preceding the departure of this infatuated prince was employed by Carathis in repeating to him the decrees of the mysterious parchment which she had thoroughly gotten by heart, and in recommending him not to enter the habitation of any one by the way; "for well thou knowest," added she, "how liquorish thy taste is after good dishes and young damsels; let me therefore enjoin thee to be content with thy old cooks, who are the best in the world; and not to forget that in thy ambulatory seraglio there are three dozen pretty faces, which Bababalouk hath not yet unveiled. I, myself, have a great desire to watch over thy conduct, and visit the subterranean palace, which no doubt contains whatever can interest persons like us. There is nothing so pleasing as retiring to caverns; my taste for dead bodies and everything like mummy is decided, and I am confident thou wilt see the most exquisite of their kind. Forget me not, then, but the moment thou art in possession of the talismans which are to open to thee the mineral kingdoms and the centre of the earth itself, fail not to despatch some trusty genius to take me and my cabinet, for the oil of the serpents I have pinched to death will be a pretty present to the Giaour, who cannot but be charmed with such dainties."

Scarcely had Carathis ended this edifying discourse, when the sun, setting behind the mountain of the four fountains, gave place to the rising moon. This planet, being that evening at full, appeared of unusual beauty and magnitude in the eyes of the women, the eunuchs, and the pages, who were all impatient to set forward. The city re-echoed with shouts of joy and flourishing of trumpets. Nothing was visible but plumes nodding on pavilions, and aigrets shining in the mild lustre of the moon. The spacious square resembled an immense parterre, variegated with the most stately tulips of the East.

Arrayed in the robes which were only worn at the most distinguished ceremonials, and supported by his vizier and Bababalouk, the Caliph descended the grand staircase of the tower in the sight of all his people. He could not forbear pausing at intervals to admire the superb appearance which everywhere courted his view, whilst the whole multitude, even to the camels with their sumptuous burdens, knelt down before him. For some time a general stillness prevailed, which nothing happened to disturb but the shrill screams of some eunuchs in the rear. These vigilant guards having remarked certain cages of the ladies swagging somewhat awry, and discovered that a few adventurous gallants had contrived to get in, soon dislodged the en-raptured culprits, and consigned them, with good commendations, to the surgeons of the serai. The majesty of so magnificent a spectacle was not, however, violated by incidents like these. Vathek, meanwhile, saluted the moon with an idolatrous air, that neither pleased Morakanabad nor the doctors of the law, any more than the viziers and grandees of his court, who were all assembled to enjoy the last view of their sovereign.

At length the clarions and trumpets from the top of the tower announced the prelude of departure. Though the instruments were in unison with each other, yet a singular dissonance was blended with their sounds. This proceeded from Carathis, who was singing her direful orisons to the Giaour, whilst the negresses and mutes supplied thorough bass without articulating a word. The good Mussulmans fancied that they heard the sullen hum of those nocturnal insects which presage evil, and importuned Vathek to beware how he ventured his sacred person.

On a given signal the great standard of the Califat was displayed; twenty thousand lances shone around it; and the Caliph, treading royally on the cloth of gold which had been spread for his feet, ascended his litter amidst the general awe that possessed his subjects.

The expedition commenced with the utmost order, and so entire a silence that even the locusts were heard from the thickets on the plain of Catoul. Gayety and good humor prevailing, six good leagues were passed before the dawn; and the morning star was still glittering in the firmament when the whole of this numerous train had halted on the banks of the Tigris, where they encamped to repose for the rest of the day.

The three days that followed were spent in the same manner, but on the fourth the heavens looked angry, lightnings broke forth in frequent flashes, re-echoing peals of thunder succeeded, and the trembling Circassians clung with all their might to their ugly guardians. The Caliph himself was greatly inclined to take shelter in the large town of Gulchissar, the governor of which came forth to meet him, and tendered every kind of refreshment the place could supply. But having examined his tablets, he suffered the rain to soak him almost to the bone, notwithstanding the importunity of his first favorites. Though he began to regret the palace of the senses, yet he lost not sight of his enterprise, and his sanguine expectations confirmed his resolutions. His geographers were ordered to attend him, but the weather proved so terrible, that these poor people exhibited a lamentable appearance; and as no long journeys had been undertaken since the time of Haroun al Raschid, their maps of the different countries were in a still worse plight than themselves. Every one was ignorant which way to turn; for Vathek, though well versed in the course of the heavens, no longer knew his situation on earth. He thundered even louder than the elements, and muttered forth certain hints of the bowstring which were not very soothing to literary ears. Disgusted at the toilsome weariness of the way, he determined to cross over the craggy heights, and follow the guidance of a peasant, who undertook to bring him, in four days, to Rocnabad. Remonstrances were all to no purpose, his resolution was fixed, and an invasion commenced on the province of the goats, who sped away in large troops before them. It was curious to view on these half calcined rocks camels richly caparisoned, and pavilions of gold and silk waving on their summits, which till then had never been covered but with sapless thistles and fern.

The females and eunuchs uttered shrill wailings at the sight of the precipices below them and the dreary prospects that opened in the vast gorges of the mountains. Before they could reach the ascent of the steepest rock night overtook them, and a boisterous tempest arose, which, having rent the awnings of the palanquins and cages, exposed to the raw gusts the poor ladies within, who had never before felt so piercing a cold. The dark clouds that overcast the face of the sky deepened the horrors of this disastrous night, insomuch that nothing could be heard distinctly but the mewling of pages and lamentations of sultanas.

To increase the general misfortune, the frightful uproar of wild beasts resounded at a distance, and there were soon perceived in the forest they were skirting the glaring of eyes which could belong only to devils or tigers. The pioneers, who, as well as they could, had marked out a track, and a part of the advanced guard, were devoured before they had been in the least apprised of their danger.

The confusion that prevailed was extreme. Wolves, tigers, and other carnivorous animals, invited by the howling of their companions, flocked together from every quarter. The crushing of bones was heard on all sides, and a fearful rush of wings overhead, for now vultures also began to be of the party.

The terror at length reached the main body of the troops which surrounded the monarch and his harem, at the distance of two leagues from the scene. Vathek (voluptuously reposed in his capacious litter upon cushions of silk, with two little pages beside him, of complexions more fair than the enamel of Franguestan, who were occupied in keeping off flies) was soundly asleep, and contemplating in his dreams the treasures of Soliman. The shrieks, however, of his wives awoke him with a start, and instead of the Giaour with his key of gold, he beheld Bababalouk full of consternation.

"Sire," exclaimed this good servant of the most potent of monarchs, "misfortune has arrived at its height; wild beasts, who entertain no more reverence for your sacred person than for that of a dead ass, have beset your camels and their drivers; thirty of the richest laden are already become their prey, as well as all your confectioners, your cooks, and purveyors, and unless our holy prophet should protect us, we shall have all eaten our last meal."

At the mention of eating, the Caliph lost all patience. He began to bellow, and even beat himself, for there was no seeing in the dark. The rumor every instant increased, and Bababalouk, finding no good could be done with his master, stopped both his ears against the hurly-burly of the harem, and called out aloud: —

"Come, ladies and brothers! all hands to work! strike light in a moment! never shall it be said that the commander of the faithful served to regale these infidel brutes."

Though there wanted not in this bevy of beauties a sufficient number of capricious and wayward, yet, on the present occasion, they were all compliance. Fires were visible in a twinkling in all their cages. Ten thousand torches were lighted at once. The Caliph himself seized a large one of wax; every person followed his example; and by kindling ropes' ends dipped in oil and fastened on poles, an amazing blaze was spread. The rocks were covered with the splendor of sunshine. The trails of sparks, wafted by the wind, communicated to the dry fern, of which there was plenty. Serpents were observed to crawl forth from their retreats with amazement and hissings, whilst the horses snorted, stamped the ground, tossed their noses in the air, and plunged about without mercy.

One of the forests of cedar that bordered their way took fire, and the branches that overhung the path, extending their flames to the muslins and chintzes which covered the cages of the ladies, obliged them to jump out at the peril of their necks. Vathek, who vented on the occasion a thousand blasphemies, was himself compelled to touch with his sacred feet the naked earth.

Never had such an incident happened before. Full of mortification, shame, and despondence, and not knowing how to walk, the ladies fell into the dirt.

"Must I go on foot?" said one.

"Must I wet my feet?" cried another.

"Must I soil my dress?" asked a third.

"Execrable Bababalouk!" exclaimed all; "outcast of hell! what hadst thou to do with torches? Better were it to be eaten by tigers than to fall into our present condition; we are forever undone. Not a porter is there in the army, nor a currier of camels, but hath seen some part of our bodies, and, what is worse, our very faces!"

On saying this the most bashful amongst them hid their foreheads on the ground, whilst such as had more boldness flew at Bababalouk; but he, well apprised of their humor and not wanting in shrewdness, betook himself to his heels along with his comrades, all dropping their torches and striking their tymbals.

It was not less light than in the brightest of the dog-days, and the weather was hot in proportion; but how degrading was the spectacle, to behold the Caliph bespattered like an ordinary mortal. As the exercise of his faculties seemed to be suspended, one of his Ethiopian wives (for he delighted in variety) clasped him in her arms, threw him upon her shoulder like a sack of dates, and, finding that the fire was hemming them in, set off with no small expedition, considering the weight of her burden. The other ladies, who had just learned the use of their feet, followed her; their guards galloped after; and the camel drivers brought up the rear as fast as their charge would permit.

They soon reached the spot where the wild beasts had commenced the carnage, and which they had too much spirit to leave, notwithstanding the approaching tumult and the luxurious supper they had made. Bababalouk, nevertheless, seized on a few of the plumpest, which were unable to budge from the place, and began to flay them with admirable adroitness. The cavalcade being got so far from the conflagration as that the heat felt rather grateful than violent, it was immediately resolved on to halt. The tattered chintzes were picked up, the scraps left by the wolves and tigers interred, and vengeance was taken on some dozens of vultures that were too much glutted to rise on the wing. The camels which had been left unmolested to make sal-ammoniac being numbered, and the ladies once more enclosed in their cages, the imperial tent was pitched on the levellest ground they could find.

Vathek, reposing upon a mattress of down, and tolerably recovered from the jolting of the Ethiopian, who, to his feelings, seemed the roughest trotting jade he had hitherto mounted, called out for something to eat; but, alas! those delicate cakes which had been baked in silver ovens for his royal mouth, those rich manchets, amber comfits, flagons of Schiraz wine, porcelain vases of snow, and grapes from the banks of the Tigris, were all irremediably lost; and nothing had Bababalouk to present in their stead but a roasted wolf, vultures à la daube, aromatic herbs of the most acrid poignancy, rotten truffles, boiled thistles, and such other wild plants as must ulcerate the throat and parch up the tongue. Nor was he better provided in the article of drink, for he could procure nothing to accompany these irritating viands but a few phials of abominable brandy, which had been secreted by the scullions in their slippers.

Vathek made wry faces at so savage a repast, and Bababalouk answered them with shrugs and contortions. The Caliph, however, ate with tolerable appetite, and fell into a nap that lasted six hours. The splendor of the sun, reflected from the white cliffs of the mountains in spite of the curtains that enclosed him, at length disturbed his repose. He awoke terrified, and stung to the quick by those wormwood-colored flies which emit from their wings a suffocating stench. The miserable monarch was perplexed how to act, though his wits were not idle in seeking expedients, whilst Bababalouk lay snoring amidst a swarm of those insects, that busily thronged to pay court to his nose. The little pages, famished with hunger, had dropped their fans on the ground, and exerted their dying voices in bitter reproaches on the Caliph, who now for the first time heard the language of truth.

Thus stimulated, he renewed his imprecations against the Giaour, and bestowed upon Mahomet some soothing expressions.

"Where am I?" cried he. "What are these dreadful rocks, these valleys of darkness? Are we arrived at the horrible Kaf?* Is the Simurgh† coming to pluck out my eyes as a punishment for undertaking this impious enterprise?"

Having said this, he bellowed like a calf, and turned himself towards an outlet in the side of his pavilion. But alas! what objects occurred to his view! on one side a plain of black sand that appeared to be unbounded, and on the other perpendicular crags bristled over with those abominable thistles which had so severely lacerated his tongue. He fancied, however, that he perceived amongst the brambles and briers some gigantic flowers, but was mistaken, for these were only the dangling palampores and variegated tatters of his gay retinue. As there were several clefts in the rock from whence water seemed to have flowed, Vathek applied his ear with the hope of catching the sound of some latent runnel, but could only distinguish the low murmurs of his people, who were repining at

* This mountain, which, in reality, is no other than Caucasus, was supposed to surround the earth like a ring encompassing a finger. The sun was believed to rise from one of its eminences (as over Octa, by the Latin poets), and to set on the opposite; whence "from Kaf to Kaf" signified from one extremity of the earth to the other.

† This is that wonderful bird of the East concerning which so many marvels are told. It was not only endowed with reason, but possessed also the knowledge of every language. This creature relates of itself, that it had seen the great revolution of seven thousand years, twelve times commence and close; and that, in its duration, the world had been seven times void of inhabitants, and as often replenished. their journey, and complaining for the want of water.

"To what purpose," asked they, "have we been brought hither? Hath our Caliph another tower to build? or have the relentless Afrits,* whom Carathis so much loves, fixed in this place their abode?"

At the name of Carathis, Vathek recollected the tablets he had received from his mother, who assured him they were fraught with preternatural qualities, and advised him to consult them as emergencies might require. Whilst he was engaged in turning them over, he heard a shout of joy and a loud clapping of hands. The curtains of his pavilion were soon drawn back, and he beheld Bababalouk, followed by a troop of his favorites, conducting two dwarfs, each a cubit high, who brought between them a large basket of melons, oranges, and pomegranates. They were singing in the sweetest tones the words that follow: —

"We dwell on the top of these rocks, in a cabin of rushes and canes; the eagles envy us our nest; a small spring supplies us with abdest, and we daily repeat prayers which the prophet approves. We love you, O commander of the faithful! our master, the good emir Fakreddin, loves you also; he reveres in your person the vicegerent of Mahomet. Little as we are, in us he confides; he knows our hearts to be good as our bodies are contemptible, and hath placed us here to aid those who are bewildered on these dreary mountains. Last night, whilst we were occupied within our cell in reading the holy Koran, a sudden hurricane blew out our lights and rocked our habitation. For two whole hours a palpable darkness prevailed: but we heard sounds at a distance which we conjectured to proceed from the bells of a cafila passing over the rocks. Our ears were soon filled with deplorable shrieks, frightful roarings, and the sound of tymbals. Chilled with terror, we concluded that the Deggial,† with his exterminating angels, had sent forth their plagues on the earth. In the midst of these melancholy reflections, we perceived flames of the deepest red glow in the horizon, and found ourselves in a few moments covered with flakes of fire. Amazed at so strange an appearance, we took up the volume dictated by the blessed intelligence, and kneeling by the light of the fire that surrounded us, we recited the verse which says: 'Put no trust in anything but the mercy of Heaven; there is no help save in the holy prophet; the mountain of Kaf itself may tremble; it is the power of Alla only that cannot be moved.' After having pronounced these words, we felt consolation, and our minds were hushed into a sacred repose. Silence ensued, and our ears clearly distinguished a voice in the air, saying, 'Servants of my faithful servant, go down to the happy valley of Fakreddin; tell him that an illustrious opportunity now offers to satiate the thirst of his hospitable heart. The commander of true believers is this day bewildered amongst these mountains, and stands in need of thy aid.' We obeyed with joy the angelic mission, and our master, filled with pious zeal, hath culled with his own hands these melons, oranges, and pomegranates. He is following us with a hundred dromedaries laden with the purest waters of his fountains, and is coming to kiss the fringe of your consecrated robe, and implore you to enter his humble habitation, which, placed amidst these barren wilds, resembles an emerald set in lead."

The dwarfs, having ended their address, remained still standing, and, with hands crossed upon their bosoms, preserved a respectful silence.

Vathek, in the midst of this curious harangue, seized the basket, and long before it was finished the fruits had dissolved in his mouth. As he continued to eat, his piety increased, and, in the same breath which recited his prayers, he called for the Koran and sugar.

Such was the state of his mind when the tablets, which were thrown by at the approach of the dwarfs, again attracted his eye. He took them up, but was ready to drop on the ground when he beheld, in large, red characters, these words inscribed by Carathis, which were indeed enough to make him tremble: —

"Beware of thy old doctors, and their puny messengers of but one cubit high; distrust their pious frauds; and, instead of eating their melons, impale on a spit the bearers of them. Shouldst thou be such a fool as to visit them, the portal of the subterranean palace will be shut in thy face, and with such force as shall shake thee asunder; thy body shall be spit upon, and bats will engender in thy belly."

"To what tends this ominous rhapsody?" cries the Caliph; "and must I then perish in these deserts with thirst, whilst I may refresh myself in the valley of melons and cucumbers? Accursed be the Giaour with his portal of ebony! he hath made me dance attendance too long already. Besides, who shall prescribe laws to me? I, forsooth, must not enter any one's habitation! Be it so; but what one can I enter that is not my own?"

Bababalouk, who lost not a syllable of this soliloquy, applauded it with all his heart; and the ladies, for the first time, agreed with him in opinion.

The dwarfs were entertained, caressed, and seated with great ceremony on little cushions of satin. The symmetry of their persons was the subject of criticism; not an inch of them was suffered to pass unexamined. Knick-knacks and dainties were offered in profusion, but all were declined with respectful gravity. They clambered up the sides of the Caliph's seat, and, placing themselves each on one of his shoulders, began to whisper prayers in his ears. Their tongues quivered like the leaves of a poplar, and the patience of Vathek was almost exhausted, when the acclamations of the troops announced the approach of Fakreddin, who was come with a hundred old graybeards, and as many Korans and dromedaries. They instantly set about their ablutions, and began to repeat the Bismillah. Vathek, to get rid of these officious monitors, followed their example, for his hands were burning.

The good emir, who was punctiliously religious, and likewise a great dealer in compliments, made an harangue five times more prolix and insipid than his harbingers had already delivered. The Caliph, unable any longer to refrain, exclaimed:—

"For the love of Mahomet, my dear Fakreddin, have done! Let us proceed to your valley and enjoy the fruits that Heaven hath vouchsafed you." The hint of proceeding put all into motion. The venerable attendants of the emir set forward somewhat slowly, but Vathek having ordered his little pages in private to goad on the dromedaries, loud fits of laughter broke forth from the cages, for the unwieldy curveting of these poor beasts, and the ridiculous distress of their superannuated riders, afforded the ladies no small entertainment.

They descended, however, unhurt, into the valley, by the large steps which the emir had cut in the rock; and already the murmuring of streams and the rustling of leaves began to catch their attention. The cavalcade soon entered a path which was skirted by flowering shrubs and extended to a vast wood of palm-trees, whose branches overspread a building of hewn stone. This edifice was crowned with nine domes, and adorned with as many portals of bronze, on which was engraven the following inscription:—

"This is the asylum of pilgrims, the refuge of travellers, and the depository of secrets for all parts of the world."

Nine pages, beautiful as the day, and clothed in robes of Egyptian linen, very long and very modest, were standing at each door. They received the whole retinue with an easy and inviting air. Four of the most amiable placed the Caliph on a magnificent taktrevan; four others, somewhat less graceful, took charge of Bababalouk, who capered for joy at the snug little cabin that fell to his share; the pages that remained waited on the rest of the train.

When everything masculine was gone out of sight, the gate of a large enclosure on the right turned on its harmonious hinges, and a young female of a slender form came forth. Her light-brown hair floated in the hazy breeze of the twilight. A troop of young maidens, like the Pleiades, attended her on tiptoe. They hastened to the pavilions that contained the sultanas; and the young lady, gracefully bending, said to them:—

"Charming princesses, everything is ready; we have prepared beds for your repose, and strewed your apartments with jasmine; no insects will keep off slumber from visiting your eyelids; we will dispel them with a thousand plumes. Come, then, amiable ladies! refresh your delicate feet and your ivory limbs in baths of rose-water, and by the light of perfumed lamps your servants will amuse you with tales."

The sultanas accepted with pleasure these obliging offers, and followed the young lady to the emir's harem, where we must for a moment leave them, and return to the Caliph.

Vathek found himself beneath a vast dome illuminated by a thousand lamps of rock crystal; as many vases of the same material, filled with excellent sherbet, sparkled on a large table, where a profusion of viands were spread. Amongst others were sweetbreads stewed in milk of almonds, saffron soups, and lamb à la crême, of all of which the Caliph was amazingly fond. He took of each as much as he was able, testified his sense of the emir's friendship by the gayety of his heart, and made the dwarfs dance against their will; for these little devotees durst not refuse the commander of the faithful. At last he spread himself on the sofa, and slept sounder than he had ever before.

Beneath this dome a general silence prevailed, for there was nothing to disturb it but the jaws of Bababalouk, who had untrussed himself to eat with greater advantage, being anxious to make amends for his fast in the mountains. As his spirits were too high to admit of his sleeping, and not loving to be idle, he proposed with himself to visit the harem, and repair to his charge of the ladies, to examine if they had been properly lubricated with the balm of Mecca, if their eyebrows and tresses were in order, and, in a word, to perform all the little offices they might need. He sought for a long time together, but without being able to find out the door. He durst not speak aloud, for fear of disturbing the Caliph, and not a soul was stirring in the precincts of the palace. He almost despaired of effecting his purpose, when a low whispering just reached his ear; it came from the dwarfs, who were returned to their old occupation, and, for the nine hundred and ninety-ninth time in their lives, were reading over the Koran. They very politely invited Bababalouk to be of their party, but his head was full of other concerns. The dwarfs, though scandalized at his dissolute morals, directed him to the apartments he wanted to find. His way thither lay through a hundred dark corridors, along which he groped as he went, and at last began to catch, from the extremity of a passage, the charming gossiping of women, which not a little delighted his heart.

"Ah, ah! what, not yet asleep?" cried he, and taking long strides as he spoke. "Did you not suspect me of abjuring my charge? I stayed but to finish what my master had left."

Two of the black eunuchs, on hearing a voice so loud, detached a party in haste, sabre in hand, to discover the cause, but presently was repeated on all sides:—

"'T is only Bababalouk, no one but Bababalouk!"

This circumspect guardian, having gone up to a thin veil of carnation-color silk that hung before the doorway, distinguished, by means of a softened splendor that shone through it, an oval bath of dark porphyry surrounded by curtains festooned in large folds. Through the apertures between them, as they were not drawn close, groups of young slaves were visible, amongst whom Bababalouk perceived his pupils indulgingly expanding their arms, as if to embrace the perfumed water and refresh themselves after their fatigues. The looks of tender languor, their confidential whispers, and the enchanting smiles with which they were imparted, the exquisite fragrance of the roses,—all combined to inspire a voluptuousness which even Bababalouk himself was scarce able to withstand.

He summoned up, however, his usual solemnity, and, in the peremptory tone of authority, commanded the ladies instantly to leave the bath. Whilst he was issuing these mandates, the young Nouronihar, daughter of the emir, who was sprightly as an antelope, and full of wanton gayety, beckoned one of her slaves to let down the great swing which was suspended to the ceiling by cords of silk, and, whilst this was doing, winked to her companions in the bath, who, chagrined to be forced from so soothing a state of indolence, began to twist it round Bababalouk, and tease him with a thousand vagaries.

When Nouronihar perceived that he was exhausted with fatigue, she accosted him with an arch air of respectful concern, and said:—

"My lord, it is not by any means decent that the chief eunuch of the Caliph our sovereign should thus continue standing; deign but to recline your graceful person upon this sofa, which will burst with vexation if it have not the honor to receive you."

Caught by these flattering accents, Bababalouk gallantly replied :—

"Delight of the apple of my eye! I accept the invitation of thy honeyed lips, and, to say truth, my senses are dazzled with the radiance that beams from thy charms."

"Repose, then, at your ease," replied the beauty, and placed him on the pretended sofa, which, quicker than lightning, gave way all at once. The rest of the women, having aptly conceived her design, sprang naked from the bath and plied the swing with such unmerciful jerks that it swept through the whole compass of a very lofty dome, and took from the poor victim all power of respiration. Sometimes his feet rased the surface of the water, and at others the skylight almost flattened his nose. In vain did he pierce the air with the cries of a voice that resembled the ringing of a cracked basin, for their peals of laughter were still more predominant.

Nouronihar, in the inebriety of youthful spirits, being used only to eunuchs of ordinary harems, and having never seen anything so royal and disgusting, was far more diverted than all of the rest. She began to parody some Persian verses, and sung with an accent most demurely piquant :—

"O gentle white dove as thou soar'st through the air.
Vouchsafe one kind glance on the mate of thy love :
Melodious Philomel, I am thy rose ;
Warble some couplet to ravish my heart!"

The sultanas and their slaves, stimulated by these pleasantries, persevered at the swing with such unremitted assiduity that at length the cord which had secured it snapped suddenly asunder, and Bababalouk fell floundering like a turtle to the bottom of the bath. This accident occasioned a universal shout. Twelve little doors, till now unobserved, flew open at once, and the ladies in an instant made their escape, after throwing all the towels on his head, and putting out the lights that remained.

The deplorable animal, in water to the chin, overwhelmed with darkness, and unable to extricate himself from the warp that embarrassed him, was still doomed to hear, for his further consolation, the fresh bursts of merriment his disaster occasioned. He bustled, but in vain, to get from the bath, for the margin was become so slippery with the oil spilt in breaking the lamps, that at every effort he slid back with a plunge, which resounded aloud through the hollow of the dome. These cursed peals of laughter at every relapse were redoubled, and he, who thought the place infested rather by devils than women, resolved to cease groping and abide in the bath, where he amused himself with soliloquies interspersed with imprecations, of which his malicious neighbors, reclining on down, suffered not an accent to escape. In this delectable plight the morning surprised him. The Caliph, wondering at his absence, had caused him to be everywhere sought for. At last he was drawn forth almost smothered from the whisk of linen, and wet even to the marrow. Limping, and chattering his teeth, he appeared before his master, who inquired what was the matter, and how he came soused in so strange a pickle.

"And why did you enter this cursed lodge?" answered Bababalouk, gruffly. "Ought a monarch like you to visit with his harem the abode of a gray-bearded emir who knows nothing of life? And with what gracious damsels does the place, too, abound! Fancy to yourself how they have soaked me like a burnt crust, and made me dance like a jackpudding the livelong night through on their damnable swing. What an excellent lesson for your sultanas to follow, into whom I have instilled such reserve and decorum!"

Vathek, comprehending not a syllable of all this invective, obliged him to relate minutely the transaction ; but instead of sympathizing with the miserable sufferer, he laughed immoderately at the device of the swing, and the figure of Bababalouk mounting upon it. The stung eunuch could scarcely preserve the semblance of respect.

"Ay, laugh, my lord! laugh," said he, "but I wish this Nouronihar would play some trick on you ; she is too wicked to spare even majesty itself."

These words made for the present but a slight impression on the Caliph, but they not long after recurred to his mind.

This conversation was cut short by Fakreddin, who came to request that Vathek would join in the prayers and ablutions to be solemnized on a spacious meadow, watered by innumerable streams. The Caliph found the waters refreshing, but the prayers abominably irksome. He diverted himself, however, with the multitude of Calenders,* Santons, † and Dervises ‡ who were continually coming and going, but especially with the Brahmins, § Faquirs, || and other enthusiasts, who had travelled from the heart of India, and halted on their way with the emir. These latter had each of them some mummery peculiar to himself. One dragged a huge chain wherever he went, another an orang-outang, whilst a third was furnished with scourges, and all performed to a charm. Some clambered up trees, holding one foot in the air; others poised themselves over a fire, and without mercy filliped their noses. There were some amongst them that cherished vermin, which were not ungrateful in requiting their caresses. These rambling fanatics revolted the hearts of the Dervises, the Calenders, and Santons; however, the vehemence of their aversion soon subsided under the hope that the presence of the Caliph would cure their folly, and convert them to the Mussulman faith. But alas! how great was their disappointment! for Vathek, instead of preaching to them, treated them as buffoons; bade them present his compliments to Visnow and Ixhora, and discovered a predilection for a squat old man from the Isle of Serendib, who was more ridiculous than any of the rest.

"Come," said he, "for the love of your gods, bestow a few slaps on your chaps to amuse me."

The old fellow, offended at such an address, began loudly to weep; but as he betrayed a villanous drivelling in his tears, the Caliph turned his back and listened to Bababalouk, who whispered, whilst he held the umbrella over him:—

"Your majesty should be cautious of this odd assembly, which hath been collected I know not for what. Is it necessary to exhibit such spectacles to a mighty potentate, with interludes of talapoins more mangy than dogs? Were I you, I would command a fire to be kindled, and at once purge the earth of the emir, his harem, and all his menagerie."

"Tush, dolt," answered Vathek, "and know that all this infinitely charms me. Nor shall I leave the meadow till I have visited every hive of these pious mendicants."

Wherever the Caliph directed his course, objects of pity were sure to swarm round him: the blind, the purblind, smarts without noses, damsels without ears, each to extol the munificence of Fakreddin, who, as well as his attendant graybeards, dealt about gratis plasters and cataplasms to all that applied. At noon a superb corps of cripples made its appearance; and soon after advanced by platoons on the plain the completest association of invalids that had ever been embodied till then. The blind went groping with the blind, the lame limped on together, and the maimed made gestures to each other with the only arm that remained. The sides of a considerable waterfall were crowded by the deaf, amongst whom were some from Pegu, with ears uncommonly handsome and large, but were still less able to hear than the rest. Nor were there wanting others in abundance with hump backs, wenny necks, and even horns of an exquisite polish.

The emir, to aggrandize the solemnity of the festival in honor of his illustrious visitant, ordered the turf to be spread on all sides with skins and table-cloths, upon which were served up for the good Mussulmans pillaus of every hue, with other orthodox dishes, and by the express order of Vathek, who was shamefully tolerant, small plates of abominations for regaling the rest. This prince, on

‡ The term dervise signifies a poor man, and is the general appellation by which a religious sect amongst the Mahometans is named.

§ These constituted the principal caste of the Indians, according to whose doctrines Brahma, from whom they are called, is the first of the three created beings by whom the world was made. This Brahma is said to have communicated to the Indians four books, in which all the sciences and ceremonies of their religion are comprised.

|| This sect were a kind of religious anchorites, who spent their whole lives in the severest austerities and mortification.

seeing so many mouths put in motion, began to think it time for employing his own. In spite, therefore, of every remonstrance from the chief of his eunuchs, he resolved to have a dinner dressed on the spot. The complaisant emir immediately gave orders for a table to be placed in the shade of the willows. The first service consisted of fish, which they drew from a river flowing over sands of gold, at the foot of a lofty hill; these were broiled as fast as taken, and served up with a sauce of vinegar and small herbs that grew on Mount Sinai; for everything with the emir was excellent and pious.

The dessert was not quite set on when the sound of lutes from the hill was repeated by the echoes of the neighboring mountains. The Caliph, with an emotion of pleasure and surprise, had no sooner raised up his head than a handful of jasmine dropped on his face. An abundance of tittering succeeded this frolic, and instantly appeared through the bushes the elegant forms of several young females, skipping and bounding like roes. The fragrance diffused from their hair struck the sense of Vathek, who in an ecstasy, suspending his repast, said to Bababalouk: —

"Are the Peris * come down from their spheres? Note her in particular whose form is so perfect, venturously running on the brink of the precipice, and turning back her head as regardless of nothing but the graceful flow of her robe. With what captivating impatience doth she contend with the bushes for her veil! could it be she who threw the jasmine at me?"

"Ay, she it was; and you too would she throw from the top of the rock," answered Bababalouk; "for that is my good friend Nouronihar, who so kindly lent me her swing. My dear lord and master," added he, twisting a twig that hung by the rind from a willow, "let me correct her for her want of respect; the emir will have no reason to complain, since (bating what I owe to his piety) he is much to be censured for keeping a troop of girls on the mountains, whose sharp air gives their blood too brisk a circulation."

"Peace, blasphemer!" said the Caliph; "speak not thus of her who over her mountains leads my heart a willing captive. Contrive, rather, that my eyes may be fixed upon hers, — that I may respire her sweet breath, as she bounds panting along these delightful wilds!"

On saying these words, Vathek extended his arms towards the hill, and directing his eyes with an anxiety unknown to him before, endeavored to keep within view the object that inthralled his soul; but her course was as difficult to follow as the flight of one of those beautiful blue butterflies of Cachmere, which are at once so volatile and rare.

The Caliph, not satisfied with seeing, wished also to hear Nouronihar, and eagerly turned to catch the sound of her voice. At last he distinguished her whispering to one of her companions behind the thicket from whence she had thrown the jasmine: —

"A Caliph, it must be owned, is a fine thing to see, but my little Gulchenrouz is much more amiable; one lock of his hair is of more value to me than the richest embroidery of the Indies. I had rather that his teeth should mischievously press my finger, than the richest ring of the imperial treasure. Where have you left him, Sutlememe? and why is he now not here?"

The agitated Caliph still wished to hear more, but she immediately retired, with all her attendants. The fond monarch pursued her with his eyes till she was gone out of sight, and then continued like a bewildered and benighted traveller, from whom the clouds had obscured the constellation that guided his way. The curtain of night seemed dropped before him, — everything appeared discolored. The falling waters filled his soul with dejection, and his tears trickled down the jasmines he had caught from Nouronihar, and placed in his inflamed bosom. He snatched up a shining pebble to remind him of the scene where he felt the first tumults of love. Two hours were elapsed, and evening drew on before he could resolve to depart from the place. He often, but in vain, attempted to go; a soft languor enervated the powers of his mind. Extending himself on the brink of the stream, he turned his eyes towards the blue summits of the mountain, and exclaimed: —

"What concealest thou behind thee? what is passing in thy solitudes? Whither is she gone? O heaven! perhaps she is now wandering in the grottos with her happy Gulchenrouz!"

In the mean time the damps began to descend, and the emir, solicitous for the health of the Caliph, ordered the imperial litter to be brought. Vathek, absorbed in his reveries, was imperceptibly removed and conveyed back to the saloon that received him the evening before.

But let us leave the Caliph immersed in his new passion, and attend Nouronihar beyond the rocks, where she had again joined her beloved Gulchenrouz. This Gulchenrouz was the son of Ali Hassan, brother to the emir, and the most delicate and lovely creature in the world. Ali Hassan, who had been absent ten years on a voyage to the unknown seas, committed at his departure this child, the only survivor of many, to the care and protection of his brother. Gulchenrouz could write in various characters with precision, and paint upon vellum the most elegant arabesques that fancy could devise. His sweet voice accompanied the lute in the most enchanting manner; and when he sung the loves of Megnoun and Leileh, or some unfortunate lovers of ancient days, tears insensibly overflowed the cheeks of his auditors. The verses he composed (for, like Megnoun, he too was a poet) inspired that unresisting languor so frequently fatal to the female heart. The women all doated upon him, for, though he had passed his thirteenth year, they still detained him in the harem. His dancing was light as the gossamer waved by the zephyrs of spring; but his arms, which twined so gracefully with those of the young girls in the dance, could neither dart the lance in the chase, nor curb the steeds that pastured his uncle's domains. The bow, however, he drew with a certain aim, and would have excelled his competitors in the race, could he have broken the ties that bound him to Nouronihar.

The two brothers had mutually engaged their children to each other; and Nouronihar loved her cousin more than her eyes. Both had the same tastes and amusements, the same long languishing looks, the same tresses, the same fair complexions; and when Gulchenrouz appeared in the dress of his cousin, he seemed to be more feminine than even herself. If at any time he left the harem to visit Fakreddin, it was with all the bashfulness of a fawn that consciously ventures from the lair of its dam; he was, however, wanton enough to mock the solemn old graybeards to whom he was subject, though sure to be rated without mercy in return. Whenever this happened, he would plunge into the recesses of the harem, and sobbing take refuge in the arms of Nouronihar, who loved even his faults beyond the virtues of others.

It fell out this evening that, after leaving the Caliph in the meadow, she ran with Gulchenrouz over the greensward of the mountain that sheltered the vale, where Fakreddin had chosen to reside. The sun was dilated on the edge of the horizon; and the young people, whose fancies were lively and inventive, imagined they beheld in the gorgeous clouds of the west the domes of Shadukiam and Ambreabad, where the Peris have fixed their abode. Nouronihar, sitting on the slope of the hill, supported on her knees the perfumed head of Gulchenrouz. The air was calm, and no sound stirred but the voices of other young girls who were drawing cool water from the streams below. The unexpected arrival of the Caliph, and the splendor that marked his appearance, had already filled with emotion the ardent soul of Nouronihar. Her vanity irresistibly prompted her to pique the prince's attention, and this she before took good care to effect whilst he picked up the jasmine she had thrown upon him. But when Gulchenrouz asked after the flowers he had culled for her bosom, Nouronihar was all in confusion. She hastily kissed his forehead, arose in a flutter, and walked with unequal steps on the border of the precipice. Night advanced, and the pure gold of the setting sun had yielded to a sanguine red, the glow of which, like the reflection of a burning furnace, flushed Nouronihar's animated countenance. Gulchenrouz, alarmed at the agitation of his cousin, said to her with a supplicating accent: —

"Let us be gone; the sky looks portentous: the tamarisks tremble more than common; and the raw wind chills my very heart. Come, let us be gone, 't is a melancholy night."

Then, taking hold of her hand, he drew it towards the path he besought her to go. Nouronihar unconsciously followed the attraction, for a thousand strange imaginations occupied her spirit. She passed the large round of honeysuckles, her favorite resort, without ever vouchsafing it a glance, yet Gulchenrouz could not help snatching off a few shoots in his way, though he ran as if a wild beast were behind.

The young females seeing him approach in such haste, and according to custom expecting a dance, instantly assembled in a circle and took each other by the hand; but Gulchenrouz, coming up out of breath, fell down at once on the grass. This accident struck with consternation the whole of this frolicsome party, whilst Nouronihar, half distracted, and overcome both by the violence of her exercise and the tumult of her thoughts, sunk feebly down at his side, cherished his cold hands in her bosom, and chafed his temples with a fragrant unguent. At length he came to himself, and, wrapping up his head in the robe of his cousin, entreated that she would not return to the harem. He was afraid of being snapped at by Shaban, his tutor, a wrinkled old eunuch of a surly disposition, for, having interrupted the stated walk of Nouronihar, he dreaded lest the churl should take it amiss. The whole of this sprightly group, sitting round upon a mossy knoll, began to entertain themselves with various pastimes, whilst their superintendents, the eunuchs, were gravely conversing at a distance. The nurse of the emir's daughter, observing her pupil sit ruminating with her eyes on the ground, endeavored to amuse her with diverting tales, to which Gulchenrouz, who had already forgotten his inquietudes, listened with a breathless attention. He laughed, he clapped his hands, and passed a hundred little tricks on the whole of the company, without omitting the eunuchs, whom he provoked to run after him, in spite of their age and decrepitude.

During these occurrences the moon arose, the wind subsided, and the evening became so serene and inviting that a resolution was taken to sup on the spot. Sutlememe, who excelled in dressing a salad, having filled large bowls of porcelain with eggs of small birds, curds turned with citron juice, slices of cucumber, and the inmost leaves of delicate herbs, handed it round from one to another, and gave each their shares in a large spoon of cocknos. Gulchenrouz, nestling as usual in the bosom of Nouronihar, pouted out his vermilion little lips against the offer of Sutlememe, and would take it only from the hand of his cousin, on whose mouth he hung like a bee inebriated with the quintessence of flowers. One of the eunuchs ran to fetch melons, whilst others were employed in showering down almonds from the branches that overhung this amiable party.

In the midst of this festive scene there appeared a light on the top of the highest mountain, which attracted the notice of every eye. This light was not less bright than the moon when at full, and might have been taken for her had it not been that the moon was already risen. The phenomenon occasioned a general surprise, and no one could conjecture the cause. It could not be a fire, for the light was clear and bluish; nor had meteors ever been seen of that magnitude or splendor. This strange light faded for a moment, and immediately renewed its brightness. It first appeared motionless at the foot of the rock, whence it darted in an instant to sparkle in a thicket of palm-trees; from thence it glided along the torrent, and at last fixed in a glen that was narrow and dark. The moment it had taken its direction, Gulchenrouz, whose heart always trembled at anything sudden or rare, drew Nouronihar by the robe, and anxiously requested her to return to the harem. The women were importunate in seconding the entreaty, but the curiosity of the emir's daughter prevailed. She not only refused to go back, but resolved at all hazards to pursue the appearance. Whilst they were debating what was best to be done, the light shot forth so dazzling a blaze that they all fled away shrieking. Nouronihar followed them a few steps, but, coming to the turn of a little by-path, stopped and went back alone. As she ran with an alertness peculiar to herself, it was not long before she came to the place where they had just been supping. The globe of fire now appeared stationary in the glen, and burned in majestic stillness. Nouronihar, compressing her hands upon her bosom, hesitated for some moments to advance. The solitude of her situation was new, the silence of the night awful, and every object inspired sensations which till then she never had felt. The affright of Gulchenrouz recurred to her mind, and she a thousand times turned to go back; but this luminous appearance was always before her. Urged on by an irresistible impulse, she continued to approach it in defiance of every obstacle that opposed her progress.

At length she arrived at the opening of the glen, but instead of coming up to the light she found herself surrounded by darkness, except that at a considerable distance a faint spark glimmered by fits. She stopped a second time; the sound of waterfalls mingling their murmurs, the hollow rustlings amongst the palm branches, and the funereal screams of the birds from their rifted trunks, all conspired to fill her with terror. She imagined every moment that she trod on some venomous reptile. All the stories of malignant Dives and dismal Ghouls thronged into her memory, but her curiosity was, notwithstanding, more predominant than her fears. She therefore firmly entered a winding track that led towards the spark, but being a stranger to the path, she had not gone far till she began to repent of her rashness.

"Alas!" said she, "that I were but in those secure and illuminated apartments where my evenings glided on with Gulchenrouz! Dear child, how would thy heart flutter with terror wert thou wandering in these wild solitudes like me!"

At the close of this apostrophe she regained her road, and, coming to steps hewn out in the rock, ascended them undismayed. The light, which was now gradually enlarging, appeared above her on the summit of the mountain. At length she distinguished a plaintive and melodious union of voices proceeding from a sort of cavern, that resembled the dirges which are sung over tombs. A sound, likewise, like that which arises from the filling of baths, at the same time struck her ear. She continued ascending, and discovered large wax torches in full blaze planted here and there in the fissures of the rock. This preparation filled her with fear, whilst the subtile and potent odor which the torches exhaled caused her to sink almost lifeless at the entrance of the grot.

Casting her eyes within in this kind of trance, she beheld a large cistern of gold filled with a water whose vapor distilled on her face a dew of the essence of roses. A soft symphony resounded through the grot. On the sides of the cistern she noticed appendages of royalty; diadems and feathers of the heron, all sparkling with carbuncles. Whilst her attention was fixed on this display of magnificence, the music ceased, and a voice instantly demanded:—

"For what monarch were these torches kindled, this bath prepared, and these habiliments, which belong not only to the sovereigns of the earth, but even to the talismanic powers?"

To which a second voice answered:—

"They are for the charming daughter of the emir Fakreddin."

"What," replied the first, "for that trifler who consumes her time with a giddy child, immersed in softness, and who at best can make but an enervated husband?"

"And can she," rejoined the other voice, "be amused with such empty trifles, whilst the Caliph, the sovereign of the world, he who is destined to enjoy the treasures of the pre-Adamite sultans, a prince six feet high, and whose eyes pervade the inmost soul of a female, is inflamed with the love of her? No, she will be wise enough to answer that passion alone that can aggrandize her glory. No doubt she will, and despise the puppet of her fancy; then all the riches this place contains, as well as the carbuncle of Giamschid, shall be hers."

"You judge right," returned the first voice, "and I haste to Istakhar to prepare the palace of subterranean fire for the reception of the bridal pair."

The voices ceased, the torches were extinguished, the most entire darkness succeeded, and Nouronihar, recovering with a start, found herself reclined on a sofa in the harem of her father. She clapped her hands, and immediately came together Gulchenrouz and her women, who, in despair at having lost her, had despatched eunuchs to seek her in every direction. Shaban appeared with the rest, and began to reprimand her with an air of consequence:—

"Little impertinent," said he, "whence got you false keys? or are you beloved of some genius that hath given you a picklock? I will try the extent of your power; come, to your chamber! through the two skylights, and expect not the company of Gulchenrouz. Be expeditious! I will shut you up in the double tower."

At these menaces Nouronihar indignantly raised her head, opened on Shaban her black eyes, which, since the important dialogue of the enchanted grot, were considerably enlarged, and said: —

"Go, speak thus to slaves! but learn to reverence her who is born to give laws and subject all to her power."

She was proceeding in the same style, but was interrupted by a sudden exclamation of —

"The Caliph! the Caliph!"

The curtains at once were thrown open, and the slaves prostrate in double rows, whilst poor little Gulchenrouz hid himself beneath the elevation of a sofa. At first appeared a file of black eunuchs trailing after them long trains of muslin embroidered with gold, and holding in their hands censers, which dispensed, as they passed, the grateful perfume of the wood of aloes. Next marched Bababalouk with a solemn strut, and tossing his head as not overpleased at the visit. Vathek came close after, superbly robed; his gait was unembarrassed and noble, and his presence would have engaged admiration, though he had not been the sovereign of the world. He approached Nouronihar with a throbbing heart, and seemed enraptured at the full effulgence of her radiant eyes, of which he had before caught but a few glimpses; but she instantly depressed them, and her confusion augmented her beauty.

Bababalouk, who was a thorough adept in coincidences of this nature, and knew that the worst game should be played with the best face, immediately made a signal for all to retire, and no sooner did he perceive beneath the sofa the little one's feet, than he drew him forth without ceremony, set him upon his shoulders, and lavished on him, as he went off, a thousand odious caresses. Gulchenrouz cried out, and resisted till his cheeks became the color of the blossom of the pomegranate, and the tears that started into his eyes shot forth a gleam of indignation. He cast a significant glance at Nouronihar, which the Caliph, noticing, asked: —

"Is that, then, your Gulchenrouz?"

"Sovereign of the world," answered she, "spare my cousin, whose innocence and gentleness deserve not your anger!"

"Take comfort," said Vathek, with a smile, "he is in good hands. Bababalouk is fond of children, and never goes without sweetmeats and comfits."

The daughter of Fakreddin was abashed, and suffered Gulchenrouz to be borne away without adding a word. The tumult of her bosom betrayed her confusion; and Vathek, becoming still more impassioned, gave a loose to his frenzy, which had only not subdued the last faint strugglings of reluctance, when the emir, suddenly bursting in, threw his face upon the ground at the feet of the Caliph, and said: — "Commander of the faithful, abase not yourself to the meanness of your slave."

"No, emir," replied Vathek, "I raise her to an equality with myself; I declare her my wife; and the glory of your race shall extend from one generation to another."

"Alas! my lord," said Fakreddin, as he plucked off the honors of his beard, "cut short the days of your faithful servant rather than force him to depart from his word. Nouronihar, as her hands evince, is solemnly promised to Gulchenrouz, the son of my brother, Ali Hassan; they are united also in heart; their faith is mutually plighted; and affiances so sacred cannot be broken."

"What, then," replied the Caliph, bluntly, "would you surrender this divine beauty to a husband more womanish than herself? And can you imagine that I will suffer her charms to decay in hands so inefficient and nerveless! No! she is destined to live out her life within my embraces; such is my will; retire, and disturb not the night I devote to the homage of her charms."

The irritated emir drew forth his sabre, presented it to Vathek, and, stretching out his neck, said in a firm tone of voice: —

"Strike your unhappy host, my lord! he has lived long enough, since he hath seen the prophet's vicegerent violate the rites of hospitality."

At his uttering these words, Nouronihar, unable to support any longer the conflict of her passions, sunk down in a swoon. Vathek, both terrified for her life, and furious at an opposition to his will, bade Fakreddin assist his daughter, and withdrew, darting his terrible look at the unfortunate emir, who suddenly fell backward bathed in a sweat, cold as the damp of death.

Gulchenrouz, who had escaped from the hands of Bababalouk, and was that instant returned, called out for help as loudly as he could, not having strength to afford it himself.

Pale and panting, the poor child attempted to revive Nouronihar by caresses, and it happened that the thrilling warmth of his lips restored her to life. Fakreddin, beginning also to recover from the look of the Caliph, with difficulty tottered to a seat, and after warily casting round his eye to see if this dangerous prince were gone, sent for Shaban and Sutlememe, and said to them apart: —

"My friends, violent evils require as violent remedies; the Caliph has brought desolation and horror into my family, and how shall we resist his power? Another of his looks will send me to my grave. Fetch, then, that narcotic powder which the Dervise brought me from Aracan. A dose of it, the effect of which will continue three days, must be administered to each of these children. The Caliph will believe them to be dead, for they will have all the appearance of death. We shall go as if to inter them in the cave of Meimoune, at the entrance of the great desert of sand, and near the cabin of my dwarfs. When all the spectators shall be withdrawn, you, Shaban, and four select eunuchs, shall convey them to the lake, where provision shall be ready to support them a month; for one day allotted to the surprise this event will occasion, five to the tears, a fortnight to reflection, and the rest to prepare for renewing his progress, will, according to my calculation, fill up the whole time that Vathek will tarry, and I shall then be freed from his intrusion."

"Your plan," said Sutlememe, "is a good one if it can but be effected. I have remarked that Nouronihar is well able to support the glances of the Caliph, and that he is far from being sparing of them to her; be assured therefore, notwithstanding her fondness for Gulchenrouz, she will never remain quiet while she knows him to be here, unless we can persuade her that both herself and Gulchenrouz are really dead, and that they were conveyed to those rocks for a limited season to expiate the little faults of which their love was the cause. We will add that we killed ourselves in despair, and that your dwarfs, whom they never yet saw, will preach to them delectable sermons. I will engage that everything shall succeed to the bent of your wishes."

"Be it so," said Fakreddin; "I approve your proposal; let us lose not a moment to give it effect."

They forthwith hastened to seek for the powder, which, being mixed in a sherbet, was immediately drunk by Gulchenrouz and Nouronihar. Within the space of an hour both were seized with violent palpitations, and a general numbness gradually ensued. They arose from the floor, where they had remained ever since the Caliph's departure, and, ascending to the sofa, reclined themselves at full length upon it, clasped in each other's embraces.

"Cherish me, my dear Nouronihar," said Gulchenrouz; "put thy hand upon my heart, for it feels as if it were frozen. Alas! thou art as cold as myself! hath the Caliph murdered us both with his terrible look?"

"I am dying," cried she in a faltering voice; "press me closer, I am ready to expire!"

"Let us die then together," answered the little Gulchenrouz, whilst his breast labored with a convulsive sigh; "let me at least breathe forth my soul on thy lips."

They spoke no more, and became as dead.

Immediately the most piercing cries were heard through the harem, whilst Shaban and Sutlememe personated with great adroitness the parts of persons in despair. The emir, who was sufficiently mortified to be forced into such untoward expedients, and had now for the first time made a trial of his powder, was under no necessity of counterfeiting grief. The slaves, who had flocked together from all quarters, stood motionless at the spectacle before them. All lights were extinguished save two lamps, which shed a wan glimmering over the faces of these lovely flowers, that seemed to be faded in the springtime of life. Funeral vestments were prepared; their bodies were washed with rose-water; their beautiful tresses were braided and incensed; and they were wrapped in simars whiter than alabaster. At the moment that their attendants were placing two wreaths of their favorite jasmines on their brows, the Caliph, who had just heard the tragical catastrophe, arrived. He looked not less pale and haggard than the ghouls that wander at night among graves.

Forgetful of himself and every one else, he broke through the midst of the slaves, fell prostrate at the foot of the sofa, beat his bosom, called himself "atrocious murderer," and invoked upon his head a thousand imprecations. With a trembling hand he raised the veil that covered the countenance of Nouronihar, and, uttering a loud shriek, fell lifeless on the floor. The chief of the eunuchs dragged him off with horrible grimaces, and repeated as he went: —

"Ay, I foresaw she would play you some ungracious turn."

No sooner was the Caliph gone, than the emir commanded biers to be brought, and forbade that any one should enter the harem. Every window was fastened, all instruments of music were broken, and the Imans began to recite their prayers. Towards the close of this melancholy day Vathek sobbed in silence, for they had been forced to compose with anodynes his convulsions of rage and desperation.

At the dawn of the succeeding morning the wide folding doors of the palace were set open, and the funeral procession moved forward for the mountain. The wailful cries of "La Ilah illa Alla" reached to the Caliph, who was eager to cicatrize himself and attend the ceremonial; nor could he have been dissuaded, had not his excessive weakness disabled him from walking. At the first few steps he fell on the ground, and his people were obliged to lay him on a bed, where he remained many days in such a state of insensibility as excited compassion in the emir himself.

When the procession was arrived at the grot of Meimoune, Shaban and Sutlememe dismissed the whole of the train excepting the four confidential eunuchs who were appointed to remain. After resting some moments near the biers which had been left in the open air, they caused them to be carried to the brink of a small lake whose banks were overgrown with a hoary moss. This was the great resort of herons and storks, which preyed continually on little blue fishes. The dwarfs, instructed by the emir, soon repaired thither, and with the help of the eunuchs began to construct cabins of rushes and reeds, a work in which they had admirable skill. A magazine also was contrived for provisions, with a small oratory for themselves, and a pyramid of wood neatly piled, to furnish the necessary fuel, for the air was bleak in the hollows of the mountains.

At evening two fires were kindled on the brink of the lake, and the two lovely bodies, taken from their biers, were carefully deposited upon a bed of dried leaves within the same cabin. The dwarfs began to recite the Koran with their clear shrill voices, and Shaban and Sutlememe stood at some distance anxiously waiting the effects of the powder. At length Nouronihar and Gulchenrouz faintly stretched out their arms, and, gradually opening their eyes, began to survey with looks of increasing amazement every object around them. They even attempted to rise, but for want of strength fell back again. Sutlememe on this administered a cordial which the emir had taken care to provide.

Gulchenrouz, thoroughly aroused, sneezed out aloud, and, raising himself with an effort that expressed his surprise, left the cabin, and inhaled the fresh air with the greatest avidity.

"Yes," said he, "I breathe again! again do I exist! I hear sounds! I behold a firmament spangled over with stars!"

Nouronihar, catching these beloved accents, extricated herself from the leaves, and ran to clasp Gulchenrouz to her bosom. The first objects she remarked were their long simars, their garlands of flowers, and their naked feet; she hid her face in her hands to reflect. The vision of the enchanted bath, the despair of her father, and, more vividly than both, the majestic figure of Vathek, recurred to her memory. She recollected also that herself and Gulchenrouz had been sick and dying; but all these images bewildered her mind. Not knowing where she was, she turned her eyes on all sides, as if to recognize the surrounding scene. This singular lake, those flames reflected from its glassy surface, the pale hues of its banks, the romantic cabins, the bulrushes that sadly waved their drooping heads, the storks whose melancholy cries blended with the shrill voices of the dwarfs, — everything conspired to persuade them that the angel of death had opened the portal of some other world.

Gulchenrouz, on his part, lost in wonder, clung to the neck of his cousin. He believed himself in the region of phantoms, and was terrified at the silence she preserved. At length, addressing her: —

"Speak," said he; "where are we? do you not see those spectres that are stirring the burning coals? Are they the Monker and Nakir, come to throw us into them? Does the fatal bridge cross this lake, whose solemn stillness perhaps conceals from us an abyss, in which for whole ages we shall be doomed incessantly to sink?"

"No, my children," said Sutlememe, going towards them; "take comfort: the exterminating angel who conducted our souls hither after yours hath assured us that the chastisement of your indolent and voluptuous life shall be restricted to a certain series of years, which you must pass in this dreary abode, where the sun is scarcely visible, and where the soil yields neither fruits nor flowers. These," continued she, pointing to the dwarfs, "will provide for our wants; for souls so mundane as ours retain too strong a tincture of their earthly extraction. Instead of meats, your food will be nothing but rice, and your bread shall be moistened in the fogs that brood over the surface of the lake!"

At this desolating prospect the poor children burst into tears, and prostrated themselves before the dwarfs, who perfectly supported their characters, and delivered an excellent discourse of a customary length upon the sacred camel, which after a thousand years was to convey them to the paradise of the faithful.

The sermon being ended and ablutions performed, they praised Allah and the prophet, supped very indifferently, and retired to their withered leaves. Nouronihar and her little cousin consoled themselves on finding that, though dead, they yet lay in one cabin. Having slept well before, the remainder of the night was spent in conversation on what had befallen them; and both, from a dread of apparitions, betook themselves for protection to one another's arms.

In the morning, which was lowering and rainy, the dwarfs mounted high poles like minarets, and called them to prayers. The whole congregation, which consisted of Sutlememe, Shaban, the four eunuchs, and some storks, were already assembled. The two children came forth from their cabin with a slow and dejected pace. As their minds were in a tender and melancholy mood, their devotions were performed with fervor. No sooner were they finished than Gulchenrouz demanded of Sutlememe and the rest, "how they happened to die so opportunely for his cousin and himself."

"We killed ourselves," returned Sutlememe, "in despair at your death."

On this said Nouronihar, who, notwithstanding what was past, had not yet forgotten her vision:—

"And the Caliph, is he also dead of his grief? and will he likewise come hither?"

The dwarfs, who were prepared with an answer, most demurely replied:—

"Vathek is damned beyond all redemption!"

"I readily believe so," said Gulchenrouz; "and am glad from my heart to hear it, for I am convinced it was his horrible look that sent us hither to listen to sermons and mess upon rice."

One week passed away on the side of the lake unmarked by any variety; Nouronihar ruminating on the grandeur of which death had deprived her, and Gulchenrouz applying to prayers and to panniers along with the dwarfs, who infinitely pleased him.

Whilst this scene of innocence was exhibiting in the mountains, the Caliph presented himself to the emir in a new light. The instant he recovered the use of his senses, with a voice that made Bababalouk quake, he thundered out:—

"Perfidious Giaour! I renounce thee forever! it is thou who hast slain my beloved Nouronihar! and I supplicate the pardon of Mahomet, who would have preserved her to me had I been more wise. Let water be brought to perform my ablutions, and let the pious Fakreddin be called to offer up his prayers with mine, and reconcile me to him. Afterwards we will go together and visit the sepulchre of the unfortunate Nouronihar. I am resolved to become a hermit, and consume the residue of my days on this mountain, in hope of expiating my crimes."

Nouronihar was not altogether so content, for though she felt a fondness for Gulchenrouz, who, to augment the attachment, had been left at full liberty with her, yet she still regarded him as but a bawble that bore no competition with the carbuncle of Giamschid. At times she indulged doubts on the mode of her being, and scarcely could believe that the dead had all the wants and the whims of the living. To gain satisfaction, however, on so perplexing a topic, she arose one morning whilst all were asleep, with a breathless caution, from the side of Gulchenrouz, and, after having given him a soft kiss, began to follow the windings of the lake till it terminated with a rock whose top was accessible though lofty. This she clambered up with considerable toil, and, having reached the summit, set forward in a run like a doe that unwittingly follows her hunter. Though she skipped along with the alertness of an antelope, yet at intervals she was forced to desist and rest beneath the tamarisks to recover her breath. Whilst she, thus reclined, was occupied with her little reflections on the apprehension that she had some knowledge of the place, Vathek, who, finding himself that morning but ill at ease, had gone forth before the dawn, presented himself on a sudden to her view. Motionless with surprise, he durst not approach the figure before him, which lay shrouded up in a simar extended on the ground, trembling and pale, but yet lovely to behold. At length Nouronihar, with a mixture of pleasure and affliction, raising her fine eyes to him, said: —

"My lord, are you come hither to eat rice and hear sermons with me?"

"Beloved phantom!" cried Vathek, "dost thou speak? hast thou the same graceful form, the same radiant features? art thou palpable likewise?" and, eagerly embracing her, he added, "Here are limbs and a bosom animated with a gentle warmth! what can such a prodigy mean?"

Nouronihar with diffidence answered: —

"You know, my lord, that I died on the night you honored me with your visit; my cousin maintains it was from one of your glances, but I cannot believe him, for to me they seem not so dreadful. Gulchenrouz died with me, and we were both brought into a region of desolation, where we are fed with a wretched diet. If you be dead also, and are come hither to join us, I pity your lot, for you will be stunned with the clang of the dwarfs and the storks. Besides, it is mortifying in the extreme that you as well as myself should have lost the treasures of the subterranean palace."

At the mention of the subterranean palace the Caliph suspended his caresses, which indeed had proceeded pretty far, to seek from Nouronihar an explanation of her meaning. She then recapitulated her vision, — what immediately followed, — and the history of her pretended death; adding also a description of the palace of expiation from whence she had fled; and all in a manner that would have extorted his laughter had not the thoughts of Vathek been too deeply engaged. No sooner, however, had she ended, than he again clasped her to his bosom, and said: —

"Light of my eyes! the mystery is unravelled; we both are alive! Your father is a cheat, who, for the sake of dividing, hath deluded us both; and the Giaour, whose design, as far as I can discover, is that we shall proceed together, seems scarce a whit better. It shall be some time at least before he find us in his palace of fire. Your lovely little person, in my estimation, is far more precious than all the treasures of the pre-Adamite sultans, and I wish to possess it at pleasure, and in open day, for many a moon, before I go to burrow under ground like a mole.

"Forget this little trifler, Gulchenrouz, and —"

"Ah, my lord," interposed Nouronihar, "let me entreat that you do him no evil."

"No, no," replied Vathek, "I have already bid you forbear to alarm yourself for him. He has been brought up too much on milk and sugar to stimulate my jealousy. We will leave him with the dwarfs, who, by the by, are my old acquaintances; their company will suit him far better than yours. As to other matters, I will return no more to your father's. I want not to have my ears dinned by him and his dotards with the violation of the rites of hospitality; as if it were less an honor for you to espouse the sovereign of the world, than a girl dressed up like a boy!"

Nouronihar could find nothing to oppose in a discourse so eloquent. She only wished the amorous monarch had discovered more ardor for the carbuncle of Giamschid; but flattered herself it would gradually increase, and therefore yielded to his will with the most bewitching submission.

When the Caliph judged it proper, he called for Bababalouk, who was asleep in the cave of Meimoune, and dreaming that the phantom of Nouronihar, having mounted him once more on her swing, had just given him such a jerk that he one moment soared above the mountains, and the next sunk into the abyss. Starting from his sleep at the voice of his master, he ran gasping for breath, and had nearly fallen backward at the sight, as he believed, of the spectre by whom he had so lately been haunted in his dream.

"Ah, my lord," cried he, recoiling ten steps, and covering his eyes with both hands, "do you then perform the office of a Ghoul? 'T is true you have dug up the dead, yet hope not to make her your prey; for after all she hath caused me to suffer, she is even wicked enough to prey upon you."

"Cease thy folly," said Vathek, "and thou shalt soon be convinced that it is Nouronihar herself, alive and well, whom I clasp to my breast. Go, only, and pitch my tents in the neighboring valley. There will I fix my abode with this beautiful tulip, whose colors I soon shall restore. There exert thy best endeavors to procure whatever can augment the enjoyments of life, till I shall disclose to thee more of my will."

The news of so unlucky an event soon reached the ears of the emir, who abandoned himself to grief and despair, and began, as did all his old graybeards, to begrime his visage with ashes. A total supineness ensued; travellers were no longer entertained, no more plasters were spread, and, instead of the charitable activity that had distinguished this asylum, the whole of its inhabitants exhibited only faces of a half-cubit long, and uttered groans that accorded with their forlorn situation.

Though Fakreddin bewailed his daughter as lost to him forever, yet Gulchenrouz was not forgotten. He despatched immediate instruction to Sutlememe, Shaban, and the dwarfs, enjoining them not to undeceive the child in respect to his state, but under some pretence to convey him far from the lofty rock at the extremity of the lake, to a place which he should appoint, as safer from danger; for he suspected that Vathek intended him evil.

Gulchenrouz in the mean while was filled with amazement at not finding his cousin; nor were the dwarfs at all less surprised; but Sutlememe, who had more penetration, immediately guessed what had happened. Gulchenrouz was amused with the delusive hope of once more embracing Nouronihar in the interior recesses of the mountains, where the ground, strewed over with orange blossoms and jasmines, offered beds much more inviting than the withered leaves in their cabin, where they might accompany with their voices the sounds of their lutes, and chase butterflies in concert. Sutlememe was far gone in this sort of description when one of the four eunuchs beckoned her aside to apprise her of the arrival of a messenger from their fraternity, who had explained the secret of the flight of Nouronihar, and brought the commands of the emir. A council with Shaban and the dwarfs was immediately held. Their baggage being stowed in consequence of it, they embarked in a shallop, and quietly sailed with the little one, who acquiesced in all their proposals. Their voyage proceeded in the same manner till they came to the place where the lake sinks beneath the hollow of the rock; but as soon as the bark had entered it, and Gulchenrouz found himself surrounded with darkness, he was seized with a dreadful consternation, and incessantly uttered the most piercing outcries; for he now was persuaded he should actually be damned for having taken too many little freedoms in his lifetime with his cousin.

But let us return to the Caliph and her who ruled over his heart. Bababalouk had pitched the tents, and closed up the extremities of the valley with magnificent screens of India cloth, which were guarded by Ethiopian slaves with their drawn sabres. To preserve the verdure of this beautiful enclosure in its natural freshness, the white eunuchs went continually round it with their red water-vessels. The waving of fans was heard near the imperial pavilion, where, by the voluptuous light that glowed through the muslins, the Caliph enjoyed at full view all the attractions of Nouronihar. Inebriated with delight, he was all ear to her charming voice, which accompanied the lute; while she was not less captivated with his descriptions of Samarah and the tower full of wonders, but especially with his relation of the adventure of the ball, and the chasm of the Giaour with its ebony portal.

In this manner they conversed for a day and a night; they bathed together in a basin of black marble, which admirably relieved the fairness of Nouronihar. Bababalouk, whose good graces this beauty had regained, spared no attention that their repasts might be served up with the minutest exactness; some exquisite rarity was ever placed before them, and he sent even to Schiraz for that fragrant and delicious wine which had been hoarded up in bottles prior to the birth of Mahomet. He had excavated little ovens in the rock to bake the nice manchets which were prepared by the hands of Nouronihar, from whence they had derived a flavor so grateful to Vathek that he regarded the ragouts of his other wives as entirely mawkish; whilst they would have died at the emir's of chagrin at finding themselves so neglected, if Fakreddin, notwithstanding his resentment, had not taken pity upon them.

The sultana Dilara, who till then had been the favorite, took this dereliction of the Caliph to heart with a vehemence natural to her character; for during her continuance in favor she had imbibed from Vathek many of his extravagant fancies, and was fired with impatience to behold the superb tombs of Istakhar and the palace of forty columns; besides, having been brought up amongst the magi, she had fondly cherished the idea of the Caliph's devoting himself to the worship of fire; thus his voluptuous and desultory life with her rival was to her a double source of affliction. The transient piety of Vathek had occasioned her some serious alarms, but the present was an evil of far greater magnitude. She resolved, therefore, without hesitation, to write to Carathis, and acquaint her that all things went ill; that they had eaten, slept, and revelled at an old emir's, whose sanctity was very formidable, and that, after all, the prospect of possessing the treasures of the pre-Adamite sultans was no less remote than before. This letter was intrusted to the care of two woodmen who were at work on one of the great forests of the mountains, and, being acquainted with the shortest cuts, arrived in ten days at Samarah.

The Princess Carathis was engaged at chess with Morakanabad when the arrival of these wood-fellers was announced. She, after some weeks of Vathek's absence, had forsaken the upper regions of her tower, because everything appeared in confusion among the stars, whom she consulted relative to the fate of her son. In vain did she renew her fumigations, and extend herself on the roof to obtain mystic visions; nothing more could she see in her dreams than pieces of brocade, nosegays of flowers, and other unmeaning gewgaws. These disappointments had thrown her into a state of dejection which no drug in her power was sufficient to remove. Her only resource was in Morakanabad, who was a good man, and endowed with a decent share of confidence, yet whilst in her company he never thought himself on roses.

No person knew aught of Vathek, and a thousand ridiculous stories were propagated at his expense. The eagerness of Carathis may be easily guessed at receiving the letter, as well as her rage at reading the dissolute conduct of her son.

"Is it so?" said she. "Either I will perish, or Vathek shall enter the palace of fire. Let me expire in flames, provided he may reign on the throne of Soliman!"

Having said this, and whirled herself round in a magical manner, which struck Morakanabad with such terror as caused him to recoil, she ordered her great camel Alboufaki to be brought, and the hideous Nerkes with the unrelenting Cafour to attend.

"I require no other retinue," said she to Morakanabad; "I am going on affairs of emergency; a truce, therefore, to parade! Take you care of the people, fleece them well in my absence, for we shall expend large sums, and one knows not what may betide."

The night was uncommonly dark, and a pestilential blast ravaged the plain of Catoul that would have deterred any other traveller, however urgent the call; but Carathis enjoyed most whatever filled others with dread. Nerkes concurred in opinion with her, and Cafour had a particular predilection for a pestilence. In the morning this accomplished caravan, with the wood-fellers, who directed their route, halted on the edge of an extensive marsh, from whence so noxious a vapor arose as would have destroyed any animal but Alboufaki, who naturally inhaled these malignant fogs. The peasants entreated their convoy not to sleep in this place.

"To sleep," cried Carathis, "what an excellent thought! I never sleep but for visions; and as to my attendants, their occupations are too many to close the only eye they each have."

The poor peasants, who were not over pleased with their party, remained open-mouthed with surprise.

Carathis alighted as well as her negresses, and, severally stripping off their outer garments, they all ran in their drawers to cull from those spots where the sun shone fiercest the venomous plants that grew on the marsh. This provision was made for the family of the emir and whoever might retard the expedition to Istakhar. The woodmen were overcome with fear when they beheld these three horrible phantoms run, and, not much relishing the company of Alboufaki, stood aghast at the command of Carathis to set forward, notwithstanding it was noon, and the heat fierce enough to calcine even rocks. In spite, however, of every remonstrance, they were forced implicitly to submit.

Alboufaki, who delighted in solitude, constantly snorted whenever he perceived himself near a habitation, and Carathis, who was apt to spoil him with indulgence, as constantly turned him aside; so that the peasants were precluded from procuring subsistence; for the milch-goats and ewes which Providence had sent towards the district they traversed, to refresh travellers with their milk, all fled at the sight of the hideous animal and his strange riders. As to Carathis, she needed no common aliment; for her invention had previously furnished her with an opiate to stay her stomach, some of which she imparted to her mutes.

At the fall of night Alboufaki, making a sudden stop, stamped with his foot, which to Carathis, who understood his paces, was a certain indication that she was near the confines of some cemetery. The moon shed a bright light on the spot, which served to discover a long wall with a large door in it standing ajar, and so high that Alboufaki might easily enter. The miserable guides, who perceived their end approaching, humbly implored Carathis, as she had now so good an opportunity, to inter them, and immediately gave up the ghost. Nerkes and Cafour, whose wit was of a style peculiar to themselves, were by no means parsimonious of it on the folly of these poor people, nor could anything have been found more suited to their taste than the site of the burying-ground and the sepulchres which its precincts contained. There were at least two thousand of them on the declivity of a hill; some in the form of pyramids, others like columns, and, in short, the variety of their shapes was endless. Carathis was too much immersed in her sublime contemplations to stop at the view, charming as it appeared in her eyes. Pondering the advantages that might accrue from her present situation, she could not forbear to exclaim:—

"So beautiful a cemetery must be haunted by Ghouls, and they want not for intelligence! having heedlessly suffered my guides to expire, I will apply for directions to them, and, as an inducement, will invite them to regale on these fresh corpses."

After this short soliloquy, she beckoned to Nerkes and Cafour, and made signs with her fingers, as much as to say:—

"Go, knock against the sides of the tombs, and strike up your delightful warblings, that are so like to those of the guests whose company I wish to obtain."

The negresses, full of joy at the behests of their mistress, and promising themselves much pleasure from the society of the Ghouls, went with an air of conquest, and began their knockings at the tombs. As their strokes were repeated, a hollow noise was heard in the earth, the surface hove up into heaps, and the Ghouls on all sides protruded their noses to inhale the effluvia which the carcasses of the woodmen began to emit.

They assembled before a sarcophagus of white marble, where Carathis was seated between the bodies of her miserable guides. The princess received her visitants with distinguished politeness, and, when supper was ended, proceeded with them to business. Having soon learnt from them everything she wished to discover, it was her intention to set forward forthwith on her journey, but her negresses, who were forming tender connections with the Ghouls, importuned her with all their fingers to wait, at least till the dawn. Carathis, however, being chastity in the abstract, and an implacable enemy to love and repose, at once rejected their prayer, mounted Alboufaki, and commanded them to take their seats in a moment. Four days and four nights she continued her route, without turning to the right hand or left; on the fifth she traversed the mountains and half-burnt forests, and arrived on the sixth before the beautiful screens which concealed from all eyes the voluptuous wanderings of her son.

It was daybreak, and the guards were snoring on their posts in careless security, when the rough trot of Alboufaki awoke them in consternation. Imagining that a group of spectres ascended from the abyss was approaching, they all without ceremony took to their heels. Vathek was at that instant with Nouronihar in the bath, hearing tales and laughing at Bababalouk, who related them; but no sooner did the outcry of his guards reach him, than he flounced from the water like a carp, and as soon threw himself back at the sight of Carathis, who, advancing with her negresses upon Alboufaki, broke through the muslin awnings and veils of the pavilion. At this sudden apparition, Nouronihar (for she was not at all times free from remorse) fancied that the moment of celestial vengeance was come, and clung about the Caliph in amorous despondence.

Carathis, still seated on her camel, foamed with indignation at the spectacle which obtruded itself on her chaste view. She thundered forth without check or mercy:—

"Thou double-headed and four-legged monster! what means all this winding and writhing? art thou not ashamed to be seen grasping this limber sapling in preference to the sceptre of the pre-Adamite sultans? Is it then for this paltry doxy that thou hast violated the conditions in the parchment of our Giaour? Is it on her thou hast lavished thy precious moments? Is this the fruit of the knowledge I have taught thee? Is this the end of thy journey? Tear thyself from the arms of this little simpleton; drown her in the water before me, and instantly follow my guidance."

In the first ebullition of his fury, Vathek resolved to make a skeleton of Alboufaki, and to stuff the skins of Carathis and her blacks; but the ideas of the Giaour, the palace of Istakhar, the sabres, and the talismans, flashing before his imagination with the simultaneousness of lightning, he became more moderate, and said to his mother in a civil but decisive tone:—

"Dread lady, you shall be obeyed; but I will not drown Nouronihar; she is sweeter to me than a Myrabolan comfit, and is enamored of carbuncles, especially that of Giamschid, which hath also been promised to be conferred upon her; she therefore shall go along with us, for I intend to repose with her beneath the canopies of Soliman; I can sleep no more without her."

"Be it so," replied Carathis, alighting, and at the same time committing Alboufaki to the charge of her women.

Nouronihar, who had not yet quitted her hold, began to take courage, and said with an accent of fondness to the Caliph:—

"Dear sovereign of my soul! I will follow thee, if it be thy will, beyond the Kaf, in the land of the Afrits. I will not hesitate to climb for thee the nest of the Simurgh, who, this lady excepted, is the most awful of created existences."

"We have here, then," subjoined Carathis, "a girl both of courage and science."

Nouronihar had certainly both; but, notwithstanding all her firmness, she could not help casting back a look of regret upon the graces of her little Gulchenrouz, and the days of tenderness she had participated with him. She even dropped a few tears, which Carathis observed, and inadvertently breathed out with a sigh:—

"Alas! my gentle cousin, what will become of him?"

Vathek at this apostrophe knitted up his brows, and Carathis inquired what it could mean.

"She is preposterously sighing after a stripling with languishing eyes and soft hair, who loves her," said the Caliph.

"Where is he?" asked Carathis. "I must be acquainted with this pretty child; for," added she, lowering her voice, "I design before I depart to regain the favor of the Giaour. There is nothing so delicious in his estimation as the heart of a delicate boy palpitating with the first tumults of love."

Vathek, as he came from the bath, commanded Bababalouk to collect the women and other movables of his harem, embody his troops, and hold himself in readiness to march in three days; whilst Carathis retired alone to a tent, where the Giaour solaced her with encouraging visions; but at length waking, she found at her feet Nerkes and Cafour, who informed her by their signs, that, having led Alboufaki to the borders of a lake, to browse on some moss that looked tolerably venomous, they had discovered certain blue fishes of the same kind with those in the reservoir on the top of the tower.

"Ah, ah," said she, "I will go thither to them! These fish are past doubt of a species that by a small operation I can render oracular. They may tell me where this little Gulchenrouz is, whom I am bent upon sacrificing."

Having thus spoken, she immediately set out with her swarthy retinue.

It being but seldom that time is lost in the accomplishment of a wicked enterprise, Carathis and her negresses soon arrived at the lake, where, after burning the magical drugs with which they were always provided, they, stripping themselves naked, waded to their chins, Nerkes and Cafour waving torches around them, and Carathis pronouncing her barbarous incantations. The fishes, with one accord, thrust forth their heads from the water, which was violently rippled by the flutter of their fins, and, at length, finding themselves constrained by the potency of the charm, they opened their piteous mouths, and said: —

"From gills to tail we are yours; what seek ye to know?"

"Fishes," answered she, "I conjure you, by your glittering scales, tell me where now is Gulchenrouz?"

"Beyond the rock," replied the shoal, in full chorus: "will this content you? for we do not delight in expanding our mouths."

"It will," returned the princess; "I am not to learn that you like not long conversations; I will leave you therefore to repose, though I had other questions to propound."

The instant she had spoken the water became smooth, and the fishes at once disappeared.

Carathis, inflated with the venom of her projects, strode hastily over the rock, and found the amiable Gulchenrouz asleep in an arbor, whilst the two dwarfs were watching at his side, and ruminating their accustomed prayers. These diminutive personages possessed the gift of divining whenever an enemy to good Mussulmans approached; thus they anticipated the arrival of Carathis, who, stopping short, said to herself: —

"How placidly doth he recline his lovely little head! how pale and languishing are his looks! it is just the very child of my wishes!"

The dwarfs interrupted this delectable soliloquy by leaping instantly upon her, and scratching her face with their utmost zeal. But Nerkes and Cafour, betaking themselves to the succor of their mistress, pinched the dwarfs so severely in return, that they both gave up the ghost, imploring Mahomet to inflict his sorest vengeance upon this wicked woman and all her household.

At the noise which this strange conflict occasioned in the valley Gulchenrouz awoke, and, bewildered with terror, sprung impetuously upon an old fig-tree that rose against the acclivity of the rocks, from thence gained their summits, and ran for two hours without once looking back. At last, exhausted with fatigue, he fell as if dead into the arms of a good old Genius, whose fondness for the company of children had made it his sole occupation to protect them; and who, whilst performing his wonted rounds through the air, happening on the cruel Giaour at the instant of his growling in the horrible chasm, rescued the fifty little victims which the impiety of Vathek had devoted to his maw. These the Genius brought up in nests still higher than the clouds, and himself fixed his abode in a nest more capacious than the rest, from which he had expelled the possessors that had built it.

These inviolable asylums were defended against the Dives and the Afrits by waving streamers, on which were inscribed, in characters of gold that flashed like lightning, the names of Allah and the prophet. It was there that Gulchenrouz, who as yet remained undeceived with respect to his pretended death, thought himself in the mansions of eternal peace. He admitted, without fear, the congratulations of his little friends, who were all assembled in the nest of the venerable Genius, and vied with each other in kissing his serene forehead and beautiful eyelids. This he found to be the state congenial to his soul; remote from the inquietudes of earth, the impertinence of harems, the brutality of eunuchs, and the lubricity of women. In this peaceable society his days, months, and years glided on, nor was he less happy than the rest of his companions, for the Genius, instead of burdening his pupils with perishable riches, and the vain sciences of the world, conferred upon them the boon of perpetual childhood.

Carathis, unaccustomed to the loss of her prey, vented a thousand execrations on her negresses for not seizing the child, instead of amusing themselves with pinching to death the dwarfs, from which they could gain no advantage. She returned into the valley murmuring, and, finding that her son was not risen from the arms of Nouronihar, discharged her ill-humor upon both. The idea, however, of departing next day for Istakhar, and cultivating, through the good offices of the Giaour, an intimacy with Eblis himself, at length consoled her chagrin; but fate had ordained it otherwise.

In the evening, as Carathis was conversing with Dilara, who through her contrivance had become of the party, and whose taste resembled her own, Bababalouk came to acquaint her "that the sky towards Samarah looked of a fiery red, and seemed to portend some alarming disaster." Immediately recurring to her astrolabes and instruments of magic, she took the altitude of the planets, and discovered by her calculations, to her great mortification, that a formidable revolt had taken place at Samarah; that Motavakel, availing himself of the disgust which was inveterate against his brother, had incited commotions amongst the populace, made himself master of the palace, and actually invested the great tower, to which Morakanabad had retired with a handful of the few that still remained faithful to Vathek.

"What!" exclaimed she; "must I lose then my tower, my mutes, my negresses, my mummies, and, worse than all, the laboratory, in which I have spent so many a night, without knowing, at least, if my hair-brained son will complete his adventure? No! I will not be the dupe! Immediately will I speed to support Morakanabad. By my formidable art the clouds shall sleet hailstones in the faces of the assailants, and shafts of red-hot iron on their heads. I will spring mines of serpents and torpedoes from beneath them, and we shall soon see the stand they will make against such an explosion!"

Having thus spoken, Carathis hasted to her son, who was tranquilly banqueting with Nouronihar in his superb carnation-colored tent.

"Glutton that thou art," cried she; "were it not for me thou wouldst soon find thyself the commander only of pies. Thy faithful subjects have abjured the faith they swore to thee. Motavakel, thy brother, now reigns on the hill of pied horses; and, had I not some slight resources in the tower, would not be easily persuaded to abdicate. But, that time may not be lost, I shall only add four words: strike tent to-night; set forward, and beware how thou loiterest again by the way. Though thou hast forfeited the conditions of the parchment, I am not yet without hope; for it cannot be denied that thou hast violated to admiration the laws of hospitality by seducing the daughter of the emir, after having partaken of his bread and his salt. Such a conduct cannot but be delightful to the Giaour; and if, on thy march, thou canst signalize thyself by an additional crime, all will still go well, and thou shalt enter the palace of Soliman in triumph. Adieu! Alboufaki and my negresses are waiting."

The Caliph had nothing to offer in reply: he wished his mother a prosperous journey, and ate on till he had finished his supper. At midnight the camp broke up, amidst the flourishing of trumpets and other martial instruments; but loud indeed must have been the sound of the tymbals, to overpower the blubbering of the emir and his long-beards, who by an excessive profusion of tears had so far exhausted the radical moisture that their eyes shrivelled up in their sockets, and their hairs dropped off by the roots. Nouronihar, to whom such a symphony was painful, did not grieve to get out of hearing. She accompanied the Caliph in the imperial litter, where they amused themselves with imagining the splendor which was soon to surround them. The other women, overcome with dejection, were dolefully rocked in their cages, whilst Dilara consoled herself with anticipating the joy of celebrating the rites of fire on the stately terraces of Istakhar.

In four days they reached the spacious valley of Rocnabad. The season of spring was in all its vigor, and the grotesque branches of the almond-trees in full blossom fantastically checkered the clear blue sky. The earth, variegated with hyacinths and jonquils, breathed forth a fragrance which diffused through the soul a divine repose. Myriads of bees, and scarce fewer of Santons, had there taken up their abode. On the banks of the stream hives and oratories were alternately ranged, and their neatness and whiteness were set off by the deep green of the cypresses that spired up amongst them. These pious personages amused themselves with cultivating little gardens that abounded with flowers and fruits, especially musk-melons of the best flavor that Persia could boast. Sometimes, dispersed over the meadow, they entertained themselves with feeding peacocks whiter than snow, and turtles more blue than the sapphire. In this manner were they occupied when the harbingers of the imperial procession began to proclaim :—

"Inhabitants of Rocnabad, prostrate yourselves on the brink of your pure waters, and tender your thanksgivings to Heaven, that vouchsafeth to show you a ray of its glory; for lo! the commander of the faithful draws near."

The poor Santons, filled with holy energy, having bustled to light up wax torches in their oratories, and expand the Koran on their ebony desks, went forth to meet the Caliph with baskets of honeycomb, dates, and melons. But whilst they were advancing in solemn procession and with measured steps, the horses, camels, and guards wantoned over their tulips and other flowers, and made a terrible havoc amongst them. The Santons could not help casting from one eye a look of pity on the ravages committing around them, whilst the other was fixed upon the Caliph and heaven. Nouronihar, enraptured with the scenery of a place which brought back to her remembrance the pleasing solitudes where her infancy had passed, entreated Vathek to stop; but he, suspecting that each oratory might be deemed by the Giaour a distinct habitation, commanded his pioneers to level them all. The Santons stood motionless with horror at the barbarous mandate, and at last broke out into lamentations, but these were uttered with so ill a grace that Vathek bade his eunuchs to kick them from his presence. He then descended from the litter with Nouronihar. They sauntered together in the meadow, and amused themselves with culling flowers and passing a thousand pleasantries on each other. But the bees, who were stanch Mussulmans, thinking it their duty to revenge the insult on their dear masters the Santons, assembled so zealously to do it with effect, that the Caliph and Nouronihar were glad to find their tents prepared to receive them.

Bababalouk, who, in capacity of purveyor, had acquitted himself with applause, as to peacocks and turtles, lost no time in consigning some dozens to the spit, and as many more to be fricasseed. Whilst they were feasting, laughing, carousing, and blaspheming at pleasure on the banquet so liberally furnished, the Moullahs, the Sheiks, the Cadis, and Imans of Schiraz (who seemed not to have met the Santons) arrived, leading by bridles of ribbon, inscribed from the Koran, a train of asses which were loaded with the choicest fruits the country could boast. Having presented their offerings to the Caliph, they petitioned him to honor their city and mosques with his presence.

"Fancy not," said Vathek, "that you can detain me. Your presents I condescend to accept, but beg you will let me be quiet, for I am not over fond of resisting temptation. Retire, then. Yet, as it is not decent for personages so reverend to return on foot, and as you have not the appearance of expert riders, my eunuchs shall tie you on your asses, with the precaution that your backs be not turned towards me, for they understand etiquette."

In this deputation were some high-stomached Sheiks, who, taking Vathek for a fool, scrupled not to speak their opinion. These Bababalouk girded with double cords; and having well disciplined their asses with nettles behind, they all started with a preternatural alertness, plunging, kicking, and running foul of each other in the most ludicrous manner imaginable.

Nouronihar and the Caliph mutually contended who should most enjoy so degrading a sight. They burst out in volleys of laughter to see the old men and their asses fall into the stream. The leg of one was fractured, the shoulder of another dislocated, the teeth of a third dashed out, and the rest suffered still worse.

Two days more, undisturbed by fresh embassies, having been devoted to the pleasures of Rocnabad, the expedition proceeded, leaving Schiraz on the right, and verging towards a large plain, from whence were discernible on the edge of the horizon the dark summits of the mountains of Istakhar.

At this prospect the Caliph and Nouronihar were unable to repress their transports. They bounded from their litter to the ground, and broke forth into such wild exclamations as amazed all within hearing. Interrogating each other, they shouted :—

"Are we not approaching the radiant palace of light, or gardens more delightful than those of Sheddad?"

Infatuated mortals! they thus indulged delusive conjecture, unable to fathom the decrees of the Most High!

The good Genii, who had not totally relinquished the superintendence of Vathek, repairing to Mahomet in the seventh heaven, said: —

"Merciful prophet! stretch forth thy propitious arms towards thy vicegerent, who is ready to fall irretrievably into the snare which his enemies, the Dives, have prepared to destroy him. The Giaour is awaiting his arrival in the abominable palace of fire, where if he once set his foot his perdition will be inevitable."

Mahomet answered with an air of indignation: —

"He hath too well deserved to be resigned to himself; but I permit you to try if one effort more will be effectual to divert him from pursuing his ruin."

One of these beneficent Genii, assuming without delay the exterior of a shepherd, more renowned for his piety than all the Dervises and Santons of the region, took his station near a flock of white sheep on the slope of a hill, and began to pour forth from his flute such airs of pathetic melody as subdued the very soul, and, awakening remorse, drove far from it every frivolous fancy. At these energetic sounds, the sun hid himself beneath a gloomy cloud, and the waters of two little lakes, that were naturally clearer than crystal, became a color like blood. The whole of this superb assembly was involuntarily drawn towards the declivity of the hill. With downcast eyes, they all stood abashed, each upbraiding himself with the evil he had done. The heart of Dilara palpitated; and the chief of the eunuchs, with a sigh of contrition, implored pardon of the women, whom, for his own satisfaction, he had so often tormented.

Vathek and Nouronihar turned pale in their litter, and, regarding each other with haggard looks, reproached themselves: the one with a thousand of the blackest crimes, a thousand projects of impious ambition; the other, with the desolation of her family and the perdition of the amiable Gulchenrouz. Nouronihar persuaded herself that she heard in the fatal music the groans of her dying father, and Vathek the sobs of the fifty children he had sacrificed to the Giaour. Amidst these complicated pangs of anguish, they perceived themselves impelled towards the shepherd, whose countenance was so commanding, that Vathek, for the first time, felt overawed, whilst Nouronihar concealed her face with her hands. The music paused, and the Genius, addressing the Caliph, said, —

"Deluded Prince! to whom Providence hath confided the care of innumerable subjects, is it thus that thou fulfillest thy mission? Thy crimes are already completed; and art thou now hastening towards thy punishment? Thou knowest that beyond these mountains Eblis and his accursed Dives hold their infernal empire; and, seduced by a malignant phantom, thou art proceeding to surrender thyself to them! This moment is the last of grace allowed thee! Abandon thy atrocious purpose. Return. Give back Nouronihar to her father, who still retains a few sparks of life. Destroy thy tower with all its abominations. Drive Carathis from thy councils. Be just to thy subjects. Respect the ministers of the Prophet. Compensate for thy impieties by an exemplary life; and, instead of squandering thy days in voluptuous indulgence, lament thy crimes on the sepulchres of thy ancestors. Thou beholdest the clouds that obscure the sun; at the instant he recovers his splendor, if thy heart be not changed, the time of mercy assigned thee will be passed forever."

Vathek, depressed with fear, was on the point of prostrating himself at the feet of the shepherd, whom he perceived to be of a nature superior to man; but, his pride prevailing, he audaciously lifted his head, and glancing at him one of his terrible looks said: —

"Whoever thou art, withhold thy useless admonitions. Thou wouldst either delude me, or art thyself deceived. If what I have done be so criminal as thou pretendest, there remains not for me a moment of grace. I have traversed a sea of blood to acquire a power which will make thy equals tremble: deem not that I shall retire when in view of the port, or that I will relinquish her who is dearer to me than either my life or thy mercy. Let the sun appear! Let him illumine my career! It matters not where it may end."

On uttering these words, which made even the Genius shudder, Vathek threw himself into the arms of Nouronihar, and commanded that his horses should be forced back to the road.

There was no difficulty in obeying these orders, for the attraction had ceased, the sun shone forth in all his glory, and the shepherd vanished with a lamentable scream.

The fatal impression of the music of the Genius remained, notwithstanding, in the hearts of Vathek's attendants. They viewed each other with looks of consternation. At the approach of night almost all of them escaped; and of this numerous assemblage there only remained the chief of the eunuchs, some idolatrous slaves, Dilara, and a few other women, who, like herself, were votaries of the religion of the Magi.

The Caliph, fired with the ambition of prescribing laws to the Intelligences of Darkness, was but little embarrassed at this dereliction. The impetuosity of his blood prevented him from sleeping; nor did he encamp any more as before. Nouronihar, whose impatience, if possible, exceeded his own, importuned him to hasten his march, and lavished on him a thousand caresses, to beguile all reflection. She fancied herself already more potent than Balkis;* and pictured to her imagination the Genii falling prostrate at the foot of her throne. In this manner they advanced, by moonlight, till they came within view of the two towering rocks that formed a kind of portal to the valley, at whose extremity rose the vast ruins of Istakhar. Aloft on the mountain glimmered the fronts of various royal mausoleums, the horror of which was deepened by the shadows of night. They passed through two villages, almost deserted; the only inhabitants remaining being a few feeble old men, who at the sight of horses and litters fell upon their knees, and cried out: —

"O Heaven! is it then by these phantoms that we have been for six months tormented! Alas! it was from the terror of these spectres and the noise beneath the mountains that our people have fled, and left us at the mercy of maleficent spirits!"

The Caliph, to whom these complaints were but unpromising auguries, drove over the bodies of these wretched old men, and at length arrived at the foot of the terrace of black marble. There he descended from his litter, handing down Nouronihar; both, with beating hearts, stared wildly around them, and expected, with an apprehensive shudder, the approach of the Giaour. But nothing as yet announced his appearance.

A deathlike stillness reigned over the mountain and through the air. The moon dilated, on a vast platform, the shades of the lofty columns which reached from the terrace almost to the clouds. The gloomy watch-towers, whose number could not be counted, were veiled by no roof; and their capitals, of an architecture unknown in the records of the earth, served as an asylum for the birds of darkness, which, alarmed at the approach of such visitants, fled away croaking.

The chief of the eunuchs, trembling with fear, besought Vathek that a fire might be kindled.

"No!" replied he, "there is no time left to think of such trifles; abide where thou art, and expect my commands."

Having thus spoken, he presented his hand to Nouronihar, and, ascending the steps of a vast staircase, reached the terrace, which was flagged with squares of marble, and resembled a smooth expanse of water, upon whose surface not a leaf ever dared to vegetate. On the right rose the watch-towers, ranged before the ruins of an immense palace, whose walls were embossed with various figures. In front stood forth the colossal forms of four creatures composed of the leopard and the griffin; and, though but of stone, inspired emotions of terror. Near these were distinguished by the splendor of the moon, which streamed full on the place, characters like those on the sabres of the Giaour, that possessed the same virtue of changing every moment. These, after vacillating for some time, at last fixed in Arabic letters, and prescribed to the Caliph the following words: —

* This was the Arabian name of the Queen of Sheba, who went from the South to hear the wisdom and admire the glory of Solomon. The Koran represents her as a worshipper of fire. Solomon is said not only to have entertained her with the greatest magnificence, but also to have raised her to his bed and his throne. — Al Koran, ch. 27, and Sale's notes. Herbelot, p. 182.

"Vathek! thou hast violated the conditions of my parchment, and deservest to be sent back; but in favor to thy companion, and as the meed for what thou hast done to obtain it, Eblis permitteth that the portal of his palace shall be opened, and the subterranean fire will receive thee into the number of its adorers."

He scarcely had read these words before the mountain, against which the terrace was reared, trembled; and the watch-towers were ready to topple headlong upon them. The rock yawned, and disclosed within it a staircase of polished marble, that seemed to approach the abyss. Upon each stair were planted two large torches, like those Nouronihar had seen in her vision, the camphorated vapor ascending from which gathered into a cloud under the hollow of the vault.

This appearance, instead of terrifying, gave new courage to the daughter of Fakreddin. Scarcely deigning to bid adieu to the moon and the firmament, she abandoned without hesitation the pure atmosphere, to plunge into these infernal exhalations. The gait of those impious personages was haughty and determined. As they descended, by the effulgence of the torches, they gazed on each other with mutual admiration, and both appeared so resplendent that they already esteemed themselves spiritual intelligences. The only circumstance that perplexed them was their not arriving at the bottom of the stairs. On hastening their descent, with an ardent impetuosity, they felt their steps accelerated to such a degree, that they seemed not walking, but falling from a precipice. Their progress, however, was at length impeded by a vast portal of ebony, which the Caliph without difficulty recognized. Here the Giaour awaited them, with the key in his hand.

"Ye are welcome!" said he to them, with a ghastly smile, "in spite of Mahomet, and all his dependants. I will now admit you into that palace, where you have so highly merited a place."

Whilst he was uttering these words, he touched the enamelled lock with his key, and the doors at once expanded with a noise still louder than the thunder of mountains, and as suddenly recoiled the moment they had entered.

The Caliph and Nouronihar beheld each other with amazement, at finding themselves in a place which, though roofed with a vaulted ceiling, was so spacious and lofty that at first they took it for an immeasurable plain. But their eyes at length growing familiar to the grandeur of the objects at hand, they extended their view to those at a distance, and discovered rows of columns and arcades, which gradually diminished, till they terminated in a point, radiant as the sun when he darts his last beams athwart the ocean. The pavement, strewed over with gold-dust and saffron, exhaled so subtile an odor as almost overpowered them. They, however, went on, and observed an infinity of censers, in which ambergris and the wood of aloes were continually burning. Between the several columns were placed tables, each spread with a profusion of viands, and wines of every species sparkling in vases of crystal. A throng of Genii and other fantastic spirits, of each sex, danced lasciviously in troops, at the sound of music which issued from beneath.

In the midst of this immense hall a vast multitude was incessantly passing, who severally kept their right hands on their hearts, without once regarding anything around them. They had all the livid paleness of death. Their eyes, deep sunk in their sockets, resembled those phosphoric meteors that glimmer by night in places of interment. Some stalked slowly on, absorbed in profound revery; some, shrieking with agony, ran furiously about, like tigers wounded with poisoned arrows; whilst others, grinding their teeth in rage, foamed along, more frantic than the wildest maniac. They all avoided each other, and though surrounded by a multitude that no one could number, each wandered at random unheedful of the rest, as if alone on a desert which no foot had trodden.

Vathek and Nouronihar, frozen with terror at a sight so baleful, demanded of the Giaour what these appearances might mean, and why these ambulating spectres never withdrew their hands from their hearts.

"Perplex not yourselves," replied he bluntly, "with so much at once; you will soon be acquainted with all; let us haste and present you to Eblis."

They continued their way through the multitude, but, notwithstanding their confidence at first, they were not sufficiently composed to examine with attention the various perspectives of halls, and of galleries, that opened on the right hand and left, which were all illuminated by torches and braziers, whose flames rose in pyramids to the centre of the vault. At length they came to a place where long curtains, brocaded with crimson and gold, fell from all parts in striking confusion. Here the choirs and dances were heard no longer. The light which glimmered came from afar.

After some time Vathek and Nouronihar perceived a gleam brightening through the drapery, and entered a vast tabernacle carpeted with the skins of leopards. An infinity of elders with streaming beards and Afrits in complete armor had prostrated themselves before the ascent of a lofty eminence, on the top of which, upon a globe of fire, sat the formidable Eblis. His person was that of a young man, whose noble and regular features seemed to have been tarnished by malignant vapors. In his large eyes appeared both pride and despair; his flowing hair retained some resemblance to that of an angel of light. In his hand, which thunder had blasted, he swayed the iron sceptre that causes the monster Ouranabad,* the Afrits, and all the powers of the abyss to tremble. At his presence the heart of the Caliph sank within him, and, for the first time, he fell prostrate on his face. Nouronihar, however, though greatly dismayed, could not help admiring the person of Eblis, for she expected to have seen some stupendous giant. Eblis, with a voice more mild than might be imagined, but such as transfused through the soul the deepest melancholy, said:—

"CREATURES OF CLAY, I receive you into mine empire. Ye are numbered amongst my adorers. Enjoy whatever this palace affords, — the treasures of the pre-Adamite sultans, their bickering sabres, and those talismans that compel the Dives to open the subterranean expanses of the mountain of Kaf, which communicate with these. There, insatiable as your curiosity may be, shall you find sufficient to gratify it. You shall possess the exclusive privilege of entering the fortress of Aherman, and the halls of Argenk, where are portrayed all creatures endowed with intelligence, and the various animals that inhabited the earth prior to the creation of that contemptible being whom ye denominate the Father of Mankind."

Vathek and Nouronihar, feeling themselves revived and encouraged by this harangue, eagerly said to the Giaour:—

"Bring us instantly to the place which contains these precious talismans."

"Come," answered this wicked Dive, with his malignant grin; "come, and possess all that my sovereign hath promised, and more."

He then conducted them into a long aisle adjoining the tabernacle, preceding them with hasty steps, and followed by his disciples with the utmost alacrity. They reached at length a hall of great extent, and covered with a lofty dome, around which appeared fifty portals of bronze, secured with as many fastenings of iron. A funereal gloom prevailed over the whole scene. Here, upon two beds of incorruptible cedar, lay recumbent the fleshless forms of the pre-Adamite kings, who had been monarchs of the whole earth. They still possessed enough of life to be conscious of their deplorable condition. Their eyes retained a melancholy motion; they regarded each other with looks of the deepest dejection, each holding his right hand motionless on his heart. At their feet were inscribed the events of their several reigns, their power, their pride, and their crimes. Soliman Raad, Soliman Daki, and Soliman Di Gian Ben Gian, who, after having chained up the Dives in the dark caverns of Kaf, became so presumptuous as to doubt of the Supreme Power, — all these maintained great state, though not to be compared with the eminence of Soliman Ben Daoud.

This king, so renowned for his wisdom, was on the loftiest elevation, and placed immediately under the dome. He appeared to possess more animation than the rest, though from time to time he labored with profound sighs, and, like his companions, kept his right hand on his heart; yet his countenance was more composed, and he seemed to be listening to the sullen roar of a vast cataract, visible in part through the grated portals. This was the only sound that intruded on the silence of these doleful mansions. A range of brazen vases surrounded the elevation.

* This monster is represented as a fierce, flying hydra, and belongs to the same class with the Rakshe, whose ordinary food was serpents and dragons; the Soham, which had the head of a horse, with four eyes, and the body of a flame-colored dragon; the Syl, a basilisk with a face resembling the human, but so tremendous that no mortal could bear to behold it; the Ejder, and others. —See these respective titles in Richardson's Dictionary, Persian, Arabic, and English.

THE HALL OF EBLIS

"Remove the covers from these cabalistic depositaries," said the Giaour to Vathek, "and avail thyself of the talismans, which will break asunder all these gates of bronze, and not only render thee master of the treasures contained within them, but also of the spirits by which they are guarded."

The Caliph, whom this ominous preliminary had entirely disconcerted, approached the vases with faltering footsteps, and was ready to sink with terror when he heard the groans of Soliman. As he proceeded, a voice from the livid lips of the prophet articulated these words: —

"In my lifetime I filled a magnificent throne, having on my right hand twelve thousand seats of gold, where the patriarchs and prophets heard my doctrines; on my left the sages and doctors, upon as many thrones of silver, were present at all my decisions. Whilst I thus administered justice to innumerable multitudes, the birds of the air, librating over me, served as a canopy from the rays of the sun. My people flourished, and my palace rose to the clouds. I erected a temple to the Most High, which was the wonder of the universe; but I basely suffered myself to be seduced by the love of women and a curiosity that could not be restrained by sublunary things. I listened to the counsels of Aherman and the daughter of Pharaoh, and adored fire and the host of heaven. I forsook the holy city, and commanded the Genii to rear the stupendous palace of Istakhar, and the terrace of the watch-towers, each of which was consecrated to a star. There, for a while, I enjoyed myself in the zenith of glory and pleasure. Not only men, but supernatural existences, were subject also to my will. I began to think, as these unhappy monarchs around had already thought, that the vengeance of Heaven was asleep, when at once the thunder burst my structures asunder, and precipitated me hither; where, however, I do not remain, like the other inhabitants, totally destitute of hope, for an angel of light hath revealed that, in consideration of the piety of my early youth, my woes shall come to an end when this cataract shall forever cease to flow. Till then I am in torments, ineffable torments: an unrelenting fire preys on my heart"

Having uttered this exclamation, Soliman raised his hands towards heaven in token of supplication, and the Caliph discerned through his bosom, which was transparent as crystal, his heart enveloped in flames. At a sight so full of horror, Nouronihar fell back like one petrified into the arms of Vathek, who cried out with a convulsive sob: —

"O Giaour! whither hast thou brought us! Allow us to depart, and I will relinquish all thou hast promised. O Mahomet! remains there no more mercy?"

"None! none!" replied the malicious Dive.

"Know, miserable prince, thou art now in the abode of vengeance and despair. Thy heart, also, will be kindled, like those of the other votaries of Eblis. A few days are allotted thee previous to this fatal period; employ them as thou wilt. Recline on these heaps of gold; command the Infernal Potentates; range at thy pleasure through these immense subterranean domains. No barrier shall be shut against thee. As for me, I have fulfilled my mission. I now leave thee to thyself."

At these words he vanished.

The Caliph and Nouronihar remained in the most abject affliction. Their tears unable to flow, scarcely could they support themselves. At length, taking each other despondingly by the hand, they went faltering from this fatal hall, indifferent which way they turned their steps. Every portal opened at their approach. The Dives fell prostrate before them. Every reservoir of riches was disclosed to their view, but they no longer felt the incentives of curiosity, pride, or avarice. With like apathy they heard the chorus of Genii, and saw the stately banquets prepared to regale them. They went wandering on, from chamber to chamber, hall to hall, and gallery to gallery; all without bounds or limit; all distinguishable by the same lowering gloom; all adorned with the same awful grandeur; all traversed by persons in search of repose and consolation, but who sought them in vain, for every one carried within him a heart tormented in flames. Shunned by these various sufferers, who seemed by their looks to be upbraiding the partners of their guilt, they withdrew from them, to wait in direful suspense the moment which should render them to each other the like objects of terror.

"What," exclaimed Nouronihar, "will the time come when I shall snatch my hand from thine!"

"Ah," said Vathek, "and shall my eyes ever cease to drink from thine long draughts of enjoyment! Shall the moments of our reciprocal ecstasies be reflected on with horror! It was not thou that broughtest me hither; the principles by which Carathis perverted my youth have been the sole cause of my perdition!"

Having given vent to these painful expressions, he called to an Afrit, who was stirring up one of the braziers, and bade him fetch the Princess Carathis from the palace of Samarah.

After issuing these orders, the Caliph and Nouronihar continued walking amidst the silent crowd, till they heard voices at the end of the gallery. Presuming them to proceed from some unhappy beings who, like themselves, were awaiting their final doom, they followed the sound, and found it to come from a small square chamber, where they discovered, sitting on sofas, five young men of goodly figure, and a lovely female, who were all holding a melancholy conversation by the glimmering of a lonely lamp. Each had a gloomy and forlorn air, and two of them were embracing each other with great tenderness. On seeing the Caliph and the daughter of Fakreddin enter, they arose, saluted, and gave them place. Then he who had appeared the most considerable of the group, addressed himself thus to Vathek:—

"Strangers! who doubtless are in the same state of suspense as ourselves, as you do not yet bear your hand on your heart, if you are come hither to pass the interval allotted previous to the infliction of our common punishment, condescend to relate the adventures that have brought you to this fatal place; and we in return will acquaint you with ours, which deserve but too well to be heard. We will trace back our crimes to their source, though we are not permitted to repent. This is the only employment suited to wretches like us."

The Caliph and Nouronihar assented to the proposal, and Vathek began, not without tears and lamentations, a sincere recital of every circumstance that had passed. When the afflicting narrative was closed, the young man entered on his own. Each person proceeded in order, and when the fourth prince had reached the midst of his adventures a sudden noise interrupted him, which caused the vault to tremble and to open.

Immediately a cloud descended, which, gradually dissipating, discovered Carathis on the back of an Afrit, who grievously complained of his burden. She, instantly springing to the ground, advanced towards her son, and said:—

"What dost thou here, in this little square chamber? As the Divs are become subject to thy beck, I expected to have found thee on the throne of the pre-Adamite kings."

"Execrable woman!" answered the Caliph, "cursed be the day thou gavest me birth! Go! follow this Afrit; let him conduct thee to the hall of the Prophet Soliman; there thou wilt learn to what these palaces are destined, and how much I ought to abhor the impious knowledge thou hast taught me."

"The height of power to which thou art arrived has certainly turned thy brain," answered Carathis; "but I ask no more than permission to show my respect for the prophet. It is, however, proper thou shouldst know, that, as the Afrit has informed me neither of us shall return to Samarah, I requested his permission to arrange my affairs, and he politely consented. Availing myself, therefore, of the few moments allowed me, I set fire to the tower, and consumed in it the mutes, negresses, and serpents, which have rendered me so much good service; nor should I have been less kind to Morakanabad, had he not prevented me by deserting at last to thy brother. As for Bababalouk, who had the folly to return to Samarah, and all the good brotherhood to provide husbands for thy wives, I undoubtedly would have put them to the torture, could I but have allowed them the time. Being, however, in a hurry, I only hung him, after having caught him in a snare with thy wives; whilst them I buried alive by the help of my negresses, who thus spent their last moments greatly to their satisfaction. With respect to Dilara, who ever stood high in my favor, she hath evinced the greatness of her mind by fixing herself near, in the service of one of the Magi, and, I think, will soon be our own."

Vathek, too much cast down to express the indignation excited by such a discourse, ordered the Afrit to remove Carathis from his presence, and continued immersed in thought, which his companions durst not disturb.

Carathis, however, eagerly entered the dome of Soliman, and, without regarding in the least the groans of the Prophet, undauntedly removed the covers of the vases, and violently seized on the talismans. Then, with a voice more loud than had hitherto been heard in these mansions, she compelled the Dives to disclose to her the most secret treasures, the most profound stores, which the Afrit himself had not seen. She passed by rapid descents known only to Eblis and his most favored Potentates, and thus penetrated the very entrails of the earth, where breathes the Sansar, or icy wind of death. Nothing appalled her dauntless soul. She perceived, however, in all the inmates who bore their hands on their heart, a little singularity not much to her taste. As she was emerging from one of the abysses, Eblis stood forth to her view, but, notwithstanding he displayed the full effulgence of his infernal majesty, she preserved her countenance unaltered, and even paid her compliments with considerable firmness.

This superb monarch thus answered: —

"PRINCESS, whose knowledge and whose crimes have merited a conspicuous rank in my empire, thou doest well to employ the leisure that remains; for the flames and torments which are ready to seize on thy heart will not fail to provide thee with full employment."

He said this, and was lost in the curtains of his tabernacle.

Carathis paused for a moment with surprise, but, resolved to follow the advice of Eblis, she assembled all the choirs of Genii and all the Dives to pay her homage. Thus marched she in triumph through a vapor of perfumes, amidst the acclamations of all the malignant spirits, with most of whom she had formed a previous acquaintance. She even attempted to dethrone one of the Solimans, for the purpose of usurping his place, when a voice, proceeding from the Abyss of Death, proclaimed: —

"ALL IS ACCOMPLISHED!"

Instantaneously the haughty forehead of the intrepid princess became corrugated with agony; she uttered a tremendous yell, and fixed — no more to be withdrawn — her right hand upon her heart, which was become a receptacle of eternal fire.

In this delirium, forgetting all ambitious projects and her thirst for that knowledge which should ever be hidden from mortals, she overturned the offerings of the Genii; and, having execrated the hour she was begotten, and the womb that had borne her, glanced off in a whirl that rendered her invisible, and continued to revolve without intermission.

At almost the same instant, the same voice announced to the Caliph, Nouronihar, the five princes, and the princess, the awful and irrevocable decree. Their hearts immediately took fire, and they at once lost the most precious of the gifts of heaven, — HOPE. These unhappy beings recoiled, with looks of the most furious distraction. Vathek beheld in the eyes of Nouronihar nothing but rage and vengeance; nor could she discern aught in his but aversion and despair. The two princes who were friends, and till that moment had preserved their attachment, shrunk back, gnashing their teeth with mutual and unchangeable hatred. Kalilah and his sister made reciprocal gestures of imprecation; whilst the two other princes testified their horror for each other by the most ghastly convulsions, and screams that could not be smothered. All severally plunged themselves into the accursed multitude, there to wander in an eternity of unabating anguish.

Such was, and such should be, the punishment of unrestrained passions and atrocious actions. Such is, and such should be, the chastisement of blind ambition, that would transgress those bounds which the Creator hath prescribed to human knowledge, and by aiming at discoveries reserved for pure intelligence, acquire that infatuated pride which perceives not the condition appointed to man is, TO BE IGNORANT AND HUMBLE.

Thus the CALIPH VATHEK who, for the sake of empty pomp and forbidden power, hath sullied himself with a thousand crimes, became a prey to grief without end and remorse without mitigation; whilst the humble and despised GULCHENROUZ passed whole ages in undisturbed tranquillity and the pure happiness of childhood.

INTRODUCTION.

No better Introduction to this charming tale can be given than by quoting a few thoughts from the pen of the Rev. Thomas Tracy, whose admirable English translation is the one here presented to our readers. He says:—

"Undine is a beautifully imaginative tale, a masterpiece in this department of German literature. With a simplicity of the antique cast it combines the most picturesque wildness, unbroken interest, excellent principles, a peculiar vein of pleasantry, and even what we seldom look for in works of this kind, touches of genuine pathos. We are esteemed, and I presume justly, a less imaginative race than the people of Germany. Our traditions, local superstitions, early influences, education, habits of thought, and other circumstances of life, are of a more commonplace order than theirs. We are not, it may be, less fond of legendary lore, since love of the marvellous seems to be a universal impulse in our nature; but we seek its enjoyment with the mere calm approval of fancy, while they welcome it with much of the warmth of good faith. Still, if 'the World of Reality, not the Fairyland of Romance,' be our maxim, the spirit of truth and tenderness is nowhere wholly extinct: long as it may lie slumbering in the soul, it is too inseparable a part of our being ever to die. Is not imagination a germ of immortality?

"I am gratified to perceive that many writers allude to this fiction in terms of warm commendation. Menzel, in his development of German Literature, of which we have lately been favored with an able translation, speaks of this and the 'Vial-Genie,' or 'Mandrake,' another miniature romance by the same author, in these words: 'Fouqué's "Undine" will always continue one of the most delightful creations of German poetry. Also the little story of the "Mandrake" belongs to the best elaborations of the old national sagas,' or tales of the supernatural, derived from the voice of traditional superstition. But the most accurate appreciation that I have seen of 'Undine' I find among those golden fragments of the richest of minds, the Specimens of the Table Talk of S. T. Coleridge. This is the passage to which I refer: '"Undine" is a most exquisite work. It shows the general want of any sense for the fine and the subtle in the public taste, that this romance made no deep impression. Undine's character, before she receives a soul, is marvellously beautiful.'

"The author to whom we are so much indebted for these Specimens and other Literary Remains, and to whom we had hoped, alas! to be more and more indebted as well for these labors of love as for those of his own classical genius, observes in a note: 'Mr. Coleridge's admiration of this little romance was unbounded. He said there was something in "Undine" even beyond Scott, — that Scott's best characters and conceptions were composed; by which I understood him to mean that "Baillie Nicol Jarvie," for example, was made up of old particulars, and received its individuality from the author's power of fusion, being in the result an admirable product, as Corinthian brass was said to be the conflux of the spoils of a city. But "Undine," he said, was one and single in projection, and had presented to his imagination what Scott had never done, an absolutely new idea.'

"The reader will allow me to observe, in closing these brief notices, that, supported as well by my own feeling as by the judgment of Menzel, Coleridge, and, I may add, by the general voice of criticism, I view 'Undine' not only as a work of art, but as something far superior, — an exquisite creation of genius. If I have failed to do justice to her peculiar traits, in thus introducing her to him in the costume of our language, it is not owing to want of admiration, or of studiously endeavoring to be faithful to my trust; and, aware of the difficulty of presenting her the 'vision of beauty' that Fouqué 'found' her, he will forgive the fond impulse of my ambition. What welcome she may receive among us it remains for the noble knights and lovely ladies of our country to show. She does not come as a stranger, — she has already been more than once greeted with favor; still, wide as may be her fame in the world of letters, she seems, as yet, to be more talked of in the world of common readers than, if I may so speak, known in person. To all lovers of the imaginative, therefore, — to every 'simple, affectionate, and wonder-loving heart,' — her fortunes are again committed."

Friedrich Heinrich Karl de la Motte, Baron Fouqué, was born on the 12th February, 1777, and died 23d October, 1843. He was twice in arms in defence of his country, in early youth, and again, "with the Lyre and the Sword," in the war against Napoleon. He was wounded at Culm, and present at Leipzig. His grandfather was the intimate of the great Frederic, attained the rank of general, and fought in the Seven Years' War. He himself found military pursuits too severe for his health, which was not sturdy, and, resigning his commission, he devoted himself ardently to literature, soon becoming a great favorite with the admirers of the romantic and poetic school of fiction. The best of his tales are "Undine," "Sintram and his Companions," "Aslauga's Knight," and "Thiodolf the Icelander," — all breathing a spirit of enthusiasm for the ideal mediæval Christian chivalry, and for the wild myths and sagas of the Norsemen, — as, indeed, do every one of his works.

DEDICATION.

VISION of beauty, dear Undine,
Since led by storied light,
I found you, mystic sprite,
How soothing to my heart your voice has been!

You press beside me, angel mild,
Soft breathing all your woes,
And winning brief repose, —
A wayward, tender, timid child.

Still my guitar has caught the tone,
And from its gate of gold
Your whispered sorrows rolled,
Till through the world their sound is flown.

And many hearts your sweetness love,
Though strange your freaks and state,
And while I sing your fate,
The wild and wondrous tale approve.

Now would they warmly, one and all,
Your fortunes trace anew:
Then, sweet, your way pursue,
And, fearless, enter bower and hall.

Greet noble knights with homage due;
But greet, all trusting there,
The lovely German fair:
"Welcome," they cry, "the maiden true!"

And if toward ME one dart a glance,
Say, "He's a loyal knight,
Who serves you, ladies bright, —
Guitar and sword, — at tourney, feast, and dance."

UNDINE.

CHAPTER I.

HOW A KNIGHT CAME TO A FISHERMAN'S COTTAGE.

ONCE on a beautiful evening, it may now be many hundred years ago, there was a worthy old fisherman who sat before his door mending his nets.

Now the corner of the world where he dwelt was exceedingly picturesque. The green turf on which he had built his cottage ran far out into a great lake; and this slip of verdure appeared to stretch into it as much through love of its clear waters, blue and bright, as the lake, moved by a like impulse, strove to fold the meadow, with its waving grass and flowers, and the cooling shade of the trees, in its fond embrace. Such were the freshness and beauty of both, that they seemed to be drawn toward each other, and the one to be visiting the other as a guest.

With respect to human beings, indeed, in this pleasant spot, excepting the fisherman and his family, there were few or rather none to be met with. For, in the background of the scene, toward the west and northwest, lay a forest of extraordinary wildness, which, owing to its gloom and its being almost impassable, as well as to fear of the strange creatures and visionary forms to be encountered there, most people avoided entering, unless in cases of extreme necessity. The pious old fisherman, however, many times passed through it without harm, when he carried the fine fish, which he caught by his beautiful strip of land, to a great city lying only a short distance beyond the extensive forest.

Now the reason he was able to go through this wood with so much ease may have been chiefly this, because he entertained scarcely any thoughts but such as were of a religious nature; and, besides, every time he crossed the evil-reported shades, he used to sing some holy song with a clear voice and from a sincere heart.

Well, while he sat by his nets this evening, neither fearing nor devising evil, a sudden terror seized him, as he heard a rushing in the darkness of the wood, that resembled the trampling of a mounted steed, and the noise continued every instant drawing nearer and nearer to his little territory.

What he had dreamed in his reveries, when abroad in many a stormy night, respecting the mysteries of the forest, now flashed through his mind in a moment, especially the figure of a man of gigantic stature and snow-white appearance, who kept nodding his head in a portentous manner. Yet, when he raised his eyes toward the wood, the form came before him in perfect distinctness, as he saw the nodding man burst forth from the mazy web-work of leaves and branches. But he immediately felt emboldened when he reflected that nothing to give him alarm had ever befallen him even in the forest; and moreover, that on this open neck of land the evil spirit, it was likely, would be still less daring in the exercise of its power. At the same time he prayed aloud with the most earnest sincerity of devotion, repeating a passage of the Bible. This inspired him with fresh courage; and soon perceiving the illusion, the strange mistake into which his imagination had betrayed him, he could with difficulty refrain from laughing. The white, nodding figure he had seen became transformed in the twinkling of an eye to what in reality it was, a small brook long and familiarly known to him, which ran foaming from the forest, and discharged itself into the lake.

But what had caused the startling sound was a knight arrayed in sumptuous apparel, who, beneath the shadows of the trees, came riding toward the cottage. His doublet was of dark violet, embroidered with gold, and his scarlet cloak hung gracefully over it; on his cap of burnished gold waved red and violet plumes, and in his golden shoulder-belt flashed a sword, richly ornamented and extremely beautiful. The white barb that bore the knight was more slenderly built than war-horses usually are; and he touched the turf with a step so light and elastic that the green and flower-woven carpet seemed hardly to receive the slightest break from his tread The old fisherman, notwithstanding, did not feel perfectly secure in his mind, although he was forced to believe that no evil could be feared from an appearance so prepossessing; and, therefore, as good manners dictated, he took off his hat on the knight's coming near, and quietly remained by the side of his nets.

When the stranger stopped and asked whether he with his horse could have shelter and entertainment there for the night, the fisherman returned answer: "As to your horse, fair sir, I have no better stable for him than this shady meadow, and no better provender than the grass that is growing here. But with respect to yourself, you shall be welcome to our humble cottage, and to the best supper and lodging we are able to give you."

The knight was well contented with this reception, and alighting from his horse, which his host assisted him to relieve from saddle and bridle, he let him hasten away to the fresh pasture, and thus spoke: "Even had I found you less hospitable and kindly disposed, my worthy old friend, you would still, I suspect, hardly have got rid of me to-day; for here, I perceive, a broad lake lies before us, and as to riding back into that wood of wonders, with the shades of evening deepening around me, may Heaven in its grace preserve me from the thought!"

"Pray, not a word of the wood, or of returning into it!" said the fisherman, and took his guest into the cottage.

There, beside the hearth, from which a frugal fire was diffusing its light through the clean, dusky room, sat the fisherman's aged wife in a great chair. At the entrance of their noble guest, she rose and gave him a courteous welcome, but sat down again in her seat of honor, not making the slightest offer of it to the stranger. Upon this the fisherman said with a smile:—

"You must not be offended with her, young gentleman, because she has not given up to you the best chair in the house; it is a custom among poor people to look upon this as the privilege of the aged."

"Why, husband!" cried the old lady, with a quiet smile, "where can your wits be wandering? Our guest, to say the least of him, must belong to a Christian country, and how is it possible, then, that so well-bred a young man as he appears to be could dream of driving old people from their chairs? Take a seat, my young master," continued she, turning to the knight; "there is still quite a snug little chair across the room there, only be careful not to shove it about too roughly, for one of its legs, I fear, is none of the firmest."

The knight brought up the seat as carefully as she could desire, and good-humoredly sat down upon it; while it seemed to him for a moment that he must be somehow related to this little household, and have just returned home from abroad.

These three worthy people now began to converse in the most friendly and familiar manner. In relation to the forest, indeed, concerning which the knight occasionally made some inquiries, the old man chose to know but little; at any rate he was of opinion that, slightly touching upon it, at this hour of twilight, was most suitable and safe; but of the cares and comforts of their home and their business abroad the aged couple spoke more freely, and listened also with eager curiosity, as the knight recounted to them his travels, and how he had a castle near one of the sources of the Danube, and that his name was Sir Huldbrand of Ringstetten.

Already had the stranger, while they were in the midst of their talk, been aware at times of a splash against the little low window, as if some one were dashing water against it. The old man, every time he heard the noise, knit his brows with vexation; but at last, when the whole sweep of a shower came pouring like a torrent against the panes, and bubbling through the decayed frame into the room, he started up indignant, rushed to the window, and cried with a threatening voice: —

"Undine! will you never leave off these fooleries? not even to-day, when we have a stranger-knight with us in the cottage?"

All without now became still, only a low titter was just perceptible, and the fisherman said, as he came back to his seat: "You will have the goodness, my honored guest, to pardon this freak, and it may be a multitude more, but she has no thought of evil or anything improper. This mischievous Undine, to confess the truth, is our adopted daughter, and she stoutly refuses to give over this frolicsome childishness of hers, although she has already entered her eighteenth year. But in spite of this, as I said before, she is at heart one of the very best children in the world."

"You may say so," broke in the old lady, shaking her head, — "you can give a better account of her than I can. When you return home from fishing, or from selling your fish in the city, you may think her frolics very delightful. But to have her figuring about you the whole day long, and never, from morning to night, to hear her speak one word of sense; and then, as she grows older, instead of having any help from her in the family, to find her a continual cause of anxiety lest her wild humors should completely ruin us, — that is quite a different affair, and enough at last to weary out the patience even of a saint."

"Well, well," replied the master of the house, with a smile, "you have your trials with Undine, and I have mine with the lake. The lake often beats down my dams, and breaks the meshes of my nets, but for all that I have a strong affection for it; and so have you, in spite of your mighty crosses and vexations, for our nice pretty little child. Is it not true?"

"One cannot be very angry with her," answered the old lady, as she gave her husband an approving smile.

That instant the door flew open, and a girl of slender form, almost a very miniature of woman, her hair flaxen and her complexion fair, in one word, a blond-like miracle of beauty, slipped laughing in, and said: "You have only been making a mock of me, father; for where now is the guest you mentioned?"

The same moment, however, she perceived the knight also, and continued standing before the comely young man in fixed astonishment. Huldbrand was charmed with her graceful figure, and viewed her lovely features with the more intense interest, as he imagined it was only her surprise that permitted him to have the opportunity, and that she would soon turn away from his gaze with increased bashfulness. But the event was the very reverse of what he expected. For after now regarding him quite a long while, she felt more confidence, moved nearer, knelt down before him, and, while she played with a gold medal, which he wore attached to a rich chain on his breast, exclaimed —

"Why, you beautiful, you friendly guest! how have you reached our poor cottage at last? Have you been obliged, for years and years, to wander about the world, before you could catch one glimpse of our nook? Do you come out of that wild forest, my lovely friend?"

The old woman was so prompt in her reproof as to allow him no time to answer. She commanded the maiden to rise, show better manners, and go to her work. But Undine, without making any reply, drew a little footstool near Huldbrand's chair, sat down upon it with her netting, and said in a gentle tone: "I will work here."

The old man did as parents are apt to do with children to whom they have been over-indulgent. He affected to observe nothing of Undine's strange behavior, and was beginning to talk about something else. But this was what the little girl would not suffer him to do. She broke in upon him: "I have asked our kind guest from whence he has come among us, and he has not yet answered me."

"I come out of the forest, you lovely little vision," Huldbrand returned, and she spoke again: —

"You must also tell me how you came to enter that forest, so feared and shunned, and the marvellous adventures you met with there; for there is no escaping, I guess, without something of this kind."

Huldbrand felt a slight shudder, on remembering what he had witnessed, and looked involuntarily toward the window; for it seemed to him that one of the strange shapes which had come upon him in the forest must be there grinning in through the glass; but he discerned nothing except the deep darkness of night, which had now enveloped the whole prospect. Upon this he became more collected, and was just on the point of beginning his account, when the old man thus interrupted him: —

"Not so, Sir Knight; this is by no means a fit hour for such relations."

But Undine, in a state of high excitement, sprang up from her little cricket, braced her beautiful arms against her sides, and cried, placing herself directly before the fisherman, "He shall not tell his story, father? he shall not? But it is my will: — he shall! — he shall, stop him who may!"

Thus speaking, she stamped her neat little foot vehemently on the floor, but all with an air of such comic and good-humored simplicity that Huldbrand now found it quite as hard to withdraw his gaze from her wild emotion as he had before from her gentleness and beauty. The old man, on the contrary, burst out in unrestrained displeasure. He severely reproved Undine for her disobedience and her unbecoming carriage toward the stranger, and his good old wife joined him in harping on the same string.

By these rebukes Undine was only excited the more. "If you want to quarrel with me," she cried, "and will not let me hear what I so much desire, then sleep alone in your smoky old hut!" And swift as an arrow she shot from the door, and vanished amid the darkness of the night.

CHAPTER II.

IN WHAT MANNER UNDINE HAD COME TO THE FISHERMAN.

HULDBRAND and the fisherman sprang from their seats, and were rushing to stop the angry girl; but before they could reach the cottage door, she had disappeared in the cloudlike obscurity without, and no sound, not so much even as that of her light footstep, betrayed the course she had taken. Huldbrand threw a glance of inquiry toward his host; it almost seemed to him as if his whole interview with a sweet apparition, which had so suddenly plunged again amid the night, were no other than a continuation of the wonderful forms that had just played their mad pranks with him in the forest; but the old man muttered between his teeth: —

"This is not the first time she has treated us in this manner. Now must our hearts be filled with anxiety, and our eyes find no sleep, the livelong night; for who can assure us, in spite of her past escapes, that she will not some time or other come to harm, if she thus continue out in the dark and alone until daylight?"

"Then pray, for God's sake, father, let us follow her," cried Huldbrand, anxiously.

"Wherefore should we?" replied the old man; "it would be a sin, were I to suffer you, all alone, to search after the foolish girl amid the lonesomeness of night; and my old limbs would fail to carry me to this wild rover, even if I knew to what place she has hurried off."

"Still we ought at least to call after her, and beg her to return," said Huldbrand; and he began to call in tones of earnest entreaty: "Undine! Undine! come back, pray come back!"

The old man shook his head, and said: "All your shouting, however loud and long, will be of no avail; you know not as yet, Sir Knight, what a self-willed thing the little wilding is." But still, even hoping against hope, he could not himself cease calling out every minute, amid the gloom of night: "Undine! ah, dear Undine! I beseech you, pray come back, — only this once."

It turned out, however, exactly as the fisherman had said. No Undine could they hear or see; and as the old man would on no account consent that Huldbrand should go in quest of the fugitive, they were both obliged at last to return into the cottage. There they found the fire on the hearth almost gone out, and the mistress of the house, who took Undine's flight and danger far less to heart than her husband, had already gone to rest. The old man blew up the coals, put on dry wood, and by means of the renewed flame hunted for a jug of wine, which he brought and set between himself and his guest.

"You, Sir Knight, as well as I," said he, "are anxious on the silly girl's account, and it would be better, I think, to spend part of the night in chatting and drinking, than keep turning and turning on our rush-mats, and trying in vain to sleep. What is your opinion?"

Huldbrand was well pleased with the plan; the fisherman pressed him to take the vacant seat of honor, its worthy occupant having now left it for her couch; and they relished their beverage and enjoyed their chat, as two such good men and true ever ought to do. To be sure, whenever the slightest thing moved before the windows, or at times when just nothing at all was moving, one of them would look up and exclaim, "There she comes!" Then would they continue silent a few moments, and afterward, when nothing appeared, would shake their heads, breathe out a sigh, and go on with their talk.

But as they could neither of them think of anything except Undine, the best plan they could devise was that the old fisherman should relate, and the knight should hear, in what manner Undine had come to the cottage. So the fisherman began as follows: —

"It is now about fifteen years since I one day crossed the wild forest with fish for the city market. My wife had remained at home, as she was wont to do, and at this time for a reason of more than common interest; for, although we were beginning to feel the advances of age, God had bestowed upon us an infant of wonderful beauty. It was a little girl, and we already began to ask ourselves the question whether we ought not, for the advantage of the new-comer, to quit our solitude, and, the better to bring up this precious gift of Heaven, to remove to some more inhabited place. Poor people, to be sure, cannot in these cases do all you may think they ought, Sir Knight; but still, gracious God! we must all do as much for our children as we possibly can.

"Well, I went on my way, and this affair would keep running in my head. This tongue of land was most dear to me, and I shrunk from the thought of leaving it, when, amidst the bustle and brawls of the city, I was obliged to reflect in this manner by myself: 'In a scene of tumult like this, or at least in one not much more quiet, I too must soon take up my abode.' But, in spite of these feelings, I was far from murmuring against the kind providence of God; on the contrary, when I received this new blessing, my heart breathed a prayer of thankfulness too deep for words to express. I should also speak an untruth, were I to say that anything befell me, either on my passage through the forest to the city, or on my returning homeward, that gave me more alarm than usual, as at that time I had never seen any appearance there which could terrify or annoy me. The Lord was ever with me in those awful shades."

Thus speaking, he took his cap reverently from his bald head, and continued to sit for a considerable time in devout thought. He then covered himself again, and went on with his relation: —

"On this side the forest, alas! it was on this side that woe burst upon me. My wife came wildly to meet me, clad in mourning apparel, and her eyes streaming with tears. 'Gracious God!' I cried, with a groan; 'where's our child? Speak!'

"'With the Being on whom you have called, dear husband,' she answered; and we now entered the cottage together, weeping in silence. I looked for the little corse, almost fearing to find what I was seeking; and then it was I first learnt how all had happened.

"My wife had taken the little one in her arms, and walked out to the shore of the lake. She there sat down by its very brink; and while she was playing with the infant, as free from all fear as she was full of delight, it bent forward on a sudden, as if seeing something very beautiful in the water. My wife saw her laugh, the dear angel, and try to catch the image in her little hands; but in a moment, with a motion swifter than sight, she sprung from her mother's arms, and sunk in the lake, the watery glass into which she had been gazing. I searched for our lost darling again and again, but it was all in vain; I could nowhere find the least trace of her.

"Well, we were again childless parents, and were now, on the same evening, sitting together by our cottage hearth. We had no desire to talk, even if our tears would have permitted us. As we thus sat in mournful stillness, gazing into the fire, all at once we heard something without, — a slight rustling at the door. The door flew open, and we saw a little girl, three or four years old, and more beautiful than I am able to tell you, standing on the threshold, richly dressed and smiling upon us. We were struck dumb with astonishment, and I knew not for a time whether the tiny form were a real human being or a mere mockery of enchantment. But I soon perceived water dripping from her golden hair and rich garments, and that the pretty child had been lying in the water, and stood in immediate need of our help.

"'Wife,' said I, 'no one has been able to save our child for us; still we doubtless ought to do for others what would make ourselves the happiest parents on earth, could any one do us the same kindness.'

"We undressed the little thing, put her to bed, and gave her something warming to drink; at all this she spoke not a word, but only turned her eyes upon us, — eyes blue and bright as sea or sky, — and continued looking at us with a smile.

"Next morning we had no reason to fear that she had received any other harm than her wetting, and I now asked her about her parents, and how she could have come to us But the account she gave was both confused and incredible. She must surely have been born far from here, not only because I have been unable for these fifteen years to learn anything of her birth, but because she then said, and at times continues to say, many things of so very singular a nature that we neither of us know, after all, whether she may not have dropped among us from the moon. Then her talk runs upon golden castles, crystal domes, and Heaven knows what extravagances beside. What of her story, however, she related with most distinctness, was this: that while she was once taking a sail with her mother on the great lake, she fell out of the boat into the water; and that when she first recovered her senses, she was here under our trees, where the gay scenes of the shore filled her with delight.

"We now had another care weighing upon our minds, and one that caused us no small perplexity and uneasiness. We of course very soon determined to keep and bring up the child we had found in place of our own darling that had been drowned: but who could tell us whether she had been baptized or not? She herself could give us no light on the subject. When we asked her the question, she commonly made answer that she well knew she was created for God's praise and glory, and that as to what might promote the praise and glory of God, she was willing to let us determine.

"My wife and I reasoned in this way: 'If she has not been baptized, there can be no use in putting off the ceremony; and if she has been, it is more dangerous to have too little of a good thing than too much.'

"Taking this view of our difficulty, we now endeavored to hit upon a good name for the child, since while she remained without one we were often at a loss in our familiar talk to know what to call her. We at length decided that Dorothea would be most suitable for her, as I had somewhere heard it said that this name signified a Gift of God; and surely she had been sent to us by Providence as a gift to comfort us in our misery. She, on the contrary, would not so much as hear Dorothea mentioned; she insisted that, as she had been named Undine by her parents, Undine she ought still to be called.

It now occurred to me, that this was a heathenish name, to be found in no calendar, and I resolved to ask the advice of a priest in the city. He, too, would hear nothing of the name Undine; and yielding to my urgent request, he came with me through the enchanted forest, in order to perform the rite of baptism here in my cottage.

"The little maid stood before us so smart in her finery, and with so winning an air of gracefulness, that the heart of the priest softened at once in her presence; and she had a way of coaxing him so adroitly, and even of braving him at times with so merry a queerness, that he at last remembered nothing of his many objections to the name of Undine.

"Thus, then, was she baptized Undine; and during the holy ceremony she behaved with great propriety and gentleness, wild and wayward as at other times she invariably was. For in this my wife was quite right, when she mentioned what care and anxiety the child has occasioned us. If I should relate to you —"

At this moment the knight interrupted the fisherman, with a view to direct his attention to a deep sound, as of a rushing flood, which had caught his ear, within a few minutes, between the words of the old man. And now the waters came pouring on with redoubled fury before the cottage windows. Both sprang to the door. There they saw, by the light of the now risen moon, the brook which issued from the wood rushing wildly over its banks, and whirling onward with it both stones and branches of trees in its rapid course. The storm, as if awakened by the uproar, burst forth from the clouds, whose immense masses of vapor coursed over the moon with the swiftness of thought; the lake roared beneath the wind, that swept the foam from its waves; while the trees of this narrow peninsula groaned from root to topmost branch, as they bowed and swung above the torrent.

"Undine! in God's name, Undine!" cried the two men in an agony. No answer was returned, and now, regardless of everything else, they hurried from the cottage, one in this direction, the other in that, searching and calling.

CHAPTER III.

HOW THEY FOUND UNDINE AGAIN.

THE longer Huldbrand sought Undine beneath the shades of night, and failed to find her, the more anxious and confused he became The impression that she was a mere phantom of the forest gained a new ascendency over him; indeed, amid the howling of the waves and the tempest, the crashing of the trees, and so entire a change of the scene that it bore no resemblance to its former calm beauty, he was tempted to view the whole peninsula, together with the cottage and its inhabitants, as little more than some mockery of his senses; but still he heard afar off the fisherman's anxious and incessant shouting, "UNDINE! UNDINE!" and also his aged wife, who, with a loud voice and a strong feeling of awe, was praying and chanting hymns amid the commotion.

At length, when he drew near to the brook which had overflowed its banks, he perceived by the moonlight that it had taken its wild course directly in front of the haunted forest, so as to change the peninsula into an island.

"Merciful God!" he breathed to himself, "if Undine has ventured one step within that fearful wood, what will become of her? Perhaps it was all owing to her sportive and wayward spirit, because I could give her no account of my adventures there. And now the stream is rolling between us, she may be weeping alone on the other side in the midst of spectral horrors!"

A shuddering groan escaped him, and clambering over some stones and trunks of overthrown pines, in order to step into the impetuous current, he resolved, either by wading or swimming, to seek the wanderer on the further shore. He felt, it is true, all the dread and shrinking awe creeping over him which he had already suffered by daylight among the now tossing and roaring branches of the forest. More than all, a tall man in white, whom he knew but too well, met his view, as he stood grinning and nodding on the grass beyond the water; but even monstrous forms, like this, only impelled him to cross over toward them, when the thought rushed upon him that Undine might be there alone, and in the agony of death.

He had already grasped a stout branch of a pine, and stood supporting himself upon it in the whirling current, against which he could with difficulty keep himself erect; but he advanced deeper in, with a courageous spirit. That instant a gentle voice of warning cried near him: "Do not venture, do not venture! — that OLD MAN, the STREAM, is too full of tricks to be trusted!" — He knew the soft tones of the voice; and while he stood as it were entranced, beneath the shadows which now duskily veiled the moon, his head swum with the swell and rolling of the waves, as he every moment saw them foaming and dashing above his knee. Still he disdained the thought of giving up his purpose.

"If you are not really there, if you are merely gambolling round me like a mist, may I too bid farewell to life, and become a shadow like you, dear, dear Undine!"*

* This intensive form of expression is almost as familiar in English as in German, and I have not scrupled occasionally to employ it. The following example from "Thalaba" is one of the most impressive in the language —

"No sound but the wild, wild wind,
And the snow crunching under his feet."

These lines from the "Ancient Mariner" afford

Thus calling aloud, he again moved deeper into the stream. "Look round you, — ah, pray look round you, beautiful young stranger! why rush on death so madly!" cried the voice a second time close by him; and looking on one side, as the moon by glimpses unveiled its light, he perceived a little island formed by the flood, and, reclined upon its flowery turf beneath the high branches of embowering trees, he saw the smiling and lovely Undine.

O, with what a thrill of delight, compared with the suspense and pause of a moment before, the young man now plied his sturdy staff! A few steps freed him from the flood that was rushing between himself and the maiden, and he stood near her on the little spot of greensward, in secret security, covered by the primeval trees that rustled above them. Undine had partially risen within her tent of verdure, and she now threw her arms around his neck, so that she gently drew him down upon the soft seat by her side.

"Here you shall tell me your story, my handsome friend," she breathed in a low whisper; "here the cross old people cannot disturb us. And, besides, our roof of leaves here will make quite as good a shelter, it may be, as their poor cottage.

"It is heaven itself," cried Huldbrand; and folding her in his arms, he kissed the lovely and affectionate girl with fervor.

The old fisherman, meantime, had come to the margin of the stream, and he shouted across to the young lovers: "Why, how is this, Sir Knight! I received you with the welcome which one true-hearted man gives to another, and now you sit there caressing my foster-child in secret, while you suffer me in my anxiety to go roaming through the night in quest of her."

"Not till this moment did I find her myself, old father," cried the knight across the water.

"So much the better," said the fisherman; "but now make haste and bring her over to me upon firm ground."

To this, however, Undine would by no means consent. She declared that she would rather enter the wild forest itself, with the beautiful stranger, than return to the cottage where she was so thwarted in her wishes, and from which the handsome knight would soon or late go away. Then closely embracing Huldbrand, she sung the following verse with the warbling sweetness of a bird: —

"A Rill would leave its misty vale,
And fortunes wild explore;
Weary at length it reached the main,
And sought its vale no more."

The old fisherman wept bitterly at her song, but his emotion seemed to awaken little or no sympathy in her. She kissed and caressed her new friend, whom she called her darling, and who at last said to her: "Undine, if the distress of the old man does not touch your heart, it cannot but move mine. We ought to return to him."

She opened her large blue eyes upon him in perfect amazement, and spoke at last with a slow and lingering accent: "If you think so, — it is well; all is right to me which you think right. But the old man over there must first give me his promise that he will allow you, without objection, to relate what you saw in the wood, and — Well, other things will settle themselves."*

"Come, do only come!" cried the fisherman to her, unable to utter another word. At the same time he stretched his arms wide over the current toward her, and, to give her assurance that he would do what she required, nodded his head; this motion caused his white hair to fall strangely over his face, and Huldbrand could not but remember the nodding white man of the forest. Without allowing anything, however, to produce in him the least confusion, the young knight took the beautiful girl in his arms, and bore her across the narrow channel, which the stream had torn away between her little island and the solid shore. The old man fell upon Undine's neck, and found it impossible either to express his joy or to kiss her enough; even the ancient dame came up and embraced the recovered girl most cordially. Every word of censure was carefully avoided; the more so, indeed, as even Undine, forgetting her waywardness, another example, and one still more remarkable: —

"Alone, alone, all, all alone, Alone on a wide, wide sea."

* "Undine evidently meant to have added another condition, but then, thinking it superfluous, only remarks, 'Well, other things will settle themselves.'" almost overwhelmed her foster-parents with caresses and the prattle of tenderness.

THE KNIGHT BRINGS UNDINE FROM THE FOREST.

When at length the excess of their joy at recovering their child had subsided, and they seemed to have come to themselves, morning had already dawned, opening to view and brightening the waters of the lake. The tempest had become hushed, and small birds sung merrily on the moist branches.

As Undine now insisted upon hearing the recital of the knight's promised adventures, the aged couple, smiling with good-humor, yielded to her wish. Breakfast was brought out beneath the trees which stood behind the cottage toward the lake on the north, and they sat down to it with delighted hearts, — Undine lower than the rest (since she would by no means allow it to be otherwise), at the knight's feet on the grass. These arrangements being made, Huldbrand began his story in the following manner.

CHAPTER IV.

OF WHAT HAD HAPPENED TO THE KNIGHT IN THE FOREST.

"It is now about eight days since I rode into the free imperial city which lies yonder on the farther side of the forest. Soon after my arrival a splendid tournament and running at the ring took place there, and I spared neither my horse nor my lance in the encounters.

"Once, while I was pausing at the lists to rest from the brisk exercise, and was handing back my helmet to one of my attendants, a female figure of extraordinary beauty caught my attention, as, most magnificently attired, she stood looking on at one of the balconies. I learnt, on making inquiry of a person near me, that the name of the gay young lady was Bertalda, and that she was a foster-daughter of one of the powerful dukes of this country. She, too, I observed, was gazing at me, and the consequences were such as we young knights are wont to experience; whatever success in riding I might have had before, I was now favored with still better fortune. That evening I was Bertalda's partner in the dance, and I enjoyed the same distinction during the remainder of the festival."

A sharp pain in his left hand, as it hung carelessly beside him, here interrupted Huldbrand's relation, and drew his eye to the part affected. Undine had fastened her pearly teeth, and not without some keenness, too, upon one of his fingers, appearing at the same time very gloomy and displeased. On a sudden, however, she looked up in his eyes with an expression of tender melancholy, and whispered, almost inaudibly, "You blame me, but it was all your own fault." *

She then covered her face, and the knight, strangely embarrassed and thoughtful, went on with his story.

"This lady, Bertalda, of whom I spoke, is of a proud and wayward spirit. The second day I saw her she pleased me by no means so much as she had the first, and the third day still less. But I continued about her, because she showed me more favor than she did any other knight; and it so happened that I playfully asked her to give me one of her gloves.

"'When you have entered the haunted forest all alone,' said she; 'when you have explored its wonders, and brought me a full account of them, the glove is yours.'

"As to getting her glove, it was of no importance to me whatever; but the word had been spoken, and no honorable knight would permit himself to be urged to such a proof of valor a second time."

"I thought," said Undine, interrupting him, "that she loved you."

"It did appear so," replied Huldbrand.

"Well!" exclaimed the maiden, laughing, "this is beyond belief; she must be very stupid and heartless. To drive from her one who was dear to her! And, worse than all, into that ill-omened wood! The wood and its mysteries, for all I should have cared, might have waited a long while."

"Yesterday morning, then," pursued the knight, smiling brightly upon Undine, "I set out from the city, my enterprise before me. The early light lay rich upon the verdant turf. It shone so rosy on the slender boles of the trees, and there was so merry a whispering among the leaves, that in my heart I could not but laugh at people who feared meeting anything to terrify them in a spot so delicious. 'I shall soon trot through the forest, and as speedily return,' I said to myself, in the overflow of joyous feeling; and ere I was well aware, I had entered deep among the green shades, while of the plain that lay behind me I was no more able to catch a glimpse.

"Then the conviction for the first time impressed me, that in a forest of so great extent I might very easily become bewildered, and that this, perhaps, might be the only danger which was likely to threaten those who explored its recesses. So I made a halt, and turned myself in the direction of the sun, which had meantime risen somewhat higher; and while I was looking up to observe it, I saw something black among the boughs of a lofty oak. My first thought was, 'It is a bear!' and I grasped my weapon of defence; the object then accosted me from above in a human voice, but in a tone most harsh and hideous: 'If I, overhead here, do not gnaw off these dry branches, Sir Wiseacre, what shall we have to roast you with when midnight comes?' And with that it grinned, and made such a rattling with the branches that my courser became mad with affright, and rushed furiously forward with me before I had time to see distinctly what sort of a devil's beast it was."

"You must not name it," said the old fisherman, crossing himself; his wife did the same, without speaking a word; and Undine, while her eye sparkled with glee, looked at her beloved knight, and said: "The best of the story is, however, that as yet they have not actually roasted you. But pray make haste, my handsome young friend. I long to hear more."

The knight then went on with his adventures: "My horse was so wild that he well-nigh rushed with me against limbs and trunks of trees. He was dripping with sweat, through terror, heat, and the violent straining of his muscles. Still he refused to slacken his career. At last, altogether beyond my control, he took his course directly up a stony steep, when suddenly a tall white man flashed before me, and threw himself athwart the way my mad steed was taking. At this apparition he shuddered with new affright, and stopped, trembling. I took this chance of recovering my command of him, and now, for the first time, perceived that my deliverer, so far from being a white MAN, was only a brook of silver brightness, foaming near me in its descent from the hill, while it crossed and arrested my horse's course with its rush of waters."

"Thanks, thanks, dear BROOK," cried Undine, clapping her little hands. But the old man shook his head, and, deeply musing, looked vacantly down before him.

"Hardly had I well settled myself in my saddle, and got the reins in my grasp again," Huldbrand pursued, "when a wizard-like dwarf of a man was already standing at my side, diminutive and ugly beyond conception, his complexion of a brownish yellow, and his nose scarcely of less magnitude than all the rest of him. The fellow's mouth was slit almost from ear to ear, and he showed his teeth with a simpering smile of idiot courtesy, while he overwhelmed me with bows and scrapes innumerable. The farce now becoming excessively irksome, I thanked him in the fewest words I could well use, turned about my still trembling charger, and purposed either to seek another adventure, or, should I meet with none, to pick my way back to the city; for the sun, during my wild chase, had passed the meridian, and was now hastening toward the west. But this villain of a manikin sprung at the same instant, and, with a turn as rapid as lightning, stood before my horse again. 'Clear the way, there!' I fiercely shouted; 'the beast is wild, and will make nothing of running over you.'

"'He will, will he!' cried the imp, with a snarl, and snorting out a laugh still more frightfully idiotic; 'pay me; first pay what you owe me; I stopped your fine little nag for you; without my help both you and he would be now sprawling below there in that stony ravine. Hu! from what a horrible plunge I've saved you.'

"'Well, pray don't stretch your mouth any wider,' said I; 'but take your drink-money and be off, though every word you say is false. See! it was the kind brook there, you miserable thing, and not you, that saved me.'

"And, at the same time, I dropped a piece of gold into his wizard cap, which he had taken from his head while he was begging before me.

"I then trotted off, and left him; but, to make bad worse, he screamed after me, and, on a sudden, with inconceivable quickness, he was close by my side. I started my horse into a gallop; he galloped on with me, impossible for him as it appeared; and with this strange movement, half ludicrous and half horrible, forcing at the same time every limb and feature into distortion, he kept raising the gold piece as high as he could stretch his arm, and screaming at every leap: 'Counterfeit! false! false coin! counterfeit!' and such were the croaking sounds that issued from his hollow breast, you would have supposed that every time he made them he must have tumbled upon the ground dead. All this while his disgusting red tongue hung lolling far out of his mouth.

"Discomposed at the sight, I stopped and asked him: 'What do you mean by your screaming? Take another piece of gold; take two more, — but leave me.'

"He then began to make his hideous salutations of courtesy again, and snarled out as before: 'Not gold; it shall not be gold, my smart young gentleman; I have too much of that trash already, as I will show you in no time.'

"At that moment, and thought itself could not have been more instantaneous, I seemed to have acquired new powers of sight. I could see through the solid green plain as if it were green glass, and the smooth surface of the earth were round as a globe; and within it I saw crowds of goblins, who were pursuing their pastime, and making themselves merry with silver and gold. They were tumbling and rolling about, heads up and heads down: they pelted one another in sport with the precious metals, and with irritating malice blew gold-dust in one another's eyes. My odious companion stood half within and half without; he ordered the others to reach him up a vast quantity of gold; this he showed to me with a laugh, and then flung it again, ringing and chinking, down the measureless abyss.

"After this contemptuous disregard of gold, he held up the piece I had given him, showing it to his brother gnomes below, and they laughed themselves half dead at a bit so worthless, and hissed me. At last, raising their fingers all smutched with ore, they pointed them at me in scorn, and wilder and wilder, and thicker and thicker, and madder and madder, the crowd were clambering up to where I sat gazing at these wonders. Then terror seized me, as it had before seized my horse. I drove my spurs into his sides, and how far he rushed headlong with me through the forest, during this second of my wild heats, it is impossible to say.

"At last, when I had now come to a dead halt again, the cool of evening was around me. I caught the gleam of a white footpath through the branches of the trees; and presuming it would lead me out of the forest toward the city, I was desirous of working my way into it; but a face perfectly white and indistinct, with features forever changing, kept thrusting itself out and peering at me between the leaves. I tried to avoid it; but wherever I went, there too appeared the unearthly face. I was maddened with rage at this interruption, and drove my steed at the appearance full-tilt, when such a cloud of white foam came rushing upon me and my horse, that we were almost blinded and glad to turn about and escape. Thus from step to step it forced us on, and ever aside from the footpath, leaving us, for the most part, only one direction open. But when we advanced in this, although it kept following close behind us, it did not occasion the smallest harm or inconvenience.

"At times, when I looked about me at the form, I perceived that the white face, which had splashed upon us its shower of foam, was resting on a body equally white and of more than gigantic size. Many a time, too, I received the impression that the whole appearance was nothing more than a wandering stream or torrent, but respecting this I could never attain to any certainty. We both of us, horse and rider, became weary, as we shaped our course according to the movements of the white man, who continued nodding his head at us, as if he would say, 'Perfectly right! perfectly right!' And thus, at length, we came out here at the edge of the wood, where I saw the fresh turf, the waters of the lake, and your little cottage, and where the tall white man disappeared."

"Well, Heaven be praised that he is gone!" cried the old fisherman; and he now fell to considering how his guest could most conveniently return to his friends in the city. Upon this, Undine began tittering to herself, but so very low that the sound was hardly perceivable. Huldbrand, observing it, said: "I had hoped you would see me remain here with pleasure; why then do you now appear so happy, when our talk turns upon my going away?"

"Because you cannot go away," answered Undine. "Pray, make a single attempt; try with a wherry, with your horse or alone, as you please, to cross that forest stream which has burst its bounds. Or, rather, make no trial at all, for you would be dashed to pieces by the stones and trunks of trees, which you see driven on with such violence. And, as to the lake, I am well acquainted with that; even my father dares not venture out with his wherry far enough to help you."

Huldbrand rose, smiling, in order to look about, and observe whether the state of things were such as Undine had represented it to be; the old man accompanied him, and the maiden, in mockery, went gambolling and playing her antics beside them. They found all, in fact, just as Undine had said, and that the knight, whether willing or not willing, must submit to remain on the island, so lately a peninsula, until the flood should subside.

When the three were now returning to the cottage, after their ramble, the knight whispered in the ear of the little girl: "Well, dear Undine, how is it with you? Are you angry on account of my remaining?"

"Ah," she pettishly made answer, "not a word of that. If I had not bitten you, who knows what fine things you would have put into your story about Bertalda!"

CHAPTER V.

HOW THE KNIGHT LIVED ON THE POINT OF LAND NOW ENCIRCLED BY THE LAKE.

At some period of your life, my dear reader, after being much driven to and fro in the world, you may have reached a situation where all was well with you; that love for the calm security of our own fireside, which we all feel as an affection born with us, again rose within you; you imagined that your home would again bloom forth, as from a cherished grave, with all the flowers of childhood, the purest and most impassioned love; and that, in such a spot, it must be delightful to take up your abode and build your tabernacle for life. Whether you were mistaken in this, and afterward made a severe expiation for your error, it suits not my purpose to inquire, and you would be unwilling yourself, it may be, to be saddened by a recollection so ungrateful. But again awake within you that foretaste of bliss, so inexpressibly sweet, that angelic salutation of peace, and you will be able, perchance, to understand something of the knight Huldbrand's happiness, while he remained on the point of land now surrounded by the lake.

He frequently observed, and no doubt with heartfelt satisfaction, that the forest stream continued every day to swell and roll on with a more impetuous sweep; that, by tearing away the earth, it scooped out a broader and broader channel; and that the time of his seclusion on the island became, in consequence, more and more extended. Part of the day he wandered about with an old cross-bow, which he found in a corner of the cottage, and had repaired, in order to shoot the water-fowl that flew over; and all that he was lucky enough to hit, he brought home for a good roast in the kitchen. When he came in with his booty, Undine seldom failed to greet him with a scolding, because he had cruelly deprived her dear merry friends of life as they were sporting above in the blue ocean of the air; nay, more, she often wept bitterly when she viewed the water-fowl dead in his hand. But at other times, when he returned without having shot any, she gave him a scolding equally serious, since, owing to his indolent strolling and awkward handling of the bow, they must now put up with a dinner of pickerel and crawfish. Her playful taunts ever touched his heart with delight; the more so, as she afterwards strove to make up for her pretended ill-humor with the most endearing of caresses.

In this familiarity of the young people, their aged friends saw a resemblance to the feelings of their own youth; they appeared to look upon them as betrothed, or even as a young married pair that lived with them in their age, to afford them assistance on their island, now torn off from the mainland. The loneliness of his situation strongly impressed also young Huldbrand with the feeling that he was already Undine's bridegroom.

It seemed to him as if, beyond those encompassing floods, there were no other world in existence, or at any rate as if he could never cross them, and again associate with the world of other men; and when at times his grazing steed raised his head and neighed to him, seemingly inquiring after his knightly achievements and reminding him of them, or when his coat of arms sternly shone upon him from the embroidery of his saddle and the caparisons of his horse, or when his sword happened to fall from the nail on which it was hanging in the cottage, and flashed on his eye as it slipped from the scabbard in its fall, — he quieted the doubts of his mind by saying to himself: "Undine cannot be a fisherman's daughter; she is, in all probability, a native of some remote region, and a member of some illustrious family."

There was one thing, indeed, to which he had a strong aversion: this was to hear the old dame reproving Undine. The wild girl, it is true, commonly laughed at the reproof, making no attempt to conceal the extravagance of her mirth; but it appeared to him like touching his own honor; and still he found it impossible to blame the aged wife of the fisherman, since Undine always deserved at least ten times as many reproofs as she received: so he continued to feel in his heart an affectionate tenderness for them all, even for the ancient mistress of the house, and his whole life flowed on in the calm stream of contentment.

There came, however, an interruption at last. The fisherman and the knight had been accustomed at dinner, and also in the evening, when the wind roared without, as it rarely failed to do toward night, to enjoy together a flask of wine. But now their whole stock, which the fisherman had from time to time brought with him from the city, was at last exhausted, and they were both quite out of humor at the circumstance. That day Undine laughed at them excessively, but they were not disposed to join in her jests with the same gayety as usual. Toward evening she went out of the cottage, to escape, as she said, the sight of two such long and tiresome faces.

While it was yet twilight, some appearances of a tempest seemed to be again mustering in the sky, and the waves already rushed and roared around them; the knight and the fisherman sprung to the door in terror, to bring home the maiden, remembering the anguish of that night when Huldbrand had first entered the cottage. But Undine met them at the same moment, clapping her little hands in high glee.

"What will you give me," she cried, "to provide you with wine? or, rather, you need not give me anything," she continued; "for I am already satisfied if you look more cheerful, and are in better spirits, than throughout this last most wearisome day. Do only come with me one minute; the forest stream has driven ashore a cask; and I will be condemned to sleep a whole week if it is not a wine-cask."

The men followed her, and actually found, in a bushy cove of the shore, a cask, which inspired them with as much joy as if they were sure it contained the generous old wine for which they were thirsting. They first of all, and with as much expedition as possible, rolled it toward the cottage; for heavy clouds were again rising in the west, and they could discern the waves of the lake, in the fading light, lifting their white foaming heads, as if looking out for the rain, which threatened every instant to pour upon them. Undine helped the men as much as she was able; and as the shower, with a roar of wind, came suddenly sweeping on in rapid pursuit, she raised her finger with a merry menace toward the dark mass of clouds, and cried: "You cloud, you cloud, have a care! — beware how you wet us; we are some way from shelter yet."

The old man reproved her for this sally, as a sinful presumption; but she laughed to herself with a low tittering, and no mischief came from her wild behavior. Nay, more, what was beyond their expectation, they all three reached their comfortable hearth unwet, with their prize secured; but the moment the cask had been broached, and proved to contain wine of a remarkably fine flavor, then the rain first poured unrestrained from the black cloud, the tempest raved through the tops of the trees, and swept far over the billows of the deep.

Having immediately filled several bottles from the large cask, which promised them a supply for a long time, they drew round the glowing hearth; and, comfortably secured from the violence of the storm, they sat tasting the flavor of their wine, and bandying their quips and pleasantries.

As reflection returned upon him, the old fisherman all at once became very grave, and said: "Ah, great God! here we sit, rejoicing over this rich gift, while he to whom it first belonged, and from whom it was wrested by the fury of the stream, must there also, it is more than probable, have lost his life."

"His fate, I trust, was not quite so melancholy as that," said Undine, while, smiling, she filled the knight's cup to the brim.

But he exclaimed: "By my unsullied honor, old father, if I knew where to find and rescue him, no fear of exposure to the night, nor any peril, should deter me from making the attempt. But I give you all the assurance I am able to give, that if I ever reach an inhabited country again, I will find out the owner of this wine or his heirs, and make double and triple reimbursement."

The old man was gratified with this assurance; he gave the knight a nod of approbation, and now drained his cup with an easier conscience and more relish.

Undine, however, said to Huldbrand: "As to the repayment and your gold, you may do whatever you like. But what you said about your venturing out, and searching, and exposing yourself to danger, appears to me far from wise. I should cry my very eyes out, should you perish there on such a wild jaunt; and is it not true that you would prefer staying here with me and the good wine?"

"Most assuredly," answered Huldbrand, smiling.

"Well, then," replied Undine, "you see you spoke unwisely. For charity begins at home; our neighbor ought not to be our first thought; and whatever is a calamity to him, would be one in our own case also."

The mistress of the house turned away from her, sighing and shaking her head, while the fisherman forgot his wonted indulgence toward the graceful little girl, and thus reproved her: —

"That sounds exactly as if you had been brought up by heathens and Turks"; and he finished his reproof by adding: "May God forgive both me and you, — unfeeling child!"

"Well, say what you will, this is what I think and feel," replied Undine, "whoever brought me up, — and how can a thousand of your words help it?"

"Silence!" exclaimed the fisherman, in a voice of stern rebuke; and she, who with all her wild spirit was at the same time extremely alive to fear, shrunk from him, moved close up to Huldbrand, trembling, and said very softly, —

"Are you also angry, dear friend?"

The knight pressed her soft hand, and tenderly stroked her locks. He was unable to utter a word; for his vexation, arising from the old man's severity toward Undine, closed his lips; and thus the two couple sat opposite to each other, at once heated with anger and in embarrassed silence.

CHAPTER VI.

A WEDDING.

In the midst of this painful stillness, a low knocking was heard at the door, which struck all in the cottage with dismay; for there are times when a slight circumstance, coming unexpectedly upon us, startles us like something supernatural. But here it was a further source of alarm, that the enchanted forest lay so near them, and that their place of abode seemed at present inaccessible to the visit of any human being. While they were looking upon one another in doubt, the knocking was again heard, accompanied by a deep groan. The knight sprang to seize his sword. But the old man said in a low whisper: —

"If it be what I fear it is, no weapon of yours can protect us."

Undine, in the mean while, went to the door, and cried with the firm voice of fearless displeasure: "Spirits of the earth! if mischief be your aim, Kuhleborn shall teach you better manners."

The terror of the rest was increased by this wild speech; they looked fearfully upon the girl, and Huldbrand was just recovering presence of mind enough to ask what she meant, when a voice reached them from without: —

"I am no spirit of the earth, though a spirit still in its earthly body. You that are within the cottage there, if you fear God and would afford me assistance, open your door to me."

By the time these words were spoken, Undine had already opened it; and the lamp throwing a strong light upon the stormy night, they perceived an aged priest without, who stepped back in terror when his eye fell on the unexpected sight of a little damsel of such exquisite beauty. Well might he think there must be magic in the wind, and witchcraft at work, where a form of such surpassing loveliness appeared at the door of so humble a dwelling. So he lifted up his voice in prayer:—

"Let all good spirits praise the Lord God!"

"I am no spectre," said Undine with a smile. "Do you think, indeed, I look so very frightful? And more,—you cannot but bear me witness yourself that I am far from shrinking terrified at your holy words. I too have knowledge of God, and understand the duty of praising him; every one, to be sure, has his own way of doing this, and this privilege he meant we should enjoy when he gave us being. Walk in, father; you will find none but worthy people here."

The holy man came bowing in, and cast round a glance of scrutiny, wearing at the same time a very placid and venerable air. But water was dropping from every fold of his dark garments, from his long white beard, and the white locks of his hair. The fisherman and the knight took him to another apartment, and furnished him with a change of raiment, while they handed his own clothes into the room they had left, for the females to dry. The aged stranger thanked them in a manner the most humble and courteous, but on the knight's offering him his splendid cloak to wrap round him, he could not be persuaded to take it, but chose instead an old gray overcoat that belonged to the fisherman.

They then returned to the common apartment. The mistress of the house immediately offered her great chair to the priest, and continued urging it upon him, till she saw him fairly in possession of it. "You are old and exhausted," said she, "and are moreover a man of God."

Undine shoved under the stranger's feet her little cricket, on which at other times she used to sit near to Huldbrand, and showed herself, in thus promoting the comfort of the worthy old man, in the highest degree gentle and amiable. On her paying him these little attentions, Huldbrand whispered some raillery in her ear, but she replied gravely:—

"He is a minister of that Being who created us all, and holy things are not to be treated with lightness."

The knight and the fisherman now refreshed the priest with food and wine; and when he had somewhat recovered his strength and spirits, he began to relate how he had the day before set out from his cloister, which was situated afar off beyond the great lake, in order to visit the bishop, and acquaint him with the distress into which the cloister and its tributary villages had fallen, owing to the extraordinary floods. After a long and wearisome wandering, on account of the same rise of the waters, he had been this day compelled toward evening to procure the aid of a couple of stout boatmen, and cross over an arm of the lake which had burst its usual boundary.

"But hardly," continued he, "had our small ferry-boat touched the waves, when that furious tempest burst forth, which is still raging over our heads. It seemed as if the billows had been waiting our approach, only to rush upon us with a madness the more wild. The oars were wrested from the grasp of my men in an instant; and shivered by the resistless force, they drove farther and farther out before us upon the waves. Unable to direct our course, we yielded to the blind power of nature, and seemed to fly over the surges toward your remote shore, which we already saw looming through the mist and foam of the deep. Then it was, at last, that our boat turned short from its course, and rocked with a motion that became more and more wild and dizzy: I know not whether it was overset, or the violence of the motion threw me overboard. In my agony and struggle at the thought of a near and terrible death, the waves bore me onward, till one of them cast me ashore here beneath the trees of your island."

"Yes, an island!" cried the fisherman. "A short time ago it was only a point of land. But now, since the forest stream and lake have become all but mad, it appears to be entirely changed."

"I observed something of it," replied the priest, "as I stole along the shore in the obscurity; and hearing nothing around me but a sort of wild uproar, I perceived at last that the noise came from a point exactly where a beaten footpath disappeared. I now caught the light in your cottage, and ventured hither, where I cannot sufficiently thank my Father in heaven, that, after preserving me from the waters, he has also conducted me to such pious people as you are; and the more so, as it is difficult to say whether I shall ever behold any other persons in this world except you four."

"What mean you by those words?" asked the fisherman.

"Can you tell me, then, how long this commotion of the elements will last?" returned the holy man. "And the years of my pilgrimage are many. The stream of my life may easily sink into the ground and vanish, before the overflowing of that forest stream shall subside. Indeed, taking a general view of things, it is not impossible, that more and more of the foaming waters may rush in between you and yonder forest, until you are so far removed from the rest of the world, that your small fishing-canoe may be incapable of passing over, and the inhabitants of the continent entirely forget you in your old age, amid the dissipation and diversions of life."

At this melancholy foreboding, the old lady shrunk back with a feeling of alarm, crossed herself, and cried: "May God forbid!"

But the fisherman looked upon her with a smile, and said: "What a strange being is man! Suppose the worst to happen: our state would not be different, at any rate your own would not, dear wife, from what it is at present. For have you, these many years, been farther from home than the border of the forest? And have you seen a single human being besides Undine and myself? It is now only a short time since the coming of the knight and the priest. They will remain with us, even if we do become a forgotten island; so, after all, you will derive the best advantage from the disaster."

"I know not," replied the ancient dame; "it is a dismal thought, when brought fairly home to the mind, that we are forever separated from mankind, even though, in fact, we never do know nor see them."

"Then you will remain with us, then you will remain with us!" whispered Undine, in a voice scarcely audible and half singing, while with the intense fervor of the heart she nestled more and more closely to Huldbrand's side. But he was absorbed in the deep and strange musings of his own mind. The region on the other side of the forest river seemed, since the last words of the priest, to have been withdrawing farther and farther, in dim perspective, from his view; and the blooming island on which he lived grew green and smiled more freshly before the eye of his mind. His bride glowed like the fairest rose, — not of this obscure nook only, but even of the whole wide world, and the priest was now present.

Beside these hopes and reveries of love, another circumstance influenced him: the mistress of the family was directing an angry glance at the fair girl, because, even in the presence of the priest, she was leaning so fondly on her darling knight; and it seemed as if she was on the point of breaking out in harsh reproof. Then was the resolution of Huldbrand taken; his heart and mouth were opened; and turning toward the priest, he said, "Father, you here see before you an affianced pair, and if this maiden and these worthy people of the island have no objection, you shall unite us this very evening."

The aged couple were both exceedingly surprised. They had often, it is true, thought of this, but as yet they had never mentioned it; and now, when the knight made the attachment known, it came upon them like something wholly new and unexpected. Undine became suddenly grave, and cast her eyes upon the floor in a deep revery, while the priest made inquiries respecting the circumstances of their acquaintance, and asked the old people whether they gave their consent to the union. After a great number of questions and answers, the affair was arranged to the satisfaction of all; and the mistress of the house went to prepare the bridal apartment for the young couple, and also, with a view to grace the nuptial solemnity, to seek for two consecrated tapers, which she had for a long time kept by her for this occasion.

The knight in the mean while busied himself about his gold chain, for the purpose of disengaging two of its links, that he might make an exchange of rings with his bride. But when she saw his object she started from her trance of musing, and exclaimed : —

"Not so ! my parents were far from sending me into the world so perfectly destitute ; on the contrary, they must have foreseen, even at so early a period, that such a night as this would come"

Thus speaking, she was out of the room in a moment, and a moment after returned with two costly rings, of which she gave one to her bridegroom, and kept the other for herself. The old fisherman was beyond measure astonished at this ; and his wife, who was just re-entering the room, was even more surprised than he, that neither of them had ever seen these jewels in the child's possession.

"My parents," said Undine, "made me sew these trinkets to that beautiful raiment which I wore the very day I came to you. They also charged me on no account whatever to mention them to any one before the evening I should be married. At the time of my coming, therefore, I took them off in secret, and have kept them concealed to the present hour."

The priest now cut short all further questioning and wondering, while he lighted the consecrated tapers, placed them on a table, and ordered the bridal pair to stand directly before him. He then pronounced the few solemn words of the ceremony, and made them one : the elder couple gave the younger their blessing ; and the bride, slightly trembling and thoughtful, leaned upon the knight.

The priest then spoke plainly and at once: "You are strange people, after all ; for why did you tell me you were the only inhabitants of the island ? So far is this from being true, I have seen, the whole time I have been performing the ceremony, a tall, stately man, in a white mantle, stand opposite to me, looking in at the window. He must be still waiting before the door, if peradventure you would invite him to come in."

"God forbid !" cried the old lady, shrinking back ; the fisherman shook his head without opening his lips, and Huldbrand sprang to the window. It appeared to him that he could still discern some vestige of a form, white and indistinct as a vapor, but it soon wholly disappeared in the gloom. He convinced the priest that he must have been quite mistaken in his impression ; and now, inspired with the freedom and familiarity of perfect confidence, they all sat down together round a bright and comfortable hearth.

CHAPTER VII.

WHAT FURTHER HAPPENED ON THE EVENING OF THE WEDDING.

BEFORE the nuptial ceremony, and during its performance, Undine had shown a modest gentleness and maidenly reserve ; but it now seemed as if all the wayward freaks that effervesced within her were foaming and bursting forth with an extravagance only the more bold and unrestrained. She teased her bridegroom, her foster-parents, and even the priest, whom she had just now revered so highly, with all sorts of childish tricks and vagaries ; and when the ancient dame was about to reprove her too frolicsome spirit, the knight, by a few serious and expressive words, imposed silence upon her by calling Undine his wife.

The knight was himself, indeed, just as little pleased with Undine's childish behavior as the rest ; but still, all his winking, hemming, and expressions of censure were to no purpose. It is true, whenever the bride observed the dissatisfaction of her husband, — and this occasionally happened, — she became more quiet, placed herself beside him, stroked his face with caressing fondness, whispered something smilingly in his ear, and in this manner smoothed the wrinkles that were gathering on his brow. But the moment after some wild whim would make her resume her antic movements, and all went worse than before.

The priest then spoke in a kind, although serious tone : "My pleasant young friend, surely no one can witness your playful spirit without being diverted ; but remember, betimes, so to attune your soul that it may produce a harmony ever in accordance with the soul of your wedded bridegroom."

"SOUL !" cried Undine, with a laugh nearly allied to one of derision ; "what you say has a remarkably pretty sound, and for most people, too, it may be a very instructive rule and profitable caution. But when a person has no soul at all, how, I pray you, can such attuning be possible? And this, in truth, is just my condition."

The priest was much hurt, but continued silent in holy displeasure, and turned away his face from the maiden in sorrow. She, however, went up to him with the most winning sweetness, and said:—

"Nay, I entreat you, first listen to some particulars before you frown upon me in anger; for your frown of anger is painful to me, and you ought not to give pain to a creature that has itself done nothing injurious to you. Only have patience with me, and I will explain to you every word of what I meant."

She had come to the resolution, it was evident, to give a full account of herself, when she suddenly faltered, as if seized with an inward shuddering, and burst into a passion of tears. They were none of them able to understand the intenseness of her feelings, and with mingled emotions of fear and anxiety, they gazed on her in silence. Then wiping away her tears, and looking earnestly at the priest, she at last said:—

"There must be something lovely, but at the same time something most awful, about a SOUL. In the name of God, holy man, were it not better that we never shared a gift so mysterious?"

Again she paused and restrained her tears, as if waiting for an answer. All in the cottage had risen from their seats, and stept back from her with horror. She, however, seemed to have eyes for no one but the holy man; a fearful curiosity was painted on her features, and this made her emotion appear terrible to the others.

"Heavily must the soul weigh down its possessor," she pursued, when no one returned her any answer, "very heavily! for already its approaching image overshadows me with anguish and mourning. And, alas! I have till now been so merry and light-hearted!" And she burst into another flood of tears, and covered her face with her veil.

The priest, going up to her with a solemn look, now addressed himself to her, and conjured her in the name of God most holy, if any evil or spirit of evil possessed her, to remove the light covering from her face. But she sunk before him on her knees, and repeated after him every sacred expression he uttered, giving praise to God, and protesting that she wished well to the whole world.

The priest then spoke to the knight. "Sir bridegroom, I leave you alone with her, whom I have united to you in marriage. So far as I can discover, there is nothing of evil in her, but, of a truth, much that is wonderful. What I recommend to you in domestic life is prudence, love, and fidelity."

Thus speaking, he left the apartment, and the fisherman with his wife followed him, crossing themselves.

Undine had sunk upon her knees; she uncovered her face, and exclaimed, while she looked fearfully round upon Huldbrand: "Alas, you will now refuse to look upon me as your own; and still I have done nothing evil, poor unhappy child that I am!" She spoke these words with a look so infinitely sweet and touching, that her bridegroom forgot both the confession that had shocked and the mystery that had perplexed him; and hastening to her, he raised her in his arms. She smiled through her tears, and that smile was like the rosy morning light playing upon a small stream. "You cannot desert me!" she whispered, with a confiding assurance, and stroked the knight's cheeks with her little soft hands. He was thus in some degree withdrawn from those terrible apprehensions that still lay lurking in the recesses of his soul, and were persuading him that he had been married to a fairy, or some spiteful and mischievous being of the spirit-world; but, after all, only this single question, and that almost unawares, escaped from his lips:—

"Dearest Undine, pray tell me this one thing; what was it you meant by 'spirits of the earth' and 'Kuhleborn,' when the priest stood knocking at the door?"

"Mere fictions! mere tales of children!" answered Undine, laughing, now quite restored to her wonted gayety. "I first awoke your anxiety with them, and you finally awoke mine. This is the end of the story, and of our nuptial evening."

"Nay, not exactly that," replied the enamored knight, extinguishing the tapers, and a thousand times kissing his beautiful and beloved bride, while, lighted by the moon that shone brightly through the windows, he bore her into their bridal apartment.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE DAY AFTER THE WEDDING.

THE fresh light of morning awoke the young married pair. Undine bashfully hid her face beneath their covering, and Huldbrand lay lost in silent reflection. Whenever during the night he had fallen asleep, strange and horrible dreams of spectres had disturbed him; and these shapes, grinning at him by stealth, strove to disguise themselves as beautiful females; and from beautiful females they all at once assumed the appearance of dragons. And when he started up, aroused by the intrusion of these hideous forms, the moonlight shone pale and cold before the windows without; he looked affrighted at Undine, in whose arms he had fallen asleep, and she was reposing in unaltered beauty and sweetness beside him. Then pressing her rosy lips with a light kiss, he again fell into a slumber, only to be awakened by new terrors.

When he had now perfectly awoke, and well considered all the circumstances of this connection, he reproached himself for any doubt that could lead him into error in regard to his lovely wife. He also earnestly begged her to pardon the injustice he had done her, but she only gave him her fair hand, heaved a sigh from the depth of her heart, and remained silent. Yet a glance of fervent tenderness, an expression of the soul beaming in her eyes, such as he had never witnessed there before, left him in undoubting assurance that Undine was innocent of any evil against him whatever.

He then rose with a serene mind, and, leaving her, went to the common apartment, where the inmates of the house had already met. The three were sitting round the hearth with an air of anxiety about them, as if they feared trusting themselves to raise their voice above a low apprehensive undertone. The priest appeared to be praying in his inmost spirit, with a view to avert some fatal calamity. But when they observed the young husband come forth so cheerful, a brighter hope rose within them, and dispelled the cloudy traces that remained upon their brows; yes, the old fisherman began to be facetious with the knight, but in a manner so perfectly becoming, that his aged wife herself could not help smiling with great good-humor.

Undine had in the mean time got ready, and now entered the door, when they were all on the point of rushing to meet her, and yet all remained fixed in perfect admiration, so changed and at the same time so familiar was the young woman's appearance. The priest, with paternal affection beaming from his countenance, first went up to her, and as he raised his hand to pronounce a blessing, the beautiful bride, trembling with religious awe, sunk on her knees before him; she begged his pardon, in terms both respectful and submissive, for any foolish things she might have uttered the evening before, and entreated him, in a very pathetic tone, to pray for the welfare of her soul. She then rose, kissed her foster-parents, and, after thanking them for all the kindness they had shown her, said: "O, I now feel in my inmost heart, how great, how infinitely great, is what you have done for me, you dear, dear friends of my childhood!"

At first she was wholly unable to tear herself away from their affectionate caresses; but the moment she saw the good old mother busy in getting breakfast, she went to the hearth, applied herself to cooking the food and putting it on the table, and would not suffer her to take the least share in the work.

She continued in this frame of spirit the whole day; calm, kind, attentive, — at the same time a little mistress of a family, and a tender, modest young woman. The three, who had been longest acquainted with her, expected every instant to see her capricious spirit break out in some whimsical change or sportive vagary. But their fears were quite unnecessary. Undine continued as mild and gentle as an angel. The priest found it all but impossible to remove his eyes from her, and he often said to the bridegroom: —

"The bounty of Heaven, sir, through me its unworthy instrument, intrusted to you last evening an invaluable treasure; regard and cherish it as you ought to do, and it will promote your temporal and eternal welfare."

Toward evening Undine was hanging upon the knight's arm with lowly tenderness, while she drew him gently out before the door, where the setting sun shone richly over the fresh grass, and upon the high, slender boles of the trees. Her emotion was visible: the dew of sadness and love swam in her eyes, while a tender and fearful secret seemed to hover upon her lips; but sighs, and those scarcely perceptible, were all that made known the wish of her heart. She led her husband farther and farther onward without speaking. When he asked her questions, she replied only with looks, in which, it is true there appeared to be no immediate answer to his inquiries, but yet a whole heaven of love and timid attachment. Thus they reached the margin of the swollen forest stream, and the knight was astonished to see it gliding away with so gentle a murmuring of its waves that no vestige of its former swell and wildness was now discernible.

"By morning it will be wholly drained off," said the beautiful woman, almost weeping; "and you will then be able to travel, without anything to hinder you, whithersoever you will."

"Not without you, dear Undine," replied the knight, laughing; "for pray remember, even were I disposed to leave you, both the church and the spiritual powers, the emperor and the laws of the realm, would require the fugitive to be seized and restored to you."

"All this depends on you, — all depends on you," whispered his little companion, half weeping and half smiling. "But I still feel sure that you will not leave me; I love you too deeply to fear that misery. Now bear me over to that little island, which lies before us. There shall the decision be made. I could easily, indeed, glide through that mere rippling of the water without your aid, but it is so grateful to rest in your arms; and should you determine to put me away, I shall have sweetly rested in them once more, ... for the last time."

Huldbrand was so full of strange anxiety and emotion, that he knew not what answer to make her. He took her in his arms and carried her over, now first realizing the fact that this was the same little island from which he had borne her back to the old fisherman the first night of his arrival. On the farther side, he placed her upon the soft grass, and was throwing himself lovingly near his beautiful burden; but she said to him, "Not here, but there, opposite to me. I shall read my doom in your eyes, even before your lips pronounce it; now listen very attentively to what I shall relate to you." And she began: —

"You must know, my own love, that there are beings in the elements, which bear the strongest resemblance to the human race, and which, at the same time, but seldom become visible to you. The wonderful salamanders sparkle and sport amid the flames; deep in the earth the meagre and malicious gnomes pursue their revels; the forest spirits belong to the air, and wander in the woods; while in the seas, rivers, and streams live the widespread race of water-spirits. These last, beneath resounding domes of crystal, through which the sky appears with sun and stars, inhabit a region of light and beauty; lofty coral-trees glow with blue and crimson fruits in their gardens; they walk over the pure sand of the sea, among infinitely variegated shells, and amid whatever of beauty the old world possessed, such as the present is no more worthy to enjoy, — creations which the floods covered with their secret veils of silver; and now these noble monuments glimmer below,* stately and solemn, and bedewed by the water which loves them, and calls forth from their crevices exquisite moss-flowers and enwreathing tufts of sedge.

"Now the nation that dwell there are very fair and lovely to behold, for the most part more beautiful than human beings. Many a fisherman has been so fortunate as to catch a view of a delicate maiden of the waters, while she was floating and singing upon the deep. He then spread to remotest shores the fame of her beauty; and to such wonderful females men are wont to give the name of Undines. But what need of saying more? You, my dear husband, now actually behold an Undine before you."

The knight would have persuaded himself that his lovely wife was under the influence of one of her odd whims, and that she was only amusing herself and him with her extravagant inventions. He wished it might be so. But with whatever power of words he said this to himself, he still could not credit the hope for a moment; a strange shivering shot through his soul; unable to

* No reader of English poetry need be reminded of Southey's admirable description of the submarine City of Baly in his "Curse of Kehama": —

"In sunlight and sea-green,
The thousand palaces were seen
Of that proud city, whose superb abodes
Seemed reared by giants for the immortal gods.
How silent and how beautiful they stand,
Like things of nature."

utter a word, he gazed upon the sweet speaker with a fixed eye. She shook her head in distress, heaved a sigh from her full heart, and then proceeded in the following manner: —

"In respect to the circumstances of our life, we should be far superior to yourselves, who are another race of the human family, — for we also call ourselves human beings, as we resemble them in form and features, — had we not one great evil peculiar to ourselves. Both we and the beings I have mentioned as inhabiting the other elements vanish into air at death, and go out of existence, spirit and body, so that no vestige of us remains; and when you hereafter awake to a purer state of being, we shall remain where sand and sparks and wind and waves remain. We of course have no souls; the element moves us, and, again, is obedient to our will, while we live, though it scatters us like dust when we die; and as we have nothing to trouble us, we are as merry as nightingales, little goldfishes, and other pretty children of nature.

"But all beings aspire to rise in the scale of existence higher than they are. It was therefore the wish of my father, who is a powerful water-prince in the Mediterranean Sea, that his only daughter should become possessed of a soul, although she should have to endure many of the sufferings of those who share that gift.

"Now, the race to which I belong have no other means of obtaining a soul than by forming with an individual of your own the most intimate union of love. I am now possessed of a soul, and I, the very soul itself, thank you, dear Huldbrand, with a warmth of heart beyond expression, and never shall I cease to thank you, unless you render my whole future life miserable. For what will become of me if you avoid and reject me? Still, I would not keep you as my own by artifice. And should you decide to cast me off, then do it now, ... leave me here, and return to the shore alone. I will plunge into this brook, where my uncle will receive me; my uncle, who here in the forest, far removed from his other friends, passes his strange and solitary existence. But he is powerful, as well as revered and beloved by many great rivers; and as he brought me hither to our friends of the lake a light-hearted and laughing child, he will also restore me to the home of my parents a woman, gifted with a soul, full of affection, and heir to suffering."

She was about to add something more, when Huldbrand, with the most heartfelt tenderness and love, clasped her in his arms, and again bore her back to the shore. There, amid tears and kisses, he first swore never to forsake his affectionate wife, and esteemed himself even more happy than the Grecian sculptor, Pygmalion, for whom Venus gave life to his beautiful statue, and thus changed it into a beloved wife. Supported by his arm, and in the sweet confidence of affection, Undine returned to the cottage; and now she first realized with her whole heart how little cause she had for regretting what she had left, — the crystal palaces of her mysterious father.

CHAPTER IX.

HOW THE KNIGHT TOOK HIS YOUNG WIFE WITH HIM.

Next morning, when Huldbrand awoke from slumber, and perceived that his beautiful wife was not by his side, he began to give way again to his wild imaginations; these represented to him his marriage, and even the charming Undine herself, as only a shadow without substance, a mere illusion of enchantment. But she entered the door at the same moment, kissed him, seated herself on the bed by his side, and said: —

"I have been out somewhat early this morning, to see whether my uncle keeps his word. He has already restored the waters of the flood to his own calm channel, and he now flows through the forest, a rivulet as before, in a lonely and dreamlike current His friends, too, both of the water and the air, have resumed their usual peaceful tenor; all in this region will again proceed with order and tranquillity; and you can travel homeward without fear of the flood, whenever you choose."

It seemed to the mind of Huldbrand that he must be wrapt in some revery or waking dream, so little was he able to understand the nature of his wife's strange relative. Notwithstanding this, he made no remark upon what she had told him, and the infinite charm of her beauty, gentleness, and affection soon lulled every misgiving to rest.

Some time afterward, while he was standing with her before the door, and surveying the verdant point of land with its boundary of bright waters, such a feeling of bliss came over him in this cradle of his love, that he exclaimed: —

"Shall we then, so early as to-day, begin our journey? Why should we? It is probable that abroad in the world we shall find no days more delightful than those we have spent in this little green isle, so secret and so secure. Let us remain here, and see the sun go down two or three times more."

"Just as my lord shall command," replied Undine, meekly. "Only we must remember that our aged friends will, at all events, see me depart with pain; and should they now, for the first time, discover the true soul in me, and how fervently I can now love and honor them, their feeble eyes would surely become blind with weeping. As yet, they consider my present calm and exemplary conduct as of no better promise than my former occasional quietness, — merely the calm of the lake, just while the air remains tranquil, — and they will soon learn to cherish a little tree or flower as they have cherished me. Let me not, then, make known to them this newly bestowed, this love-inspired heart, at the very moment they must lose it for this world; and how could I conceal what I have gained if we continued longer together?"

Huldbrand yielded to her representation, and went to the aged couple to confer with them respecting his journey, on which he proposed to set out that very hour. The priest offered himself as a companion of the young married pair; and, after their taking a short farewell, he held the bridle, while the knight lifted his beautiful wife upon his horse; and with rapid step they crossed the dry channel with her toward the forest. Undine wept in silent but intense emotion; the old people, as she moved away, were more clamorous in the expression of their grief. They appeared to feel, at the moment of separation, all that they were losing in their affectionate foster-daughter.

The three travellers reached the thickest shades of the forest without interchanging a word. It must have been a picturesque sight in that hall of leafy verdure, to see this lovely woman's form sitting on the noble and richly ornamented steed, on her right hand the venerable priest in the white garb of his order, on her left the blooming young knight, clad in splendid raiment of scarlet, gold, and violet, girt with a sword that flashed in the sun, and attentively walking beside her. Huldbrand had no eyes but for his fair wife; Undine, who had dried her tears of tenderness, had no eyes but for him; and they soon entered into the still and voiceless converse of looks and gestures, from which after some time they were awakened by the low discourse which the priest was holding with a fourth traveller, who had meanwhile joined them unobserved.

He wore a white gown, resembling in form the dress of the priest's order, except that his hood hung very low over his face, and that the whole drapery floated in such wide folds around him as obliged him every moment to gather it up and throw it over his arm, or by some management of this sort to get it out of his way, and still it did not seem in the least to impede his movement. When the young couple became aware of his presence, he was saying: —

"And so, venerable sir, many as have been the years I have dwelt here in this forest, I have never received the name of hermit in your sense of the word. For, as I said before, I know nothing of penance, and I think, too, that I have no particular need of it. Do you ask me why I am so attached to the forest? It is because its scenery is so peculiarly picturesque, and affords me so much pastime, when, in my floating white garments, I pass through its world of leaves and dusky shadows; — and then a sweet sunbeam glances down upon me, at times, before I think of it."

"You are a very singular man," replied the priest, "and I should like to have a more intimate acquaintance with you."

"And who, then, may you be yourself, to pass from one thing to another?" inquired the stranger.

"I am called Father Heilmann," answered the holy man, "and I am from the cloister of our Lady of the Salutation, beyond the lake."

"Well, well," replied the stranger, "my name is Kuhleborn, and were I a stickler for the nice distinctions of rank, I might with equal propriety require you to give me the title of noble lord of Kuhleborn, or free lord of Kuhleborn,* for I am as free as a bird in the forest, and, it may be, a trifle more so. For example, I now have something to tell that young lady there." And before they were aware of his purpose, he was on the other side of the priest, close to Undine, and stretching himself high into the air, in order to whisper something in her ear. But she shrunk from him in terror, and exclaimed —

"I have nothing more to do with you."

"Ho, ho," cried the stranger, with a laugh, "you have made a grand marriage indeed, since you no longer know your own relations! Have you no recollection of your uncle Kuhleborn, who so faithfully bore you on his back to this region?"

"However that may be," replied Undine, "I entreat you never to appear in my presence again. I am now afraid of you; and will not my husband fear and forsake me, if he sees me associate with such strange company and kindred?"

"You must not forget, my little niece," said Kuhleborn, "that I am with you here as a guide; otherwise those madcap spirits of the earth, the gnomes that haunt this forest, would play you some of their mischievous pranks. Let me therefore still accompany you in peace; even the old priest there had a better recollection of me than you appear to have; for he just now assured me, that I seemed to be very familiar to him, and that I must have been with him in the ferry-boat, out of which he tumbled into the waves. He certainly did see me there, for I was no other than the water-spout that tore him out of it, and kept him from sinking, while I safely wafted him ashore to your wedding."

Undine and the knight turned their eyes upon Father Heilmann; but he appeared to be moving forward, just as if he were dreaming or walking in his sleep, and no longer to be conscious of a word that was spoken. Undine then said to Kuhleborn: "I already see yonder the end of the forest. We have no further need of your assistance, and nothing now gives us alarm but yourself. I therefore beseech you by our mutual love and good-will to vanish, and allow us to proceed in peace."

Kuhleborn seemed to be transported with fury at this: he darted a frightful look at Undine, and grinned fiercely upon her. She shrieked aloud, and called her husband to protect her. The knight sprung round the horse as quick as lightning, and, brandishing his sword, struck at Kuhleborn's head. But, instead of severing it from his body, the sword merely flashed through a torrent, which rushed foaming near them from a lofty cliff; and with a splash, which much resembled in sound a burst of laughter, the stream all at once poured upon them, and gave them a thorough wetting. The priest, as if suddenly awaking from a trance, coolly observed. "This is what I have been some time expecting, because the brook has descended from the steep so close beside us, — though at first sight, indeed, it appeared to look just like a man, and to possess the power of speech."

As the waterfall came rushing from its crag, it distinctly uttered these words in Huldbrand's ear: "Rash knight! valiant knight! I am not angry with you; I have no quarrel with you; only continue to defend your charming little wife with the same spirit, you bold knight! you rash blade!"

After advancing a few steps farther, the travellers came out upon open ground. The imperial city lay bright before them; and the evening sun, which gilded its towers with gold, kindly dried their garments that had been so completely drenched.

CHAPTER X.

HOW THEY LIVED IN THE CITY.

THE sudden disappearance of the young knight, Huldbrand of Ringstetten, had occasioned much remark in the imperial city, and no small concern among those of the people, who, as well on account of his expertness in tourney and dance as of his mild and amiable manners, had become greatly attached to him. His attendants were unwilling to quit the place without their master although not a soul of them had been courageous enough to follow him into the fearful recesses of the forest. They remained, therefore, at their public house, idly hoping, as men are wont to do, and, by the expression of their fears, keeping the fate of their lost lord fresh in remembrance.

* "Freiherr," baron. There is something peculiarly whimsical in this quiet humor of "Lord or Baron Kühleborn."

Now, when the violent storms and floods had been observed, immediately after his departure, the destruction of the handsome stranger became all but certain: even Bertalda had quite openly discovered her sorrow, and detested herself for having induced him to take that fatal excursion into the forest. Her foster-parents, the duke and duchess, had meanwhile come to take her away, but Bertalda persuaded them to remain with her until some certain news of Huldbrand should be obtained, whether he were living or dead. She endeavored, also, to prevail upon several young knights, who were assiduous in courting her favor, to go in quest of the noble adventurer in the forest. But she refused to pledge her hand as the reward of the enterprise, because she still cherished, it might be, a hope of being claimed by the returning knight; and no one would consent, for a glove, a riband, or even a kiss, to expose his life to bring back so very dangerous a rival.

When Huldbrand now made his sudden and unexpected appearance, his attendants, the inhabitants of the city, and almost every one rejoiced: we must acknowledge, indeed, that this was not the case with Bertalda; for, although it might be quite a welcome event to others, that he brought with him a wife of such exquisite loveliness, and Father Heilmann as a witness of their marriage, Bertalda could not but view the affair with grief and vexation. She had, in truth, become attached to the young knight with her whole soul, and then her mourning for his absence, or supposed death, had shown this more than she could now have wished.

But, notwithstanding all this, she conducted herself like a prudent woman in circumstances of such delicacy, and lived on the most friendly terms with Undine, whom the whole city looked upon as a princess that Huldbrand had rescued in the forest from some evil enchantment. Whenever any one questioned either herself or her husband relative to surmises of this nature, they had wisdom enough to remain silent, or wit enough to evade the inquiries. The lips of Father Heilmann had been sealed in regard to idle gossip of every kind; and besides, on Huldbrand's arrival, he had immediately returned to his cloister: so that people were obliged to rest contented with their own wild conjectures, and even Bertalda herself ascertained nothing more of the truth than others.

For the rest, Undine daily regarded this fair girl with increasing fondness. "We must have been heretofore acquainted with each other," she often used to say to her, "or else there must be some mysterious connection between us; for it is incredible that any one so perfectly without cause — I mean without some deep and secret cause — should be so fondly attached to another, as I have been to you from the first moment of our meeting."

Even Bertalda could not deny that she felt a confiding impulse, an attraction of tenderness, toward Undine, much as she deemed this fortunate rival the cause of her bitterest disappointment. Under the influence of this mutual regard, they found means to persuade, the one her foster-parents and the other her husband, to defer the day of separation to a period more and more remote; nay, more, they had already begun to talk of a plan for Bertalda's some time accompanying Undine to Castle Ringstetten, near one of the sources of the Danube.

Once, on a fine evening, while they were promenading the city by starlight, they happened to be talking over their scheme just as they passed the high trees that bordered the public walk. The young married pair, though it was somewhat late, had called upon Bertalda to invite her to share their enjoyment; and all three now proceeded familiarly up and down beneath the dark-blue heaven, not seldom interrupted in their converse by the admiration which they could not but bestow upon the magnificent fountain in the middle of the square, and upon the wonderful rush and shooting upward of its water. All was sweet and soothing to their minds; among the shadows of the trees stole in glimmerings of light from the adjacent houses; a low murmur as of children at play, and of other persons who were enjoying their walk, floated around them; they were so alone, and yet sharing so much of social happiness in the bright and stirring world, that whatever had appeared difficult by day, now became smooth and easy of its own accord, and the three friends could no longer see the slightest cause for hesitation in regard to Bertalda's taking the journey.

At that instant, just as they were fixing the day of their departure, a tall man approached them from the middle of the square, bowed respectfully to the company, and spoke something in the young bride's ear. Though displeased with the interruption and its cause, she walked aside a few steps with the stranger, and both began to whisper, as it seemed, in a foreign tongue. Huldbrand thought he recognized the strange man of the forest; and he gazed upon him so fixedly that he neither heard nor answered the astonished inquiries of Bertalda. All at once Undine clapped her hands with delight, and turned back from the stranger, laughing: he, frequently shaking his head, retired with a hasty step and discontented air, and descended into the fountain. Huldbrand now felt perfectly certain that his conjecture was correct. But Bertalda asked: "And what, my dear Undine, did the master of the fountain wish to say to you?"

The young wife laughed within herself, and made answer: "The day after to-morrow, my dear child, when the anniversary of your name-day * returns, you shall be informed." And this was all she could be prevailed upon to disclose. She merely asked Bertalda to dinner on the appointed day, and requested her to invite her foster-parents; and soon afterward they separated.

"Kühleborn?" said Huldbrand to his lovely wife, with an inward shudder, when they had taken leave of Bertalda, and were now going home through the darkening streets.

"Yes, it was he," answered Undine, "and he would have wearied me with foolish warnings without end. But in the midst of them, quite contrary to his intention, he delighted me with a most welcome piece of news. If you, my dear lord and husband, wish me to acquaint you with it now, you need only command me, and I will freely and from my heart tell you all without reserve. But would you confer upon your Undine a very, very great pleasure, only wait till the day after to-morrow, and then you too shall have your share of the surprise."

The knight was quite willing to gratify his wife in regard to what she had asked with so beautiful a spirit; and this spirit she discovered yet more, for while she was that night falling asleep, she murmured to herself, with a smile, "How she will rejoice and be astonished at what her master of the fountain has told me,—the dear, happy Bertalda!"

* Or saint's day. A literary friend, from whose kindness I have derived the best aid in revising and correcting my version, informs me that this term "refers to a German custom of celebrating, not only the birthday, but also the name-day, that is, the day which in the almanac bears the person's Christian name. The old almanacs contained a name for each day in the year, being either the name of a saint or some other remarkable personage in history."

CHAPTER XI.

FESTIVAL OF BERTALDA'S NAME-DAY.

THE company were sitting at dinner; Bertalda, adorned with jewels and flowers without number, the presents of her foster-parents and friends, and looking like some goddess of Spring, sat beside Undine and Huldbrand at the head of the table. When the sumptuous repast was ended, and the dessert was placed before them, permission was given that the doors should be left open; this was in accordance with the good old custom in Germany, that the common people might see and rejoice in the festivity of their superiors. Among these spectators the servants carried round cake and wine.

Huldbrand and Bertalda waited with secret impatience for the promised explanation, and never, except when they could not well help it, moved their eyes from Undine. But she still continued silent, and merely smiled to herself with secret and heartfelt satisfaction. All who were made acquainted with the promise she had given could perceive that she was every moment on the point of revealing a happy secret; and yet, as children sometimes delay tasting their choicest dainties, she still withheld the communication with a denial that made it the more desired. Bertalda and Huldbrand shared the same delightful feeling, while in anxious hope they were expecting the unknown disclosure which they were to receive from the lips of their friend.

At this moment several of the company pressed Undine to give them a song. This appeared to her to be quite a well-timed request, and, immediately ordering her lute to be brought, she sung the following words : —

"Morning so bright,*
Wild-flowers so gay,
Where high grass so dewy
Crowns the wavy lake's border.

"On the meadow's verdant bosom,
What glimmers there so white?
Have wreaths of snowy blossoms,
Soft-floating, fallen from heaven?

"Ah, see! a tender infant! —
It plays with flowers, unwitting;
It strives to grasp morn's golden beams. —
O where, sweet stranger, where 's your home?
Afar from unknown shores,
The waves have wafted hither
This helpless little one.

"Nay, clasp not, tender darling,
With tiny hand the flowers;
No hand returns the pressure,
The flowers are strange and mute.
They clothe themselves in beauty,
They breathe a rich perfume,
But cannot fold around you
A mother's loving arms;
Far, far away that mother's fond embrace.

"Life's early dawn just opening faint,
Your eye yet beaming Heaven's own smile,
So soon your first, best guardian 's gone;
Severe, poor child, your fate, —
All, all to you unknown.

* In reading some of the verses of Fouqué, we cannot but remember the question of Hamlet to the player, "Is this a prologue or the posy of a ring?" As one example, among many, we may take the original of his miniature picture here : —

"Morgen so hell,
Blumen so bunt,
Gräser so duftig und hoch
An wallenden See's Gestade."

These four little lines, descriptive of the scene of Undine's songs, simple as they are, cost me more trouble in trying to mould them into a fit English form than I well like to acknowledge. I made several attempts, without much success, to translate them to my mind. Among these versions the following had the merit of not being the worst : —

"The morning beams in glory,
Where wild-flowers gayly bloom,
Where dewy grass is waving
The lake's fresh marge along."

But after all, the more verbal rendering, as it now stands, seemed to be preferable.

"A noble duke has crossed the mead,
And near you checked his steed's career :
Wonder and pity touch his heart;
With knowledge high and manners pure
He rears you, makes his castle home your own.

"How great, how infinite, your gain!
Of all the land you bloom the loveliest,
Yet, ah! that first, best blessing,
The bliss of parents' fondness,
You left on strands unknown."

Undine let fall her lute, and paused with a melancholy smile ; the eyes of Bertalda's noble foster-parents were filled with tears.

"Ah, yes, it was so ; such was the morning on which I found you, poor orphan," cried the Duke, with deep emotion ; "the beautiful singer is certainly right ; still

"That first, best blessing,
The bliss of parents' fondness,"

it was beyond our power to give you."

"But we must hear also what happened to the poor parents," said Undine, as she struck the chords, and sung : —

"Through her chambers roams the mother,
Searching, searching everywhere;
Seeks, and knows not what, with yearning,
Childless home still finding there.

"Childless home! — O sound of anguish,
She alone the anguish knows,
There by day who led her dear one,
There who rocked its night repose.

"Beechen buds again are swelling,*
Sunshine warms again the shore,
Ah, fond mother, cease your searching,
Comes the loved and lost no more.

"Then, when airs of eve are freshening,
Home the father wends his way,
While with smiles his woe he 's veiling,
Gushing tears his heart betray.

"Well he knows, within his dwelling,
Still as death he 'll find the gloom,
Only hear the mother moaning, —
No sweet babe to smile him home."

"O tell me, in the name of Heaven, tell me, Undine, where are my parents?" cried the weeping Bertalda. "You certainly know ; you must have discovered them, all wonderful as you are, for otherwise you would never have thus torn my heart. Can they be already here? May I believe it possible?"

* For the epithet "swelling," I should prefer to read "greening," as "grünen" is the more picturesque expression of the original, had I found any authority to justify me in its use.

Her eye glanced rapidly over the brilliant company, and rested upon a lady of high rank, who was sitting next to her foster-father.

Then, inclining her head, Undine beckoned toward the door, while her eyes overflowed with the sweetest emotion. "Where are the poor parents waiting?" she asked; and the old fisherman, diffident and hesitating, advanced with his wife from the crowd of spectators. Swift as the rush of hope within them they threw a look of inquiry, now at Undine, and now at the beautiful lady who was said to be their daughter.

"It is she! it is she there before you!" exclaimed the restorer of their child, her voice half choked with rapture; and both the aged parents embraced their recovered daughter, weeping aloud and praising God.

But, shocked and indignant, Bertalda tore herself from their arms. Such a discovery was too much for her proud spirit to bear, especially at the moment when she had doubtless expected to see her former splendor increased, and when hope was picturing to her nothing less brilliant than a royal canopy and a crown. It seemed to her as if her rival had contrived all this, and with the special view to humble her before Huldbrand and the whole world. She reproached Undine; she reviled the old people; and even such offensive words as "deceiver, bribed and perjured impostors," burst from her lips.

The aged wife of the fisherman then said to herself, but in a very low voice, "Ah, my God! what a wicked vixen of a woman she has grown! And yet I feel in my heart that she is my child."

The old fisherman, however, had meanwhile folded his hands, and offered up a silent prayer that she might not be his daughter.

Undine, faint and pale as death, turned from the parents to Bertalda, from Bertalda to the parents; she was suddenly cast down from all that heaven of happiness of which she had been dreaming, and plunged into an agony of terror and disappointment which she had never known even in dreams.

"Have you a soul? Can you really have a soul, Bertalda?" she cried again and again to her angry friend, as if with vehement effort she would rouse her from a sudden delirium or some distracting dream, and restore her to recollection.

But when Bertalda became every moment only more and more enraged, as the disappointed parents began to weep aloud, and the company, with much warmth of dispute, were espousing opposite sides, she begged with such earnestness and dignity for the liberty of speaking in this her husband's dining-hall, that all around her were in an instant hushed to silence. She then advanced to the upper end of the table, where, both humbled and haughty, Bertalda had seated herself, and, while every eye was fastened upon her, spoke in the following manner:—

"My friends, you appear dissatisfied and disturbed; and you are interrupting with your strife a festivity that I had hoped would bring joy both to you and myself. Ah, my God! I knew nothing of these your heartless maxims, these your unnatural ways of thinking, and never so long as I live, I fear, shall I become reconciled to them. The disclosure I have made, it seems, is unwelcome to you; but I am not to blame for such a result. Believe me, little as you may imagine this to be the case, it is wholly owing to yourselves. One word more, therefore, is all I have to add, but this is one that must be spoken: I have uttered nothing but truth. Of the certainty of the fact I give you the strongest assurance; no other proof can I or will I produce; but this I will affirm in the presence of God. The person who gave me this information was the very same who decoyed the infant Bertalda into the water, and who, after thus taking her from her parents, placed her on the green grass of the meadow, where he knew the Duke was to pass."

"She is an enchantress," cried Bertalda, "a witch, that has intercourse with evil spirits. This she acknowledges herself."

"Never! I deny it," replied Undine, while a whole heaven of innocence and truth beamed from her eyes. "I am no witch; look upon me, and say if I am."

"Then she utters both falsehood and folly," cried Bertalda, "and she is unable to prove that I am the child of these low people. My noble parents, I entreat you to take me from this company, and out of this city, where they do nothing but expose me to shame."

But the aged duke, a man of honorable feeling, remained unmoved, and his lady remarked: "We must thoroughly examine into this matter. God forbid that we should move a step from this hall before we do so."

Encouraged by this kind word, the aged wife of the fisherman drew near, made a low obeisance to the duchess, and said: "Exalted and pious lady, you have opened my heart. Permit me to tell you, that if this evil-disposed maiden is my daughter, she has a mark, like a violet, between her shoulders, and another of the same kind on the instep of her left foot. If she will only consent to go out of the hall with me —"

"I will not consent to uncover myself before the peasant woman," interrupted Bertalda, haughtily turning her back upon her.

"But before me you certainly will," replied the duchess, gravely. "You will follow me into that room, young woman, and the worthy old lady shall go with us."

The three disappeared, and the rest continued where they were, in the hush of breathless expectation. In a few minutes the females returned, Bertalda pale as death, and the duchess said: "Justice must be done; I therefore declare, that our lady hostess has spoken the exact truth. Bertalda is the fisherman's daughter; no further proof is required; and this is all of which, on the present occasion, you need to be informed."

The princely pair went out with their adopted daughter; the fisherman, at a sign from the duke, followed them with his wife. The other guests retired in silence, or but half suppressing their murmurs, while Undine, weeping as if her heart would break, sunk into the arms of Huldbrand.

CHAPTER XII.

HOW THEY DEPARTED FROM THE CITY.

THE lord of Ringstetten would certainly have been more gratified, had the events of this day been different; but even such as they now were, he could by no means look upon them as unwelcome, since his fair wife had discovered so much natural feeling, kindness of spirit, and cordial affection.

"If I have given her a soul," he could not help saying to himself, "I have assuredly given her a better one than my own"; and now what chiefly occupied his mind was to soothe and comfort his weeping wife, and even so early as the morrow to remove her from a place, which, after this cross accident, could not fail to be distasteful to her. Yet it is certain that the opinion of the public concerning her was not changed. As something extraordinary had long before been expected of her, the mysterious discovery of Bertalda's parentage had occasioned little or no surprise; and every one who became acquainted with Bertalda's story, and with the violence of her behavior on that occasion, was only disgusted and set against her. Of this state of things, however, the knight and his lady were as yet ignorant; besides, whether the public condemned Bertalda or herself, the one view of the affair would have been as distressing to Undine as the other; and thus they came to the conclusion that the wisest course they could take was to leave behind them the walls of the old city with all the speed in their power.

With the earliest beams of morning, a brilliant carriage, for Undine, drove up to the door of the inn; the horses of Huldbrand and his attendants stood near stamping the pavement, impatient to proceed. The knight was leading his beautiful wife from the door, when a fisher-girl came up and met them in the way.

"We have no occasion for your fish," said Huldbrand, accosting her; "we are this moment setting out on a journey."

Upon this the fisher-girl began to weep bitterly, and then it was that the young couple first knew her to be Bertalda. They immediately returned with her to their apartment, where she informed them, that, owing to her unfeeling and violent conduct of the preceding day, the duke and duchess had been so displeased with her as entirely to withdraw from her their protection, though not before giving her a generous portion. The fisherman, too, had received a handsome gift, and had, the evening before, set out with his wife for their peninsula.

"I would have gone with them," she pursued, "but the old fisherman, who is said to be my father, —"

"He certainly is your father, Bertalda," said Undine, interrupting her. "Pray, consider what I tell you: the stranger, whom you took for the master of the water-works, gave me all the particulars. He wished to dissuade me from taking you with me to Castle Ringstetten, and therefore disclosed to me the whole mystery."

"Well, then," continued Bertalda, "my father, — if it must needs be so, — my father said: 'I will not take you with me until you are changed. If you will leave your home here in the city, and venture to come to us alone through the ill-omened forest, that shall be a proof of your having some regard for us. But come not to me as a lady; come merely as a fisher-girl.' I will do, therefore, just what he commanded me; for since I am abandoned by all the world, I will live and die in solitude, a poor fisher-girl with parents equally poor. The forest, indeed, appears very terrible to me. Horrible spectres make it their haunt, and I am so timorous. But how can I help it? I have only come here at this early hour, to beg the noble lady of Ringstetten to pardon my unbecoming behavior of yesterday. Dear madam, I have the fullest persuasion that you meant to do me a kindness, but you were not aware how severely you would wound and injure me; and this was the reason that, in my agony and surprise, so many rash and frantic expressions burst from my lips. Forgive me, ah, forgive me! I am in truth so unhappy already. Do but consider what I was only yesterday morning, what I was even at the beginning of your yesterday's festival, and what I am at the present moment!"

Her words now became inarticulate, lost in a passionate flow of tears, while Undine, bitterly weeping with her, fell upon her neck. So powerful was her emotion, that it was a long time before she could utter a word. But at length she said: —

"You shall still go with us to Ringstetten; all shall remain just as we lately arranged it. only, in speaking to me, pray continue to use the familiar and affectionate terms * that we have been wont to use, and do not pain me with the sound of 'madam' and 'noble lady' any more. Consider, we were changed for each other when we were children; even then we were united by a like fate, and we will strengthen this union with such close affection as no human power shall dissolve. Only, first of all, you must go with us to Ringstetten. In what manner we shall share our sisterly enjoyments there, we will leave to be talked over after we arrive."

Bertalda looked up to Huldbrand with timid inquiry. He pitied the fair girl in her affliction, took her hand, and begged her tenderly to intrust herself to him and his wife.

"We will send a message to your parents," continued he, "giving them the reason why you have not come"; and he would have added much more about his worthy friends of the peninsula, when, perceiving that Bertalda shrunk in distress at the mention of them, he refrained. Then, taking her under the arm, as they left the room, he lifted her first into the carriage, after her Undine, and was soon riding blithely beside them; so persevering was he, too, in urging forward their driver, that in a short time they had left behind them the limits of the city, and with these a crowd of painful recollections; and now the ladies experienced a satisfaction, more and more exquisite, as their carriage rolled on through the picturesque scenes which their progress was continually presenting.

After a journey of some days, they arrived, on a fine evening, at Castle Ringstetten. The young knight being much engaged with the overseers and menials of his establishment, Undine and Bertalda were left alone. Eager for novelty, they took a walk upon the high rampart of the fortress, and were charmed with the delightful landscape which fertile Suabia spread around them. While they were viewing the scene, a tall man drew near, who greeted them with respectful civility, and who seemed to Bertalda much to resemble the director of the city fountain. Still less was the resemblance to be mistaken, when Undine, indignant at his intrusion, waved him off with an air of menace; while he, shaking his head, retreated with rapid strides, as he had formerly done, then glided among the trees of a neighboring grove, and disappeared.

* The words of the original are, "nur nenne mich wieder Du," "only do call me THOU again." The use of the personal pronouns, thou and thee, so familiar and endearing in the German idiom, gives an entirely different impression in English. In the conversations of this tale examples of this peculiarity occur on almost every page. The translator has, of course, avoided a mode of expression which most of his readers would feel to be stiff, strange, and unsuitable.

"Do not be terrified, dear Bertalda," said Undine; "the hateful master of the fountain shall do you no harm this time." And then she related to her the particulars of her history, and who she was herself, — how Bertalda had been taken away from the people of the peninsula, and Undine left in her place. This relation at first filled the young maiden with amazement and alarm; she imagined her friend must be seized with a sudden madness. But, from the consistency of her story, she became more and more convinced that all was true, it so well agreed with former occurrences, and still more convinced from that inward feeling with which truth never fails to make itself known to us. She could not but view it as an extraordinary circumstance that she was herself now living, as it were, in the midst of one of those wild fictions of romance which she had formerly heard related for mere amusement. She gazed upon Undine with awe, but could not avoid feeling a shudder which seemed to separate her from her friend; and she could not but wonder when the knight, at their evening repast, showed himself so kind and full of love toward a being who appeared, after the discoveries just made, more like a phantom of the spirit-world than one of the human race.

CHAPTER XIII.

HOW THEY LIVED AT CASTLE RINGSTETTEN.

THE writer of this history, because it moves his own heart, and he wishes it may equally move the hearts of others, begs you, dear reader, to grant him a single favor. Excuse him, if he now passes over a considerable period of time, and gives you only a general account of its events. He is well aware that, perfectly conforming to the rules of art, and step by step, he might delineate the process by which Huldbrand's warmth of attachment for Undine began to decline and to be transferred to Bertalda; how Bertalda gradually became more and more attached, and met the young man's glance with the glow of love; how they both seemed rather to fear the poor wife, as a being of another species, than to sympathize with her; how Undine wept, and her tears produced remorse in the knight's heart, yet without awakening his former tenderness, so that his treatment of her would discover occasional impulses of kindness, but a cold shuddering would soon drive him from her side, and he would hasten to the society of Bertalda, as a more congenial being of his own race; — all this the writer is aware he could describe with the minute touches of truth, and perhaps this is the course that he ought to pursue. But his heart would feel the task to be too melancholy; for, having suffered calamities of this nature, he is impressed with terror even at the remembrance of their shadows.

You have probably experienced a similar feeling yourself, my dear reader, for such is the inevitable allotment of mortal man. Happy are you if you have rather endured than inflicted this misery, since, in matters of this kind, more blessed is he that receives than he that gives. For when you have been the suffering party, and such remembrances come over the mind, only a soft pensiveness steals into the soul, and perhaps a tender tear trickles down your cheek, while you regret the fading of the flowers in which you once took a delight so exquisite. But of this no more; we would not linger over the evil, and pierce our hearts with pangs a thousandfold repeated, but just briefly hint the course of events, as I said before.

Poor Undine was extremely distressed, and the other two were far from being happy; Bertalda in particular, whenever she was in the slightest degree opposed in her wishes, attributed the cause to the jealousy and oppression of the injured wife. In consequence of this suspicious temper, she was daily in the habit of discovering a haughty and imperious demeanor, to which Undine submitted in sad and painful self-denial; and such was the blind delusion of Huldbrand, he usually supported the impropriety in the most decisive terms.

What disturbed the inmates of the castle still more was the endless variety of wonderful apparitions which assailed Huldbrand and Bertalda in the vaulted passages of the building, and of which nothing had ever been heard before within the memory of man. The tall white man, in whom Huldbrand but too well recognized Undine's uncle Kuhleborn, and Bertalda the spectral master of the water-works, often passed before them with threatening aspect and gestures; more especially, however, before Bertalda, so that she had already several times fainted or fallen ill through terror, and had, in consequence, frequently thought of quitting the castle. But, partly owing to her excessive fondness for Huldbrand, as well as to a reliance on what she termed her innocence, since no declaration of mutual attachment had ever been distinctly made, and partly also because she knew not whither to direct her steps, she lingered where she was.

The old fisherman, on receiving the message from the lord of Ringstetten that Bertalda was his guest, returned answer in some lines almost too illegible to be deciphered, but still the best his advanced life and long disuse of writing permitted him to form.

"I have now become," he wrote, "a poor old widower, for my beloved and faithful wife is dead. But, lonely as I now sit in my cottage, I prefer Bertalda's remaining where she is to her living with me. Only let her do nothing to hurt my dear Undine; otherwise she will have my curse."

The last words of this letter Bertalda flung to the winds; but the permission to remain from home, which her father had granted her, she remembered and clung to, just as we are all of us wont to do in like circumstances.

One day, a few moments after Huldbrand had ridden out, Undine called together the domestics of the family and ordered them to bring a large stone, and carefully to cover with it a magnificent fountain that was situated in the middle of the castle court. The servants ventured to hint as an objection that it would oblige them to bring their water from the valley below, which was at an inconvenient distance. Undine smiled with an expression of melancholy.

"I am sorry, dear children," replied she, "to increase your labor; I would rather bring up the water-vessels myself; but this fountain must indeed be closed. Believe me when I say that it must be done, and that only by doing it can we avoid a greater evil."

The domestics were all rejoiced to gratify their gentle mistress; and, making no further inquiry, they seized the enormous stone. While they were raising it in their hands, and were now on the point of adjusting it over the fountain, Bertalda came running to the place, and cried with an air of command, that they must stop; that the water she used, so improving to her complexion, she was wont to have brought from this fountain, and that she would by no means allow it to be closed.

This time, however, while Undine showed her usual gentleness, she showed more than her usual resolution, and remained firm to her purpose; she said it belonged to her, as mistress of the castle, to direct the regulations of the household according to her own best judgment, and that she was accountable in this to no one but her lord and husband.

"See, O pray, see!" exclaimed the dissatisfied and indignant Bertalda, "how the beautiful water is curling and curving, winding and waving there, as if disturbed at being shut out from the bright sunshine, and from the cheerful view of the human countenance, for whose mirror it was created."

In truth, the water of the fountain was agitated, and foaming and hissing in a surprising manner; it seemed as if there were something within, possessing life and will, that was struggling to free itself from confinement. But Undine only the more earnestly urged on the accomplishment of her commands. This earnestness was scarcely required. The servants of the castle were as happy in obeying their sweet-tempered lady, as in opposing the haughty spirit of Bertalda; and with whatever rudeness the latter might scold and threaten, still the stone was in a few minutes lying firm over the opening of the fountain. Undine leaned thoughtfully over it, and wrote with her beautiful fingers on the flat surface. She must, however, have had something very acrid and corrosive in her hand; for when she retired, and the domestics went up to examine the stone, they discovered various strange characters upon it, which none of them had seen there before.

When the knight returned home toward evening, Bertalda received him with tears and complaints of Undine's conduct. He threw a severe look at his poor wife, and she cast down her eyes in distress. Still she spoke with great firmness: "My lord and husband, you never reprove even a bond-slave before you hear his defence, — how much less, then, your wedded wife!"

"Speak, what moved you to this singular conduct?" said the knight, with a gloomy countenance.

"I could wish to tell you when we are entirely alone," said Undine, with a sigh.

"You can tell me equally well in the presence of Bertalda," he replied.

"Yes, if you command me," said Undine; "but do not command me. Pray, pray, do not!"

She looked so humble, affectionate, and obedient, that the heart of the knight was touched and softened, as if he felt the influence of a ray from better times. He kindly took her arm within his, and led her to his apartment, where she spoke as follows: —

"You already know something, my beloved lord, of Kuhleborn, my evil-disposed uncle, and have often felt displeasure at meeting him in the passages of this castle. Several times has he terrified Bertalda even to swooning. He does this because he possesses no soul, being a mere elementary mirror of the outward world, while of the world within he can give no reflection. Then, too, he sometimes observes that you are displeased with me; that in my childish weakness I weep at this, and that Bertalda, it may be, is laughing at the same moment. Hence it is that he conceives every sort of wrong and unkindness to exist, and in various ways mixes with our circle unbidden. What do I gain by reproving him? by showing displeasure, and sending him away? He does not believe a word I say. His poor imperfect nature affords him no conception that the pains and pleasures of love have so mysterious a resemblance and are so intimately connected, that no power on earth is able to separate them. Even in the midst of tears, a smile is dawning on the cheek, and smiles call forth tears from their secret recesses."

She looked up at Huldbrand, smiling and weeping; and he again felt within his heart all the magic of his former love. She perceived it, and pressed him more tenderly to her, while with tears of joy she went on thus: —

"When the disturber of our peace would not be dismissed with words, I was obliged to shut the door upon him; and the only entrance by which he has access to us is that fountain. His connection with the other water-spirits, here in this region, is cut off by the valleys that border upon us, and his kingdom first commences farther off on the Danube, in whose tributary streams some of his good friends have their abode. For this reason I caused the stone to be placed over the opening of the fountain, and inscribed characters upon it which baffle all the efforts of my suspicious and passionate uncle, so that he now has no power of intruding either upon you or me or Bertalda. Human beings, it is true, notwithstanding the characters I have inscribed there, are able to raise the stone without any extraordinary trouble; there is nothing to prevent them. If you choose, therefore, remove it according to Bertalda's desire, but she assuredly knows not what she asks. The rude Kuhleborn looks with peculiar ill-will upon her; and should much come to pass that he has imperfectly predicted to me, and which may well happen without your meaning any evil, — I fear, I fear, my dear husband, that you yourself would be exposed to peril."

Huldbrand felt the generosity of his amiable wife in the depth of his heart, since she had been so active in confining her formidable defender, and even at the very moment she was reproached for it by Bertalda. Influenced by this feeling, he pressed her in his arms with the tenderest affection, and said with emotion: "The stone shall remain unmoved; all remains and ever shall remain just as you choose to have it, my dear, very dear Undine!"

At these long-withheld expressions of tenderness, she returned his caresses with lowly delight, and at length said: "My dearest husband, since you are so very kind and indulgent to-day, may I venture to ask a favor of you? Pray observe, it is with you as with summer. Even amid its highest splendor, summer puts on the flaming and thundering crown of glorious tempests, in which it strongly resembles a king and god on earth. You, too, are sometimes terrible in your rebukes; your eyes flash lightning, while thunder resounds in your voice; and although this may be quite becoming to you, I in my folly cannot but sometimes weep at it. But never, I entreat you, behave thus toward me on a river, or even when we are near a piece of water. For if you should, pray consider what the consequences will be: my relations would acquire a right to exercise authority over me. They would tear me from you in their fury with inexorable force, because they would conceive that one of their race was injured; and I should be compelled, as long as I lived, to dwell below in the crystal palaces, and never dare ascend to you again ; or should they send me up to you, — O God ! that would be infinitely more deplorable still. No, no, my beloved husband, let it not come to that, if your poor Undine is dear to you."

He solemnly promised to do as she desired, and, inexpressibly happy and full of affection, the married pair returned from the apartment. At this very moment Bertalda came with some work-people, whom she had meanwhile ordered to attend her, and said with a fretful air, which she had assumed of late : —

" Well, now the secret consultation is at an end, it is to be hoped the stone may come down. Go out, workmen, and execute your business."

The knight, however, highly resenting her impertinence, said in brief and very decisive terms : " The stone remains where it is." He reproved Bertalda also for the vehemence that she had shown toward his wife. Whereupon the workmen, smiling with secret satisfaction, withdrew ; while Bertalda, pale with rage, hurried away to her room.

When the hour of supper came, Bertalda was waited for in vain. They sent for her ; but the domestic found her apartments empty, and brought back with him only a sealed billet, addressed to the knight. Trembling with alarm, he tore it open, and read : —

" I feel with shame that I am only the daughter of a poor fisherman. That I for one moment forgot this, I will make expiation in the miserable hut of my parents. Farewell to you and your beautiful wife ! "

Undine was troubled at heart. Most earnestly she entreated Huldbrand to hasten after their friend, who had flown, and bring her back with him. Alas ! she had no occasion to urge him. His passion for Bertalda again burst forth with vehemence. He hurried round the castle, inquiring whether any one had seen which way the fair fugitive had gone. He could gain no information, and was already in the court on his horse, determining to take at a venture the road by which he had conducted Bertalda to the castle ; when there appeared a shield-boy, who assured him that he had met the lady on the path to the Black Valley. Swift as an arrow, the knight sprung through the gate in the direction pointed out, without hearing Undine's voice of agony, as she cried after him from the window : —

" To the Black Valley ! O, not there ! Huldbrand, not there ! or if you will go, for Heaven's sake take me with you ! "

But when she perceived that all her calling was of no avail, she ordered her white palfrey to be instantly saddled, and followed the knight, without permitting a single servant to accompany her.

CHAPTER XIV.

HOW BERTALDA RETURNED WITH THE KNIGHT.

THE Black Valley lies secluded far among the mountains. What its present name may be I am unable to say. At the time of which I am speaking, the country people gave it this appellation from the deep obscurity produced by the shadows of lofty trees, more especially by a crowded growth of firs, that covered this region of moorland. Even the brook, which gushed out among the crags, and wound its way down a ravine into the valley, assumed there the same dark hue, and showed nothing of that cheerful aspect which streams are wont to wear that have the blue sky immediately over them.

It was now the dusk of evening, and the view between the heights had become extremely wild and gloomy. The knight, in great anxiety, skirted the border of the brook ; he was at one time fearful that by delay he should allow the fugitive to advance too far before him ; and then, again, in his too eager rapidity, he was afraid he might somewhere overlook and pass by her, should she be desirous of concealing herself from his search. He had in the mean time penetrated pretty far into the valley, and might hope soon to overtake the maiden, provided he were pursuing the right track, The fear, indeed, that he might not as yet have gained this track made his heart beat with more and more of anxiety. In the stormy night, which was now impending, and which always hovered more fearfully over this valley, where would the delicate Bertalda shelter herself, should he fail to find her ? At last while these thoughts were darting across his mind, he saw something white glimmer through the branches on the ascent of the mountain. He felt quite certain that the object he discerned was Bertalda's robe, and he directed his course toward it. But his horse refused to go forward; he reared with a fury so uncontrollable, and his master was so unwilling to lose a moment, that (especially as he saw the thickets were altogether impassable on horseback) he dismounted, and, having fastened his snorting steed to an elm, worked his way with caution through the matted underwood. The branches, moistened by the cold drops of the evening dew, keenly smote his forehead and cheeks; thunder muttered remotely from the farther side of the mountain; and everything put on so strange and mystic an appearance, that he began to feel a dread of the white figure, which now lay only a short distance from him upon the ground. Still, he could see with perfect clearness that it was a female, either asleep or in a swoon, and dressed in long white garments such as Bertalda had worn the past day. Approaching quite near to her, he made a rustling with the branches and a ringing with his sword, — but she did not move.

"Bertalda!" he cried, at first low, then louder and louder; still she heard him not. At last, when he uttered the dear name with an energy yet more powerful, a hollow echo, from the mountain summits around the valley, returned the deadened sound, "BERTALDA!" Still the sleeper continued insensible. He stooped low, with a view to examine her countenance, but the duskiness of the valley and the obscurity of twilight would not allow him to distinguish her features. While with painful uncertainty he was bending over her, a flash of lightning suddenly shot across the valley. By this stream of light, he saw a frightfully distorted visage close to his own, and a hoarse voice struck him with startling abruptness: "You enamored shepherd, give me a kiss!"

Huldbrand sprang upon his feet with a cry of horror, and the hideous figure rose with him.

"Home!" it cried with a deep murmur; "the fiends are abroad. Home! or I have you!" And it stretched toward him its long white arms.

"Malicious Kuhleborn," exclaimed the knight with restored energy, "if Kuhleborn you are, what business have you here? — what's your will, you goblin! There, take your kiss!" And in fury he flashed his sword at the form. But the form vanished like vapor; and a rush of water, giving the knight as good a drenching as wetting him to the skin could make it, left him in no doubt with what foe he had been engaged.

"He wishes to frighten me back from my pursuit of Bertalda," said he to himself; "he imagines that I shall be terrified at his senseless enchantments, and resign the poor distressed girl to his power, so that he can wreak his vengeance upon her at will. But, impotent spirit of the flood! he shall find himself mistaken. What the heart of man can do, when it exerts the full force of its will, the strong energy of its noblest powers, of this the feeble enchanter has no comprehension."

He felt the truth of his words, and that, in thus giving utterance to his thoughts, he had inspired his heart with fresh courage. Fortune too appeared to favor him; for, before reaching his fastened steed, he distinctly heard the voice of Bertalda, where she was now weeping and now moaning not far before him, amid the roar of the thunder and the tempest, which every moment increased. He flew swiftly toward the sound, and found the trembling maiden, just as she was attempting to climb the steep, and striving, to the extent of her power, to escape from the dreadful darkness of this valley. He stepped before her, while he spoke in tones of the most soothing tenderness; and bold and proud as her resolution had so lately been, she now felt nothing but the liveliest joy that the man whom she so passionately loved would rescue her from this frightful solitude, and, extending to her his arms of welcome, would still cast a brightness over her existence in their reunion at the castle. She followed almost unresisting, but so spent with fatigue, that the knight was glad to support her to his horse, which he now hastily unfastened from the elm; his intention was to lift the fair wanderer upon him, and then to lead him carefully by the reins through the uncertain shades of this lowland tract.

But, owing to the mad appearance of Kuhleborn, the horse had become altogether unmanageable. Rearing and wildly snorting as he was, the knight must have used uncommon effort to mount the beast himself; to place the trembling Bertalda upon him was impossible. They were compelled, therefore, to return home on foot. While with one hand the knight drew the steed after him by the bridle, he supported the tottering Bertalda with the other She exerted all the strength she had remaining, in order to escape from this vale of terrors as speedily as possible; but weariness weighed her down like lead, and a universal trembling seized her limbs, partly in consequence of what she had suffered from the extreme harassment with which Kuhleborn had pursued her, and in part from her continual fear, arising from the roar of the tempest and thunder amid the mountain forest.

At last she slid from the arm of her conductor, and, sinking upon the moss, she said. "I can no more, let me lie here, my noble lord. I suffer the punishment due to my folly, and nothing can save me now; I must perish here through faintness and dismay."

"Never, my sweet friend, will I leave you," cried Huldbrand, vainly trying to restrain the furious animal he was leading; for the horse was all in a foam, and began to chafe more ungovernably than before, till the knight was glad merely to keep him at such a distance from the exhausted maiden as would secure her from still greater fear and alarm. But hardly had he withdrawn five steps with the frantic steed, when she began to call after him in the most sorrowful accents, fearful that he would actually leave her in this horrible wilderness. He was wholly at a loss what course to take. Gladly would he have given the enraged beast his liberty, — he would have let him rush away amid the night, and exhaust his fury, — had he not shuddered at the thought that in this narrow defile his iron-shod hoofs might come tramping and thundering over the very spot where Bertalda lay.

While he was in this extreme peril and embarrassment, a feeling of delight, not to be expressed, shot through him, when he heard the rumbling wheels of a wagon, as it came slowly descending the stony slope behind them. He called out for help: answer was returned in the deep voice of a man, bidding them have patience, but promising assistance; and two horses of grayish white soon after shone through the bushes, and near them their driver in the white frock of a carter; and next appeared a great sheet of white linen, with which the goods he seemed to be conveying were covered. The whitish grays, in obedience to a shout from their master, stood still. He came up to the knight, and aided him in checking the fury of the foaming charger.

"I know well enough," said he, "what is the matter with the brute. The first time I travelled this way my horses were just as wilful and headstrong as yours. The reason is, there is a water-spirit haunts this valley, and a wicked wight they say he is, who takes delight in mischief and witcheries of this sort. But I have learned a charm; and if you will let me whisper it in your horse's ear, he will stand just as quiet as my silver-grays there."

"Try your luck, then, and help us as quick as possible!" said the impatient knight.

Upon this the wagoner drew down the head of the rearing courser close to his own, and spoke some half-dozen words in his ear. The animal instantly stood still and subdued; only his quick panting and smoking sweat showed his recent violence.

Huldbrand had little time to inquire by what means this had been effected. He agreed with the man, that he should take Bertalda in his wagon, where, as he said, a quantity of soft cotton was stowed, and he might in this way convey her to Castle Ringstetten; the knight could accompany them on horseback. But the horse appeared to be too much exhausted to carry his master so far. Seeing this, the man advised him to mount the wagon with Bertalda. The horse could be tied to it behind.

"It is down hill," said he, "and the load for my grays will therefore be light."

The knight accepted his offer, and entered the wagon with Bertalda; the horse followed quietly after, while the wagoner, sturdy and attentive, walked beside them.

Amid the silence and deepening obscurity of the night, the tempest became more and more remote and hushed; in the comfortable feeling of their security and their commodious passage, a confidential conversation arose between Huldbrand and Bertalda. He reproved her in the most gentle and affectionate terms for her resentful flight; she excused herself with humility and feeling; and from every tone of her voice it was evident, — just as a lamp guides a lover amid the secrecy of night to his waiting mistress, — that she still cherished her former affection for him. The knight felt the sense of what she said far more than the words themselves, and he answered simply to this sense, — to the feeling and not the confession of love.

In the midst of this interchange of murmured feelings, the wagoner suddenly shouted with a startling voice: "Up, my grays, up with your feet! Hey, my hearts, now together, show your spirit! Do it handsomely! remember who you are!"

The knight bent over the side of the wagon, and saw that the horses had dashed into the midst of a foaming stream, and were, indeed, almost swimming, while the wheels of the wagon were rushing round and flashing like mill-wheels, and the teamster had got on before to avoid the swell of the flood.

"What sort of a road is this? It leads into the middle of the stream!" cried Huldbrand to his guide.

"Not at all, sir," returned he with a laugh; "it is just the contrary. The stream is running in the middle of our road. Only look about you, and see how all is overflowed."

The whole valley, in fact, was covered and in commotion, as the waters, suddenly raised and visibly rising, swept over it.

"It is Kuhleborn, that devil of a water-spirit, who wishes to drown us!" exclaimed the knight. "Have you no charm of protection against him, companion?"

"Chram! to be sure I have one," answered the wagoner, "but I cannot and must not make use of it before you know who I am."

"Is this a time for riddles?" cried the knight. "The flood is every moment rising higher and higher, and what does it concern me to know who you are?"

"But mayhap it does concern you, though," said the guide, "for I AM KUHLEBORN."

Thus speaking, he thrust his face into the wagon, and laughed with every feature distorted; but the wagon remained a wagon no longer, the grayish-white horses were horses no longer; all was transformed to foam, — all sunk into the waves that rushed and hissed around them, — while the wagoner himself, rising in the form of a gigantic surge, dragged the vainly struggling courser under the waters, then rose again huge as a liquid tower, burst over the heads of the floating pair, and was on the point of burying them irrecoverably beneath it.

At that instant the soft voice of Undine was heard through the uproar; the moon emerged through the clouds, and by its light Undine became visible on the heights above the valley. She rebuked, she threatened, the flood below her: the menacing and tower-like billow vanished muttering and murmuring; the waters gently flowed away under the beams of the moon; while Undine, like a hovering white dove, came sweeping down from the hill, raised the knight and Bertalda, and supported them to a green spot of turf, where, by her earnest efforts, she soon restored them, and dispelled their terrors. She then assisted Bertalda to mount the white palfrey on which she had herself been borne to the valley, and thus all three returned homeward to Castle Ringstetten.

CHAPTER XV.

PASSAGE DOWN THE DANUBE TO VIENNA.

AFTER this last adventure, they lived at the castle undisturbed and in peaceful enjoyment. The knight was more and more impressed with the heavenly goodness of his wife, which she had so nobly shown by her instant pursuit, and by the rescue she had effected in the Black Valley, where the power of Kuhleborn again commenced. Undine herself felt that peace and security which the mind never fails to experience so long as it has the consciousness of being in the path of rectitude; and she had this additional comfort, that, in the newly awakened love and regard of her husband, Hope and Joy were rising upon her with their myriad beams of promise.

Bertalda, on the other hand, showed herself grateful, humble, and timid, without taking to herself any merit for so doing. Whenever Huldbrand or Undine began to explain to her their reason for covering the fountain, or their adventures in the Black Valley, she would earnestly entreat them to spare her the recital, since the fountain had occasioned her too much shame, and the Black Valley too much terror, to be made topics of conversation. With respect to these, therefore, she learnt nothing further from either of them; and why was it necessary that she should be informed? Peace and Happiness had visibly taken up their abode at Castle Ringstetten. They enjoyed their present blessings in perfect security; and in relation to the future, they now imagined it impossible that life could produce anything but pleasant flowers and fruits.

In this grateful union of friendship and affection, winter came and passed away; and spring, with its foliage of tender green and its heaven of softest blue, succeeded to gladden the hearts of the inmates of the castle. The season was in harmony with their minds, and their minds imparted their own hue and tone to the season. What wonder, then, that its storks and swallows inspired them also with a disposition to travel! On a bright morning, while they were taking a walk down to one of the sources of the Danube, Huldbrand spoke of the magnificence of this noble stream, how it continued swelling as it flowed through countries enriched by its waters, with what splendor Vienna rose and sparkled on its banks, and how it grew lovelier and more imposing almost the whole of its progress.

"It must be glorious to trace its course down to Vienna!" Bertalda exclaimed, with warmth; but, immediately resuming the humble and modest demeanor she had recently shown, she paused and blushed in silence.

This slight circumstance was extremely touching to Undine; and with the liveliest wish to gratify her friend, she said: "And who or what shall prevent our taking this little voyage?"

Bertalda leapt up with delight, and the two females the same moment began painting this enchanting trip on the Danube in the most brilliant colors. Huldbrand, too, agreed to the project with pleasure; only he once whispered with something of alarm in Undine's ear: "But, at that distance, Kuhleborn becomes possessed of his power again?"

"Let him come, let him come," she answered, with a laugh; "I shall be there, and he dares do none of his mischief in my presence."

Thus was the last impediment removed; they prepared for the expedition, and soon set out upon it with lively spirits and the brightest hopes.

But be not surprised, O man, if events almost always happen very differently from what you expect. That malign power, which lies in ambush for our destruction, delights to lull its chosen victim asleep with sweet songs and golden delusions; while, on the other hand, the messenger of Heaven, sent to rescue us from peril, often thunders at our door with the violence of alarm and terror.

During the first days of their passage down the Danube, they were unusually gratified. The farther they advanced upon the waters of this proud river, the views became more and more picturesque and attractive. But here, amid scenes otherwise most delicious, and from which they had promised themselves the purest delight, here again the stubborn Kuhleborn, dropping all disguise, began to show his power of annoying them. He had no other means of doing this, indeed, than mere tricks and illusions, for Undine often rebuked the swelling waves or the contrary winds, and then the insolence of the enemy was instantly humbled and subdued; but his attacks were renewed, and Undine's reproofs again became necessary; so that the pleasure of this little water-party was completely destroyed. The boatmen, too, were continually whispering to one another in dismay, and eying their three superiors with distrust; while even the servants began more and more to form dismal surmises, and to watch their master and mistress with looks of suspicion.

Huldbrand often said to himself, in the silence of his soul: "This comes to pass when like marries not like,—when a man forms an unnatural union with a female of the sea." Still, excusing himself, as we are most of us so fond of doing, he frequently pursued a train of thought like this: "I did not, in fact, know that she was a maid of the sea. It is my misfortune that all my steps are haunted and disturbed by the wild humors of her kindred, but it is not my crime."

Making reflections like these, he felt himself in some measure strengthened; but, on the other hand, he only the more entertained a feeling of ill-humor against Undine, almost amounting to malevolence. He cast upon her glances of fretfulness and ill-nature, and the unhappy wife but too well understood their meaning.

One day, grieved by this unkindness, as well as exhausted by her continual exertions to foil the artifices of Kuhleborn, while rocked and soothed by the gentle motion of the bark, she, toward evening, fell into a deep slumber. But hardly had she closed her eyes, when every person in the boat, in whatever direction he might look upon the water, saw the head of a man, beyond imagination frightful: each head rose out of the waves, not like that of a person swimming, but quite perpendicular, as if firmly fastened to the watery mirror, and yet moving on with the bark. Every one wished to show to his companion what terrified himself, and each perceived the same expression of horror on the face of the other, only his hand and eye were directed to a different quarter, as if to a point where the monster, half laughing and half threatening, rose opposite to himself.

When, however, they wished to make one another understand the sight, and all cried out, "Look there!" "No, there!" the frightful heads all became visible to each, and the whole river around the boat swarmed with the most horrible faces. All raised a scream of terror at the sight, and Undine started from sleep. The moment she opened her eyes upon the mad group the deformed visages disappeared. But Huldbrand was made furious by so many hideous visions. He would have burst out in wild imprecations, had not Undine, with the most submissive air, and in the gentlest tone of supplication, thus entreated him: —

"For God's sake, my husband, do not express displeasure against me here, — we are on the water."

The knight was silent, and sat down, absorbed in deep thought. Undine whispered in his ear: "Would it not be better, my love, to give up this foolish voyage, and return to Castle Ringstetten in peace?"

But Huldbrand murmured wrathfully: "So I must become a prisoner in my own castle? and not be allowed to breathe a moment but while the fountain is covered? Would to Heaven that your cursed kindred —"

At these fatal words, Undine pressed her fair hand on his lips with the most touching tenderness. He said no more, but, assuming an air of composure, pondered on all that Undine had lately warned him to avoid.

Bertalda, meanwhile, had given herself up to a crowd of wild and wandering thoughts. Of Undine's origin she knew a good deal, but not the whole; and the terrible Kuhleborn especially remained to her an awful, an impenetrable mystery; never, indeed, had she once heard his name. Musing upon this series of wonders, she unclasped, without being fully conscious of what she was doing, a gold necklace which Huldbrand, on one of the preceding days of their passage, had bought for her of a travelling trader; and she was now letting it swing in sport just over the surface of the stream, while, in her dreamy mood, she enjoyed the bright reflection it threw on the water, so clear beneath the glow of evening. That instant a huge hand flashed suddenly up from the Danube, seized the necklace in its grasp, and vanished with it beneath the flood. Bertalda shrieked aloud, and a laugh of mockery and contempt came pealing up from the depth of the river.*

The knight could now restrain his wrath no longer. He started up, gazed fiercely upon the deep, poured forth a torrent of reproaches, heaped curses upon all who interfered with his friends or troubled his life,

* This fine passage of Fouqué bears a strong resemblance to a finer one in Southey's "Thalaba," Book V.: —

"And he drew off Abdaldar's ring,
And cast it in the gulf.
A skinny hand came up,
And caught it as it fell,
And peals of devilish laughter shook the cave"

The reader, if he take any interest in the coincidences of genius, may like to compare with these passages the following verse from King Arthur's death, in Percy's "Reliques": —

"A hande and an arme did meet the sworde,
And flourish'd three times in the air,
Then sunke beneathe the rennинge streme,
And of the duke was seene noe marr"

See, also, this same incident of the Hand very strongly pictured in Tennyson's "Morte d'Arthur." The whole poem, indeed, is so full of power, beauty, and tenderness, that we hope the author will take a hint from it, as a suggestion of his good genius, relative to his talent in this style of composition.

and dared them all, water-spirits or mermaids, to come within the sweep of his sword.

Bertalda, meantime, wept for the loss of the ornament so very dear to her heart, and her tears were to Huldbrand as oil poured upon the flame of his fury; while Undine held her hand over the side of the boat, dipping it in the waves, softly murmuring to herself, and only at times interrupting her strange, mysterious whisper, when she addressed her husband in a voice of entreaty. "Do not reprove me here, beloved; blame all others as you will, but here, do not reprove me here. Surely you know the reason!" And, in truth, though he was trembling with excess of passion, he, with strong effort, kept himself from uttering a single word against her.

She then brought up in her wet hand, which she had been holding under the waves, a coral necklace of such exquisite beauty, such sparkling brilliancy, as dazzled the eyes of all who beheld it. "Take this," said she, holding it out kindly to Bertalda; "I have ordered it to be brought, to make some amends for your loss, and do not, dear heart, be troubled any more."

But the knight rushed between them, and, snatching the beautiful ornament out of Undine's hand, hurled it back into the flood, and in a flame of rage exclaimed: "So, then, you have a connection with them forever? In the name of all witches and enchanters, go and remain among them with your presents, you sorceress, and leave us human beings in peace!"

But poor Undine, with a look of mute amazement and eyes streaming with tears, gazed on him, her hand still stretched out, just as it was when she had so lovingly offered her brilliant gift to Bertalda. She then began to weep more and more, as if her heart would break, like a tender, innocent child, very bitterly grieved. At last, all wearied out, she said:—

"Alas, dearest, all is over now,—farewell! They shall do you no harm; only remain true, that I may have power to keep them from you. But I, alas, must go away, I must go away, even in this early dawn of youth and bliss. O woe, woe, what have you done! O woe, woe!"

And she vanished over the side of the boat. Whether she plunged into the stream, or whether, like water melting into water, she flowed away with it, they knew not, her disappearance so much resembled both united, and neither by itself. But she was gone, gliding on with the Danube, instantly and completely; only little waves were yet whispering and sobbing around the boat,* and they seemed almost distinctly to say, "O woe, woe! Ah, remain true! O woe!"

But Huldbrand, in a passion of burning tears, threw himself upon the deck of the bark, and a deep swoon soon wrapped the wretched man in a blessed forgetfulness of misery.

CHAPTER XVI.

WHAT FURTHER HAPPENED TO HULDBRAND.

THE brief period of our mourning,—ought we to view it as a misfortune or as a blessing? I mean that deep mourning of the heart which gushes up from the very well-springs of our being; that mourning, which becomes so perfectly one with the lost object of our affection, that this even ceases to be a lost thing to the sorrowing heart; and which desires to make the whole life a holy office dedicated to the image of the departed, until we, too, pass that bourne which separates it from our view.

Some men there are, indeed, who have this profound tenderness of spirit, and who thus consecrate their affections to the memory of the departed; but still their mourning softens into an emotion of gentle melancholy, having none of the intenseness of the first agony of separation. Other and foreign images intervene, and impress themselves upon the mind; we learn at last the transitory nature of everything earthly, even from that of our affliction; and I cannot, therefore, but view it as a misfortune that the period of our mourning is so brief.

The lord of Ringstetten learnt the truth of this by experience; but whether he derived any advantage from the knowledge, we shall discover in the sequel of this history. At first he could do nothing but weep, weep as bitterly as the poor amiable Undine had wept, when he snatched out of her hand that brilliant ornament, with which she so beautifully wished to make amends for Bertalda's loss. And then he stretched his hand out as she had done, and wept again like her with renewed violence. He cherished a secret hope that even the springs of life would at last become exhausted by weeping; and, when we have been severely afflicted, has not a similar thought passed through the minds of many of us with a painful pleasure? Bertalda wept with him; and they lived together a long while at Castle Ringstetten in undisturbed quiet, honoring the memory of Undine, and having almost wholly forgotten their former attachment.

Owing to this tender remembrance of Huldbrand, and to encourage him in conduct so exemplary, the good Undine, about this time, often visited his dreams; she soothed him with soft and affectionate caresses, and then went away again, weeping in silence; so that when he awoke he sometimes knew not how his cheeks came to be so wet, — whether it was caused by her tears, or only by his own.

But as time advanced, these visions became less frequent, and the severity of the knight's sorrow was softened; still, he might never while he lived, it may be, have entertained any other wish than thus to think of Undine in silence, and to speak of her in conversation, had not the old fisherman arrived unexpectedly at the castle, and earnestly insisted on Bertalda's returning with him, as his child. He had received information of Undine's disappearance, and he was not willing to allow Bertalda to continue longer at the castle with the now unmarried knight. "For," said he, "whether my daughter loves me or not, is at present what I care not to know; but her good name is at stake, and where that commands or forbids, not a word more need be said."

This resolution of the old fisherman, and the fearful solitude that, on Bertalda's departure, threatened to oppress the knight in every hall and passage of the deserted castle, brought a circumstance into distinct consciousness, which, owing to his sorrow for Undine, had of late been slumbering and completely forgotten, — I mean his attachment for the fair Bertalda; and this he made known to her father.

The fisherman had many objections to make to the proposed marriage. The old man had loved Undine with exceeding tenderness, and it was doubtful to his mind whether the mere disappearance of his beloved child could be properly viewed as her death. But, were it even granted that her corse were lying stiff and cold at the bottom of the Danube, or swept away by the current to the ocean, still Bertalda would not be guiltless in her death; and it was unfitting for her to step into the place of the poor banished wife. The fisherman, however, had felt a strong regard also for the knight: this, and the entreaties of his daughter, who had become much more gentle and respectful, as well as her tears for Undine, all exerted their influence; and he must at last have been forced to give up his opposition, for he remained at the castle without objection, and a courier was sent off express to Father Heilmann, who, in former and happier days, had united Undine and Huldbrand, requesting him to come and perform the ceremony at the knight's second marriage.

But hardly had the holy man read through the letter from the lord of Ringstetten ere he set out upon the journey, and made much greater despatch on his way to the castle than the messenger from there had made in reaching him. Whenever his breath failed him in his rapid progress, or his old limbs ached with fatigue, he would say to himself: "Perhaps I may still be in season to prevent a sin; then sink not, weak and withered body, before I arrive at the end of my journey!" And with renewed vigor he pressed forward, hurrying on without rest or repose, until, late one evening, he entered the embowered court-yard of Castle Ringstetten.

The betrothed pair were sitting arm in arm under the trees, and the aged fisherman, in a thoughtful mood, sat near them. The moment they saw Father Heilmann they rose with a spring of joy, and pressed round him with eager welcome. But he, in few words, urged the bridegroom* to accompany him into the castle; and when Huldbrand stood mute with surprise, and delayed complying with his earnest request, the pious priest said to him :—

"Why do I then defer speaking, my lord of Ringstetten, until I can address you in private? There is no occasion for the delay of a moment. What I have to say as much concerns Bertalda and the fisherman as yourself; and what we cannot avoid hearing at some time, it is best to hear as soon as possible. Are you then so very certain, Knight Huldbrand, that your first wife is actually dead? It hardly appears so to me. I will say nothing, indeed, of the mysterious state in which she may be now existing; in truth, I know nothing of it with certainty. But that she was a most devoted and faithful wife, so much is beyond all dispute. And for fourteen nights past she has appeared to me in a dream, standing at my bedside, wringing her tender hands in anguish, and imploring me with deep sighs: 'Ah, prevent him, dear father! I am still living! Ah! save his life! ah! save his soul!'

"What this vision of the night could mean, I was at first unable to divine; then came your messenger, and I have now hastened hither, not to unite, but, as I hope, to separate, what ought not to be joined together. Leave her, Huldbrand! Leave him, Bertalda! He still belongs to another; and do you not see on his pale cheek the traces of that grief which the disappearance of his wife has produced there? That is not the look of a bridegroom, and the spirit breathes the presage on my soul: 'If you do not leave him, you will never, never be happy.'"

The three felt in their inmost hearts that Father Heilmann spoke the truth; but still they affected not to believe him, or they strove rather to resist their conviction. Even the old fisherman had become so infatuated, that he conceived the marriage to be now indispensable, as they had so often, during the time he had been with them, mutually agreed to the arrangement. They all, therefore, with a determined and gloomy eagerness, struggled against the representations and warnings of the holy man, until, shaking his head and oppressed with sorrow, he finally quitted the castle, not choosing to accept their offered shelter even for a single night, or indeed so much as to taste a morsel of the refreshment they brought him. Huldbrand persuaded himself, however, that the priest was a mere visionary, and sent at daybreak to a monk of the nearest monastery, who, without scruple, promised to perform the ceremony in a few days.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE KNIGHT'S DREAM.

It was at the earliest moment of dawn, when night begins faintly to brighten into morning twilight, that Huldbrand was lying on his couch, half waking and half sleeping. Whenever he attempted to compose himself to sleep, he was seized with an undefined terror, that made him shrink back from the enjoyment, as if his slumber were crowded with spectres. But whenever he made an effort to rouse himself, the wings of a swan seemed to be waving around him, and soothing him with the music of their motion, and thus in a soft delusion of the senses he sunk back into his state of imperfect repose.

At last, however, he must have fallen perfectly asleep; for, while the sound of the swan-wings was murmuring around him, he seemed to be lifted by their regular strokes, and to be wafted far away over land and sea, and still their music swelled on his ear most sweetly. "The music of the swan! the song of the swan!" he could not but repeat to himself every moment; "is it not a sure foreboding of death?" Probably, however, it had yet another meaning. All at once he seemed to be hovering over the Mediterranean Sea. A swan with her loud melody sung in his ear, that this was the Mediterranean Sea; and while he was looking down upon the waves, they became transparent as crystal, so that he could see through them to the very bottom.

At this a thrill of delight shot through him, for he could see Undine, where she was sitting beneath the clear domes of crystal. It is true, she was weeping very bitterly, and such was the excess of her grief that she bore only a faint resemblance to the bright and joyous being she had been during those happy days they had lived together at Castle Ringstetten, both on their arrival there and afterward, a short time before they set out upon their fatal passage down the Danube.

The knight could not avoid dwelling upon all this with deep emotion, but it did not appear that Undine was aware of his presence.

Kuhleborn had meanwhile approached her, and was about to reprove her for weeping, when she assumed the boldness of superiority, and looked upon him with an air so majestic and commanding, that he was wellnigh terrified and confounded by it.

"Although I too now dwell here beneath the waters," said she, "yet I have brought my soul with me; and therefore I may well be allowed to weep, little as you may conceive the meaning of such tears. They are even a blessed privilege, as everything is such a privilege to one gifted with the true soul."

He shook his head with disbelief of what she said, and, after musing a moment or two, replied. "And yet, niece, you are subject to our laws of the element, as a being of the same nature with ourselves; and, should HE prove unfaithful to you and marry again, you are obliged to take away his life."

"He remains a widower to this very hour," replied Undine, "and he still loves me with the passion of a sorrowful heart."

"He is, however, a bridegroom withal," said Kuhleborn, with a chuckle of scorn; "and let only a few days wear away, and anon comes the priest with his nuptial blessing, and then you must go up and execute your share of the business, the death of the husband with two wives."

"I have not the power," returned Undine, with a smile. "Do you not remember? I have sealed up the fountain securely, not only against myself but all of the same race."

"Still, should he leave his castle," said Kuhleborn, "or should he once allow the fountain to be uncovered, what then? for doubtless he thinks there is no great murder in such trifles." *

"For that very reason," said Undine, still smiling amid her tears, "for that very reason he is this moment hovering in spirit here over the Mediterranean Sea, and dreaming of this voice of warning which our conversation affords him. With a view to give him this warning I have studiously disposed the whole vision."

That instant Kuhleborn, inflamed with rage, looked up at the knight, wrathfully threatened him, stamped upon the ground, and then, swift as the passion that possessed him, sprang up from beneath the waves. He seemed to swell in his fury to the size of a whale. Again the swans began to sing, to wave their wings, to fly; the knight seemed to be soaring away over mountains and streams, and at last to alight at Castle Ringstetten, where he awoke upon his couch.

Upon his couch he actually did awake, and his attendant, entering at the same moment, informed him that Father Heilmann was still lingering in the neighborhood; that he had, the evening before, met with him in the forest, where he was sheltering, himself under a booth, which he had formed by interweaving the branches of trees, and covering them with moss and fine brushwood; and that to the question, 'What he was doing there, since he had so firmly refused to perform the nuptial ceremony?' his answer was: —

"There are yet other ceremonies to perform, besides those at the altar of marriage; and though I did not come to officiate at the wedding, I can still officiate at a very different solemnity. All things have their season, and we must be ready for them all. Besides, marrying and mourning are by no means very far from each other, as every one, not wilfully blinded, must know full well."

In consequence of these words and of his dream, the knight made a variety of reflections, some wild and some not unmixed with alarm. But a man is apt to consider it very disagreeable to give over an affair which he has once settled in his mind as certain, and therefore all went on just according to the old arrangement.

CHAPTER XVIII.

HOW THE KNIGHT HULDBRAND SOLEMNIZED HIS MARRIAGE.

SHOULD I relate to you the events of the marriage festival at Castle Ringstetten, it would seem as if you were viewing a crowded assemblage of bright and joyous things, but all overspread with a black mourning crape, through whose darkening veil the whole splendor appeared less to resemble pleasure than a mockery of the nothingness of all earthly joys.

* "Denn er denkt gewiss blutwenig an alle diese Dinge." "For he surely thinks very little of all these things." The temptation to render this odd idiom, blutwenig, by some equivalent phrase in English was a whim too strong to be resisted.

It was not that any spectral visitation disturbed the scene of festivity; for the castle, as we well know, had been secured against the mischief and menaces of water-spirits. But the knight, the fisherman, and all the guests, were unable to banish the feeling that the chief personage of the feast was still wanting, and that this chief personage could be no other than the amiable Undine, so dear to them all.

Whenever a door was heard to open, all eyes were involuntarily turned in that direction; and if it was nothing but the steward with new dishes, or the cup-bearer with a supply of wine of higher flavor than the last, they again looked down in sadness and disappointment; while the flashes of wit and merriment that had been passing at times from one to another ceased, and were succeeded by tears of mournful remembrance.

The bride was the least thoughtful of the company, and therefore the most happy; but even she, occasionally, found it difficult to realize the fact that she was sitting at the head of the table, wearing a green garland and gold-embroidered garments, while Undine was lying a corse, stiff and cold, at the bottom of the Danube, or carried out by the current into the ocean. For, ever since her father had suggested something of this sort, his words were continually sounding in her ear; and this day, in particular, they would neither fade from her memory nor yield to other thoughts.

Evening had scarcely arrived, when the company returned to their homes; not dismissed by the impatience of the bridegroom, as wedding-parties are sometimes broken up, but constrained solely by painful associations, joyless melancholy, and forebodings of evil. Bertalda retired with her maidens, and the knight with his attendants, to undress; but these young bridemaids and bridemen, such was the gloomy tenor of this festival, made no attempt to amuse bride or bridegroom with the usual pleasantry and frolicsome good-humor of the occasion.

Bertalda wished to awake a livelier spirit; she ordered them to spread before her a brilliant set of jewels, a present from Huldbrand, together with rich apparel and veils, that she might select from among them the brightest and most beautiful for her dress in the morning. The attendants rejoiced at this opportunity of pouring forth good wishes and promises of happiness to their young mistress, and failed not to extol the beauty of the bride with their liveliest eloquence. They became more and more absorbed in this admiration and flattery, until Bertalda at last, looking in a mirror, said with a sigh:—

"Ah, but do you not see plainly how freckled I am growing? Look here on the side of my neck."

They looked at the place, and found the freckles, indeed, as their fair mistress had said; but they called them mere beauty-spots, the faintest touches of the sun, such as would only heighten the whiteness of her delicate complexion. Bertalda shook her head, and still viewed them as a blemish.

"And I could remove them," she said at last, sighing. "But the castle-fountain is covered, from which I formerly used to have that precious water, so purifying to the skin. O, had I this evening only a single flagon of it!"

"Is that all?" cried an alert waiting-maid, laughing, as she glided out of the apartment.

"She will not be so frantic," said Bertalda, in a voice of inquiry and agreeably surprised, "as to cause the stone cover of the fountain to be taken off this very evening?"

That instant they heard the tread of men already passing along the court-yard, and could see from the window where the officious girl was leading them directly up to the fountain, and that they carried levers and other instruments on their shoulders.

"It is certainly my will," said Bertalda with a smile, "if it does not take them too long." And, pleased with the thought that the merest hint from her was now sufficient to accomplish what had formerly been refused with a painful reproof, she looked down upon their operations in the bright moonlight of the castle court.

The men seized the enormous stone, as if they must exert all their strength in raising it; some one of their number indeed would occasionally sigh, when he recollected they were destroying the work of their former beloved mistress. Their labor, however, was much lighter than they had expected. It seemed as if some power from within the fountain itself aided them in raising the stone.

"It certainly appears," said the workmen to one another in astonishment, "as if the confined water were become a jet or spouting fountain." And the stone rose more and more, and, almost without the assistance of the work-people, rolled slowly away upon the pavement with a hollow sound. But an appearance, from the opening of the fountain, filled them with awe, as it rose like a white column of water: at first they imagined it to be a spouting fountain in good earnest, until they perceived the rising form to be a pale female, veiled in white. She wept bitterly, raised her hands above her head, and wrung them with anguish, as with slow and solemn step she moved toward the castle. The servants shrunk back, and fled from the fountain; while the bride, pale and motionless with horror, stood with her maidens at the window from which she had been viewing what passed without. When the figure had now come close beneath their room, it looked up to them and uttered the low moaning of misery, and Bertalda thought she recognized through the veil the pale features of Undine. But the mourning form passed on, as sad, reluctant, and lingering as if going to the place of execution. Bertalda screamed to her maids to call the knight: not one of them dared to stir from her place; and even the bride herself became again mute, as if trembling at the sound of her own voice.

While they continued standing at the window, overpowered with terror and motionless as statues, the mysterious wanderer entered the castle, ascended the well-known stairs, and traversed the well-known halls, her tears ever flowing in silent woe. Alas, with what different emotions had she once passed through these rooms!

The knight had, in the mean time, dismissed his attendants. Half undressed, and in deep dejection, he was standing before a large mirror; a wax taper burned dimly beside him. At this moment he heard a low tapping at his door; the least perceptible touch of a finger. Undine had formerly tapped in this way when she wished to amuse him with her endearing sportiveness.

"It is all illusion! a mere freak of fancy!" said he to himself. "I must to my nuptial bed."

"You must, indeed, but to a cold one!" he heard a voice, choked with sobs, repeat from without; and then he saw, in the mirror, that the door of his room was slowly, slowly opened, and the white wanderer entered, and gently secured it behind her.

"They have opened the fountain," said she, in a low tone; "and now I am here, and you must die."

He felt in the shock and death-pause of his heart that this must, indeed, be his doom; but, covering his eyes with his hands, he cried: "Do not, in my death-hour, do not drive me to distraction with terror. If you have a visage of horror behind that veil, do not lift it! Take my life, but let me not see you."

"Alas!" replied the wanderer, "will you not, then, look upon me once more? I am as beautiful now as when you wooed me on the peninsula!"

"O, would to God it were so!" sighed Huldbrand; "and that I might die by a kiss from you!"

"Most willingly do I grant your wish, my dearest love," said she. And as she threw back her veil, her dear face met his view, smiling with celestial beauty. Trembling with love and the awe of approaching death, the knight stooped to give and receive the embrace. She kissed him with the holy kiss of heaven; but she relaxed not her hold, pressing him more passionately in her arms, and weeping as if she would weep away her soul. Tears rushed into the knight's eyes, while a thrill, both of bliss and agony,* shot through his heart, until he at last expired, sinking softly back from her fair arms, and resting upon the pillow of his couch, a corse.

"I have wept him to death!" said she to some domestics, who met her in the antechamber; and, passing through the terrified group, she went slowly out and disappeared in the fountain.

* The expression of the original is, "lieblichen Wehe," a blissful agony or pang. This union of opposite qualities, however bold the conception producing it, and however suited to express the death-pang under such circumstances, forms a curious felicity, rather too violent to be often admitted in English. Phrases of this kind are more familiar in German.

CHAPTER XIX

HOW THE KNIGHT HULDBRAND WAS BURIED

FATHER HEILMANN had returned to the castle as soon as the death of the lord of Ringstetten was made known in the neighborhood, and he arrived at the very hour when the monk, who had married the unfortunate couple, was hurrying from the door, overcome with dismay and horror

When Father Heilmann was informed of this, he replied "It is all well, and now come the duties of my office, in which I have no need of an assistant"

He then began to console the bride, now become a widow, small as was the advantage her worldly and light-minded spirit derived from his kindness

The old fisherman, on the other hand, though severely afflicted, was far more resigned in regard to the fate of his son in law and the calamity of his daughter, and while Bertalda could not refrain from accusing Undine as a murderess and sorceress, the old man calmly said "The event, after all, could not have happened otherwise I see nothing in it but the judgment of God, and no one, I am sure, could have his heart more pierced by the death of Huldbrand, than she who was obliged to accomplish his doom, — the poor forsaken Undine!"

He then assisted in arranging the funeral solemnities as suited the rank of the deceased The knight was to be interred in a village churchyard, in whose consecrated ground were the graves of his ancestors, a place which they, as well as himself, had endowed with rich privileges and gifts His shield and helmet lay upon his coffin, ready to be lowered with it into the grave, for Lord Huldbrand, of Ringstetten, had died the last of his race, the mourners began their sorrowful march, lifting the melancholy wail of their dirges amid the calm, unclouded heaven, Father Heilmann preceded the procession, bearing a lofty crucifix, while Bertalda followed in her misery, supported by her aged father

While proceeding in this manner, they suddenly saw, in the midst of the dark-habited mourning females in the widow's train, a snow-white figure, closely veiled, and wringing its hands in the wild vehemence of sorrow. Those next to whom it moved, seized with a secret dread, started back, or on one side; and, owing to their movements, the others, next to whom the white stranger now came, were terrified still more, so as to produce almost a complete disarrangement of the funeral train Some of the military escort ventured to address the figure, and attempt to remove it from the procession, but it seemed to vanish from under their hands, and yet was immediately seen advancing again, with slow and solemn step, among the followers of the body At last, in consequence of the shrinking away of the attendants, it came close behind Bertalda It now moved so slowly that the widow was not aware of its presence, and it walked meekly on behind, neither suffering nor creating disturbance

This continued until they came to the churchyard, where the procession formed a circle round the open grave Then it was that Bertalda perceived her unbidden companion, and prompted half by anger and half by terror, she commanded her to depart from the knight's place of final rest But the veiled female, shaking her head with a gentle refusal, raised her hands toward Bertalda, in lowly supplication, by which she was greatly moved, and could not but remember with tears how Undine had shown such sweetness of spirit on the Danube, when she held out to her the coral necklace

Father Heilmann now motioned with his hand, and gave order for all to observe perfect stillness, that over the body, whose mound was wellnigh formed, they might breathe a prayer of silent devotion Bertalda knelt, without speaking, and all knelt, even the grave diggers, who had now finished their work But when they rose from this breathing of the heart, the white stranger had disappeared On the spot where she had kneeled, a little spring of silver brightness was gushing out from the green turf, and it kept swelling and flowing onward, with a low murmur, till it almost encircled the mound of the knight's grave; it then continued its course, and emptied itself into a calm lake, which lay by the side of the consecrated ground Even to this day the inhabitants of the village point out the spring; and they cannot but cherish the belief that it is the poor deserted Undine, who in this manner still fondly encircles her beloved in her arms.

INTRODUCTION.

COLONEL CAPPER, in his "Observations on the Passage to India," observes: "'The Arabian Nights' contain much curious and useful observation. They are universally read and admired throughout Asia by all ranks of men, both old and young. Considered, therefore, as an original work, descriptive as they are of the manners and customs of the East in general, and of the Arabians in particular, they surely must be thought to merit the attention of the curious. Nor are they, in my opinion, destitute of merit in other respects; for, although the extravagance of some of the stories is carried too far, yet on the whole one cannot help admiring the fancy and invention of the author in striking out such a variety of pleasing incidents, — pleasing I will call them, because they have frequently afforded me much amusement; nor do I envy any man his feelings who is above being pleased with them. But before any person decides upon the merit of these books he should be an eyewitness of the effect they produce on those who best understand them. I have more than once seen the Arabians in the desert, sitting round a fire, listening to these stories with such attention and pleasure as totally to forget the fatigue and hardship with which an instant before they were entirely overcome."

The great Orientalist, Silvester de Sacy, in his essay on the "Thousand and One Nights," says: —

"The literature of the East possesses no other works which could have obtained in Europe such celebrity and favor as has been accorded to 'Pilpay's Fables' and the stories of 'The Thousand and One Nights.' They have been translated into almost every language, and their readers have been legion. Their unequalled popularity is not, however, surprising, for they are at once calculated to charm and instruct: they possess for the youthful reader an indescribable fascination, and even the reader of riper years may turn to them at times to find relaxation and amusement. The vaunted antiquity and wisdom of the laws of Menoo, the oracular and sententious obscurity of the sacred books of the Chinese, the majestic and almost inspired eloquence of the Koran, the lofty epic of Valmiki, the sublime songs of Homer himself, or the transcendent meditations of Plato, — all these grand monuments of the human mind cannot rival in the foregoing respect these two books, which have, moreover, occasioned no revolution in the world, and have neither caused blood to flow, nor armed sect against sect and nation against nation. . . . . .

"Its success, each day increasing, has suffered nothing from the caprices of fashion or the change of manners. The drama of Schiller has supplanted the obsolete tragedy of Sophocles and Corneille. A deluge of crude recollections, vain and frivolous, not to give it a harsher designation, collected under the influence of interested views and personal passions, has put to silence the severe muse of history, — the science of Bodin and Montesquieu, the art of Sully and Colbert, have become the possession of all; and, no longer folded in mystery, supply in our writings, as well as in our salons, entertainment and amusement. Still the 'Thousand and One Nights' have always found editors, and expectation has been incessantly turned to the East for the completion of that long and wonderful succession of tales." . . . .

"It appears to me to have been originally written in Syria, and in the common language; that it was never finished by its author, whether from death or any other cause; that subsequently others have endeavored to complete it, either by adding tales which were already known, though not belonging to the collection, or embodying their own original productions, more or less ingenious, which would account for the extreme dissimilarity to be remarked between many of the tales in the collection; — that this is also the reason why there is a want of unity as to the dénouement, of which there are two different accounts; that the additional stories were appended at different periods, perhaps in different countries, though probably chiefly in Egypt; and, finally, that all that can be asserted with any degree of probability relative to the date of the composition of this book is, that it is not ancient, — as is proved by the language in which it is written. This observation will therefore give the date of the composition of the collection somewhere in the middle of the ninth century of the Hegira, which makes its age to be about four hundred years."

Whatever doubt, however, may exist as to the particular country to which the "Arabian Nights" belong, it is generally admitted that they have been derived from the East. The Venetians, in whose hands the trade of the East almost exclusively rested in the Middle Ages, brought home and naturalized in Europe many of the Arabian fictions; and the Crusaders and the minstrels who accompanied them introduced many more. It is to the East, indeed, that we are indebted for many of our popular stories, more especially our nursery tales. The story of "Jack the Giant-Killer" has been traced by Sir John Malcolm to Persia. Mr. Morier and Sir William Ouseley found among the same people the tradition of "Whittington and his Cat," where the descendants of the old woman who was Puss's owner became sovereigns of the country. Mr. Keightley, an author of considerable research and ability, conceives that the story of "Sindbad the Sailor" was originally derived by the Arabs from the "Odyssey" of Homer, and that it has travelled back to Europe in the new shape into which Oriental imagination has moulded it. Some of the adventures, it cannot be denied, have great similarity to those of Ulysses; but there appears to have been some other and more generally accessible Oriental source for the tale in question. It has been also supposed to be Chinese. The other tales are involved in similar obscurities; but their great fascination and attractiveness are elements that have never been questioned.

In the present translation of the "Thousand and One Nights," or, as it is generally known, the "Arabian Nights' Entertainments," the division into nights was omitted, and the conversation which is supposed to pass between Schahriar, Scheherazade, and Dinarzade, whenever daylight appears, interrupting the progress of the narration, was inserted only rarely, in order to avoid weakening the unity and sequence of the stories.

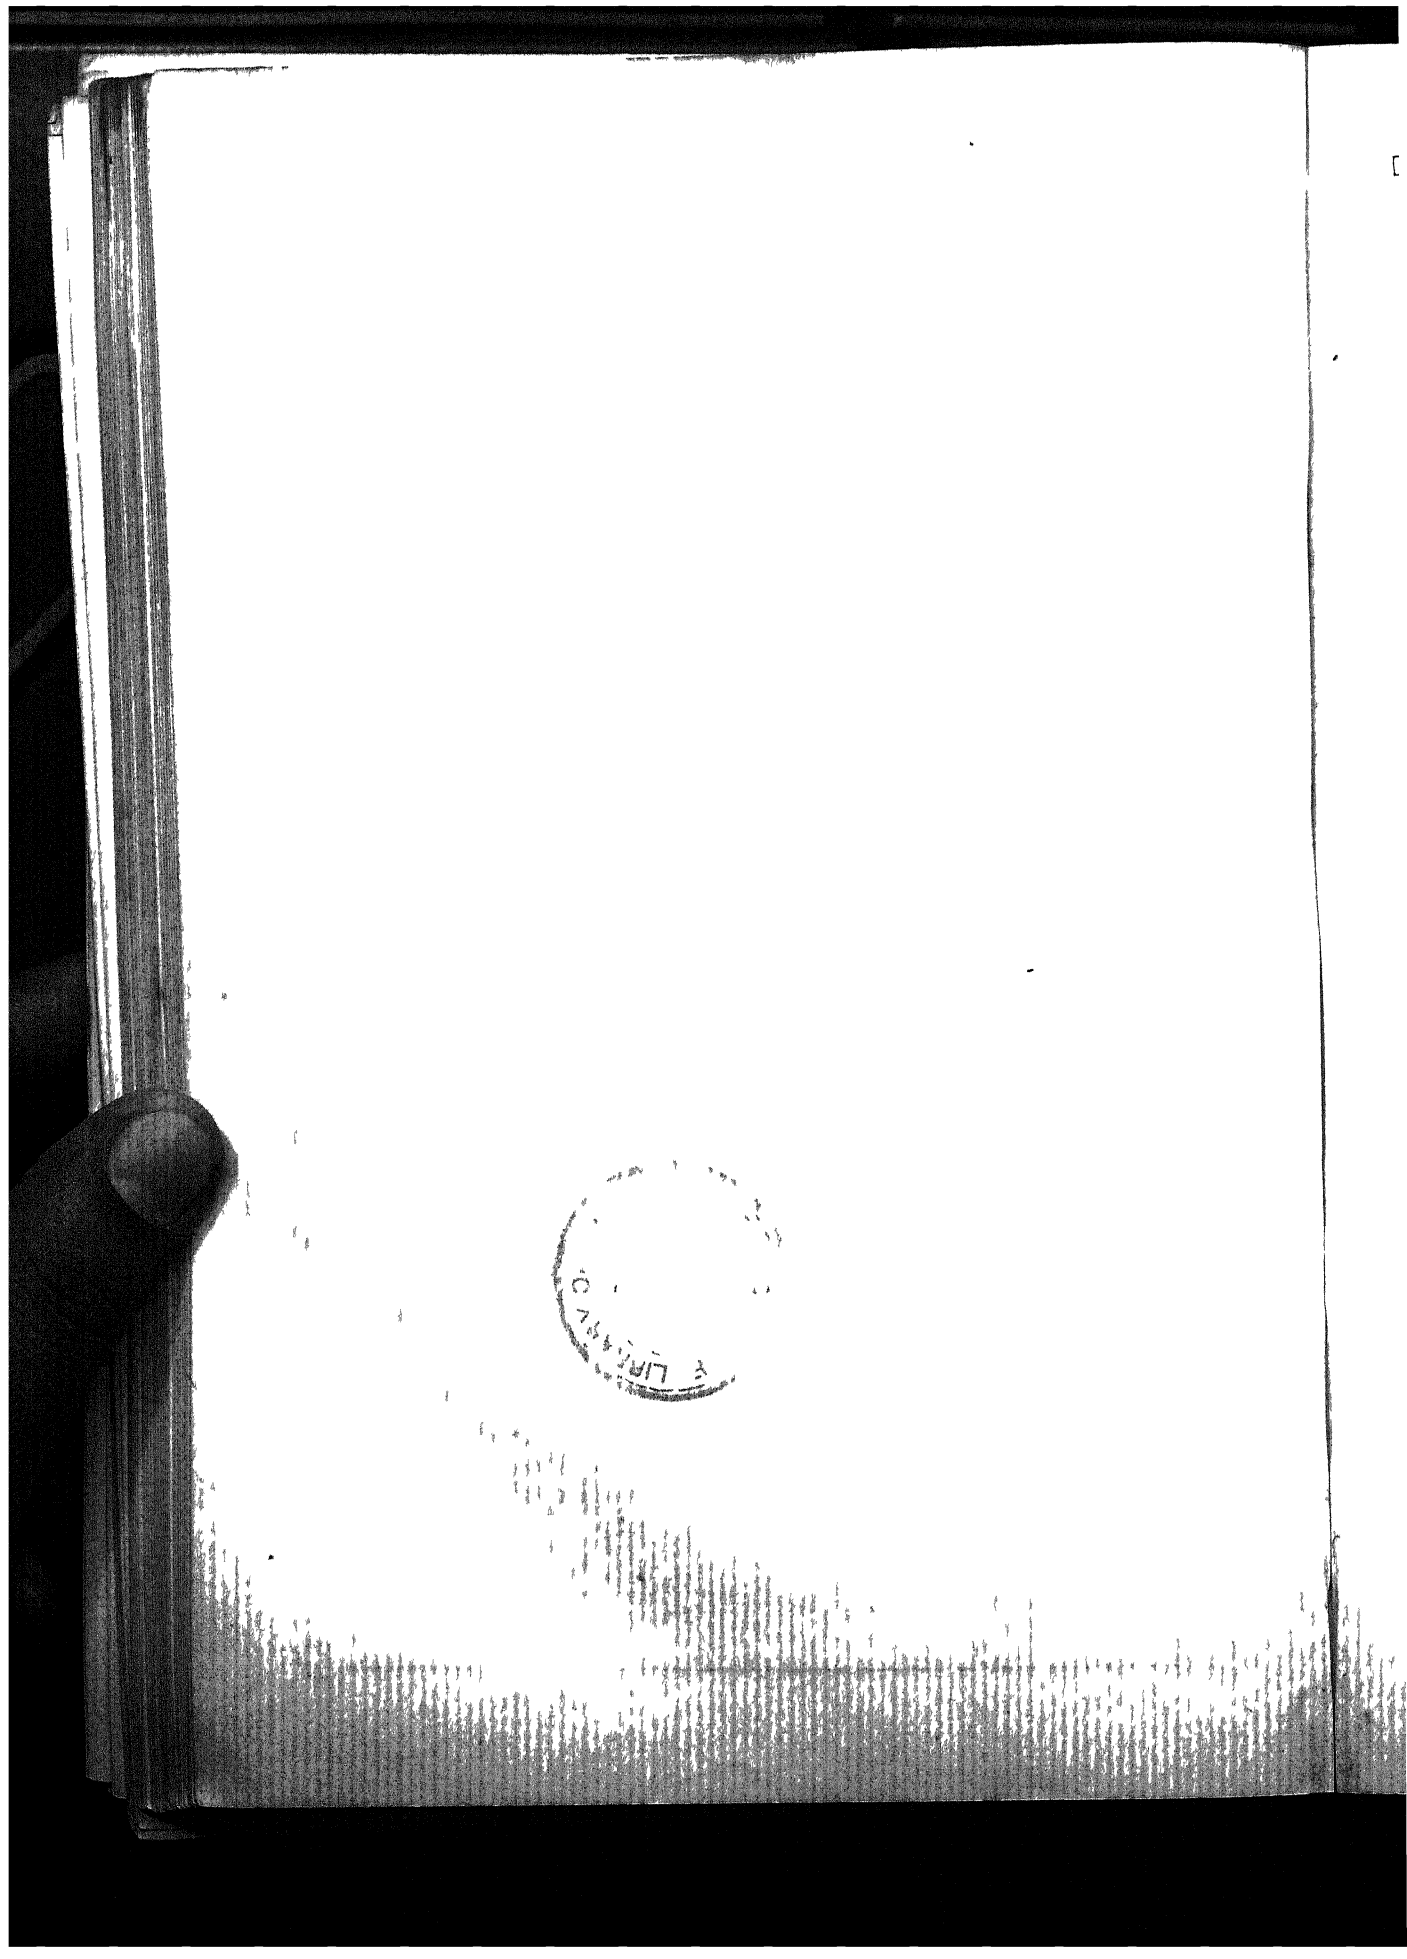
Lacking the space to give more than a standard illustration of this charming collection of tales, the present work contains in full the three most famous of the entire series, — "Aladdin, or the Wonderful Lamp," "The Voyages of Sindbad the Sailor," and "Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves."



TALES

ARABIAN NIGHTS' ENTERTAINMENTS.

ALADDIN, OR THE WONDERFUL LAMP.

IN the capital of one of the richest and most extensive kingdoms of Cathay, the name of which does not at this moment occur, there lived a tailor named Mustafa, who had no other distinction than that of his trade. This tailor was very poor, the profits of his trade barely producing enough for himself, his wife, and a son, with whom God had blessed him, to subsist upon.

Mustafa's son, whose name was Aladdin, had been brought up in a very negligent manner, and had been left so much to himself that he had contracted the most vicious habits of idleness and mischief, and had no reverence for the commands of his father or mother. Before he had passed the years of childhood, his parents could no longer keep him in the house. He generally went out early in the morning, and spent the whole day in playing in the public streets with boys who were as idle as himself.

When he was old enough to learn a trade, his father, being unable to have him taught any other than that he himself followed, took him to his shop, and began to show him how he should use his needle. But neither kindness nor the fear of punishment could restrain his volatile and restless disposition. No sooner was Mustafa's back turned, than Aladdin was off, and returned no more during the whole day. His father continually chastised him; still Aladdin remained incorrigible, and Mustafa, to his great sorrow, was obliged to abandon him to his idle, vagabond kind of life. This conduct of his son gave him great pain, and the vexation of not being able to induce him to pursue a proper and reputable course of life brought on so obstinate and fatal a disease, that at the end of a few months it put an end to his existence.

As Aladdin's mother saw that her son never would follow the trade of his father, she shut up his shop, and converted all his stock and implements of trade into money, upon which, added to what she could earn by spinning cotton, she and her son subsisted.

Aladdin now, no longer restrained by dread of his father, and regarding his mother so little that he even threatened her with violence whenever she attempted to remonstrate with him, gave himself completely up to a life of indolence and licentiousness. He continued to associate with persons of his own age, and was fonder than ever of entering into all their tricks and fun. He pursued this course of life till he was fifteen years old, without showing the least spark of understanding of any sort, and without making the least reflection on what was to be his future lot. He was in this state, when, as he was one day playing with his companions in one of the public places, as was his usual custom, a stranger, who was going by, stopped and looked at him.

This stranger was, in fact, a noted and learned magician, called, for distinction, the African magician. And indeed he was so styled with the greater propriety, as he was a native of Africa, and had arrived from that part of the world only two days before.

Whether this magician, who was well skilled in physiognomy, had remarked in the countenance of Aladdin the signs of such a disposition as was best adapted to the purpose for which he had undertaken so long a journey, or not, is uncertain; but he very adroitly made himself acquainted with his family, discovered who he was, and the sort of character and disposition he possessed. He was no sooner informed of what he wished, than he went up to the young man, and, taking him apart from his companions, he asked him if his father's name was not Mustafa, and whether he was not a tailor by trade. "Yes, sir," replied Aladdin, "but he has been dead this long time."

At this speech the African magician threw his arms around Aladdin's neck, embraced and kissed him for some time, while the tears seemed to run from his eyes, and his bosom to heave with sighs. Aladdin asked him what reason he had to weep. "Alas! my child," replied the magician, "how can I do otherwise? I am your uncle; your father was my most excellent brother. I have been several years upon my journey, and at the very instant of my arrival in this place, and when I was congratulating myself in the hopes of seeing him, and giving him joy on my return, you inform me of his death. Can I then be so unfeeling as not to evince my grief, when I thus find myself deprived of my expected consolation? What, however, alleviates my affliction is, that, as far as my recollection carries me, I discover many traces of your father in your countenance, and that I have not been deceived in addressing myself to you." He then asked Aladdin, putting at the same time his hand into his purse, where his mother lived, and as soon as he was answered, the African magician gave him a handful of small money, and said to him. "My son, go to your mother, and make my respects to her; tell her that I will come and see her to-morrow, if I have an opportunity, in order to afford myself the consolation of seeing the spot where my good brother lived so many years, and where he at last finished his career."

The African magician had no sooner quitted his new-created nephew, than Aladdin ran to his mother, highly delighted with the money his supposed uncle had given him. "Pray, tell me, mother," he cried, the instant of his arrival, "whether I have not an uncle?" "No, my child," replied she; "you have no uncle, either on your poor father's side or mine." "I have, however, just left a man," answered the boy, "who told me he was my father's brother, and my uncle. He even cried and embraced me, when I told him of my father's death. And to prove to you that he spoke the truth," added he, showing her the money which he had received, "see what he has given me. He bid me also give his kindest remembrances to you, and to say that he would, if he had time, come and see you to-morrow, as he was desirous of beholding the house where my father lived and died." "It is true, indeed, my son," replied Aladdin's mother, "that your father had a brother, but he has been dead a long time, and I never heard him mention any other." After this conversation, they said no more on the subject.

The next day the African magician again accosted Aladdin, while he was playing in another part of the city with three other boys. He embraced him as before, and putting two pieces of gold into his hand, "Take this, my boy," said he, "and carry it to your mother. Tell her that I intend to sup with her this evening, and to purchase what is necessary for us to regale ourselves; but first inform me in what quarter of the city I shall find your house." Aladdin gave him the necessary information, and the magician departed.

Aladdin carried the two pieces of gold to his mother, and when he had told her of his supposed uncle's intentions, she went out and procured a supply of good provisions; and as she was unprovided with a sufficient quantity of china or earthenware, she borrowed what she might want from her neighbors. She was busily employed during the whole day in preparing for night; and in the evening, when everything was ready, she desired Aladdin, as his uncle might not know where to find the house, to go into the street, and if he saw him to show him the way.

Although Aladdin had pointed out to the magician the exact situation of his mother's house, he was nevertheless ready to go; but at the very moment that he reached the door he heard some person knock. Aladdin instantly opened it, and saw the African, bringing several bottles of wine and various sorts of fruit for them to regale with.

When he had given Aladdin all the things that he had brought, he paid his respects to his mother, and requested her to show him the place where his brother Mustafa was accustomed to sit upon the sofa. She had no sooner pointed it out than he prostrated himself before it; kissed the place several times, while the tears seemed to run in abundance from his eyes. "My poor brother," he exclaimed, "how unfortunate am I not to have arrived time enough to receive your embraces once more before you died!" The mother of Aladdin begged this pretended brother to sit in the place her husband used to occupy, but he would by no means hear of it. "No," he cried, "I will not do that: give me leave, however, to seat myself opposite; that if I am deprived of the pleasure of seeing him here in person, sitting like the father of a family that is so dear to me, I may at least look at the spot as if he were present." Aladdin's mother pressed him no further, but permitted him to take whatever seat he chose.

When the magician had taken the seat which he had chosen, he began to enter into a conversation with Aladdin's mother. "Do not be surprised, my good sister," he said, "at never having seen me during the whole of the time you have been married to my late brother Mustafa. It is full forty years since I left this country, of which I am a native, as well as himself. In the course of this long period, I first travelled through India, Persia, Arabia, Syria, and Egypt; and after passing a considerable time in all the finest and most remarkable cities in those countries, I went into Africa, where I resided for a great length of time. At last, as it is the natural disposition of man, how distant soever he may be from the place of his birth, never to forget his native country, nor lose the recollection of his family, his friends, and the companions of his youth, the desire of seeing mine, and of once more embracing my dear brother, took so powerful a hold of my mind, that I felt myself sufficiently strong again to undergo the fatigue of so long a journey. I therefore set about all the necessary preparations, and began my travels. It is useless to mention the length of time I was thus employed, the various obstacles I had to encounter, and all the fatigue I suffered before I arrived at the end of my labors. Nothing, however, so much mortified me, or gave me so much pain, in all my travels, as the intelligence of the death of my poor brother, whom I so tenderly loved, and whose memory I must ever respect. I have traced almost every feature of his countenance in the face of my nephew; and it was this that enabled me to distinguish him from the other young persons with whom he was. He can inform you in what manner I received the melancholy news that my brother no longer lived. We must, however, praise God for all things; and I console myself in finding him again alive in his son."

The magician, perceiving that Aladdin's mother was very much affected at this conversation about her husband, and that the recollection of him renewed her grief, changed the subject; and, turning towards Aladdin, he asked him his name. "I am called Aladdin," he answered. "Well, then, Aladdin," said the magician, "how do you employ yourself? Are you acquainted with any trade?"

At this speech Aladdin hung down his head, and was much disconcerted; but his mother answered for him. "Aladdin," she said, "is a very idle boy. His father did all he could to make him learn his business, but he could not accomplish it; and since his death, in spite of everything I can say, he will learn nothing, but leads the idle life of a vagabond, though I talk to him on the subject every day of my life. He spends all his time at play with other boys, as you saw him, without considering that he is no longer a child; and if you cannot make him ashamed of himself, and profit by your advice, I shall utterly despair that he will ever be good for anything. He knows very well that his father has left us nothing to live upon, and sees that, though I pass the whole day in spinning cotton, I can hardly get bread for us to eat. In short, I am resolved soon to shut my doors against him, and make him seek his own livelihood."

Saying this, the good woman burst into tears. "This is not right, Aladdin," said the magician; "you must, nephew, think of supporting yourself and working for your bread. There is a variety of trades; consider if there is not one you have an inclination for in preference to another. Perhaps that which your father followed displeases you, and you would rather be brought up to some other? Come, come, don't conceal your opinion; give it freely, and I may perhaps assist you." As he found that Aladdin made him no answer, he went on thus: "If you have an objection to learning any trade, and yet wish to be a respectable and honest character, I will procure you a shop, and furnish it with rich stuffs and fine sorts of linens; you shall sell the goods, and with the money you make you shall buy other merchandise; and in this manner your life will pass respectably. Consult your own inclinations, and tell me candidly what you think of the plan. You will always find me ready to perform my promise."

This offer flattered the vanity of Aladdin very much; and he was the more averse to any manual occupation because he knew well enough that the shops which contained goods of this sort were much frequented, and the merchants themselves well dressed and highly esteemed. He hinted, therefore, to the magician, whom he considered as his uncle, that he was much more inclined to the latter plan, and that he should all his life continue sensible of the obligation he was under to him. "Since, then, this employment is agreeable to you," replied the magician, "I will take you with me to-morrow, and have you properly and handsomely dressed, as becomes one of the richest merchants of this city, and then we will procure a shop in the way I propose."

The mother of Aladdin, who had not hitherto been convinced that the magician was in fact the brother of her husband, no longer doubted it when he promised to do so much good for her son. She thanked him sincerely for his kind intentions, and, after having charged Aladdin to conduct himself so as to prove worthy of the good fortune his uncle had led him to expect, she served up the supper. The conversation during the whole time the supper lasted turned on the same subject, and continued till the magician, who perceived that the night was far advanced, took leave of Aladdin and his mother, and retired.

The magician did not fail to return the next morning to the widow of Mustafa the tailor, as he had promised. He took Aladdin with him, and conducted him to a merchant's where clothes made of the finest stuffs were sold. He made Aladdin try on such as seemed to fit him, and, after selecting those he liked best, "My nephew," said the magician, "choose such as you are most pleased with out of this number." Delighted with the liberality of his new uncle, Aladdin made choice of one. The magician bought it, together with everything that was necessary to complete the dress, and paid for the whole without asking the merchant to make any abatement.

When Aladdin saw himself thus magnificently dressed from head to foot, he returned his uncle a thousand thanks; the magician, on his part, again promised never to forsake him, but to have him always with him. He then conducted Aladdin to the most frequented parts of the city, particularly where the shops of the most opulent merchants were; and when he was come to the street where the shops of stuffs and fine linens were, he said to Aladdin, "You will soon become a merchant such as one of these. It is proper that you should frequent this place, and become acquainted with them." After this he took him to the largest and most noted mosques, to the khans where all the foreign merchants lived, and through every part of the sultan's palace, where he had leave to enter. Having at length gone with him over every part of the city worth seeing, they came to the khan where the magician had hired an apartment. They found several merchants with whom he had made some slight acquaintance since his arrival, and whom he had now invited to partake of a repast, in order to introduce his pretended nephew to them.

The entertainment was not over till the evening. Aladdin then wished to take leave of his uncle, and go home; the magician, however, would not suffer him to go alone, but conducted him back to his mother's When she saw her son so handsomely dressed, she was transported with joy, and bestowed a thousand blessings on the magician, who had been at so great an expense on her dear child's account. "Generous relation," she exclaimed, "I know not how to thank you enough for your great liberality. My son, I am aware, is not worthy of so much generosity; and he will be wicked indeed if he ever prove ungrateful to you, or does not conduct himself so as to deserve, and be an ornament to, the excellent situation you are about to place him in. For my part," added she, "I thank you with my whole soul; may you live many happy years, and witness my son's gratitude, who cannot prove his good intentions better than by following your advice."

"Aladdin," replied the magician, "is a good boy. He seems to pay attention to what I say. I have no doubt but we shall make him what we wish. I am sorry for one thing, and that is, that I am not able to perform all my promises to-morrow. It is Friday, and on that day the shops are shut; and it is impossible either to hire one or furnish it with goods, because all the merchants are absent and engaged in their several amusements. We will, however, settle this business on Saturday; and I will come here to-morrow to take Aladdin and show him the public gardens, in which people of reputation constantly walk and amuse themselves. He has probably hitherto been ignorant of the way in which they pass their time there. He has associated only with boys, but he must now learn to live with men." The magician then took his leave, and departed. In the mean time Aladdin, who was delighted at seeing himself so well dressed, was still more pleased at the idea of going to the gardens in the environs of the city. He had never been outside of the gates, nor seen the neighboring country, which was very beautiful.

The next morning Aladdin got up and dressed himself very early, in order to be ready to set out at the moment his uncle called for him. After waiting some time, and which he thought an age, he became so impatient that he opened the door, and stood on the outside to watch for his uncle. The moment he saw him coming he went and informed his mother of it, took leave of her, shut the door, and ran to meet him.

The magician behaved in the most affectionate manner to Aladdin. "Come, my good boy," said he, with a smile, "I will to-day show you some very fine things." He conducted him out at a gate that led to some large and handsome houses, or rather magnificent palaces, each having a beautiful garden, in which they had the liberty of walking. At each palace they came to he asked Aladdin if it were not very beautiful; while the latter often prevented this question by exclaiming, when a new one presented itself, "O uncle, here is one much more beautiful than those we have before seen!" In the mean time they kept going on into the country, and the cunning magician, who wanted to go still farther for the purpose of putting a design which he had in his head into execution, went into one of these gardens and sat down by the side of a large basin of pure water, which received its supplies through the jaws of a bronze lion. He then pretended to be very tired, in order to give Aladdin an opportunity of resting. "My dear nephew," he said, "you must be fatigued as well as myself. Let us rest ourselves here a little while, and get fresh strength to pursue our walk."

When they were seated, the magician took out from a piece of linen cloth which was attached to his girdle various sorts of fruits and some cakes with which he had provided himself, and spread them on the bank before them. He divided a cake between himself and Aladdin, and gave him leave to eat whatever fruit he liked best. While they were eating he gave his pretended nephew much good advice, desiring him to leave off playing with boys, and to associate with intelligent and prudent men; to pay every attention to them, and to profit from their conversation. "You will very soon," said he, "be a man yourself, and you cannot too soon accustom yourself to their manners and behavior." When they had finished their slight repast, they got up and pursued their way by the side of gardens, which were separated from each other by a small fosse, that served chiefly to mark the limits of each, and not to prevent the communication between them, the honesty of the inhabitants of this city making it unnecessary for them to take other means of preventing any injury. The magician insensibly led Aladdin much farther than the gardens extended; and they walked on through the country till they came into the neighborhood of the mountain.

Aladdin, who had never before taken so long a walk, felt himself very much tired. "Where are we going, my dear uncle?" said he. "We have got much farther than the gardens, and I can see nothing but hills and mountains before us. And if we go on any farther, I know not whether I shall have strength enough to walk back to the city." "Take courage, nephew," replied his pretended uncle; "I wish to show you another garden that far surpasses all you have hitherto seen. It is not far from hence; and after your arrival you will readily own how sorry you would have been to have come thus near it and not gone on to see." Aladdin was persuaded to proceed, and the magician led him on considerably farther, amusing him all the time with entertaining stories, to beguile the way, and make it less fatiguing and unpleasant.

They at length came to a narrow valley, situated between two moderately sized mountains of nearly the same height. This was the particular spot to which the magician wished to bring Aladdin, in order to put in execution the grand project that was the sole cause of his coming from the extremity of Africa to Cathay. "We shall now," said he to Aladdin, "go no farther; and I shall here unfold to your view some extraordinary things hitherto unknown to mortals; and which, when you shall have seen, you will thank me a thousand times for having made you an eyewitness of. They are indeed such wonders as no one besides yourself will ever have seen. I am now going to strike a light, and do you, in the mean time, collect all the dry sticks and leaves that you can find, in order to make a fire."

There were so many pieces of dry sticks scattered about, that Aladdin had collected more than was sufficient for his purpose by the time the magician had lighted his match. He then set them on fire; and, as soon as they were in a blaze, the magician threw a certain perfume, which he had ready in his hand, upon them. A thick and dense smoke immediately arose, which seemed to unfold itself in consequence of some mysterious words pronounced by the magician, and which Aladdin did not in the least comprehend. At the same instant the ground slightly shook, and, opening in the spot where they stood, discovered a square stone about a foot and a half broad, placed horizontally, with a brass ring in the centre for the purpose of lifting it up.

Aladdin was dreadfully alarmed at these things, and was about to run away, when the magician, to whom his presence in this mysterious affair was absolutely necessary, stopped him in an angry manner, and gave him at the same moment a blow which not only beat him down, but nearly knocked some of his teeth out. Poor Aladdin, with tears in his eyes, and the blood streaming from his mouth, and trembling in every limb, got up. "My dear uncle," he cried, "what have I done to deserve such severity?" "I have my reasons for it," replied the magician; "I am your uncle, and consider myself as your father, and you ought not to make me any answer. Do not, however, my boy," added he, in a milder tone of voice, "be at all afraid; I desire nothing of you but that you obey me most implicitly; and this you must do, if you wish to render yourself worthy of the great advantages I mean to afford you." These fine speeches of the magician in some measure lessened the fright of Aladdin; and when the former saw him less alarmed, "You have observed," he said, "what I have done by virtue of my perfumes and the words that I pronounced. You are now to be informed that under the stone which you see here there is a concealed treasure destined for you; and which will one day render you richer than any of the most powerful potentates of the earth. It is, moreover, the fact, that no one in the world but you can be permitted to touch or lift up this stone and go beneath it. Even I myself am not able to approach it, and to take possession of the treasure which is under it. And, in order to insure your success, you must observe and execute in every respect, even to the minutest point, what I am now going to instruct you in. This is a matter of the greatest consequence both to you and to myself."

Wrapped in astonishment at everything he had seen and heard, and full of the idea of this treasure, which the magician said was to make him forever happy, Aladdin forgot everything else that had passed. "Well, my dear uncle," he exclaimed, as he got up, "what must I do? Tell me; I am ready to obey you in everything." "I heartily rejoice, my boy," replied the magician, embracing Aladdin, "that you have made so good a resolution. Come to me; take hold of this ring, and lift up the stone." "I am not strong enough, uncle," said Aladdin; "you must help me." "No, no," answered the magician; "you have no occasion for my assistance; we shall neither of us do any good, if I attempt to help you; you must lift it up entirely by yourself. Pronounce only the name of your father and your grandfather, take hold of the ring, and lift it; it will come without any difficulty." Aladdin did exactly as the magician told him; he raised the stone without any trouble, and laid it on one side.

When the stone was taken away, a small cavern was visible, between three and four feet deep, at the bottom of which there appeared a door, with steps to go down still lower. "You must now, my good boy," said the magician to Aladdin, "observe very exactly everything I am going to tell you. Go down into this cavern, and when you have come to the bottom of the steps which you see, you will perceive an open door, leading into a large vaulted space, divided into three successive halls. In each of these you will perceive, on both sides of you, four bronze vases, as large as tubs, full of gold and silver; but you must take particular care not to touch any of it. When you get into the first hall, take up your robe and bind it round you. Then observe, and go on to the second without stopping, and thence, in the same manner, to the third. Above all, however, be very particular not to go near the walls, nor even to touch them with your robe; for if any part of your dress comes in contact with them, your instant death will be the inevitable consequence. This is the reason of my having desired you to fasten your robe closely round you. At the extremity of the third hall there is a door, leading to a garden planted with beautiful trees, all of which are full of fruit. Go on straight forward, and pursue a path which you will perceive, and which will bring you to the bottom of a flight of fifty steps, at the top of which is a terrace. When you shall have ascended the terrace, you will observe a niche before you, in which there is a lighted lamp. Take the lamp, and extinguish it. Then throw out the wick, and the liquid that is within, and put it in your bosom. When you have done this, bring it to me. Do not be afraid of staining your dress, as what is within the lamp is not oil; and when you have thrown it out, the lamp will dry directly. If you should feel yourself very desirous of gathering any of the fruit in the garden, you may do so; and there is nothing to prevent your taking as much as you please."

When the magician had given these directions to Aladdin, he took a ring from his finger, and gave it to his pretended nephew; telling him, at the same time, that it was a preservative against every evil that might otherwise happen to him, and again bade him be mindful of everything he had said to him. "Go, my child," added he, "descend boldly; we shall now both of us become immensely rich for the rest of our lives."

Aladdin gave a spring, jumped into the opening with a willing mind, and went down to the bottom of the steps. He found the three halls exactly answering the description the magician had given of them. He passed through them with the greatest precaution possible, as he was fearful he might be killed if he did not most strictly observe all the directions he had received. He went on to the garden, and ascended to the terrace without stopping. He took the lamp, as it stood lighted in the niche, threw out its contents, and, observing that it was, as the magician had said, quite dry, he put it into his bosom. He then came down the terrace, and stopped in the garden to examine the fruit, which he had only seen for an instant, as he passed along. The trees of this garden were all full of the most extraordinary fruit. Each tree bore a sort of a different color. Some were white, others sparkling and transparent, like crystal; some were red, and of different shades, others green, blue, violet; some of a yellowish hue, — in short, of almost every color. The white were pearls; the sparkling and transparent were diamonds; the deep red were rubies; the paler, a particular sort of ruby, called balass; the green, emeralds; the blue, turquoises; the violet, amethysts; those tinged with yellow, sapphires; in the same way, all the other colored fruits were varieties of precious stones; and the whole of them were of the largest size, and more perfect than were ever seen in the world. Aladdin, who knew neither their beauty nor their value, was not at all struck with the appearance of them, which did not the least suit his taste, like the figs, grapes, and other excellent fruits, common in Cathay. As he was not yet of an age to be acquainted with their value, he thought they were all only pieces of colored glass, and did not therefore attach any value to them. The variety, however, and contrast of so many beautiful colors, as well as the brilliancy and extraordinary size of each sort, nevertheless tempted him to gather some of each. And he took so many of every color that he filled both his pockets, as well as his two new purses that the magician had bought for him at the time he made him a present of his new dress, that everything he wore might be equally new; and as his pockets, which were already full, could not hold his two purses, he fastened them on each side of his girdle, or sash, and also wrapped some in its folds, as it was of silk, and made very full. In this manner he carried them so as they could not fall out. He did not even neglect to fill his bosom quite full, between his robe and shirt.

Laden in this manner with the most immense treasure, though ignorant of its value, Aladdin made haste through the three halls, in order that he might not make the magician wait too long. Having proceeded through them with the same caution as before, he began to ascend the steps he had come down, and presented himself at the entrance of the cave, where the magician was impatiently waiting for him. As soon as Aladdin had perceived him, he called out, "Give me your hand, uncle, to help me up." "You had better, my dear boy," replied the magician, "first give me the lamp, as that will only embarrass you." "It is not at all in my way," said Aladdin, "and I will give it to you when I am out." The magician still persevered in wishing to get the lamp before he helped Aladdin out of the cave; but the latter had in fact so covered it with the fruit of the trees, that he absolutely refused to give it till he had got out of the cave. The African magician was in the greatest despair at the obstinate resistance the boy made; he put himself into the most violent rage; he threw a little perfume upon the fire which he had taken care to keep up, and he had hardly pronounced two magic words before the stone, which served to shut up the entrance to the cavern, returned of its own accord to the place, with all the earth over it, exactly in the same state it was when the magician and Aladdin arrived there.

There is no doubt that this African magician was not the brother of Mustafa the tailor, as he had boasted, and consequently not the uncle of Aladdin. He was most probably originally of Africa, being born there; as that is a country where magic is more studied than in any other, he had given himself up to it from his earliest youth; and after nearly forty years spent in enchantments, experiments in geomancy, fumigations, and reading books of magic, he had at length discovered that there was in the world a certain wonderful lamp, the possession of which would make him the most powerful monarch in the universe, if he were so fortunate as to obtain it. By a late experiment in geomancy he had discovered that this lamp was in a subterraneous place in the middle of Cathay, in the very spot and under the very circumstances that have just been detailed. Thoroughly persuaded of the truth of this discovery, he had come from the remotest part of Africa, and after a long and painful journey had arrived in the city that was nearest this treasure. But though the lamp was certainly in the place which he had found out, he was nevertheless not permitted to take it away himself, nor to go in person to the very spot where it was. It was absolutely necessary that another person should go down to take it, and then put it into his hands. It was for this reason that he had addressed himself to Aladdin, who seemed to him to be an artless youth, and well adapted to perform the service he expected from him; and he had resolved, as soon as he had got the lamp from him, to raise the last fumigation, pronounce the two magic words which produced the effect already seen, and sacrifice poor Aladdin to his avarice and wickedness, that he might not have an existing witness of his being in possession of the lamp. The blow he had given Aladdin, as well as the authority he exercised over him, were only for the purpose of accustoming him to fear him and obey all his orders without hesitation; that when Aladdin had got possession of the wonderful lamp he might instantly deliver it to him. The reverse, however, of what he both wished and expected, came to pass; for he was so much in a hurry to put an end to poor Aladdin, only because he was afraid that, while he was contesting the matter with him, some person might come and make that public which he wished to be kept secret, that he completely failed in his object.

When the magician found all his hopes and expectations forever blasted, he had only one method to pursue, and that was to return to Africa, which he in fact did the very same day. He pursued his journey along the most private roads, in order to avoid the city where he had met with Aladdin. He was also afraid to meet any person who might have seen him walk out with him and come back without him.

To judge from all these circumstances, it might naturally be supposed that Aladdin was gone forever; and indeed the magician himself, who thought he had thus destroyed him, had not paid any attention to the ring which he had placed on his finger, and which was now about to render Aladdin the most essential service, and to save him. Aladdin knew not the wonderful qualities either of that or the lamp; and it is indeed astonishing that the loss of both of them did not drive the magician to absolute despair; but persons of his profession are so accustomed to defeat, and so many events happen to them contrary to their wishes, that they never cease from endeavoring to conquer every misfortune by charms, visions, and enchantments.

Aladdin, who did not expect this wicked action from his pretended uncle, after all the kindness and generosity which the latter had evinced towards him, experienced a degree of surprise and astonishment easier to conceive than explain. When he found himself as it were buried alive, he called aloud a thousand times to his uncle, telling him he was ready to give him the lamp. But all his cries were useless, and having no other means of making himself heard, he remained in perfect darkness. Giving, at length, a little cessation to his tears, he went down to the bottom of the flight of stairs, intending to look for the light in the garden where he had been before. But the walls, which had been opened by enchantment, were now shut by the same means. He felt all around him, to the right and left, several times, but could not discover the least opening. He then redoubled his cries and tears, sat down upon the step of his dungeon, without hoping ever again to see the light of day, and with the melancholy conviction that he should only pass from the darkness which now encompassed him to the shades of an inevitable and speedy death.

Aladdin remained two days in this state, without either eating or drinking. On the third day, regarding his death as certain, he lifted up his hands, and, joining them as in the act of prayer, he wholly resigned himself to the will of God, and uttered in a loud tone of voice: "There is no strength or power but in the high and great God." In this action of joining his hands, he happened to rub the ring which the African magician had put upon his finger, and of the virtue of which he was as yet ignorant. Upon its being thus rubbed, a genie of an enormous figure and most horrid countenance instantly appeared before him; he was so tall, that his head touched the vaulted roof, and he addressed these words to Aladdin: "What do you wish? I am ready to obey you as your slave; as the slave of him who has the ring on his finger; I and the other slaves of the ring."

At any other moment, and on any other occasion, Aladdin, who was totally unaccustomed to such appearances, would have been so frightened at the sight of such a wonderful figure, he would have been unable to speak; but he was so entirely preoccupied with the danger and peril of his situation, that he answered without the least hesitation: "Whoever you are, take me, if you are able, out of this place." He had scarcely pronounced these words when the earth opened, and he found himself on the outside of the cave, and at the very spot to which the magician had brought him. It is easy to be conceived that after having remained in complete darkness for so long a time, Aladdin had at first some difficulty in supporting the brightness of open day. By degrees, however, his eyes became accustomed to the light, and on looking round him he was surprised to find not the least opening in the earth. He could not comprehend in what manner he had so suddenly come out of it. There was only the place where the fire had been made, which he recollected was close to the entrance of the cave. Looking round towards the city, he perceived it surrounded by the gardens, and thus knew the road he had come with the magician. He returned the same way, thanking God for having again permitted him to behold and revisit the face of the earth, which he had quite despaired of doing.

He arrived at the city, but it was with great difficulty that he got home. When he was within the door, the joy he experienced at again seeing his mother, added to the weak state he was in from not having eaten anything for the space of three days, made him faint, and it was some time before he came to himself. His mother, who had already wept for him as lost or dead, seeing him in this state, did not omit anything that could tend to restore him. At length he recovered, and the first thing he said was: "Bring me something, my dear mother, to eat, before you do anything else. I have tasted nothing these three days." His mother instantly set what she had before him. "My dear child," said she, "do not hurry yourself, it is dangerous · eat but little, and at your leisure; you must take great care how you indulge the pressing appetite you have. Do not even speak to me; you will have plenty of time to relate to me everything that has happened to you when you shall have regained your strength. I am sufficiently satisfied at seeing you once more, after all the affliction I have suffered since Friday, and all the trouble I have also taken to learn what was become of you, when I found the night approach and you did not return home."

Aladdin followed his mother's advice; he ate but little and slowly, and drank sparingly. "I have great reason, my dear mother," said he, when he had done, "to complain of you for putting me in the power of a man whose object was to destroy me, and who, at this very moment, supposes my death sure, or at least that I should not live another day. But you took him to be my uncle, and I was also equally deceived. Indeed, how could we suppose him to be anything else, as he almost overwhelmed me with his kindness and generosity, and made me so many promises of future advantage. But I must tell you, mother, that he was a traitor, a wicked man, a cheat. He was good and kind to me only that he might, after answering his own purpose, destroy me, as I have already told you, without either of us being able to know the reason. I can assure you I have not given him the least cause for the bad treatment I have received; and you will yourself be convinced of it by the faithful and true account I am going to give you of everything that has passed from the moment that I left you till he put his wicked design in execution."

Aladdin then related to his mother everything that had happened to him and the magician on the day when the latter came and took him away to see the palaces and gardens round the city; what had befallen him on the road, and at the place between the two mountains, where the magician worked such prodigies; how upon throwing the perfume into the fire and uttering some magical words the earth instantly opened, and discovered the entrance to a cave that led to most inestimable treasures. Neither did he forget the blow that the magician had given him, nor how, after having first coaxed him, he had persuaded him, by the means of the greatest promises, and by putting a ring· upon his finger, to descend into the cave. He omitted no circumstance of what passed, or what he had seen in going backwards and forwards through the three halls, in the garden, or on the terrace whence he had taken the wonderful lamp. This he now drew from his bosom, and showed it to his mother, as well as the transparent and different colored fruits that he had gathered as he returned through the garden, and the two purses, quite full, all of which he gave her; she, however, did not set much value upon them. The fruits were, in fact, precious stones; and the lustre which they threw round, by means of a lamp that hung in the chamber, and which almost equalled the sun in brightness ought to have informed her they were of the greatest value; but the mother of Aladdin had no more knowledge of their worth than her son. She had been brought up in a middle station in life, and her husband had never been rich enough to bestow any jewels upon her, nor had she ever seen any among her relations or neighbors; consequently it was not at all surprising that she considered them as things of no value, and only fit to please the eye by the variety of their colors. Aladdin, therefore, put them all behind one of the cushions of the sofa on which they were sitting.

He finished the recital of his adventure by telling her that when he came back and presented himself at the mouth of the cave to get out, upon refusing to give the lamp to the magician, the entrance to the cave was instantly closed by means of the perfume thrown by the magician on the fire, which he had kept alight, and of some words that he pronounced. He could not then proceed any further without shedding tears, and representing the miserable state he found himself in, buried, as it were, alive in this fatal cave, till the moment he got out by means of the ring, of which he did not even now know the virtues. When he had finished his account, he said to his mother: "I need not tell you more; the rest is known to you. This is the whole of my adventures, and of the danger I have been in since I left you."

Wonderful and surprising as this relation was, distressing, too, as it must have been for a mother, who, in spite of his defects, tenderly loved her son, she had the patience to hear it to the end, without giving him the least interruption. In the most affecting parts, however, particularly those that unfolded the wicked intentions of the African magician, she could not help showing by her actions how much she detested him, and how much he excited her indignation. But Aladdin had no sooner concluded, than she began to abuse the impostor in the strongest terms. She called him a traitor, a barbarian, a cheat, an assassin, a magician, the enemy and destroyer of the human race. "Yes, my child," she exclaimed, "he is a magician; and magicians are public evils. They hold communication with demons by means of their sorceries and enchantments. Blessed be God that he has not suffered the wickedness of this wretch to have its full effect upon you. You ought to return him many thanks for his kindness to you. Your death would have been inevitable if God had not come to your assistance, and you had not implored his aid." She added many more things of the same sort; showing, at the same time, her complete detestation of the treachery with which the magician had treated her son; but as she was proceeding in this manner, she perceived that Aladdin, who had not slept for three days, wanted rest. She made him, therefore, retire to bed, and soon afterwards went thither herself.

As Aladdin had not been able to take any repose in the subterranean vault in which he had been, as it were, buried, with the idea of his certain destruction, it is no wonder that he passed the whole of that night in the most profound sleep, and that it was even late the next morning before he awoke. He at last got up, and the first thing he said to his mother was that he was very hungry, and told her she could not oblige him more than by giving him something for breakfast. "Alas! my child," replied his mother, "I have not a morsel of bread to give you. You ate last night all the trifling remains of food there was in the house. Have a little patience, however, and it shall not be long before I will bring you some. I have a little cotton of my own spinning which I will go and sell, and purchase something for our dinner." "Keep your cotton, mother," said Aladdin, "for another time, and give me the lamp which I brought with me yesterday. I will go and sell that, and the money it will fetch will serve us for breakfast and dinner, too, and perhaps also for supper."

Aladdin's mother took the lamp from the place she had put it in. "Here it is," she said to her son, "but it is, I think, very dirty. If I were to clean it a little perhaps it might sell for something more." She then took some water and a little fine sand to clean it with. But she had scarcely begun to rub the lamp, when instantly, and while her son was present, a hideous and gigantic genie rose out of the ground before her, and cried with a voice as loud as thunder: "What do you wish? I am ready to obey you as your slave, and the slave of those who have the lamp in their hands; I and the other slaves of the lamp." The mother of Aladdin was not in a condition to answer this address. She was unable to endure the sight of a figure so hideous and alarming as that of the genie; and her fears were so great that he had no sooner begun to speak than she fell down in a fainting fit.

As Aladdin had once before seen a similar appearance in the cavern, and did not either lose his presence of mind or his judgment, he instantly seized the lamp, and supplied his mother's place by answering for her in a firm tone of voice, "I am hungry, bring me something to eat." The genie disappeared, and returned in a moment with a large silver basin, which he carried on his head, and twelve covered dishes of the same material, filled with the choicest meat, properly arranged, and six loaves, as white as snow, upon as many plates; and having two bottles of excellent wine and two silver cups in his hand. He placed them all upon the sofa, and instantly vanished.

All this passed in so short a time, that Aladdin's mother had not recovered from fainting before the genie had disappeared the second time. Aladdin, who had thrown some water over her without any effect, again endeavored to bring her to herself; but whether her scattered spirits returned of themselves, or that the smell of the dishes which the genie had brought produced the effect, she quite recovered. "My dear mother," cried Aladdin, "there is nothing the matter Get up, and come and eat; here is what will put you in good spirits again, and at the same time satisfy my violent appetite. Come, do not let us suffer these good things to get cold before we begin."

His mother was extremely astonished when she beheld the large basin, the twelve dishes, the six loaves, the two bottles of wine and two cups, and perceived the delicious odor that exhaled from them. "My child," she said, "how came all this abundance here, and to whom are we obliged for such liberality? The sultan surely cannot have become acquainted with our poverty and have taken compassion on us?" "My good mother," replied Aladdin, "come and sit down, and begin to eat; you are as much in want of something as I am. I will tell you of everything when we have broken our fast." They then sat down, and both of them ate with the greater appetite, as neither mother nor son had before ever seen a table so well covered.

During the repast, the mother of Aladdin could not help stopping frequently to look at and admire the basin and dishes; although she was not quite sure whether they were silver or any other material, so little was she accustomed to things of this sort; and, in fact, without regarding their value, of which she was ignorant, it was only the novelty of their appearance that attracted her admiration. Nor, indeed, was her son better informed than herself. Although they both merely intended to make a simple breakfast, yet they sat so long, that the hour of dining came before they had risen; the dishes were so excellent, they almost increased their appetites; and as they were still hot, they thought it no bad plan to join the two meals together, and therefore they dined before they got up from breakfast. When they had made an end of their double repast, they found enough remaining, not only for supper, but even for two as good meals the next day.

When Aladdin's mother had taken away the things, and put aside what they had not consumed, she seated herself on the sofa, near her son. "I am waiting, my boy," she said, "for you to satisfy my impatient curiosity, and to hear the account you have promised me." Aladdin then related to her everything that had passed between him and the genie, from the time her alarm had made her faint till she again came to herself. At this relation of her son, and the account of the appearance of the genie, his mother was in the greatest astonishment. "But what do you tell me, child, about your genie? Never since I was born have I heard of any person of my acquaintance that has seen one. How comes it then that this villanous genie should have presented himself to me? Why did he not rather address himself to you, to whom he had before appeared in the subterraneous cavern?"

"Mother," replied Aladdin, "the genie who appeared just now to you is not the same that appeared to me. In some things, indeed, they resemble each other, being both as large as giants; but they are very different both in their countenance and dress, and they belong to different masters. If you recollect he whom I saw called himself the slave of the ring which I had on my finger; and the one who appeared to you was the slave of the lamp you had in your hand; but I believe you did not hear him, as you seemed to faint the instant he began to speak. "What," cried his mother, "is it then your lamp that was the reason why this cursed genie addressed himself to me rather than to you? Ah, child, take the lamp out of my sight, and put it where you please, so that I never touch it again. Indeed, I would rather that you should throw it away or sell it, than I should run the risk of almost dying with fright by again touching it. And if you would also follow my advice, you would put away the ring as well. We ought to have no commerce with genii; they are demons, and our prophet has told us so."

"With your permission, however, my dear mother," replied Aladdin, "I shall take care not to sell this lamp in a hurry, which has already been so useful to us both. I have, indeed, been once very near it. Do you not see what it has procured us, and that it will also continue to furnish us with enough for our entire support? You may easily judge, as well as myself, that it was not for nothing my pretended wicked uncle gave himself so much trouble, and undertook so long and fatiguing a journey, since it was merely to get possession of this wonderful lamp, which he preferred to all the gold and silver which he knew was in the three halls, and which I myself saw, as he said I should. He was too well acquainted with the worth and qualities of this lamp to wish for any other part of that immense treasure. Since chance then has discovered its virtues to us, let us profit by them, but in such a manner that we shall not make any bustle to draw down the envy and jealousy of our neighbors. I will take it indeed out of your sight, and put it where I shall be able to find it whenever I shall have occasion for it, since you are so much alarmed at the appearance of the genie. Neither can I resolve to throw the ring away. Without this ring you would have never seen me again; and even if I should now have been alive, it would have been almost the last moment of my existence. You must permit me, then, to keep it and to wear it always carefully on my finger. Who can tell if some danger may not one day or other again happen to me, which neither you nor I can now foresee, and from which it may deliver me?" As the arguments of Aladdin appeared very just and reasonable, his mother had nothing to say in reply. "Do as you like, my son," she cried; "as for me, I wish to have nothing at all to do with genii; and I declare to you that I entirely wash my hands of them, and will never mention them to you again."

After supper the next evening, nothing remained of the good provisions which the genie had brought. The following morning, Aladdin, who did not like to wait till hunger approached, took one of the silver plates under his robe, and went out early, in order to sell it. He addressed himself to a Jew whom he happened to meet. Aladdin took him aside, and, showing him the plate, asked him if he would buy it.

The Jew, who was both clever and cunning, took the plate and examined it. He had no sooner ascertained that it was good silver, than he desired to know how much he expected for it. Aladdin, who knew not its value nor had ever had any dealings of the sort before, was satisfied with saying that he supposed the Jew knew what the plate was worth, and that he would depend upon his honor. Being uncertain whether Aladdin was acquainted with its real value or not, he took out of his purse a piece of gold equal to one seventy-second part of the value of the plate, and offered it to Aladdin. The latter eagerly took the money, and went away so quickly, that the Jew, not satisfied with the exorbitant profit he had made by this bargain, was very sorry he had not foreseen Aladdin's ignorance of the value of the plate, and offered him much less for it. He was upon the point of running after him, to get something back out of the piece of gold; but Aladdin himself ran very fast, and was already got so far that he would have found it impossible to overtake him.

In his way home, Aladdin bought enough bread for his mother and himself, which he paid for out of his piece of gold. When he got back, he gave the change to his mother, who went to the market, and purchased as much provision as would last them for several days.

Thus they continued to live till Aladdin had sold the twelve dishes, one after the other, to the same Jew, exactly as he had done the first, when they found they wanted more money. The Jew having given him a piece of gold for the first, durst not offer him less for the other dishes, for fear of losing so good a bargain. He bought them all, therefore, at the same rate. When the money for the last plate was expended, Aladdin had recourse to the basin, which was at least ten times as heavy as any of the dishes. He wished to carry this to the same merchant, but its great weight prevented him; he was obliged, therefore, to bring the Jew to his mother's. After having ascertained the weight of the basin, the Jew counted out ten pieces of gold, with which Aladdin was satisfied.

While these ten pieces lasted, they were employed in the daily expense of the house. In the mean time, Aladdin, thus accustomed to lead an idle life, abstained from going to play with boys of his own age from the time of his adventure with the African magician. He now passed his days in walking about, or conversing with such men as he got acquainted with. Sometimes he stopped in the shops belonging to large and extensive merchants, where he listened to the conversation of such people of distinction and education as came there, and who made these shops a sort of meeting-place. The information he thus acquired gave him a slight knowledge of the world.

When nothing remained of his ten pieces of gold, Aladdin had recourse to the lamp. He took it up, and looked for the particular spot that his mother had rubbed. As he easily perceived the place where the sand had touched it, he applied his hand to the same place, and the same genie whom he had before seen instantly appeared. But, as Aladdin had rubbed the lamp in a more gentle manner than his mother had done, the genie spoke to him also in a more softened tone. "What do you wish?" said he to him, in the same words as before: "I am ready to obey you, as your slave, and the slave of those who have the lamp in their hands; I and the other slaves of the lamp." "I am hungry," cried Aladdin; "bring me something to eat." The genie disappeared, and in a short time returned, loaded with a similar service to that he had brought before, which he placed upon the sofa, and vanished in an instant.

As Aladdin's mother was aware of the intention of her son, she had gone out on some business, that she might not be in the house when the genie again made his appearance. She soon after came in, and saw the table and sideboard well set out; nor was she less surprised at the effect of the lamp this time than she had been the first. Aladdin and his mother immediately placed themselves at the table; and after they had finished their repast, there still remained sufficient food to last them two whole days.

When Aladdin again found that all his provisions were gone, and that he had no money to purchase any, he took one of the silver dishes, and went to look for the Jew, in order to sell it him. As he walked along, he happened to pass a goldsmith's shop, belonging to a respectable old man, whose probity and general honesty were unimpeachable. The goldsmith, who perceived him, called to him to come into the shop. "My son," said he, "I have often seen you pass, loaded as you are at present, and join such a Jew; and then, in a short time, come back empty-handed. I have thought that you sold him what you carried. But perhaps you are ignorant that this Jew is a very great cheat; nay, that he will even deceive his own brethren, and that no one who knows him will have any dealings with him. Now what I have more to say to you is only this, — and I wish you to act exactly as you like in the matter, — if you will show me what you are now carrying, and are going to sell it, I will faithfully give you what it is worth, if it be anything in my way of business; if not, I will introduce you to other merchants, who will not deceive you."

The hope of making a little more of his silver dish induced Aladdin to take it from under his robe and show it to the goldsmith. The old man, who knew at first sight that the dish was of the finest silver, asked him if he had sold any like it to the Jew, and how much he had received. Aladdin ingenuously told him that he had sold twelve, and that the Jew had given him a piece of gold for each. "Ah, the thief!" cried the merchant; "but, my son, what is done cannot be undone, and let us, therefore, think of it no more; but, in letting you see what your dish, which is made of the finest silver we ever use in our shops, is really worth, we shall know to what extent the Jew has cheated you."

The goldsmith took his scales, weighed the dish, and after explaining to Aladdin how much a mark of silver was worth, and the different divisions of it, he said, that, according to the weight of the dish, it was worth seventy-two pieces of gold, which he immediately counted out to him. "This," said he, "is the exact value of your dish; if you doubt it, you may go to any one of our goldsmiths you please; and if you find that he will give you more for it, I promise to forfeit to you double the sum. All we get is by the fashion or workmanship of the goods we buy in this manner; and with this even the most equitable Jews are not satisfied." Aladdin thanked the goldsmith for the good advice he had given him, from which, too, he derived so much advantage. And for the future he carried his dishes to no one else. He took the basin also to his shop, and always received the value, according to its weight.

Although Aladdin and his mother had an inexhaustible source for money in their lamp, by which they could procure what they wished, they nevertheless continued to live with the same frugality as before, except that Aladdin put a little apart for some innocent amusements, and to procure some things that were necessary in the house. His mother took the care of her dress upon herself, and supplied it from the cotton she spun. From such a quiet mode of living, it is easy to conjecture how long the money arising from the sale of the twelve dishes and the basin, at the rate Aladdin had sold them at, must have lasted them. They lived in this manner for some years, with the profitable assistance which Aladdin occasionally procured from the lamp.

During this interval, Aladdin did not fail to resort frequently to the places where persons of distinction were to be met; such as the shops of the most considerable merchants in gold and silver, in silks, fine linens, and jewelry; and by sometimes taking a part in their conversations he insensibly acquired the style and manners of the best company. It was at the jewellers' more particularly that he became undeceived in the idea he had formed, that the transparent fruits he had gathered in the garden which contained the lamp were only colored glass, and that he learnt they were jewels of inestimable price. By observing all kinds of precious stones that were bought and sold in these shops, he acquired a knowledge of their value; and as he did not see any that could be compared with those he possessed, either in brilliancy or in size, he concluded that instead of bits of common glass, which he had considered as trifles of no worth, he was in fact possessed of an invaluable treasure. He had, however, the prudence not to mention it to any one, not even to his mother; and there is no doubt that it was in consequence of his silence that he afterwards rose to the great good fortune to which we shall in the end see him elevated.

One day, as he was walking in the city, Aladdin heard a proclamation of the sultan, ordering all persons to shut up their shops and retire into their houses, until the princess Badroul Boudour, his daughter, had passed to the bath and returned.

This public order created in Aladdin a curiosity to see the princess unveiled; which, however, he could not accomplish but by going to some house where he was acquainted, and by looking through the lattices. Yet this by no means satisfied him, because the princess usually wore a veil as she went to the bath. He thought at last of a plan which by its success completely gratified his curiosity. He went and placed himself behind the door of the bath, which was so constructed that he could not fail to see her face.

Aladdin did not wait long in his place of concealment before the princess made her appearance; and he saw her through a crevice perfectly well without being at all seen. A great crowd of females and eunuchs walked on each side of her, and others followed behind. When she had come within three or four paces of the door of the bath, she lifted up the veil, which not only concealed her face but encumbered her, and thus gave Aladdin an opportunity of seeing her as she approached the door.

Till that moment Aladdin had never seen any other female without her veil, except his mother, who was rather old, and who even in her youth had not possessed any beauty; and he was, therefore, incapable of comparing the beauty of women. He had indeed heard that there were some females who were possessed of surprising beauty; but the expressions people use in commenting upon beauty never make the same impression which the examples themselves afford.

Aladdin had no sooner beheld the princess Badroul Boudour, than he forgot that he had ever supposed all women similar to his mother. His opinions were now very different, and he could not help surrendering his heart to the lovely being who had so charmed him. The princess was, in fact, the most beautiful brunette that ever was seen. Her eyes were large, well placed, and full of fire; yet the expression of her countenance was sweet and modest; her nose was properly proportioned, and pretty; her mouth small; her lips like vermilion, and beautifully formed; in short, every feature of her face was perfect and regular. It is therefore by no means wonderful that Aladdin was dazzled and almost out of his senses at beholding such a combination of charms, to which he had been hitherto a stranger. Besides all these perfections, the figure of the princess was elegant, and her air majestic; and merely the sight of her could attract the respect that was due to her rank.

Even after she had entered the bath, Aladdin stood for some time like one distracted, retracing and endeavoring to impress more strongly on his mind the image of her by whom he had been so charmed, and whose beauty had penetrated the inmost recesses of his heart. He at last came to himself, and recollecting that the princess had gone by, and that it would be perfectly useless for him to keep his station in order to see her come out, as her back would then be towards him, and she would also be veiled, he determined to quit his post and retire.

When Aladdin reached home, he was unable to conceal his disquietude and distress from his mother. She was much surprised to see him appear so melancholy, and with such an unusually confused manner, and asked him if anything had happened to him, or if he were not well. He gave her, however, no answer whatever, and continued sitting on the sofa in a negligent manner, retracing in his imagination the lovely image of the princess Badroul Boudour. His mother, who was employed in preparing supper, forbore to trouble him. As soon as it was ready, she served it up close to him on the sofa, and sat down to table. But as she perceived that Aladdin was too much absorbed to attend to it, she invited him to partake of the cheer; but it was with great difficulty she could get him even to change his position. He at length ate, but in a much more sparing manner than usual; casting down his eyes all the time, and keeping such a profound silence that his mother could not obtain a single word in answer to all the questions she put to him, in order to learn the cause of so extraordinary a change.

After supper she renewed the subject, and inquired the cause of his great melancholy; but she could get no intelligible information from him; and he determined to go to bed rather than afford his mother the least satisfaction.

It is not necessary to inquire how Aladdin passed the night, struck as he was with the beauty and charms of the princess Badroul Boudour; but the next morning, as he was sitting upon the sofa opposite his mother, who was spinning her cotton as usual, he addressed her as follows: "Mother, I will now break the silence I have kept since my return from the city yesterday morning. I have perceived that it has pained you. I was not ill, as you seemed to think, nor is anything the matter with me now; yet I can assure you, that what I at this moment feel, and what I shall ever continue to feel, is much worse than any disease. I am myself ignorant of the nature of my feelings; but, doubtless, when I have explained myself, you will understand them.

"It was not known in this quarter of the city," continued Aladdin, "and therefore you of course are ignorant of it, that the princess Badroul Boudour, the daughter of our sultan, went after dinner yesterday to the bath; I learnt this intelligence during my walk in the city. An order was consequently published that all the shops should be shut up, and every one keep at home, that due honor and respect might be paid to the princess; and that the streets through which she had to pass might be clear. As I was not far from the bath at the time, the desire I felt to see the princess unveiled made me take it into my head to place myself behind the door of the bath, supposing, as indeed it happened, that she might take off her veil just before she went into it. You recollect the situation of this door, and can therefore very well judge with what ease I could obtain a full sight of her, if what I conjectured should take place. She did, in fact, take off her veil in going in, and I had the happiness and supreme satisfaction of seeing this beautiful princess. This, my dear mother, is the true cause of the state you saw me in yesterday, and the reason of the silence I have hitherto kept. I feel such a violent passion for this princess, that I know not terms strong enough to express it; and as my ardent desire increases every instant, I am convinced it can only be satisfied by the possession of the lovely princess Badroul Boudour, whom I have resolved to ask in marriage of the sultan."

Aladdin's mother listened with the greatest attention to the whole account of her son, till he came to the last sentence; but when she heard that it was his intention to demand the princess Badroul Boudour in marriage, she could not help interrupting him with a violent fit of laughter. Aladdin wished to resume his speech, but she prevented him.

"Alas! my son," she cried, "what are you thinking of? You must surely have lost your senses to talk thus." "Mother," replied Aladdin, "I assure you I have not lost my senses; I am perfectly in my right mind. I foresaw that you would reproach me with folly and extravagance, even more than you have already done; but, whatever you may say, nothing will prevent me from again declaring to you that my resolution to demand the princess Badroul Boudour of the sultan her father, in marriage, is unalterably fixed."

"Truly, my son," replied his mother, very seriously, "I cannot help telling you that you seem entirely to have forgotten who you are; and even if you are determined to put this resolution in practice, I do not know who will have the audacity to make this request to the sultan." "You yourself must," answered he, without the least hesitation. "I!" cried his mother, in a tone of the greatest surprise; "I go to the sultan! Not I, indeed; I will take care how I engage in such an enterprise. And pray, son, who do you suppose you are," she continued, "to have the impudence to aspire to the daughter of the sultan? Have you forgotten that you are the son of one of the poorest tailors in his capital, and that your mother's family cannot boast of anything better? Are you ignorant that sultans do not deign to bestow their daughters even upon the sons of other sultans, unless they have some chance of coming to the throne?"

"My dear mother," replied Aladdin, "I have already told you that I perfectly foresaw everything you have said, and am aware of all that you can add more; but neither your reasons nor your remonstrances will in in the least change my sentiments. I have told you that I would demand the princess Badroul Boudour in marriage, and that you must make the request. It is a favor which I require of you, and ask with all the respect I owe to you; and I entreat you not to refuse me, unless you would rather see me die than, by granting it, give me life, as it were, a second time."

Aladdin's mother was very much embarrassed when she saw with what obstinacy her son persisted in his mad design. "My dear son," she said, "I am your mother, and, like a good mother, I am ready to do anything that is reasonable and proper for your situation in life and my own. If this business were merely to ask the daughter of one of our neighbors, in a condition of life similar to yours, I would omit nothing, but willingly employ all my abilities in the cause. And to hope for success, even in such a case, you ought to possess some little fortune, or at least be master of some business. When poor people like us wish to marry, the first thing we ought to think about is how to live. While you, not to mention the lowness of your birth, and the little merit or fortune you have, at once aspire to the highest degree of fortune, and pretend to nothing less than to ask in marriage the daughter of your sovereign, who need only open his lips to blast all your designs, and destroy you at once.

"I will omit," continued Aladdin's mother, "what will be the consequence of this business to you, who ought to reflect upon that, if you have any reason left; and I will only consider what regards myself. How such an extraordinary design as that of wishing me to go and propose to the sultan that he would bestow the princess his daughter upon you, came into your head, I cannot think. Now suppose that I have, I will not say the courage, but the impudence, to go and present myself before his majesty, and to make such a mad request of him, to whom should I in the first place address myself for an introduction? Do you not suppose that the very first person I spoke to would treat me as a mad woman, and drive me back with all the indignity and abuse I should so justly merit? But even if I should overcome this difficulty and procure an audience of the sultan,—as indeed I know he readily grants it to all his subjects when they demand it of him for the purpose of obtaining justice, and that he even grants it with pleasure when you have to ask a favor of him, if he thinks you are worthy of it,—what should I do then? Are you in either of these situations? Do you think that you deserve the favor which you wish me to ask for you? Are you worthy of it? What have you done for your prince or for your country? How have you ever distinguished yourself? If, then, you have done nothing to deserve so great a favor, and if, moreover, you are not worthy of it, with what face can I make the demand? How can I even open my lips to propose such a thing to the sultan? His illustrious presence and the magnificence of his whole court will instantly stop my mouth. How shall I, who trembled before your poor father, my husband, even attempt such a thing? But there is also another reason, my son, which you have not yet thought of, and that is, that no one ever appears before the sultan without offering him some present, when any favor is required. Presents have at least this advantage, that if, for any reason of their own, the persons solicited refuse your request, they listen to the demand that is made without any repugnance. But what present have you to offer? And when should you ever have anything that might be at all worthy the attention of so mighty a monarch? what proportion can your present possibly have with the demand you wish to make? Recollect yourself, and think that you aspire to a thing which it is impossible to obtain."

Aladdin listened with great patience to everything his mother said in order to dissuade him from his purpose; and having reflected for some time upon every part of her remonstrance, he addressed her as follows: "I readily acknowledge, my dear mother, that it is a great piece of rashness in me to dare to carry my pretensions so high as I do; and that it must also appear very inconsiderate to request you with so much earnestness and warmth to propose this marriage to the sultan, without first having taken the proper means of procuring an audience and a favorable reception. I earnestly ask your pardon for doing so; but you must not wonder if the violence of the passion that possesses me has prevented me from thinking about everything that was necessary to procure me the gratification I seek. I love the princess Badroul Boudour far beyond what you can possibly conceive; or rather I adore her, and shall persevere in my wish and intention of marrying her. This is a matter on which my mind is irrevocably fixed. I am much obliged to you for the hints which you have thrown out in what you have said; and I look upon this beginning as an earnest of the complete success which I flatter myself will attend my proposals.

"You say that it is customary for him who seeks an audience of the sultan to bear a present in his hand, and that I have nothing worthy to offer him. I agree with you about the present, and also that I never once thought of it. But with regard to what you say about my having nothing worthy of his acceptance, that is a different matter. Do you not suppose, mother, that what I brought home with me on the day that I was saved in so wonderful a manner as I have before told you, from an almost inevitable death, would be an acceptable present to the sultan? I mean what I brought home in the two purses, in my sash, and in my vest, and which we have both hitherto taken for colored glass; but I am now undeceived, and can inform you, that they are precious stones of almost inestimable value, and exactly suitable to the state and dignity of a great sovereign. I became acquainted with their value by frequenting the shops of jewellers; and you may, I assure you, depend upon the truth of what I say. None of those which I have seen at our jewellers are to be compared with those we have, either for size or beauty; and yet the dealers set a very high price upon them. In fact, we are both of us ignorant of the value of ours; although that is the case, however, as far as I can judge from the little experience I have had, I am persuaded the present cannot but be very agreeable to the sultan. You have a porcelain dish sufficiently large, and of a very good shape, for holding them. Bring it here, and let us see the effect it will produce when we have arranged them according to their different colors."

Aladdin's mother brought the dish, and he took the precious stones out of the two purses and arranged them. The effect they produced in broad daylight by the variety of their colors, by their lustre and brilliancy, was so great, that both mother and son were absolutely dazzled, and were in the greatest astonishment, they having previously seen them only by the light of a lamp. It is true that Aladdin had seen them on the trees, hanging like fruit, where they afforded a most brilliant sight; but as he was then, as it were, a child, he looked upon these jewels only as things proper to play with.

After having for some time admired their beauty, "You cannot now," said Aladdin, resuming the conversation, "excuse yourself any longer from presenting yourself to the sultan, under the pretence that you have nothing to offer him. Here is a present which, in my opinion, will procure for you the most favorable reception."

Although the mother of Aladdin, notwithstanding its great beauty and brilliancy, did not think this present near so valuable as her son did, yet she nevertheless supposed it would be very acceptable; and had, therefore, nothing to answer on that point. She then recurred to the nature of the request which Aladdin wished her to make to the sultan: this was a constant source of disquietude to her. "I cannot, my son," she said, "possibly conceive that this present will produce the effect you wish, or that the sultan will look upon you with a favorable eye. And it becomes necessary for me to acquit myself with propriety in the business you wish me to undertake. I feel convinced I shall not have courage enough to carry me through, but be struck quite dumb; and thus not only lose all my labor, but the present also, which, according to what you say, is most uncommonly rich and valuable. If I should fail in this manner, how painful will it be for me to come back and inform you of the destruction of all your hopes and expectations! I have thus told you what I know will happen, and you ought to believe it. But," added she, "if I should act so contrary to my opinion as to submit to your wishes, and shall have sufficient courage to make the request you desire, be assured that the sultan will either ridicule me, and send me back as a mad woman, or that he will be in such a passion, and with reason too, that both you and I shall most infallibly become the victims of his anger."

Aladdin's mother continued to give her son many other reasons, in order to prevail upon him to change his mind; but the charms of the princess Badroul Boudour had made too strong an impression upon the heart of Aladdin to suffer his intentions to be altered. He persisted in requiring his mother to perform her part of what he had resolved upon; and the regard she had for him, as well as the dread lest he should give himself up to some horrid excess, at length conquered her repugnance, and she acceded to his wishes.

As it was now very late, and the time of going to the palace to be presented to the sultan was past for that day, they let the matter rest till the next. Aladdin and his mother talked of nothing else during the rest of the day, and he said all he could think of to confirm her resolution of presenting herself to the sultan. But, notwithstanding all that he could say, his mother could not be persuaded that she should ever succeed in this affair; and, indeed, she had every reason to be doubtful of it. "My dear child," said she, "even should the sultan receive me as favorably as my regard for you would lead me to wish, and should listen with the greatest patience to the proposal you request me to make, will he not inquire what property you possess, and where your estates are, — for he will, of course, in the first instance, rather ask about this matter than about your personal appearance, — if, I say, he should ask me this question, what answer do you wish me to make?"

"Do not, mother, let us distress ourselves," replied Aladdin, "about a thing that may never happen. Let us first see how the sultan will receive you, and what answer he will give to your request. If he should wish to be informed of what you mention, I will find out some answer to make him. I put the greatest confidence in my lamp, by means of which we have been able for some years past to live in the manner we have done. It will not desert me when I have most need of it."

His mother had not a word to say to this speech of Aladdin. She might naturally suppose that the lamp would be able to perform much more astonishing things than simply to procure them the means of subsistence. This satisfied her; and at the same time smoothed all the difficulties which seemed to oppose themselves to the business she had promised to undertake for her son. Aladdin, who easily penetrated his mother's thoughts, said to her: "Above all things, keep this matter secret; for upon that depends all the success we may either of us expect." They then retired for the night: but love, joined to the great schemes of aggrandizement which the son had in view, prevented him from passing the night so tranquilly as he wished. He got up at daybreak and went immediately to call his mother. He was anxious that she should dress herself as soon as possible, in order that she might repair to the gate of the sultan's palace, and enter at the same time that the grand vizier, the subordinate viziers, and the other officers of state went into the divan, or hall of audience, where the sultan always held his council in person.

Aladdin's mother did everything as her son wished. She took the porcelain dish in which the jewels were deposited, and folded it up in a very fine and white linen cloth. She then took another cloth, which was not so fine, and tied the four corners of it together, that she might carry it with less trouble. She afterwards set out, to the great joy of Aladdin, towards the palace of the sultan. The grand vizier, accompanied by the other viziers and the proper officers of the court, had already gone in before she arrived at the gate. The crowd of persons who had business at the divan was very great. The doors were opened, and the mother of Aladdin went into the divan with the rest. It was a beautiful saloon, very spacious, and with a magnificent entrance. She placed herself opposite to the throne of the sultan, near the grand vizier and other officers who formed the council on both sides. The different parties who had suits to press were called up one after the other, according to the order in which their petitions had been presented; and their affairs were heard, pleaded, and determined, till the usual hour of breaking up the council. The sultan then rose, took leave of the members, and went back to his apartment, into which he was followed by the grand vizier. The other viziers and officers who formed the council then went away: as also did all those whose private business had brought them there, some being delighted at having gained their cause, while others were but ill satisfied with the decisions pronounced against them; in addition to whom was a third party, they who were anxious to have their business come on as early as possible.

Aladdin's mother, who saw the sultan arise and retire, rightly imagined that he would not appear any more that day, as she observed that every one was going away: she therefore determined to return home. When Aladdin saw her come back with the present in her hand, he knew not at first what to think of the success of her journey. He could hardly open his mouth to inquire what intelligence she brought him, from the fear that she had something unfortunate to announce. The good woman, who had never before set her foot within the walls of a palace, and of course knew not in the least the customs of the place, very soon relieved her son from his anxiety by saying, with an air of gayety, "I have seen the sultan, my son, and I am persuaded he has seen me also. I placed myself directly opposite to him, and there was no person in the way to prevent his seeing me: but he was so much engaged in speaking with those on each side of him, that I really felt compassion to see the trouble he had, and the patience with which he listened to them. This lasted so long, that I believe at length he was quite worn out, for he got up before any one expected it, and retired suddenly, without staying to hear a great many others who were ranged in readiness to address him in their turn: and, indeed, this gave me great pleasure, for I began to lose all patience, and was extremely tired with standing so long. There was, however, no other restraint; and I will not fail to return to-morrow; the sultan will not then, perhaps, be so much engaged."

However desperate Aladdin's passion was, he was obliged to be satisfied with this excuse, and to summon up all his patience. He had, at least, the satisfaction of knowing that his mother had got over the most difficult part of the business, which was to obtain an interview with the sultan; and therefore hoped that, like those who had spoken to him in her presence, she would not hesitate to acquit herself of the commission with which she was intrusted when the favorable moment of addressing him should arrive.

The next morning, quite as early as on the preceding day, Aladdin's mother set out for the sultan's palace with the present of jewels; but her journey was useless. She found the gate of the divan shut, and learned that the council never sat two days together, but alternately, and that she must come again on the following morning. She went back with this intelligence to her son, who was again obliged to exert his patience. She returned again to the palace six different times on the appointed days, always placing herself opposite to the sultan, but she was every time as unsuccessful as at first, and would probably have gone a hundred times as uselessly if the sultan, who constantly saw her standing opposite to him every day the divan sat, had not taken notice of her. This is the more probable. as it was only those who had petitions to present or causes to be heard that approached the sultan, each in his turn pleading his cause according to his rank; and Aladdin's mother was not in this situation.

One day, however, when the council was broken up and the sultan had retired to his apartment, he said to the grand vizier: "For some time past I have observed a woman who has come regularly every day I hold my council, and who carries something in her hand wrapped up in a linen cloth. She remains standing from the beginning of the audience till it is concluded, and always takes care to place herself opposite to me. Do you know what she wants?"

The grand vizier, who did not wish to appear ignorant of the matter, though in fact he knew no more about it than the sultan himself, replied: "Your majesty, sire, is not ignorant that women often make complaints upon the most trivial subjects; she appears to have come to your majesty with some complaint, that they have sold her some bad meat, or something else of equal insignificance." This answer, however, did not satisfy the sultan. "The very next day the council sits," said he to the grand vizier, "if this woman returns, do not fail to call her, that I may hear what she has to say" The grand vizier only answered by kissing his hand and placing it on his head, to show that he would rather lose it than fail in his duty.

The mother of Aladdin had already been so much in the habit of going to the palace on the days the council met, that she now thought it no trouble, provided she by these means proved to her son that she neglected nothing that depended upon her, and that he had, therefore, no reason to complain of her. She consequently returned to the palace the next day the council met, and placed herself near the entrance of the divan, opposite to the sultan, as had been her usual practice.

The grand vizier had not made his report of any business before the sultan perceived Aladdin's mother. Touched with compassion at the excessive patience she had shown, "In the first place," said he to the grand vizier, "and for fear you should forget it, do you not observe the woman whom I mentioned to you? Order her to come here, and we will begin by hearing what she has to say, and expedite her business." The grand vizier immediately pointed out the woman to the chief of the ushers, who was standing near him ready to receive his orders, and desired him to bring her before the sultan. The officer went directly to the mother of Aladdin and, having made a sign to her, she followed him to the foot of the throne, where he left her, and went back to his place near the grand vizier.

Aladdin's mother, following the example that so many others whom she had seen approach the sultan had set her, prostrated herself, with her face towards the carpet which covered the steps of the throne, and she remained in that situation till the sultan commanded her to rise. She did so; and the sultan then addressed her in these words: "For a long time past, my good woman, I have seen you regularly attend my divan, and remain near the entrance from the time it assembled till it broke up. What is the business that brings you here?" On hearing this she prostrated herself a second time, and, on rising, thus answered. "High monarch, mightier than all the monarchs of the world, before I inform your majesty of the extraordinary and almost incredible cause that compels me to appear before your sublime throne, I entreat you to pardon the boldness — nay, I might say the impudence — of the request I am going to make to you. It is of so uncommon a nature that I tremble, and feel almost overcome with shame to propose it to my sultan." In order, however, that she might have full liberty to explain herself, the sultan commanded every one to leave the divan, and remained with only his grand vizier in attendance; he then told her that she might speak and discover everything without fear.

The goodness of the sultan, however, did not perfectly satisfy Aladdin's mother, although he had thus prevented her from being obliged to explain her wishes before the whole assembly. She was still anxious to screen herself from the indignation which she could not but dread that the proposal she had to make to him would excite, and from which she could not otherwise defend herself. "Sire," said she, again addressing the sultan, "I once more entreat your majesty to assure me of your pardon beforehand, in case you should think my request at all injurious or offensive." "Whatever it may be," replied the sultan, "I pardon you; no harm shall happen to you from anything you may say; speak, therefore, with confidence."

When Aladdin's mother had thus taken every precaution against the possible anger of the sultan at the very delicate proposal she was about to make to him, she faithfully related by what means Aladdin had seen the princess Badroul Boudour, and with what a violent passion the fatal sight had inspired him. The declaration that he had made concerning her, and the mission with which he had charged his mother, together with all the remonstrances the latter had urged, in order to avert his thoughts from this passion, "a passion," added she, "as injurious to your majesty as it is to the princess your daughter; but my son would not profit by anything I could say, nor would he acknowledge his temerity; he obstinately persevered, and even threatened to commit some rash action in his despair, if I refused to come and demand of your majesty the princess in marriage. I have been obliged, therefore, to comply with his wishes, although this compliance was very much against my will. And once more I entreat your majesty to pardon not only me for making such a request, but also my son Aladdin for having conceived the rash and daring design of aspiring to so illustrious an alliance."

The sultan listened to this speech with the greatest patience and good-humor, and showed not the least mark of either anger or indignation at the request; nor did he even turn it into ridicule. Before he returned any answer to the good woman, he asked her what she had got tied up in a cloth. Upon this she immediately took up the porcelain dish, which she had at first set down at the foot of the throne, and, having uncovered it, she presented it to the sultan.

It is impossible to express the surprise and astonishment which the monarch felt when he saw such a quantity of the most precious, perfect, and brilliant jewels, the size of every one of which was greater than any he had before seen. His admiration for some time was so great, that it rendered him absolutely motionless. When, however, he began to recollect himself, he took the present from the hand of Aladdin's mother, and exclaimed in a transport of joy, "Ah, how very beautiful, how extremely rich!" And then, having admired them all one after another, and put each again in the same place, he turned to his grand vizier, and showing him the dish, asked him if it was not also his opinion that he had never before seen any jewels so perfect and valuable. The vizier was himself delighted with them. "Well," added the sultan, "what do you say to such a present? Is not the donor worthy of the princess my daughter, and must I not give her to him who comes and demands her at such a price?"

This speech of the sultan very much agitated the grand vizier; because the former had some time before given him to understand that he had an intention of bestowing the hand of the princess upon his only son. He was afraid, therefore, and his fears were not without foundation, that the sultan would be dazzled by so rich and extraordinary a present, and alter his mind. He approached the sultan, and, whispering in his ear, "Sire," said he, "every one must allow that this present is not unworthy of the princess; but I entreat you to grant me three months before you determine absolutely. I hope that long before that time my son, for whom you have had the condescension to express that you feel a great inclination, will be able to offer you a much more considerable present than that of Aladdin, whom your majesty does not know." Although the sultan was quite persuaded that it was impossible for his grand vizier to enable his son to make so valuable a present to the princess, he nevertheless granted him this favor. He therefore turned towards Aladdin's mother, and said to her: "Go, my good woman, return home; and tell your son that I agree to the proposal he has made through you; but that I cannot bestow the princess my daughter in marriage until I have ordered and prepared a variety of furniture and ornaments, which will not be ready for three months. At the end of that time come hither again."

The mother of Aladdin went back, and felt the greater joy because she had, in the first place, conceived even access to the sultan for a person of her condition as absolutely impossible; and because, also, she had received so favorable an answer, when she had expected a rebuke that would have overwhelmed her with confusion. When Aladdin saw his mother enter the house, there were two circumstances that led him to suppose she brought him good news: one was, that she had returned that morning much sooner than usual; and the other that her countenance expressed pleasure and good-humor. "Well, mother," said Aladdin, "what have I to hope? Am I doomed to die with despair?" When she had taken off her veil, and sat down on the sofa by his side, "My son," she said, "that I may not hold you any longer in suspense, I will, in the first place, tell you that, so far from thinking of dying, you have every reason to be satisfied." She then went on with her narrative, and told him that she had obtained an audience before every other person, which was the reason that she had come back so soon; the precautions she had taken to make her request to the sultan in such a way that he should not be offended when he came to know that it was to demand of him the princess Badroul Boudour in marriage for her son; and the very favorable answer the sultan had given her from his own lips. She then added that, as far as she could judge from everything the sultan did, it was the present that had had such a powerful effect upon his mind as to induce him to return so favorable an answer. "At least, I think so," added she, "because before the sultan returned me any answer at all, the grand vizier whispered something in his ear, and I was afraid that it would tend to lessen the good intentions he seemed to have towards you."

When Aladdin heard this, he thought himself the happiest of mortals. He thanked his mother for all the pains she had taken in the transaction, and for the happy success which was so important to his repose. So impatient was he, however, to possess the object of his affection, that three months seemed to him to be an age; he nevertheless endeavored to wait with patience, considering the word of the sultan as irrevocable. In the mean time, he not only reckoned the hours, the days, and the weeks, but even every moment, till the period should elapse.

It happened one evening, when about two months of the time were passed, that as Aladdin's mother was going to light her lamp she found she had no oil in the house. She therefore went out to buy some; and on going into the city she found that there was some festivity going forward. All the shops were ornamented with branches and decorations, and every preparation making for an illumination, each person endeavoring to excel his neighbor in splendor and magnificence, in order to show his zeal. Every one was giving marks of his pleasure and rejoicing. The streets were crowded with officers in their dresses of ceremony, mounted upon horses, most richly caparisoned, and surrounded with a great number of attendants and domestics on foot, who were traversing the city in every direction. Upon seeing all this, she asked the merchant of whom she bought the oil what it all meant. "Where do you come from, my good woman," said he, "not to know that the son of the grand vizier is this evening to be married to the princess Badroul Boudour, the daughter of our sultan? She is just now coming from the bath, and the officers whom you see have assembled here in order to escort her back to the palace, where the ceremony is to be performed."

Aladdin's mother did not wait to hear any more. She returned home with all possible speed, and arrived quite out of breath. Her son was not in the least prepared for the bad news she brought him. "Everything, my son," she exclaimed, "is lost. You depended upon the fair promises of the sultan, and it will all come to nothing." Aladdin was alarmed at these words, and instantly inquired, "On what account, mother, will not the sultan keep his word? How do you know anything about it?" "This very evening," answered she, "the son of the grand vizier is to marry the princess Badroul Boudour at the palace." She then related to him in what way she had learned the news, and informed him of all the circumstances which prevented her from having the least doubt of its truth.

Aladdin received this intelligence like a thunder-stroke. Any person but himself would have been quite overwhelmed by it; but a sort of secret jealousy prevented him from remaining long in this state. He instantly brought the lamp to his recollection,—that lamp which had hitherto been so useful to him; and then, without venting his rage in vain reproaches against the sultan, or the grand vizier, or the son of that officer, he only said: "This minister's son, mother, shall not be so happy to-night as he expects; while I am gone for a few moments into my chamber, do you prepare supper."

His mother easily comprehended that Aladdin intended to make use of the lamp, in order, if possible, to prevent the marriage of the grand vizier's son with the princess Badroul Boudour from being completed. Nor did she deceive herself; for he was no sooner in his own room, than he took the wonderful lamp, which he kept there, that his mother might never again be alarmed at it, as she had been when the genie had put her into so great a fright. He had no sooner taken the lamp, and rubbed it in the usual place, than the genie instantly appeared before him. "What do you wish?" said he to Aladdin. "I am ready to obey you as your slave, and the slave of those who have the lamp in their hands; I, and the other slaves of the lamp." "Attend to me then," answered Aladdin: "you have hitherto brought me only what I wanted to eat and drink. I have now a business for you of more importance. I have demanded of the sultan the princess Badroul Boudour, his daughter, in marriage. He promised her to me; and only requested a delay of three months. Instead, however, of keeping his word, he has this very evening, before that period has elapsed, given his daughter in marriage to the son of his grand vizier. I have just now been informed of it, and the thing is certain. What, therefore, I have to order you to do, is this; as soon as the bride and bridegroom shall be placed by each other's side, take them up, and bring them both instantly here in their bed." "Master," replied the genie, "I will obey you; have you anything else to command?" "Nothing at present," added Aladdin. The genie instantly disappeared.

Aladdin then went back to his mother, and supped with her in the same tranquil manner as usual. After supper he entered into conversation with her for some time respecting the marriage of the princess, as of a thing that did not in the least embarrass him. He afterwards returned to his chamber, and left his mother to repose whenever she pleased. He, of course, did not retire to rest; but waited in expectation of the return of the genie, and the execution of the orders he had given him.

In the mean time everything was prepared in the sultan's palace to celebrate the nuptials of the princess, and the time was spent in ceremonies and rejoicings till the night was far advanced. When all this was concluded, the son of the grand vizier, at a sign that the chief of the eunuchs belonging to the princess privately gave him, retired unperceived; and this officer then introduced him into the apartment belonging to the princess, his wife, and conducted him to the chamber where the nuptial couch was prepared. He retired to bed first; and in a short time after the sultana, accompanied by her own women and those of her daughter, brought the bride into the room; and, after she had embraced her and wished her a good night, she retired with all the other females.

Scarcely had this taken place, before the genie, like a faithful slave of the lamp, took up the bed in which were the bride and the bridegroom, and, to the great astonishment of both, transported them in an instant to Aladdin's chamber, where he set them down.

Aladdin, who was waiting for this event with the greatest impatience, did not long suffer the son of the grand vizier to remain in bed with the princess. "Take this bridegroom," said he to the genie, "and shut him up in the closet above the sewer, and return again in the morning, just at daybreak." The genie instantly took the grand vizier's son out of bed, and transported him to the place Aladdin had commanded, where he left him; having first breathed upon him in such a way that the effects of it in every limb were felt in a lassitude that prevented him from stirring from his place.

How violent soever the passion was which Aladdin felt for the princess, he did not enter into any long conversation with her, when he was with her alone. "Fear nothing, most adorable princess," he exclaimed, with an impassioned air; "you are here in safety; and however violent the love which I feel for you may be, with whatever ardor I adore your beauty and your charms, be assured that I will never exceed the limits of the profound respect I have for you. If I have been forced," he added, "to proceed to this extremity, it has not been with the intention of offending you, but to prevent an unjust rival from possessing you, contrary to the promise which the sultan your father had made in my favor."

The princess, who knew nothing of all these particulars, paid very little attention to what Aladdin said. She was indeed no longer in a condition to answer him. The alarm and astonishment into which this surprising and unexpected adventure had thrown her, had such an effect upon her, that Aladdin could not get a single word from her. He did not, however, remain long in this state, but immediately laid down in the place of the grand vizier's son, with his back turned towards the princess, having first taken the precaution to place a sabre between the princess and himself.

Aladdin was satisfied with having thus deprived his rival of the happiness with the enjoyment of which he had this night flattered himself, and slept very tranquilly. But how different was the case with the princess! — never in her whole life did she pass so unpleasant and disagreeable a night. And it is only necessary to reflect for an instant on the place and situation in which the genie had left the son of the grand vizier, to judge that the bridegroom spent the hours of darkness in a still more afflicting manner.

Aladdin had no occasion to rub his lamp the next morning to call the genie. He returned at the appointed hour, and while Aladdin was dressing himself. "Here I am," said he to Aladdin, "what commands have you for me?" "Go," answered Aladdin, "and bring back the son of the grand vizier from the place where you have put him, place him again in his bed, and transport it back to the palace of the sultan, whence you brought it." The genie instantly went to relieve the grand vizier's son from his post, and as soon as he appeared Aladdin took away his sabre. He placed the bridegroom by the side of the princess, and in a moment replaced the bed in the very same chamber of the sultan's palace whence he had before taken it.

It is necessary to remark that during all these transactions the genie was invisible to the princess and the son of the grand vizier; the sight of his hideous form would have killed them with fright. They did not even hear a single word of the conversation that passed between Aladdin and him, and perceived only the agitation of the bed and the transporting of it from one place to another; and indeed it is easy to imagine that this frightened them quite enough.

The genie had no sooner put the nuptial couch in its place, than the sultan entered the chamber and wished the princess a good morning. The son of the grand vizier, half dead with the cold he had suffered all night, jumped out of bed as soon as he heard some person opening the door, and went into the dressing-room where he had undressed himself in the evening.

The sultan came up to the bedside of the princess, and kissed her between her eyes, as is the usual custom in wishing any one a good morning. He asked her, with a smile upon his face, how she had passed the night; but when he lifted up his head and looked at her with greater attention, he was extremely surprised to observe her in a most dejected and melancholy state. She cast upon him the most sorrowful looks, and showed, by her whole manner, that she labored either under the most severe affliction or the greatest degree of discontent. The sultan again spoke to her, but as he found he was unable to get a word from her, he thought it might arise from a becoming modesty, and therefore retired. He could not, however, but suspect from her continued silence that something very extraordinary had happened. He went immediately to the apartment of the sultana, to whom he mentioned the state in which he had found the princess, and the reception she had given him. "Sire," replied the sultana, "do not let this surprise your majesty; there is not a single newly married woman who would not act in the same way the day after her nuptials. It will be a very different thing in two or three days. She will then receive the sultan her father as becomes her. I will go and see her," added the sultana; "I am very much deceived if she will receive me in the same manner."

As soon as the sultana was dressed, she went to the apartment of the princess, who was not yet risen. She approached the bed, and, wishing her a good morning, embraced her; but her surprise was excessive, when she found that the princess was not only silent, but was in the greatest distress. She therefore concluded that something which she could not yet comprehend had happened to her. "My dear daughter," said the sultana to her, "what is the reason that you so ill repay the caresses I bestow upon you?

You ought not to act thus towards your mother. Something surely has occurred which I do not understand. Tell me, then, candidly; and do not suffer me to remain so long in an uncertainty that distresses me beyond measure."

At length, fetching a deep sigh, the princess Badroul Boudour broke silence. "Alas! my most honored mother," she cried, "pardon me if I have failed in any respect that is due to you. My mind is so entirely absorbed by the strange and extraordinary things that have happened to me this night, that I have not yet recovered my astonishment and fears, and have some difficulty to collect myself." She then related how, the instant after she and her husband were retired, the bed had been taken up and transported into an ill-furnished and dismal chamber, where she found herself quite alone and separated from her husband, without in the least knowing what was become of him; and that she found in this apartment a young man, who, after having addressed a few words to her, which her terror prevented her from understanding, lay down in her husband's place, having first put his sabre between them; and that when morning approached, her husband was restored to her, and the bed again brought back to its place in an instant of time. The whole of this transaction," she added, "was but just completed, when the sultan my father came into my chamber. I was then so absorbed in grief and distress, that I could not answer him a single word; and I am afraid that he was very angry at the manner in which I received the honor he did me. I hope, however, that he will pardon me, when he shall have become acquainted with my melancholy adventure, and the lamentable state in which I even now find myself."

The sultana listened with great attention to everything the princess had to relate; but she could not give full credit to the account. "You have done well, my child," she said to the princess, "not to inform the sultan, your father, of this matter. Take care that you mention it to no one, unless you wish to be taken for one who has lost her reason, which will certainly be the case, if you should talk in this way to any other person." "Madam," replied the princess, "I assure you that I am in my right senses, and know what I say; you may ask my husband, and he will tell you the same thing." "I will take care and inform myself of it," answered the sultana; "but even if he gives me the same account you have done, I shall not be more persuaded of the truth of it; in the mean time, however, arise, and drive this phantasy from your mind. It would be indeed a curious thing to see you under such a delusion during the feasts that have been ordered on account of your nuptials, and which will last for many days, not only in the palace but all over the kingdom. Do you not already hear the trumpets, tymbals, and other instruments? All this ought to inspire you with joy and pleasure, and make you forget the fanciful dream which you have related to me." The sultana then called her women; and after she had made her get up, and seen her at her toilet, she went to the sultan's apartment, and told him that a strange fancy possessed his daughter, but that it was a mere trifle. She then ordered the son of the grand vizier to be called, in order to inquire of him about what the princess had told her. But he felt himself so highly honored by his alliance with the sultan, that he determined to feign ignorance of everything. "Tell me, son-in-law," said the sultana, "have you got the same strange ideas in your head as your wife?" "Madam," he replied, "may I be permitted to ask you for what reason you put this question to me?" "This is sufficient," answered the sultana; "I do not wish to know more; you have more sense than she has."

The festivities in the palace continued throughout the day; and the sultan forgot nothing that he thought might inspire the princess with joy. He endeavored to make her partake of the diversions and various exhibitions that were going on; but the recollection of what had passed on the preceding night made such a strong impression on her mind that it was very evident something occupied her whole attention. The son of the grand vizier was not less afflicted at the wretched night he had passed, but his ambitious views made him dissemble; and therefore, if any persons had judged from his appearance, they would have thought him the happiest bridegroom in the world.

Aladdin, who was well informed of everything that passed in the palace, did not doubt but that the newly married pair would again sleep together, notwithstanding the distressing adventure that happened to them the night before. He did not choose, however, to leave them to repose in quiet. A short time before night came on he again had recourse to his lamp. The genie instantly appeared, and addressed Aladdin with the accustomed speech in offering his services. "The grand vizier's son and the princess Badroul Boudour," replied he, "are again to sleep together this night. Go, and as soon as they have lain down, bring the bed hither, as you did yesternight."

The genie obeyed Aladdin with equal punctuality as on the night before; and the vizier's son passed this night in as cold and unpleasant a situation as he did the former; while the princess had the mortification of having Aladdin for her bedfellow, with the sabre, as before, placed between them. In the morning the genie came, according to Aladdin's orders, replaced the bridegroom in the bed, and took it back to the chamber of the palace whence he had taken it.

After the extraordinary reception which the princess Badroul Boudour had given the sultan on the preceding morning, he was very anxious to learn how she passed the second night, and whether she would again receive him in the manner she had before done. He went, therefore, to her apartment early in the morning, that he might satisfy himself. The grand vizier's son, still more mortified and distressed at his bad treatment the second night than he had been on the first, no sooner heard the sultan than he got up as fast as possible, and ran into the dressing-room. The sultan came to her bedside, and wished the princess a good morning, after having caressed her in the same manner as he had done the day before. "Well, my daughter," he said, "are you in as bad humor this morning as you were yesterday? Tell me how you have passed the night." The princess preserved the same silence, and the sultan perceived that she was still more dejected and distressed than she had been the morning before. He could therefore but infer that something very extraordinary had happened to her. Irritated at the mystery she made of it to him, "Daughter," said he, in an angry tone, and at the same time drawing his sabre, "either tell me what you thus conceal, or I will instantly strike off your head."

The princess, terrified at the manner in which the sultan menaced her, and at the sight of the drawn sabre, at length broke silence. "My dear father," she exclaimed, with tears in her eyes, "if I have offended your majesty, I earnestly entreat your pardon. From your known goodness and clemency I trust I shall change your anger into compassion when I shall have related in a full and faithful manner the occasion of the distressing and melancholy situation in which I have been placed, both last night and the night before." This preamble appeased and softened the sultan. She then related at length what had happened to her on both these horrible nights, and in a manner so affecting that he was penetrated with grief for the suffering of his beloved daughter. She thus concluded her narrative: "If your majesty has the least doubt of any part of what I have said, you can easily inquire of the husband you have bestowed upon me; I am very well persuaded that he will prove to you the truth of everything I have related."

The sultan entered very fully into the distressing feelings this surprising adventure must have excited in his daughter's mind. "My child," said he, "you were wrong not to explain to me yesterday the strange business which you have just related, and in which I am not less interested than yourself. I have not bestowed you in marriage with the view to render you unhappy, but, on the contrary, to increase your happiness, and to afford you every enjoyment you so well deserve, and which you might reasonably expect from a husband who seemed to be very proper for you. Drive away, then, from your memory the melancholy ideas of what you have been relating to me. I will take care that you shall experience no more nights so disagreeable, nay, so insupportable, as those which you have now suffered."

When the sultan got back to his apartment, he immediately sent for the grand vizier. "Have you seen your son?" he asked him; "and has he mentioned anything in particular to you?" When the latter replied that he had not seen him, the sultan reported to him everything he had heard from the princess Badroul Boudour. He then added, "I have no doubt but that my daughter has told me the truth. I wish, nevertheless, to have this matter confirmed by the testimony of your son. Go, therefore, and ask him what has happened to him."

The grand vizier instantly went to his son; he informed him of what the sultan had said, and commanded him not to disguise the truth, and to tell him everything that had passed. "I will conceal nothing from you, my father," replied his son, "and everything the princess has told the sultan is true; but she was unable to give an account of the bad treatment which I in particular have experienced. Since my marriage I have spent two of the most dreadful nights you can possibly conceive; and I cannot describe to you all the various evils I have gone through. I do not mention the fright I was in at finding myself lifted up in my bed four different times without being able to see any one, and being transported from one place to another without being able to conceive in what way it was brought about. But you can yourself judge of the dreadful state I was in, when I tell you that I passed both nights standing upright in a narrow and loathsome closet, without having the power of moving from the spot where I was placed, or making the least motion, although there seemed to be no obstacle whatever to prevent me. After having said this, I have no occasion to enter into a greater detail of my sufferings. Let me, however, add that all this has by no means lessened my respect and affection for the princess, my wife; though I confess to you most sincerely that, with all the honor and splendor that I derive from having the daughter of my sovereign for my wife, I would much sooner die than enjoy this high alliance, if I must continue to undergo the severe and horrible treatment I have already suffered. I am sure the princess must be of the same opinion as myself; and there is no doubt but that our separation is as necessary for her comfort as for my own. I entreat you, therefore, my dear father, by all the affection which led you to obtain this great honor for me, to induce the sultan to decree our marriage null and void."

However great might be the ambition of the grand vizier to have his son so nearly allied to the sultan, yet the fixed resolution which he found he had formed of dissolving his marriage with the princess made him think it necessary to request his son to have patience for a few days before it was finally settled, in order to see whether this unpleasant business might not have an end. He then left his son, and returned to the sultan, to whom he acknowledged that everything was true, as he had himself learned from his son. And then, without waiting till the sultan himself spoke to him about annulling the marriage, to which he observed that the latter was very much inclined, he requested permission for his son to leave the palace and return to him, under the pretext that it was not just that the princess should be exposed an instant longer to so terrible a persecution through regard for his son.

The grand vizier had no difficulty in obtaining his request. The sultan, who had already determined on the matter in his own mind, immediately gave orders for the rejoicings to be put a stop to, not only in his own palace, but in the city and throughout the whole extent of his dominions; and in a short time every mark of public joy and festivity within the kingdom ceased. This sudden and unexpected change gave rise to a variety of different conjectures. Every one was inquiring why these contrary orders were issued; and all affirmed that the grand vizier had been seen to come out of the palace and go towards his own house, accompanied by his son, and that they both seemed very much dejected. Aladdin was the only person who was acquainted with the actual reason; and he rejoiced most sincerely at the happy success arising from the use of the lamp. And having now learnt for a certainty that his rival had left the palace, and that the marriage between the princess and him was annulled, he had no further occasion to rub his lamp and have recourse to the genie, in order to prevent his rival's happiness. What, however, was most singular, was that neither the sultan nor the grand vizier, who had completely forgotten Aladdin and the request he had made, entertained the least idea that he had any part in the enchantment which had been the occasion of the dissolution of the marriage of the princess.

Aladdin suffered the three months which the sultan wished to elapse before the marriage of the princess Badroul Boudour and himself, to pass without making any application. He kept, however, an exact account of every day; and when the period was expired, he sent his mother on the very next morning to the palace to remind the sultan of his promise. She went to the palace, and stood at her usual place, near the entrance of the divan. The sultan no sooner cast his eyes that way than he recollected her, and she instantly brought to his mind the request she had made and the exact time to which he had deferred it. As the grand vizier approached to make some report to him, the sultan stopped him by saying: "I perceive that good woman who presented us with the beautiful collection of jewels some time since; order her to come forward, and you can make your report after I have heard what she has to say." The grand vizier immediately called to the chief of the ushers, and, pointing her out to him, desired him to bring her forward.

Aladdin's mother advanced to the foot of the throne, where she prostrated herself in the usual manner. After she had risen, the sultan asked her what she wished. "Sire," she replied, "I again present myself before the throne of your majesty to represent to you, in the name of my son Aladdin, that the three months which you had desired him to wait, in consequence of the request I had to make to your majesty, are expired, and to entreat you to have the goodness to recall the circumstance to your remembrance."

When the sultan had desired a delay of three months before he answered the request of this good woman the first time he saw her, he thought he should hear no more of a marriage which, from the apparent poverty and low situation of Aladdin's mother, who always presented herself before him in a very coarse and common dress, appeared so little suited to the princess his daughter. The application, therefore, which she now made to him to keep his word, embarrassed him very much, and he did not think it prudent to give her at the moment a direct answer. He consulted his grand vizier, and told him the repugnance he felt at concluding a marriage between the princess and an unknown person whom fortune, he conjectured, had not raised much above the condition of a common subject.

"Sire," replied the vizier, "it seems to me that there is a very easy and yet certain method to avoid this unequal marriage; and of which this Aladdin, even if he were known to your majesty, could not complain: it is to set so high a price upon the princess, your daughter, that all his riches, however great they may be, cannot amount to the value. This will be a way to make him desist from so bold, not to say arrogant an attempt, and which he certainly does not seem to have considered well before he engaged in it."

The sultan approved of the advice of his grand vizier, and after some little reflection, he said to Aladdin's mother: "Sultans, my good woman, ought always to keep their words; and I am ready to adhere to mine, and render your son happy by marrying him to the princess, my daughter; but as I cannot bestow her in marriage till I am better acquainted how she will be provided for, tell your son that I will fulfil my promise as soon as he shall send me forty large basins of massive gold, quite full of the same kind of jewels which you have already presented to me from him, brought by an equal number of black slaves, each of whom shall be conducted by a white slave, young, well made, of good appearance, and richly dressed. These are the conditions upon which I am ready to bestow upon him the princess, my daughter. Go, my good woman; and I will wait till you bring me his answer."

Aladdin's mother again prostrated herself at the foot of the throne, and retired. In her way home, she smiled within herself at the foolish thoughts of her son. "Where, indeed," said she, "is he to find so many golden basins, and such a great quantity of colored glass to fill them? Will he attempt to go back to the subterraneous cavern, the entrance of which is shut up, in order to gather them off the trees? And where can he procure all these handsome slaves which the sultan demands? He is far enough from having his pretensions fulfilled; and I believe he will not be very well satisfied with my embassy." When she entered the house, with her mind occupied by these thoughts, from which she judged Aladdin had nothing more to hope, "My son," said she, "I advise you to think no more of your marriage with the princess Badroul Boudour. The sultan, indeed, received me with great kindness, and I believe that he was well inclined towards you; the grand vizier, however, if I am not mistaken, made him alter his opinion, as you will yourself think when you have heard the account I am going to give you. After I had represented to his majesty that the three months were expired, and requested him, as from you, to recollect his promise, I observed that he did not answer me until he had spoken for some time in a low tone of voice to the grand vizier." Aladdin's mother then gave him an exact detail of everything the sultan had said, and of the conditions upon which he consented to the marriage of the princess, his daughter. "He is even now, my son," added she, "waiting for your answer; but between ourselves," she continued, with a smile, "he may wait long enough." "Not so long as you may think, mother," replied Aladdin; "and the sultan deceives himself, if he supposes, by such exorbitant demands, to prevent me thinking any more of the princess Badroul Boudour. I expected to have had much greater difficulties to surmount, and that he would have put a much higher price upon my incomparable princess. But I am now very well satisfied, and what he requires of me is trifling in comparison to what I would give him to possess such a treasure. While I am considering how to comply with his demands, do you go and see about something for dinner, and leave me to myself."

As soon as his mother was gone out to purchase some provisions, Aladdin took the lamp, and, having rubbed it, the genie instantly appeared, and demanded of him, in the usual terms, what it was that he wanted, for he was ready to obey him. "The sultan agrees to give me the princess, his daughter, in marriage," said Aladdin; "but he first demands of me forty large, heavy basins of massive gold, filled to the very top with the various fruits of the garden from which I took the lamp, of which you are the slave. He requires also that these forty basins should be carried by as many black slaves, preceded by an equal number of young, handsome, and elegant white slaves, very richly dressed. Go, and procure me this present, as soon as possible, that I may send it to the sultan before the sitting of the divan is over." The genie merely said that his commands should be instantly executed, and disappeared.

In a very short time the genie returned with forty black slaves, each carrying upon his head a large golden basin of great weight, full of pearls, diamonds, rubies, and emeralds, equally valuable, for their brilliancy and size, with those which had already been presented to the sultan. Each basin was covered with a cloth of silver, embroidered with flowers of gold. All these slaves, with their golden basins, together with the white ones, entirely filled the house, which was but small, as well as the court in front, and a garden behind it. The genie asked Aladdin if he were contented, and whether he had any further commands for him: and, on being told he had not, he immediately disappeared.

Aladdin's mother now returned from market, and was in the greatest surprise on coming home to see so many persons and so much riches. When she had set down the provisions which she had brought with her, she was going to take off her veil, but Aladdin prevented her. "My dear mother," he cried, "there is no time to lose. It is of consequence that you should return to the palace before the divan breaks up, and should immediately conduct there the present and dowry which the sultan demands for the princess Badroul Boudour, that he may judge, from my diligence and exactness, of the ardent and sincere zeal I have to procure for myself the honor of an alliance with him."

Without waiting for his mother's answer, Aladdin opened the door that led into the street, and ordered all the slaves to go out, one after the other. He then placed a white slave before each of the black ones, who carried the golden basins on their heads. When his mother, who followed the last black slave, was gone out, he shut the door, and remained quietly in his chamber, with the full expectation that the sultan, after receiving such a present as he had required, would now readily consent to accept him for a son-in-law.

The first white slave that went out of Aladdin's house occasioned every one who was going past to stop, and before all the eighty slaves, alternately a black and a white one, had finished going out, the street was filled with a great crowd of people, who collected from all parts to see so grand and extraordinary a sight. The dress of each slave was made of a rich stuff, and so studded with precious stones, that persons who thought themselves the best judges reckoned each of them worth more than a million.* Each dress was also very appropriate, and well adapted to the wearer. The graceful manner, elegant form, and great similarity of each slave, together with their marching at regular distances from each other, and the dazzling lustre constantly shed by the different jewels that were set in their girdles of massive gold, added to the branches of precious stones, fastened to their head-dresses, which were all of a particular make, produced in the multitude of spectators who were assembled such excessive admiration that they could not take their eyes from them so long as any one of them remained in sight. But all the streets were so thronged with people, that every one was obliged to remain in the spot where he happened to be.

As it was necessary to pass through several streets before they could arrive at the palace, the procession went through a great part of the city; and most of the inhabitants, of every rank and quality, were witnesses to this splendid spectacle. As soon as the porters at the gate of the first court of the palace perceived this astonishing procession approaching, they made the greatest haste to open it, as they took the first for a king, so richly and magnificently was he dressed. They were advancing to kiss the hem of his robe, when the slave, instructed by the genie, stopped them, and, in a grave tone of voice, said, "Our master will appear when the time shall be proper."

The first slave, followed by all the rest, advanced as far as the second court, which was very spacious, and contained the apartments inhabited by the sultan when the divan sat. The officers, who were at the head of the sultan's guards, were very handsomely clothed; but they were completely eclipsed by the eighty slaves who were the bearers of Aladdin's present, and who themselves formed part of it. Nothing, in short, throughout the sultan's whole palace appeared so beautiful and brilliant; and however magnificently dressed the different nobles of the court might be, they dwindled to nothing in comparison with what was now to be seen.

* This, from the French translation of M. Galland, alludes to francs; reduced to American currency, the value of each dress would be more than two hundred thousand dollars.

As the sultan had been informed of the march and arrival of these slaves, he had given orders to have them admitted. As soon, therefore, as they presented themselves before the door of the divan, they found it open. They entered in regular order, one part going to the right and the other to the left. After they were all within the hall, and had formed a large semicircle before the throne of the sultan, each of the black slaves placed the basin which he carried upon the carpet. They then all prostrated themselves so low that their foreheads touched the ground. The white slaves also, at the same time, performed the same ceremony. They then all got up, and in doing so, the black slaves skilfully uncovered the basins, which were before them, and then remained standing, with their hands crossed upon their breasts, in a very modest attitude.

The mother of Aladdin, who had in the mean time advanced to the foot of the throne, having first prostrated herself, thus addressed the sultan: "My son Aladdin, sire, is not ignorant that this present which he has sent your majesty is very much beneath the inestimable worth of the princess Badroul Boudour. He nevertheless hopes that your majesty will favorably accept it, and that you will endeavor to make his alliance agreeable to the princess. He has the greater reliance that his expectations will be fulfilled, because he has tried to conform himself to the conditions which it pleased you to point out."

The sultan was unable to pay the least attention to the complimentary address of Aladdin's mother. The very first look he cast upon the forty golden basins, heaped up with jewels of the most brilliant lustre, finest water, and greatest value he had ever seen, as well as the eighty slaves, who seemed like so many kings, both from the magnificence of their dress and their fine appearance, made such an impression upon him that he could not restrain his admiration. Instead, therefore, of making any answer to the compliments of Aladdin's mother, he addressed himself to the grand vizier, who could not himself conceive where such an immense profusion of riches could possibly come from. "Well, vizier," he exclaimed, in the hearing of all, "what do you think of the person, whoever he may be, who has now sent me so rich and wonderful a present; a person of whom neither I nor you have the least knowledge? Do you not think that he is worthy of the princess, my daughter?"

Whatever jealousy or pain the grand vizier might feel at thus seeing an unknown person become the son-in-law of the sultan in preference to his own son, he was nevertheless afraid to dissemble his real opinion on the present occasion. It was very evident that Aladdin had by these means become, in the eyes of the sultan, deserving of being honored with so high an alliance. He therefore answered the sultan in these terms: "Far be it from me, sire, to suppose that he who makes your majesty so worthy a present should himself be undeserving the honor you wish to bestow upon him. I would even say that he deserved still more, if indeed all the treasures of the universe could be put in competition with the princess, your daughter." All the nobles who attended and formed the divan showed, by their applause, that their opinion was the same as that of the grand vizier.

The sultan hesitated no longer. He did not even think of informing himself whether Aladdin possessed any other qualification that would render him worthy of aspiring to the honor of becoming his son-in-law. The sight alone of such immense riches, and the wonderful celerity with which Aladdin had fulfilled his request, without making the least difficulty about the conditions, however exorbitant, for which he had stipulated, easily persuaded him that Aladdin would not be deficient in anything that could render him as accomplished and deserving as he could wish. That he might, therefore, send back Aladdin's mother as well satisfied as she could possibly expect, he said to her: "Go, my good woman, and tell your son that I am waiting with open arms to receive and embrace him; and that the greater diligence he makes to come and receive from my hands the gift I am ready to bestow upon him in the princess, my daughter, the greater pleasure he will afford me."

Aladdin's mother had no sooner departed, as happy as a woman of her condition could be in seeing her son exalted to a situation beyond her greatest expectations, than the sultan put an end to the audience; and, coming down from his throne, he ordered the eunuchs belonging to the princess to be called, and to take up the basins and carry them to the apartment of their mistress, where he himself went in order to examine them with her at their leisure. The chief of the eunuchs immediately caused this order to be complied with.

The eighty slaves were not forgotten; they were conducted into the interior of the palace, and when, some time after, he was speaking of their splendor to the princess, he ordered them to come opposite to her apartment, that she might see them through the lattices, and be convinced that, so far from having given an exaggerated account of them, he had said much less than they deserved.

In the mean time Aladdin's mother reached home, and instantly showed by her manner that she was the bearer of most excellent news. "You have every reason, my dear son," she said, "to be satisfied. You have accomplished your wishes, contrary to my expectations, and what I have hitherto declared. But not to keep you any longer in suspense, I must inform you that the sultan, with the applause of his whole court, has announced that you are worthy to possess the princess Badroul Boudour; and he is now waiting to embrace you, and to conclude the marriage. It is, therefore, time for you to think of making some preparations for this interview, that you may endeavor to equal the high opinion he has formed of your person. After what I have seen of the wonders you have brought about, however, I am sure you will not fail in anything. I ought not, moreover, to forget to tell you that the sultan waits for you with the greatest impatience; and, therefore, that you must lose no time in making your appearance before him."

Aladdin was so delighted with this intelligence, and so taken up with the thoughts of the enchanting object of his love, that he hardly answered his mother, but instantly retired to his chamber. He then took up the lamp that had thus far been so friendly to him, by supplying all his wants and fulfilling all his wishes, and had no sooner rubbed it than the genie again showed his ready obedience to its power, by instantly appearing to execute his commands. "Genie," said Aladdin to him, "I have called you to take me immediately to a bath; and when I shall have finished bathing, I wish you to have in readiness for me a richer, and, if possible, more magnificent dress than was ever worn by any monarch." Aladdin had no sooner concluded his speech than the genie rendered him invisible, like himself, took him in his arms, and transported him to a bath formed of the finest marble, of the most beautiful and diversified colors. Without being able to see any one who waited upon him, Aladdin was undressed in a large and handsome saloon. From thence he was conducted into the bath, moderately heated, and was here washed and rubbed with various sorts of perfumed waters. After having passed through the different chambers by which the various degrees of heat in the bath were regulated, he went out, but quite a different person, as it were, from what he was before. His skin was white and fresh, his countenance blooming, and his whole body felt lighter and more active. He then went back to the saloon, where, instead of the dress he had left, he found the one he had desired the genie to procure. By his assistance he dressed himself, showing the greatest admiration at every part of it as he put it on; and the whole of it was far beyond what he could possibly have conceived. This business was no sooner over, than the genie transported him back into the same chamber of his own house whence he had brought him; he then inquired if he had any other commands. "Yes," replied Aladdin; "I am waiting till you bring me a horse, as quickly as possible, which shall surpass in beauty and excellence the most valuable horse in the sultan's stables; the housings, saddle, bridle, and other furniture of which shall be worth more than a million of money. I also order you to get me, at the same time, twenty slaves, as well and richly clothed as those who carried the present, to attend on each side and behind my person, and twenty more to march in two ranks before me. You must also procure six female slaves to attend upon my mother, all as well and richly clothed as those of the princess Badroul Boudour, each of whom must carry a complete dress, fit in point of splendor and magnificence for any sultana. I want, also, ten thousand pieces of gold, in ten separate purses. These are all my commands at present. Go, and be diligent."

Aladdin had no sooner given his orders to the genie than he disappeared, and a moment after returned with the horse, the forty slaves, ten of whom had each a purse with ten thousand pieces of gold in every one, and the six female slaves, each carrying a different dress for Aladdin's mother, wrapped in silver tissue, and presented the whole to him.

Aladdin took only four of the purses, and presented them to his mother, for any purpose, as he said, for which she might want them. He left the other six in the hands of the slaves who carried them, desiring them to throw them out by handfuls to the populace, as they went along the streets in the way to the palace of the sultan. He ordered them, also, to march before him with the others, three on one side and three on the other. He then presented the six female slaves to his mother, telling her that they would for the future consider her as their mistress, and that the dresses they had in their hands were for her use.

When Aladdin had arranged everything as he wished, he told the genie that he would call him when he had any further occasion for his service. The latter instantly vanished. Aladdin than hastened to fulfil the wish the sultan had expressed, to see him as soon as possible. He sent one of the forty slaves — whom it is useless to call the best made or most handsome, for they were all equally so — to the palace, directing him to address himself to the chief of the ushers, and inquire when his master, Aladdin, might have the honor of throwing himself at the feet of the sultan. The slave was not long in performing his errand, and brought word back that the sultan was waiting for him with the greatest impatience.

Aladdin instantly mounted his horse, and began his march in the order that has been mentioned. Although he had never been on horseback in his life, he nevertheless appeared perfectly at ease, and the best judges of horsemanship would never have taken him for a novice. The streets through which he passed were, in an instant, filled with crowds of people, who made the air resound with their acclamations, their shouts of admiration, and benedictions, particularly when the six slaves, who carried the purses, threw handfuls of gold on all sides. These expressions of joy and applause, however, did not only come from the crowd, who were employed in picking up the money, but also from those of a superior rank in life, who thus publicly bestowed all the praise that such liberality as Aladdin's deserved. Not only they who remembered to have seen him playing about the streets like a vagabond could not now recognize him, but even those who had seen and known him very lately had great difficulty to recollect him, so much were his features and appearance changed. This all arose from the power possessed by the wonderful lamp of acquiring for those who had it in their keeping every perfection adapted to the situation which such persons arrived at, by making a good and proper use of its virtues. More attention was, therefore, paid by every one to the person of Aladdin than to the magnificence with which he was surrounded, and which most of them had before seen, when the slaves who carried, and those who accompanied the present, went to the palace. The horse, however, was extremely admired by those who were judges, and were able to appreciate its beauty and excellence, without being dazzled by the richness and brilliancy of the diamonds and other precious stones with which it was covered. When the report spread about that the sultan had bestowed upon Aladdin the hand of the princess Badroul Boudour, — and this was soon universally known, — no one ever thought about his birth, or even envied him his good fortune, because he appeared so well to deserve it.

He at length arrived at the palace, where everything was ready for his reception. When he came to the second gate, he wished to alight, agreeably to the custom observed by the grand vizier, the generals of the army, and the governors of the superior provinces; but the chief of the ushers, who attended him by the sultan's orders, prevented him, and accompanied him to the hall of audience, where he assisted him in dismounting from his horse, though Aladdin opposed it as much as possible, not wishing to receive such a distinction: all his efforts were, however, vain. In the mean time all the ushers formed a double row at the entrance into the hall; and their chief, placing Aladdin on his right, went up through the midst of them, and conducted him quite to the foot of the throne.

As soon as the sultan perceived Aladdin, he was not more surprised at seeing him more richly and magnificently clothed than himself, than he was astonished at the propriety of his manner, his noble figure, and a certain air of grandeur very far removed from the degraded state in which his mother had appeared in his presence. His astonishment, however, did not prevent him from rising, and quickly descending two or three steps of his throne, in order to prevent Aladdin from throwing himself at his feet, and embracing him with the most evident marks of friendship and affection. After this civility, Aladdin again endeavored to cast himself at the sultan's feet; but he held his hand, and compelled him to ascend and sit between him and his grand vizier.

Aladdin then addressed the sultan in these words: "I receive the honors which your majesty has the goodness to bestow upon me, because it is your pleasure; but you must permit me to say that I have not forgotten that I was born your slave, that I am well aware of the greatness of your power, and that I am not ignorant how much my birth places me beneath the splendor and brilliancy of that superior rank to which you are elevated. If there can be the shadow of a reason," he continued, "from which I can in the least merit so favorable a reception, I candidly avow that I am indebted for it to a boldness which chance alone brought about; and in consequence of which I have raised my eyes, my thoughts, and my desires, to the divine princess, who is the sole object of my wishes. I request your majesty's pardon for my rashness, but I cannot dissemble that grief would occasion my death should I lose the hope of seeing my desires accomplished."

"My son," replied the sultan, again embracing him, "you would do me injustice to doubt, even for an instant, the sincerity of my word; your life is too dear to me not to endeavor to preserve it by presenting you with the princess, my daughter. I prefer the pleasure I derive from seeing and hearing you to all our united treasures."

As he concluded this speech, the sultan made a sign, and the air was immediately filled with the sound of trumpets, hautboys, and tymbals; and the sultan then conducted Aladdin into a magnificent saloon, where a great feast was served up. The sultan and Aladdin ate by themselves; the grand vizier and the nobles of the court, each according to their dignity and rank, waited upon them during their repast. The sultan fixed his eyes constantly upon Aladdin, so great was the pleasure he derived from seeing him. They entered into conversation on a variety of topics; and, whatever the subject of their discourse happened to be, Aladdin spoke with so much information and knowledge, that he completely confirmed the sultan in the good opinion which he had at first formed of him.

When the repast was over, the sultan ordered the grand judge of his capital to attend, and commanded him instantly to prepare a contract of marriage between the princess Badroul Boudour and Aladdin. While this was doing, the sultan conversed with Aladdin upon indifferent subjects, in the presence of the grand vizier and the nobles of the court, who all equally admired the solidity of his understanding, the great facility and fluency of his language, and the purity and delicacy of his metaphors.

When the judge had drawn up the contract with all the requisite forms, the sultan asked Aladdin whether he wished to remain in the palace and conclude all the ceremonies that day? "Sire," he replied, "however impatient I may be to have entire possession of all your majesty's bounties, I request you to permit me to defer my happiness until I have built a palace for the reception of the princess that shall be worthy of her merit and dignity. And for this purpose I request that you will have the goodness to point out a suitable situation near your own palace, that I may always be able to pay my court to your majesty. I will then neglect nothing to get it finished with all possible diligence." "My son," answered the sultan, "take whatever spot you think proper. There is a large open space before my palace, and I have thought for some time about filling it up; but remember, that to have my happiness complete, I cannot too soon see you united to my daughter." Having said this, he again embraced Aladdin, who took leave of the sultan in as polished a manner as if he had been brought up and spent all his life at court.

Aladdin then mounted his horse, and returned home with his suite in the same order in which they came, going back through the same crowd, and receiving similar acclamations from the people, who wished him all happiness and prosperity. As soon as he had entered the court, and alighted from his horse, he retired to his own chamber. He instantly rubbed the lamp and called the genie as usual. He had not to wait; the genie appeared directly, and offered his services. "Genie," said Aladdin to him, "I have hitherto had every reason to praise the precision and promptitude with which you have executed whatever I have required of you, by means of the power of your mistress, this lamp. You must now, through your regard for her, appear, if possible, more zealous, and make greater despatch than you have yet done. I command you, therefore, to build me a palace, in as short a time as you possibly can, opposite to that belonging to the sultan, and at a proper distance; and let this palace be every way worthy to receive the princess Badroul Boudour, my bride. I leave the choice of the materials to yourself, that is to say, whether it shall be of porphyry, of jaspar, of agate, of lapis lazuli, or of the finest marble; and also the form of the palace: I only expect that at the top there shall be erected a large saloon, with a dome in the centre, and four equal sides, the walls of which shall be formed of massive gold and silver, in alternate layers, with twenty-four windows, six on each side; that the lattices of each window, except one, which is to be purposely left unfinished, shall be enriched with diamonds, rubies, and emeralds, set with the greatest taste and symmetry, and in such a style that nothing in the whole world can equal it. I also wish this palace to have a large court in the front, another behind, and a garden. But, above everything else, be sure that there is a place, which you will point out to me, well supplied with money, both in gold and silver. There must also be kitchens, offices, magazines, receptacles for rich and valuable furniture, suited to the different seasons, and all appropriate to the magnificence of such a palace. And also stables filled with the most beautiful horses, with the grooms and attendants for the kitchen and offices, and female slaves for the service of the princess. In short, you understand what I mean. Go, and return as soon as it is completed."

The sun had retired into the west by the time Aladdin had finished giving his orders to the genie respecting the construction of the palace. The very next morning, when the day first broke, Aladdin, whose love for the princess prevented him from sleeping in tranquillity, had scarcely risen before the genie presented himself. "Sir," said he, "your palace is finished; come and see if it be according to your wish." Aladdin signified his assent, and the genie transported him to it in an instant. He found it to exceed his utmost expectation, and he could not sufficiently admire it. The genie conducted him through every part of it, and he everywhere found the greatest riches, applied with the utmost propriety. There were, also, the proper officers and slaves, all dressed according to their rank, and suited to their different employments. Amongst other things, he did not omit to show him the treasury, the door of which was opened by a treasurer, of whose fidelity the genie assured him. He here observed large vases, filled to the very top with purses of different sizes, according to the sums they contained, and so nicely arranged that it was quite a pleasure to behold them. The genie then carried Aladdin to the stables, in which were the most beautiful horses in the world, with all the officers and grooms busily employed about them. He then led him into the different magazines, filled with everything necessary for them, both useful and ornamental, as well as for their support.

When Aladdin had examined the whole palace, without omitting a single part, from the top to the bottom, and more particularly the saloon with the four-and-twenty windows, and had seen all the riches and magnificence it contained, as well as every other thing even in greater abundance and with greater propriety than he had ordered, "Genie," said he, "no one can possibly be better satisfied than I am. There is one thing only which I did not mention to you, because it escaped my recollection; it is to have a carpet of the finest velvet laid from the gate of the sultan's palace to the door of the apartment in this palace which is to be appropriated to the princess, that she may walk upon it when she leaves the sultan's palace." "I will return in an instant," replied the genie; and he had not been gone a moment before Aladdin saw his wish accomplished. The genie again made his appearance, and carried Aladdin back to his own house just as the gates of the sultan's palace were about to be opened.

The porters who came to open the gates, and who were accustomed to see an open space where Aladdin's palace now stood, were much astonished at observing it filled up, and at seeing a velvet carpet, which came from that part directly opposite to the gate of the palace. They could not at first make out what it was; but their astonishment increased when they beheld the superb palace of Aladdin. The news of this wonderful event soon spread throughout the palace, and the grand vizier, who had arrived just as the gates were open, was not less astonished than the rest. He instantly went to the sultan, and wished to make the whole business pass for enchantment. "Why do you endeavor, vizier," said the sultan, "to make this appear the effect of enchantment? You know as well as I do that this is the palace of Aladdin, which I, in your presence yesterday, gave him permission to build for the reception of the princess, my daughter. After the immense display of riches which we have seen, can you think it so very extraordinary that he should be able to build a palace in so short a time? He wished, no doubt, to surprise us, and we every day see what miracles riches can perform. Confess that it is through motives of jealousy you wish to make this appear an enchantment." The hour for entering the council-hall prevented a continuation of this conversation.

When Aladdin had returned and dismissed the genie, he found that his mother was up, and had put on one of the dresses which he had ordered for her the day before. About the time that the sultan left the council, Aladdin requested his mother to go to the palace, attended by the female slaves that the genie had procured for her use. He desired her also, if she saw the sultan, to inform him that she came for the purpose of having the honor of accompanying the princess in the evening, when it was proper for her to go to her own palace. She then set out; but although she and her slaves were dressed as richly as any sultanas, there was much less crowd to see them, as they were veiled, and the richness and magnificence of their habits were hidden by a sort of cloak that quite covered them. Aladdin himself mounted his horse, and left his paternal house nevermore to return; but he did not forget his wonderful lamp, whose assistance had been so highly advantageous to him, and had, in fact, been the cause of all his happiness. He went to his own palace in the same public manner, and surrounded with all the pomp with which he had presented himself to the sultan on the preceding day.

As soon as the porters of the sultan's palace perceived the mother of Aladdin, they gave notice of it through the proper officer to the sultan himself. He immediately sent orders to the bands, who played upon trumpets, tymbals, tabors, fifes, and hautboys, and who were already placed in different parts of the terrace, and in a moment the air echoed with their joyful sounds, and spread pleasure throughout the city. The merchants began to dress out their shops with rich carpets and seats, adorned with foliage, and to prepare illuminations for the night. The artificers quitted their work, and all the people thronged to the great square that still was left between the palaces of the sultan and Aladdin. That of the latter first attracted their admiration, not merely because they had been accustomed to see only the sultan's, which could not be put in comparison with Aladdin's, but their great surprise arose from not being able to comprehend by what unheard-of means they beheld so magnificent a palace in a spot where the day before there were neither materials brought nor foundations laid.

Aladdin's mother met with the most honorable reception, and was introduced by the chief of the eunuchs into the apartment of the princess Badroul Boudour. As soon as the latter perceived her she ran and embraced her, and made her take a place upon her own sofa. And while her women were dressing her, and adorning her person with the most valuable of the jewels with which Aladdin had presented her, she entertained her with a magnificent collation. The sultan, who wished to be as much as possible with the princess, his daughter, before she left him to go to the palace of Aladdin, paid great honor and respect to his mother. She had very often seen the sultan in public, but he had never yet seen her without her veil, as she then was. And although she was of rather an advanced age, there were still to be observed some traces from which it might be concluded she had in her youth been handsome. The sultan, too, had always seen her very plainly, and indeed indifferently, dressed; and he was, therefore, the more struck at finding her now as magnificent as the princess, his daughter.

When the evening approached, the princess took leave of the sultan her father. Their parting was tender, and accompanied by tears, and they embraced each other several times without uttering a word. The princess at last left her apartment and proceeded towards her new residence, with Aladdin's mother on her left hand, followed by a hundred female slaves magnificently dressed. All the bands of instruments, which had been incessantly heard since the arrival of Aladdin's mother, united at once, and marched with them. These were followed by a hundred chiaous,* an equal number of black eunuchs in two rows, with their proper officers at their head; and four hundred young pages belonging to the sultan marched in two troops on each side, with flambeaux in their hands. The brilliancy of these, joined to the illuminations in both palaces, made the loss of day unnoticed.

In this order did the princess proceed, walking upon the carpet which was spread from Aladdin's palace to that of the sultan. And as she continued to advance, the musicians, who were at the head of the procession, went on and mixed with those who were placed on the terrace of Aladdin's palace; thus forming a concert which, confused and extraordinary as it was, augmented the general joy, not only amongst those in the open square, but in the two palaces, in all the city, and even to a considerable distance around.

The princess at length arrived at the new palace, and Aladdin ran with every expression of joy to the entrance of the apartments appropriated to her, in order to welcome her. His mother had taken care to point out to the princess her son in the midst of the officers and attendants who surrounded him; and when she perceived him, her joy at finding him so handsome was excessive. "Adorable princess," cried Aladdin, accosting her in the most respectful manner, "if I should have the misfortune to have displeased you by the temerity with which I have aspired to possess so amiable a person, and the daughter of my sultan, I must confess that it was to your beautiful eyes and to your charms alone that you must attribute it, and not to myself." "Prince, for it is thus that I must now call you," replied the princess, "I obey the will of the sultan, my father; and it is enough to have seen you, to own that I obey him without reluctance."

* Chiaous, so called by M. Galland, are officers attached to the magnificence of Eastern courts. Their particular employments were unknown to the translators from both the Arabic and the French.

Aladdin was delighted at so satisfactory and charming an answer, and did not suffer the princess to remain long standing, after having walked so far, which she was not in the habit of doing. He took her by the hand, which he kissed with the greatest demonstrations of joy, and conducted her into a large saloon, illuminated by an immense number of tapers, where, through the attention of the genie, there was a table spread with everything that was rare and excellent. The dishes were of massive gold, and filled with the most delicious viands. The vases, the basins, and the goblets, with which the sideboard was amply furnished, were also of gold, and of the most exquisite workmanship. The other ornaments which embellished the saloon exactly corresponded with the richness of the other parts. The princess, enchanted at the sight of such an assemblage of riches in one place, said to Aladdin, "Nothing, I thought, prince, in the whole world, was more beautiful than the palace of the sultan, my father; but the sight of this saloon alone tells me I was deceived." "My princess," replied Aladdin, placing her at the table in the seat he had destined for her, "I am very sensible of your politeness, but at the same time know how to appropriate the compliment."

The princess Badroul Boudour, Aladdin, and his mother sat down, and instantly a band of the most harmonious instruments, played upon by females of great beauty, to whose voices they formed an accompaniment, began a concert which lasted till the repast was finished. The princess was delighted with it, and said she had never heard anything to equal it in the palace of her father. But she knew not that these musicians were fairies, chosen by the genie, the slave of the lamp.

When the supper was concluded, and everything had been removed, a troop of dancers of both sexes took the place of the musicians. They performed dances of various figures, as was the custom of the country, and concluded by one executed by a male and female, who danced with the most surprising activity and agility, each of whom gave the other in turn an opportunity of showing all the grace and address they were master of. It was near midnight, when, according to the custom observed at that time in Cathay, Aladdin rose, and presented his hand to the princess Badroul Boudour, in order to dance together, and thus finish the ceremony of their nuptials. They both danced with so good a grace that they were the admiration of all present. When it was over, Aladdin, who still held the princess by the hand, led her into the chamber in which the nuptial bed had been prepared. The women of the princess attended to undress her, while the attendants of Aladdin did the same, and then every one retired. In this manner did the ceremonies and rejoicings on account of the marriage of Aladdin and the princess Badroul Boudour conclude.

The next morning, when Aladdin awoke, his chamberlains presented themselves to dress him. They clothed him in a different habit from that which he wore on the day of his marriage, but one equally rich and magnificent. They then brought him one of the horses that were appropriated to his use. He mounted it, and, surrounded by a large troop of slaves, rode to the palace of the sultan. The sultan received him with the same honors he had done before. He embraced him, and, after having placed him on the throne by his side, ordered breakfast to be served up. "Sire," said Aladdin to the sultan, "I beseech your majesty to dispense with conferring this honor upon me to-day; I come for the express purpose of entreating you to partake of a repast in the palace of the princess, together with your grand vizier and the nobles of your court." The sultan readily granted his request. He rose immediately, and as the distance was not great, he proceeded on foot with Aladdin on his right hand and the grand vizier on his left, followed by the nobles, the chiaous and principal officers of his palace going before them.

The nearer the sultan came to the palace of Aladdin, the more was he struck with its beauty; yet this was but little to what he felt on entering. His expressions of surprise and pleasure continued in all the apartments through which he passed; but when they came to the saloon with twenty-four windows, to which Aladdin had requested them to ascend, — when the sultan had seen its ornaments, and had above all things cast his eyes on the lattices, enriched with diamonds, rubies, and emeralds, all of the finest sort and most appropriate size, and when Aladdin had made him observe that the outside was equally rich and superb as the other, — he was so much astonished that he stood absolutely motionless. After remaining some time in an ecstasy of wonder, "Vizier," he at length said to that minister, who was near him, "is it possible that there should be in my kingdom, and so near my own, so superb a palace, and yet that I should, till this moment, be ignorant of it?" "Your majesty," replied the grand vizier, "may remember, that the day before yesterday you gave Aladdin, whom you then acknowledged for your son-in-law, permission to build a palace opposite to your own; on the same day, when the sun went down, not the smallest part of this palace was on this spot, and yesterday I had the honor to announce to your majesty that the palace was built and finished." "I remember it," replied the sultan, "but I never imagined that this palace would be one of the wonders of the world. Where, throughout the universe, will you find the walls built with alternate layers of massive gold and silver, instead of stone or marble, and the windows having the lattices studded with diamonds, rubies, and emeralds? Never in the whole world has there been anything similar heard of."

The sultan wished to see more closely, and observe the beauty of the twenty-four lattices; when, in reckoning them, he only found twenty-three that were equally rich, and he was, therefore, in the greatest astonishment that the twenty-fourth should remain imperfect. "Vizier," said he, for that minister made it a point not to leave him, "I am very much surprised that such a magnificent saloon should remain unfinished in this particular." "Sire," replied the grand vizier, "Aladdin apparently was pressed for time, and therefore was unable to finish this window like the rest. But it must readily be granted, that he has jewels fit for the purpose, and that it will be finished the first opportunity."

Aladdin, who had left the sultan, to give some orders, joined them during this conversation. "My son," said the sultan, "this truly is a saloon worthy the admiration of all the world. There is, however, one thing I am astonished at; and that is to observe this lattice unfinished. Is it through forgetfulness or neglect," added he, "or because the workmen had not time to put the finishing stroke to such a beautiful specimen of architecture?" "Sire," answered Aladdin, "it is not for any of these reasons that this lattice remains in the state your majesty now sees it. It has been done on purpose; and it was by my orders that the workmen have not touched it. I wish that your majesty should have the glory of finishing this saloon and palace at the same time. And I entreat you to think well of my intention, that I may ever remember the favor I have thus received from you." "If you have done it with that view," replied the sultan, "I take it in good part; I will this instant give the necessary orders about it." So saying, he ordered the jewellers who were best furnished with precious stones, and the most skilful goldsmiths in his capital, to be sent for.

When the sultan came down from the saloon, Aladdin conducted him into that where he had entertained the princess Badroul Boudour on the evening of their nuptials. The princess herself entered the moment after, and received the sultan her father in such a manner as made it very evident that she was quite satisfied with her marriage. In this saloon there were two tables set out with the most delicious viands, all served up in services of gold. The sultan sat down at the first, and ate with his daughter, Aladdin, and the grand vizier. All the nobles of the court were regaled at the second, which was of great length. The repast highly pleased the sultan's taste; and he confessed that he had never partaken of anything more excellent. He said the same of the wine, which was, in fact, very delicious. But what excited his admiration most of all, were four large sideboards, furnished and set out with a profusion of flagons, vases, and cups of solid gold, enriched throughout with precious stones. He was also delighted with the different bands of music, placed in different parts of the saloon, while the trumpets, accompanied by tymbals and drums, were heard at a distance, at proper intervals joining with the music within.

When the sultan rose from table, he was informed that the jewellers and goldsmiths whom he had ordered to be sent for were come. He then went up to the saloon with twenty-four windows, and pointed out to the jewellers and goldsmiths the window which was imperfect. "I have ordered you to come here," said the sultan, "to finish this window, and make it perfect like the rest. Examine them, and lose no time in completing it."

The jewellers and goldsmiths examined all the twenty-three lattices with great attention; and after having consulted together about what they could each contribute towards its completion, they presented themselves to the sultan, and the jeweller in ordinary to the palace thus addressed him: "We are ready, sire, to employ all our care and diligence to obey your majesty, but amongst all our profession we have no jewels either sufficiently valuable or numerous to complete so great a work." "I have, then," cried the sultan, "and more than you want. Come to my palace, I will show you them, and you shall choose which you like best."

When the sultan had returned to his palace, he directed all his jewels to be brought to the jewellers; and they took a great quantity of them, particularly of those which had been presented by Aladdin. They used all these, without appearing to have made much progress. They went back for more several times, and in the course of more than a month they had not finished more than half their work. They exhausted all the sultan's jewels, with as many of the grand vizier's as he could spare, and with all these they could not do more than finish half the window.

Aladdin was well aware that the sultan's endeavors to make the lattice of this window like the others were vain, and that he would never arrive at that honor; he went up, therefore, to the workmen, and not only made them stop working, but even undo all they had finished, and carry back the jewels to the sultan and the grand vizier.

All the work which the jewellers had been six weeks in performing was destroyed in a few hours. They then went away, and left Aladdin alone in the saloon. He took out the lamp, which he had with him, and rubbed it. The genie instantly appeared. "Genie," said Aladdin to him, "I ordered you to leave one of the twenty-four lattices of this saloon imperfect, and you obeyed me. I now wish it to be made like the rest." The genie disappeared, and Aladdin went out of the saloon. He entered it again in a few moments, and found the lattice as he wished, and similar to the others.

In the mean time the jewellers and goldsmiths arrived at the palace, and were introduced to the sultan in his own apartment. The first jeweller then produced the precious stones he had brought with him, and said in the name of the rest: "Your majesty, sire, knows for what length of time and how diligently we have worked in order to finish the business your majesty employed us upon. It was already very far advanced, when Aladdin obliged us not only to leave off, but even to destroy what we had already done, and to bring back these jewels as well as those that belonged to the grand vizier." The sultan then asked them whether Aladdin had given them any reason; and when they told the sultan that he had said nothing on the subject, the former ordered his horse to be brought, and, without any other attendants than those who happened to be about his person, and who accompanied him on foot, proceeded to Aladdin's palace. He dismounted at the foot of the flight of stairs that led to the saloon with twenty-four windows, and went up without letting Aladdin know of his arrival; but the latter happened luckily to be in the saloon, and had barely time to receive the sultan at the door.

The sultan, without giving Aladdin time to chide him for not sending word of his intention to pay him a visit, and thus making him seem deficient in the respect he owed him, said: "I am come, my son, to ask the reason why you wished to leave this very magnificent and singular saloon in an unfinished state?"

Aladdin dissembled the true reason, which was, that the sultan was not sufficiently rich in jewels to go to so great an expense. But to let him see how the palace itself surpassed not only his, but also every other palace in the whole world, since he was unable to finish even a very small part of it, he replied: "It is true, sire, that your majesty did behold this saloon unfinished, but I entreat you to examine if at this moment there be anything wanting?"

The sultan immediately went to the window where he had observed the lattice imperfect; but when he saw that it was like the rest, he thought he was mistaken. He not only examined the window on each side of it, but looked at them all one after the other; and when he was convinced that the lattice upon which his people had so long employed themselves, and had cost the jewellers and goldsmiths so many days, was finished in such an incredibly short period, he embraced Aladdin, and kissed him between his eyes. "My dear son," said he, filled with astonishment, "what a man are you, who can do such wonderful things, and almost, as it were, instantaneously? There is not your equal in the world; and the more I know you, the more I find to admire in you."

Aladdin received the sultan's praises with great modesty, and replied to them in these terms: "It is, sire, my greatest glory to deserve the kindness and approbation of your majesty, and I can assure you that I will never neglect anything that will tend to make me still more worthy of your good opinion."

The sultan returned to his palace in the same way he came, and would not permit Aladdin to accompany him. When he got back, he found the grand vizier waiting his arrival. Still full of admiration at the wonder to which he had been witness, the sultan related everything to him in such terms that the vizier did not doubt for a moment that the matter was exactly as the sultan told it. But this still more confirmed that minister in the belief which he already entertained, that the palace of Aladdin was built by enchantment; which opinion he had expressed to the sultan on the very morning that the palace was first seen. He again repeated his belief. "Vizier," said the sultan, suddenly interrupting him, "you have before said the same thing: but I very plainly perceive you have not forgotten my daughter's marriage with your son."

The grand vizier clearly saw that the sultan was prejudiced; he did not, therefore, wish to enter into any dispute with him, but suffered him to remain in his own opinion. Every morning, as soon as he rose, the sultan went regularly to the apartment whence he could see the palace of Aladdin: and indeed he often went during the day to contemplate and admire it.

Aladdin himself in the mean time did not remain shut up in his palace, but took care to go through different parts of the city at least once every week; sometimes to attend prayers at various mosques; at others to visit the grand vizier, who regularly came on stated days to pay his unwilling court; and sometimes he honored with his presence the houses of the principal nobles, whom he frequently entertained at his own palace. Every time he went out he ordered two of the slaves who attended him as he rode to throw handfuls of gold in the streets and public places through which he passed, and where the people always collected in crowds to see him. Besides this, a poor person never presented himself before the gate of his palace but went away well satisfied with Aladdin's liberality.

Aladdin also so arranged his different occupations that there was not a week in which he did not once, at least, enjoy the diversion of the chase; sometimes hunting in the neighborhood of the city, and at others going to a greater distance; and he gave proofs of the same liberality in the roads and villages through which he passed. This generous disposition made the people load him with blessings; and it became the common custom to swear by his head. In short, without giving the least cause of displeasure to the sultan, to whom he very regularly paid his court, it may be asserted that Aladdin had attracted, by the affability of his manners and the liberality of his conduct, the regard and affection of every one; and that, generally speaking, he was even more beloved than the sultan himself. To all these good qualities he joined a great degree of valor, and an ardent zeal for the good of the state. He had an opportunity of giving the strongest proofs of it in a revolt that took place on the confines of the kingdom. He no sooner became apprised that the sultan meant to levy an army to quell it, than he requested to have the command of it. This he had no difficulty in obtaining. He instantly put himself at its head, marched against the rebels, and conducted the whole expedition with so much judgment and activity, that the sultan heard of their defeat, punishment, and dispersion quite as soon as of the arrival of the army at its point of destination. This action, which made his name celebrated throughout the whole extent of the empire, did not in the least alter his disposition. He returned victorious, but he returned as affable and modest as ever.

Many years passed, and Aladdin continued to conduct himself in the way we have described, when the African magician who had procured for him, but without intending it, the means by which he was raised to so exalted a situation, frequently thought of him while he was in Africa, whither he had returned. Although he was well persuaded that Aladdin had pined out a miserable existence in the subterraneous cavern where he had left him, he nevertheless thought he might as well learn precisely his end. As he had a complete knowledge of the science of geomancy, he took out of a drawer a sort of square, covered box, such as he used when he made any observations in this science. He then sat down on the sofa, and placed the square instrument before him. He uncovered it, and after making the sand with which it was filled quite smooth and even, with the view of discovering whether Aladdin died in the subterraneous cave, he arranged the points, drew the figures, and formed his horoscope. When he examined it, in order to form his judgment, instead of finding Aladdin dead in the cave, he discovered that he had got out of it, that he lived in the greatest splendor, was immensely rich, highly respected and honored, and was the husband of a princess.

No sooner had the African magician learnt by his diabolical art that Aladdin was in the enjoyment of these honors, than the blood rushed into his face.

"This miserable son of a tailor," he exclaimed in a rage, "has discovered the secret and virtues of the lamp! I thought his death certain; and now he enjoys the fruits of my long and laborious exertions. I will either prevent his enjoying them, or perish in the attempt." He did not deliberate long as to the method he should pursue. Early the next morning he mounted a horse from Barbary, which he had in his stable, and began his journey. Travelling from city to city, and from province to province, without stopping anywhere longer than was necessary to rest his horse, he at last arrived in Cathay, and very soon reached the capital where the sultan lived, whose daughter Aladdin had married. He alighted at a public khan, where he ordered an apartment for himself. He remained there the rest of the day and following night, in order to recover from the fatigue of his journey.

The first thing the African magician did the next morning was to inquire what was the general opinion that was formed of Aladdin, and how the people spoke of him. In walking about the city, he went into the most frequented place, where people of the greatest consequence and distinction assembled to drink a warm liquor, of a particular kind, which he recollected to have done when he was there before. He took his seat, and they poured some out into a cup, and presented it to him. As he took it he heard, as he was listening to what was said on every side, some person speaking of Aladdin's palace. When he had finished his cup, he approached those who were conversing on this subject, and taking his opportunity, he inquired what there was in particular about this palace of which they spoke so highly. "Where do you come from?" said one of those to whom he addressed himself. "You must surely be but lately arrived in this city if you have not seen or heard of the palace of Prince Aladdin." It was thus that Aladdin, since his union with the princess Badroul Boudour, was always called. "I do not say," continued the same person, "that it is one of the wonders of the world, but that it is the only wonder in the world. Nothing has ever been seen so rich, so grand, or so magnificent. You must have come from a great distance, since you seem never even to have heard of it. In fact, it ought to be spoken of everywhere since it has been erected. But see it, and you will then know if I have said anything but the truth." "Pardon my ignorance, I beg of you," replied the African magician; "I arrived here only yesterday, and I have come from a great distance, even from the farthest part of Africa, and the fame of it had not reached that country when I left it. And, as it was a business of great importance that brought me, and required the utmost haste,

I had no other view during my journey than to get to the end of it as soon as possible, without stopping anywhere or acquiring any information, as I came along. I was, therefore, quite ignorant of what you have been telling me. I shall, however, go and see it. My impatience, indeed, is so great that I would this moment go and satisfy my curiosity, if you would do me the favor to show me the way."

The person to whom the African magician addressed himself took a pleasure in directing him the way to Aladdin's palace, and he immediately set out. When he arrived, and had accurately examined the palace on all sides, he had not the least doubt but that Aladdin had availed himself of the power of the lamp in building it; he well knew it was in the power of the genii who were the slaves of the lamp to produce such wonders. Stung to the very soul by the happiness and greatness of Aladdin, between whom and the sultan there seemed not the shadow of a difference, he returned to his khan.

The great thing to discover was whether Aladdin carried the lamp about with him, or where he kept it; and this discovery he was able to make by a certain operation in geomancy. As soon, therefore, as he got back to his lodgings, he took his square box and his sand, which he always carried with him wherever he went. Having completed the operation, he found that the lamp was in Aladdin's palace, and his joy was so great on learning this, that he could hardly contain himself. "I shall get this lamp," he cried, "and I defy Aladdin to prevent my obtaining it; and I will compel him to sink into the obscurity and poverty from which he has taken so high a leap."

It happened most unfortunately for Aladdin that he was absent upon a hunting expedition that was to last eight days, and only three of them were yet elapsed. Of this the African magician got information in the following way. When he had finished the operation which had afforded him so much joy, he went to see the master of the khan, under the pretence of conversing with him, and he had no difficulty in finding a proper subject. He told him that he was just returned from the palace of Aladdin; and after giving him an exaggerated account of all the most remarkable and surprising things he saw, and such as generally attracted the attention of every one, "My curiosity," he added, "goes still further; and I shall not be satisfied till I have seen the master to whom so wonderful a building belongs." "That will not be at all a difficult matter," replied the keeper of the khan, "for hardly a day passes that will not afford you an opportunity, when he is at home; but he has been gone these three days on a grand hunting-party, which is to last at least eight."

The African magician did not want to know more; he took leave of the master of the khan, and returned to his own apartment. "This is the time for action," said he to himself, "nor must I let it escape." He then went to the shop of a person who made and sold lamps. "I want," said he to the master, "a dozen copper lamps; can you supply me with them?" The man replied that he had not quite so many finished, but that if he would wait till the next day he would have them ready for him. The magician agreed to wait, and desired him to take care and have them well polished; and, having first promised to give a good price for them, he returned to the khan.

The next morning the African magician received the twelve lamps, and paid the money asked for them. He put them into a basket which he had provided for the purpose, and went with this on his arm towards Aladdin's palace; and when he was near it he began to cry with a loud voice, "Who will change old lamps for new?" As he went on, the children who were at play in the open square ran and collected round him, hooting and shouting at him, as they took him for a fool or a madman. Every one who passed laughed at his folly, as they thought it. "That man," said they, "must surely have lost his senses, to offer to change new lamps for old ones."

The African magician was not at all surprised at the shouts of the children, nor at anything that was said of him; and continued to cry, "Who will change old lamps for new?" He repeated this so often, while he walked backwards and forwards in front of the palace, that at last the princess Badroul Boudour, who was in the saloon with twenty-four windows, heard him; but as she could not distinguish what he said, on account of the shouting of the children who followed him, and whose number increased every instant, she sent one of her female slaves to learn what was the reason of all the noise and bustle

It was not long before the slave returned, and entered the saloon laughing very heartily, indeed, so much so, that the princess herself, in looking at her, could not help laughing also "Well, silly one," said the princess, "why do you not tell me what it is you are laughing at?" "Princess," replied the slave, still laughing, "who can possibly help laughing at seeing that fool with a basket on his arm, full of beautiful new lamps, which he does not wish to sell, but exchange for old ones? It is the crowd of children who surround him that make all the noise we hear, in mocking him"

Hearing this account, another of the female slaves said, "Now you speak of old lamps, I know not whether the princess has taken notice of one that lies upon the cornice, whoever it belongs to, he will not be very much displeased in finding a new one instead of that old one If the princess will give me leave, she may have the pleasure of trying whether this fellow is fool enough to give a new lamp for an old one, without asking anything for the exchange"

The lamp of which the slave spoke was the identical wonderful lamp which had been the cause of Aladdin's great success and happiness, and he had himself placed it upon the cornice before he went to the chase, from the fear of losing it. It was the usual precaution which he took every time he hunted But neither the female slaves, the eunuchs, nor the princess herself, had paid the least attention to it during his absence, till this moment. Except when he hunted, Aladdin always carried it about him His precaution, it may be said, was certainly very proper, but he should at least have locked the lamp up, but every one is liable to similar neglects and always will be liable to them.

The princess, who was ignorant of the value of this lamp, and that Aladdin, not to say herself, was so much interested in its preservation, consented to the joke, and ordered a eunuch to go and get it exchanged. The eunuch obeyed; he went down from the saloon, and close to the palace gate he perceived the African magician. He immediately called to him, and when he came, he showed him the old lamp, and said, "Give me a new lamp for this"

The magician did not doubt but that this was the lamp he was seeking, because he thought there would not, of course, be any other lamp in Aladdin's palace, where everything that could be was of gold or silver He eagerly took the lamp from the eunuch, and after having thrust it into his bosom, he presented his basket, and bid him take which he liked best The eunuch chose one, and, leaving the magician, he carried the new lamp to the princess The exchange had no sooner been effected than the children made the whole square resound with their noise, in ridiculing and mocking the folly, as they thought, of the magician

The African magician let them shout as much as they pleased, and without staying any longer near Aladdin's palace, he quickly went to a distance, and no longer invited people to change old lamps for new He wished for no other than the one which he had got His silence, therefore, soon induced the children to go no farther with him

Leaving the square between the two palaces, he went along the most unfrequented streets, and as he had no further occasion either for the remainder of his lamps or his basket, he set them both down in the middle of a street where he thought no one would see him He then turned down another street, and made all the haste he could to get to one of the gates of the city As he continued his walk through the suburb, which was very extensive he bought some provisions, and when he was in the open country, he turned down a by-road, where there was no probability of seeing any person, and here he remained till he thought a good opportunity occurred to execute the design he had in coming there He did not regret the horse he left at the khan where he had lodged, but thought himself well recompensed by the treasure he had acquired

The African magician continued in this retired place until the night was far advanced He then drew the lamp from his bosom, and rubbed it. The genie instantly obeyed the summons "What do you wish?" cried the genie. "I am ready to obey you, as your slave, and the slave of those who have the lamp in their hands, I and the other slaves of the lamp." "I command you," replied the African magician, "instantly to take the palace which you and the other slaves of the lamp have erected in this city, exactly as it is, with everything in it, both dead and alive, and transport it, with me at the same time, into the farthest part of Africa." Without making any answer, the genie, assisted by the other slaves of the lamp, took him and the whole palace, and transported it in a very short time to the spot he had pointed out.

It is now necessary to leave the African magician, the princess Badroul Boudour, and the palace in Africa, and notice the effect of this change upon the sultan.

The sultan no sooner rose the next morning than he went, as usual, to the cabinet, that thence he might have the pleasure of contemplating and admiring Aladdin's palace. He cast his eyes towards the side where he was accustomed to see this palace, but discovered only an open space, such as it was before the palace had been built. He thought he must be deceived; he rubbed his eyes, but still he could see nothing more than at first, though the air was so serene, the sky so clear, and the sun so near rising that every object was distinct and plain. He looked on both sides, and out of both windows, but could not perceive what he had been accustomed to. His astonishment was so great that he remained for some time with his eyes turned to the spot where the palace had stood, but where he could no longer see it, endeavoring to comprehend how so large a palace as that of Aladdin, which he had seen every day since he had given permission to have it erected, and even so lately as the day before, should so suddenly and completely vanish, that not the smallest vestige remained. "I cannot be deceived," he said to himself; "it was in this very place that I beheld it. If it had fallen down, the materials at least would appear; and if the earth had swallowed it, we would perceive some marks of it." In whatever way this had come to pass, and however satisfied he was that the palace was no longer there, he nevertheless waited some time longer, to see if in reality he was not deceived. He at length retired, after looking once more behind him as he left the place. He returned to his apartment, and ordered his grand vizier to be instantly sent for. In the mean time he sat down, his mind agitated with so many different thoughts that he knew not how to act.

The grand vizier came in so much haste, that neither he nor his attendants observed, as they passed, that the palace of Aladdin was no longer in the same place. Even the porters, when they opened the gates, did not perceive the difference.

"Sire," said the grand vizier the moment he entered, "the eagerness and haste with which your majesty has sent for me leads me to suppose that something very extraordinary has happened, since your majesty is not ignorant that this is the day when the council meets, and that I should therefore, of course, have been here on my duty in a very short time." "What has happened is indeed very extraordinary, as you have said; and you will soon agree it is so. Tell me, where is Aladdin's palace?" "I have just now passed it, sire," replied the vizier with the utmost surprise; "and it seemed to me to be in the same spot. A building so solid as that is cannot easily change its situation." "Go into my cabinet," answered the sultan, "and come and tell me if you can see it."

The grand vizier went as he was ordered, and the very same thing happened to him as to the sultan. When he was quite sure that the palace of Aladdin did not stand in the place where it was, and that not the smallest part of it seemed to remain, he went back to the sultan. "Well," demanded the latter, "have you seen Aladdin's palace?" "Your majesty, sire, may remember," replied the grand vizier, "that I had the honor to tell you that this palace, which was so much and so deservedly admired for its beauty and immense riches, was the work of magic; but your majesty did not then pay any attention to what was said."

The sultan, who could not deny the former representations of the grand vizier, was in the greater rage because he was also unable to disavow his own incredulity. "Where is this impostor," he exclaimed, — "this wretch, that I may strike off his head?" "It is some days," answered the grand vizier, "since he came to take leave of your majesty; we must send to him to inquire about his palace; he cannot be ignorant where it is." "This would be to treat him with too great indulgence," exclaimed the monarch; "go and order thirty of my horsemen to bring him before me in chains." The grand vizier instantly gave the orders, and instructed the officer how they might take him and prevent his escape. They set out, and met Aladdin, who was returning from the chase, about five or six leagues from the city. The officer, when he first accosted him, said that the sultan was so impatient to see him again that he had sent them to inform him of it, and to accompany him on his return.

Aladdin had not the least suspicion of the true cause that had brought this detachment of the sultan's guard. He continued hunting on his way home; but when he was within half a league of the city the detachment surrounded him, and the officer then said, "Prince Aladdin, it is with the greatest regret that I must inform you of the orders we have received from the sultan to arrest you, and conduct you like a state criminal. We entreat you not to take it ill in us that we do our duty, but on the contrary that you will pardon us." This declaration astonished Aladdin to the greatest degree. He felt himself innocent, and asked the officer if he knew of what crime he was accused; but he replied that neither he nor his men were acquainted with it.

As Aladdin perceived that his own attendants were much inferior to the detachment, and even that they were at some distance, he dismounted and said to the officer, "Execute whatever orders you have received. I must, however, aver, that I am guilty of no crime, either towards the person of the sultan or the state." They immediately put a large and long chain about his neck, which they then bound round his body, so that he had not the use of his arms. When the officer had put himself at the head of the troop, one of the horsemen took hold of the end of the chain, and going on behind the officer, he led Aladdin, who was obliged to follow on foot; and in this state he was conducted through the city.

When the guards entered the suburbs, the first person who saw Aladdin conducted in this way, like a state criminal, did not doubt but that he was going to lose his head. As he was generally beloved, some seized a sabre, others whatever arms they could, and those who had none took up stones, and in this manner followed the guards. Some of those who were in the rear wheeled about, as if they wished to disperse them; but the people increased so fast that the guards thought it better to dissemble, well satisfied if they could conduct Aladdin safe to the palace without his being rescued. In order to succeed the better, they took great care, as the streets happened to be more or less wide, to occupy the whole space, sometimes extending and at others compressing themselves. In this manner they arrived in the open square before the palace, where they all formed into one line, and faced about towards the armed multitude, while the officer and guard who led Aladdin entered the palace, and the porters shut the gates to prevent any one from entering.

Aladdin was conducted before the sultan, who waited for him, accompanied by the grand vizier, in a balcony. He no sooner saw him than he commanded the executioner, who was already present by his orders, to strike off his head, as he wished not to hear a word, or any explanation whatever.

The executioner seized Aladdin, took off the chain that was round his neck and body, and after laying down on the ground a large piece of leather, stained with the blood of the many criminals he had executed, he desired him to place himself on his knees, and then tied a bandage over his eyes. Having drawn his sabre, he was about to give the fatal stroke, only making the three usual flourishes in the air, and waiting for the sultan's signal to separate Aladdin's head from his body, when at this very instant the grand vizier perceived that the populace, who had forced the guards and filled the square, were in fact scaling the walls of the palace in many places, and even began to pull them down in order to open a passage. Before, therefore, the sultan could give the signal, he said to him, "I beseech your majesty to think maturely of what you are going to do; you will run the risk, sire, of having your palace forced; and if this misfortune should happen, the event cannot but be dreadful." "My palace forced!" replied the sultan; "who can dare attempt it?" "If your majesty, sire, will cast your eyes towards the walls, you will acknowledge the truth of what I say."

When the sultan saw the violent commotion of the people, his fear was very great.

He instantly ordered the executioner to put up his sabre, to take the bandage off Aladdin's eyes, and set him at liberty. He also commanded an officer to proclaim that he pardoned Aladdin, and that every one might retire.

As all those who had mounted on the walls of the palace were witnesses of what passed, they gave over their design, and almost directly got down: and, highly delighted at having thus been the means of saving the life of one whom they really loved, they instantly published the news to those who were near them, thence it spread through all the populace who were in the neighborhood of the palace; officers also ascended the terraced roof, and proclaimed it publicly. The justice the sultan had thus rendered Aladdin by pardoning him disarmed the populace, quieted the tumult, and every one by degrees returned home.

When Aladdin found himself at liberty, he lifted up his head towards the balcony, and perceiving the sultan, he raised his voice, and addressed him in the most pathetic manner. "I entreat your majesty," he said, "to add a new favor to the pardon you have just granted me; and that is to inform me of my crime" "What thy crime is, perfidious wretch!" replied the sultan; "dost thou not know it? Come up here, and I will show thee."

Aladdin ascended, and when he presented himself, "Follow me," said the sultan, walking on before, without taking any other notice of him. He led the way to the cabinet that opened towards the place where Aladdin's palace stood. When they came to the door, "Go in," said the sultan; "you ought to know where your own palace is. Look on all sides, and tell me what is become of it." Aladdin looked, but saw nothing. He perceived the space upon which his palace had stood; but as he could not conceive how it should have disappeared, this extraordinary and wonderful event so confused and astonished him, that he could not answer the sultan a single word. "Tell me," said the latter, impatient at his silence, "where is your palace, and what is become of my daughter?" "Sire," replied Aladdin, at last breaking silence, "I plainly see and must own that the palace which I built is no longer in the place where it was. I see it has disappeared; but I can assure your majesty that I have no concern whatever in this event."

"I care not what is become of your palace; that gives me no pain," replied the sultan. "I esteem my daughter a million times beyond it; unless, therefore, you discover and bring her again to me, no consideration shall yet prevent my taking off your head." "Sire," said Aladdin, "I entreat your majesty to grant me forty days to make the most diligent inquiries, and if I do not, during this period, succeed in my search, I give you my word that I will lay my head at the foot of your throne, that you may dispose of me according to your pleasure." "I grant your request," answered the sultan; "but do not think to abuse my favor, and endeavor to escape my resentment. In whatever part of the world you are, I will take care to discover you."

Aladdin then left the sultan's presence in the deepest humiliation, and in a state truly deserving of pity. He passed through the courts of the palace with downcast eyes, not even daring to look about him, so great was his confusion; and the principal officers of the court, not one of whom he had ever disobliged, instead of coming to console him, or offer him a retreat at their houses, turned their backs upon him, both that they might not be supposed to see him, nor he be able to recognize them. But even if they had approached him in order to console him, or offer him an asylum, they themselves would not have known him: he did not even know himself. His mind seemed deranged, of which he gave evident proofs, when he was out of the palace, for without thinking of what he did, he demanded at every door, and of all he met, if they had seen his palace, or could give him any intelligence of it.

These questions made every one think that Aladdin had lost his senses. Some even laughed at him; but the more serious, and especially all those who had been on friendly terms, or ever had any business with him, most sincerely compassionated him. He remained three days in the city, walking through every part, eating only what was given him in charity, without being able to form any resolution.

At length, as he could not in his wretched state remain any longer in the city, where he had hitherto lived in such splendor, he departed towards the country. He soon turned out of the high road, and after walking over a great deal of ground in the most dreadful state of mind, he arrived towards the close of day on the bank of a river. He now gave himself up entirely to despair. "Where shall I go to seek my palace?" he exclaimed. "In what country, in what part of the world, shall I find either that or my dear princess, whom the sultan demands of me? Never shall I be able to succeed! It is much better, then, that I at once free myself from labors which must end in nothing, and from feelings that distract me." He was then going to throw himself into the river, but being a good mussulman, and faithful to his religion, he thought he ought not to do it without first repeating his prayers. In order to perform this ceremony, he went close to the bank to wash his face and hands, as was the custom of his country, but as this spot was rather steep, and the ground moist from the water that had washed against it, he slipped down, and would have fallen into the river if he had not been stopped by a piece of stone or rock that projected about two feet from the surface. Happy was it for him, too, that he still had with him the ring which the African magician had put upon his finger when he made him go down into the subterraneous cavern to bring away the precious lamp. In holding against the piece of rock, he rubbed the ring so strongly that the same genie instantly appeared whom he had before seen in the subterraneous cavern. "What do you wish?" cried the genie: "I am ready to obey you, as your slave, and as the slave of him who has that ring on his finger; I and the other slaves of the ring."

Aladdin was most agreeably surprised by a sight he so little expected in the despair he was in; and directly replied, "Save my life, genie, a second time, by informing me where the palace is which I built, or again place it where it was." "What you require of me," answered the genie, "is beyond my ability: I am only the slave of the ring; you must address yourself to the slave of the lamp." "If that be the case, then," added Aladdin, "at least transport me to the spot where my palace is, in whatever part of the world it may be; and place me under the window of the princess Badroul Boudour." He had barely said this, before the genie transported him to Africa, near a large city, and in the midst of a large meadow, in which the palace stood, and set him down directly under the windows of the apartment of the princess, and there left him. All this was the work of an instant.

Notwithstanding the obscurity, Aladdin readily recognized both his own palace and the apartment of the princess; but as the night was far advanced, and everything in the palace was quiet, he retired, and seated himself at the foot of a tree. Full of hope, and reflecting on the good fortune which chance alone had procured him, he here felt himself in a much more tranquil state than since he had been arrested by the sultan's order, brought before him, and delivered from the danger of losing his head. He amused himself for some time with these agreeable thoughts; but as he had for five or six days enjoyed hardly any rest, he could not prevent himself being overcome by sleep, and he resigned himself to its influence in the spot where he was.

The next morning, as soon as the sun rose, Aladdin was most agreeably awakened by the notes of the birds which had perched upon the tree under which he lay, and among the other thick trees in the garden of his palace. He cast his eyes upon this beautiful building, and felt an inexpressible joy at the thought of being again master of it, and once more possessing his dear princess. He got up, and approached the apartment of the princess. He walked for some time under the window, waiting till she rose, in hopes that she might observe him. While in expectation of this, he considered within himself what could have been the cause of his misfortune; and after meditating some time, he entertained no doubt but that it arose from his having left his lamp. He accused himself of negligence and carelessness in having suffered the lamp to be out of his possession a single moment. He was, however, embarrassed to discover who could be so jealous of his happiness. He would at once have comprehended it, if he had known that both he and his palace were in Africa; but of this the genie, who was the slave of the ring, had not informed him. The name alone of Africa would have brought his declared enemy, the magician, to his recollection.

The princess Badroul Boudour rose this morning much earlier than she had done since she had been transported into Africa by the artifice of the magician, whose sight she was compelled to endure once every day, as he was master of the palace; but she constantly treated him so ill, that he had never yet had the boldness to sleep there. When she was dressed, one of her women, looking through the lattice, perceived Aladdin, and ran and informed her mistress. The princess, who could scarcely believe this news, immediately went to the window, and saw him herself. She opened the lattice, the noise of which made Aladdin raise his head. He instantly recognized her, and saluted her in a manner highly expressive of his joy. "Lose not a moment," cried the princess; "they are gone to open the secret door; ascend quickly." She then shut the lattice.

This secret door was directly below the apartment of the princess. It was open, and Aladdin entered her apartment. It is impossible to express the joy they both felt in again seeing each other, after having concluded that their separation was eternal. They embraced each other with tears of joy, and gave all imaginable proofs of the tenderest affection, after so cruel and so unforeseen a separation. "Before you mention anything else, my princess," said Aladdin, "tell me in the name of God, as well for your own sake, and for that of the sultan, your ever-respected father, as for mine, what has become of that old lamp, which I placed upon the cornice of the saloon with twenty-four windows, before I went on the hunting party?" "Ah, my dear husband!" replied the princess, "I doubt very much whether our mutual misfortunes have not arisen from that lamp: and what the more distresses me is that I am myself the cause of it." "Do not, princess," resumed Aladdin, "attribute the matter to yourself; I only am to blame, for I ought to have been more careful in its preservation. But let us now only think of repairing that loss; and for this purpose, inform me, I beg of you, of everything that has happened, and into whose hands this lamp has fallen."

The princess then related to Aladdin everything that had passed relative to the exchange of the old lamp for a new one, which she showed him; and how on the morning following the night of the removal of the palace she found herself in the unknown country where the palace now stood, and that this country was Africa, — a fact she had learned from the traitor who by his magic art had transported her thither.

"Princess," replied Aladdin, interrupting her, "by informing me that we are in Africa, you have at once unmasked the traitor. He is the most infamous of men. But this is neither a proper time nor place to enter into a detail of his crimes. I entreat you only to tell me what he has done with the lamp, and where he has put it." "He constantly," rejoined the princess, "carries it carefully wrapped up in his bosom. I am sure of this, because he once took it out in my presence, showing it as a sort of trophy."

"Do not be offended, my princess," continued Aladdin, "at all the questions I put to you; they are of equal importance to us both. But to come at once to what most interests me; tell me, I conjure you, how you have been treated by so infamous and perfidious a wretch." "Since I have been in this place," answered the princess, "he has presented himself before me only once during the day; and I am persuaded that the little satisfaction he has derived from his visits makes him repeat them less often. All that he has ever said to me has only been for the purpose of persuading me to be faithless to you, and to take him for my husband; wishing to convince me that I ought never to expect to see you again; that you are no longer alive, and that the sultan, my father, has ordered your head to be cut off. And to prove to me that you were an ungrateful wretch, he said that you owed all your good fortune to him, with a thousand other injurious expressions that I cannot repeat. And as he never had any other answer than my complaints and tears afforded him, he was obliged to retire with as little satisfaction as he came. I have, nevertheless, no doubt but that he means to suffer the more violent effects of my affliction to subside, with the hope and expectation that I shall change my mind; and if, in the end, I should persevere in my resistance, to make use of violent methods; but your presence, my dear husband, at once dissipates all my fears."

"Princess," interrupted Aladdin, "I trust you will not be deceived, as I think I have discovered the means of delivering you from our common enemy. For this purpose, however, I must go into the town; I will return about noon, and communicate to you the nature of my design, for you must yourself contribute towards its success. Let me, however, apprise you not to be astonished if you see me return in a different dress; and be sure you give orders that I may not be obliged to wait at the private door, but be admitted the instant I knock." The princess promised that somebody should be ready to open it on his arrival.

Aladdin left the apartment by the same door he had entered; and when outside of the palace, he looked about on all sides, and at last discovered a peasant, who was going into the country. As this peasant had got to some distance beyond the palace, Aladdin hastened to overtake him; and as soon as he joined him, he proposed to change clothes, and made him such an offer that the peasant readily agreed to it. This was effected behind a small bush; and when the exchange was completed, they separated, and Aladdin took the road that led to the town. When he got there, he turned down a street which led from the gate, and then getting into those streets which were most frequented, he came to that part where each street was occupied by a particular profession or trade. He went into that appropriated to druggists, and going to the shop which appeared the largest and best supplied, he asked the owner if he had a certain powder, the name of which he mentioned.

The merchant, who, from looking at Aladdin's dress, did not conceive that he had money enough to pay for it, replied that he had it, but that it was very dear. Aladdin readily entered into the merchant's thoughts, and therefore took out his purse, and, showing him the gold, desired to have half a drachm of the powder. The merchant weighed it, wrapped it up, and, giving it to Aladdin, demanded one piece of gold for it; the latter immediately paid him, and without staying in the town any longer than was necessary to take some nourishment, returned to the palace. He had no occasion to wait at the street door; it was instantly opened, and he went up to the apartment of the princess Badroul Boudour. "The aversion, my princess," said Aladdin to her as soon as he came in, "which you have expressed for your ravisher, may probably occasion you some pain in complying with the instructions I am about to give you. But permit me, in the first place, to tell you that it is necessary for you to dissemble, and even to offer some violence to your own feelings, if you wish to be delivered from his persecution, and afford to the sultan, your father, and my sovereign, the satisfaction of again beholding you."

"If you will follow my advice," continued Aladdin, "you will this moment adorn yourself in one of your most elegant dresses, and when the African magician shall come, make no difficulty in receiving him with all the affability you can assume, without appearing affected, or under any constraint, in a kind of open manner; yet still with some remains of grief, which he may easily conceive will soon be entirely dissipated. In your conversation with him give him to understand that you are making the greatest efforts to forget me; and, that he may be still more convinced of your sincerity, invite him even to sup with you, and tell him that you are desirous of tasting some of the best wine this country can produce. On this he will not fail to leave you in order to procure some. While he is gone, do you go to the sideboard, which will of course be set out, and put this powder into one of the cups you usually drink out of; set the cup on one side, and tell one of your women to fill it, and bring it to you at a certain signal, which you must explain to her, warning her not to make any mistake. When the magician shall be returned, and you shall again have sat down to table, make them bring you the particular goblet in which the powder was put, and then do you make an exchange with him. He will find the flavor of that which you give him so excellent, that he will drink it up to the last drop. Scarcely shall he have emptied the cup, but you will see him fall backwards. If you should feel any repugnance at drinking out of his cup, you need only pretend to do so; and you can very easily manage this, for the effect of the powder will be so sudden, that he will not have time to pay any attention to what you do, or notice whether you drink or not."

When Aladdin had finished his instructions, the princess answered: "I must confess that I shall violently shock my own feelings in agreeing to make these advances to the magician, although I am aware they are absolutely necessary. But what cannot I resolve to undertake against such a cruel enemy? I will then do as you direct, since your happiness depends upon it as well as mine." When these matters were all arranged with the princess, Aladdin took his leave: he passed the remainder of the day in the neighborhood of the palace; and as the night came on, he approached the secret door.

The princess Badroul Boudour, being inconsolable not only at her separation from her dear husband Aladdin, whom from the first she loved more through inclination than duty, but also at being separated from the sultan, her father, between whom and herself there was an equal degree of affection, had completely neglected her person from the very moment of their distressful separation. She had even neglected the neatness so becoming to her sex, particularly since the first visit of the magician, when she had learnt from her women that he was the person who had exchanged the old lamp for a new one; after this infamous trick, therefore, she could not look upon him without horror. The opportunity, however, of taking that vengeance upon him he so justly deserved so much sooner than she could ever hope to have the means of accomplishing, made her resolve to satisfy Aladdin.

As soon, therefore, as he was gone, she went to her toilet, and made her women dress her in the most becoming manner. She put on one of her richest habits, and that which she thought best adapted to the purpose. Her girdle was of gold, set with diamonds of the largest size, and the best chosen. She put on only a necklace of pearls, six of which, on each side the centre one, which was the largest and most valuable, were so beautifully proportioned, that the proudest sultanas and greatest queens would have thought themselves happy in possessing a necklace equal to the two smallest. Her bracelets, which were formed of diamonds and rubies mixed, admirably answered to the richness of her girdle and necklace.

When the princess was completely dressed, she consulted her mirror, and asked the opinion of her women upon her appearance; and finding she was not deficient in any of those charms that might flatter the foolish passion of the African magician, she seated herself upon the sofa, in expectation of his arrival.

The magician did not fail to make his appearance at the usual hour. As soon as the princess saw him come into the saloon of the twenty-four windows, where she was waiting to receive him, she got up in all the splendor of her beauty and charms. She pointed with her hand to the most honorable seat, and remained standing till he had reached it, that she might sit down at the same time. This distinguished civility she had never before shown him.

The African magician, more dazzled by the lustre of her eyes than the brilliancy of the jewels she wore, was greatly struck. Her majestic air, the gracious manner she had put on, so opposite to the rebuffs he had hitherto met with from her, absolutely confused him. He at first wished to sit at the very end of the sofa; but as he saw that the princess declined taking her seat until he was seated where she wished, he at last obeyed.

The princess, then, in order to free him from the embarrassment in which she saw he was, looked at him in such a manner as to make him suppose she no longer beheld him in an odious point of view, and then said to him, "You are doubtless astonished at seeing me appear to-day quite like a different person from what I have been hitherto; but you will no longer be surprised at it, when I tell you that I am naturally of a disposition so much the reverse of grief, melancholy, vexation, or distress, that I endeavor to drive them from me by every means in my power, as soon as the cause of them has been a short time over. I have reflected upon what you have said respecting the destiny of Aladdin, and from the disposition of the sultan, my father, which I well know, I am persuaded, like yourself, that the former could not possibly avoid the terrible effects of his rage. I concluded, therefore, that even if I were to weep and lament all the remainder of my life, that my tears would not revive him; it is then on this account, that, after having paid him, even to the tomb, every respect and duty which my affection required, I thought I ought at length to search for the means of consoling myself. These are the motives which have produced the change you see. In order, then, to begin to drive away all sorrow, which I have now resolved to banish from my mind, and being persuaded that you will assist me in the endeavor, I have ordered a supper to be prepared; but as I have only some wine which is the produce of Cathay, and am now in Africa, I have a great desire to taste what is made here, and I thought if there were any, that you would be most likely to have the best."

The African magician, who had conceived it impossible to have so soon and so easily acquired the good graces of the princess Badroul Boudour, replied that he was unable sufficiently to express how sensible he was of her goodness; and, to put an end to a conversation from which he would find it difficult to disengage himself if it continued any longer, he adverted to the wine of Africa which she had mentioned, and told her that among the many advantages which that country boasted of possessing, that of producing most excellent wine was the principal, particularly in the part where she then was; and that he had some seven years old that was yet untouched, and it was not saying too much to aver that it surpassed all other wine in the whole world. "If my princess," added he, "will permit me, I will bring two bottles, and will return in an instant." "I should be sorry to give you that trouble," replied the princess; "it would be better, surely, to send some one." "It is necessary for me to go myself," resumed the magician; "no one but myself has the key of the cellar; nor does any one else know the secret of opening it." "The longer you are gone, the more impatient I shall be to see you again; remember, we sit down to table on your return."

Full of the ideas of his expected happiness, the African magician not only ran, but absolutely flew, to fetch the wine, and was back almost instantly. The princess did not doubt but that he would make haste, and therefore threw the powder which Aladdin had given her into a goblet, and set it aside until she should call for it. They then sat down opposite to each other, so that the magician's back was towards the sideboard. The princess, helping him to what appeared the best, said to him, "If you have any inclination, I will give you some music; but as we are only by ourselves, I think that conversation will afford us much pleasure." The magician regarded this choice as a fresh mark of her favor.

After they had eaten for some little time, the princess asked for some wine, and drank to the magician's health. "You are right," she cried, when she had drank, "in praising your wine; I have never tasted any so delicious." "Charming princess," replied he, holding the goblet they had given him in his hand, "my wine acquires a fresh flavor by the approbation you have bestowed upon it." "Drink to my health," resumed the princess; "you must confess I understand it." He did as she requested him, and in returning the goblet, he added: "I esteem myself very happy, princess, to have reserved this wine for so good an occasion: and I confess I have never in my whole life drank any in so agreeable a manner."

They continued eating some time longer, and had taken three cups each, when the princess, who had completely fascinated the African magician by her kind and obliging manners, at length gave the signal to her woman to bring some wine, at the same time desiring her to bring a goblet full, and also to fill that of the magician, which they presented to him. When they each held their goblet in their hands, "I know not," said she to the African magician, "what is your custom when those who are fond of each other drink together as we do. With us in Cathay each person presents his own goblet to the other, and the lovers then drink to each other's health." At the same time she presented the goblet she held, and extended her other hand to receive his. The African magician hastened to make this change, with which he was the more delighted, as he looked upon this favor as the surest mark of having made an entire conquest of the heart of the princess; and this completed his happiness. "Princess," he exclaimed before he drank, and holding the goblet in his hand, "we Africans ought to become as much refined in the art of giving a zest to love by every delightful accompaniment as the people of Cathay; by instructing me, therefore, in a matter of which I am ignorant, I should learn how sensible I ought to be of the favor I receive. Never shall I forget, most amiable princess, that in drinking out of your goblet I have regained that life which your cruelty, had it continued, would most infallibly have destroyed."

The princess Badroul Boudour was almost worn out with this ridiculous and troublesome discourse. "Drink," she cried, interrupting him, "you may then say what you please to me." At the same time she appeared to carry the goblet she held to her mouth, but barely suffered it to touch her lips, while the African magician did not leave a single drop in his. Wishing to drain the cup, he held his head quite back, and remained so long in that position that the princess, who kept the goblet to her lips, observed that his eyes were turned up; and he, in fact, fell upon his back without the least struggle.

The princess had no occasion to order them to open the street door and admit Aladdin. Her women, who were stationed at different parts, gave the word, one to the other, from the saloon to the bottom of the staircase, so that the African magician had no sooner fallen backwards than the door was opened.

Aladdin went up to the saloon, and as soon as he saw the African magician extended on the sofa he stopped Badroul Boudour, who had risen to congratulate him on the joyful event. "My princess," he cried, "there is at this moment no time for rejoicing; do me the favor to retire to your apartment and to suffer me to be alone, while I prepare for our return to Cathay as quickly as you went from it." The princess, her women, and the eunuchs, were no sooner out of the hall than Aladdin shut the door; and then, going up to the body of the African magician, which was lying lifeless on the sofa, he opened his vest and took out the lamp, which was wrapped up exactly in the manner the princess had described. He took it out and rubbed it. The genie instantly presented himself, and made the usual speech. "Genie," said Aladdin, "I have called you to command you, in the name of this lamp, your good mistress, immediately to transport this palace to the same spot in Cathay whence it was brought here." The genie first showed by an inclination of his head that he would obey, and vanished. The journey was instantly made, and only two slight shocks were perceptible; one when the palace was taken up from the place where it stood in Africa, and the other when it was set down in Cathay, opposite to the sultan's palace.

Aladdin then went down to the apartment of Badroul Boudour. "Our joy, my princess," exclaimed Aladdin, embracing her, "will be complete by to-morrow morning." As the princess had not finished her supper, and as Aladdin was much in want of food, she ordered them to bring the things from the saloon of twenty-four windows, where the supper had been served, and which had not yet been removed. The princess and Aladdin drank together, and found the old wine of the magician most excellent; and, after enjoying themselves at table for some time, they retired to their apartment.

Since the removal of Aladdin's palace and the loss of the princess Badroul Boudour, his daughter, as he thought forever, the sultan had been inconsolable. He slept neither night nor day; and, instead of avoiding everything that could increase his affliction, he, on the contrary, cherished every thought that was likely to add to it. Thus, instead of going only every morning to the cabinet to satisfy himself, as it were, only with the recollection of what he was now unable to perceive, he went several times during the day to renew his tears, and overwhelm himself with the most painful thoughts of never again seeing what had afforded him so much delight, and for the loss of her whom he esteemed more than all the world. The sun had not yet risen, when the sultan entered this cabinet as usual on the very morning after Aladdin's palace had been brought back to its place. When he first came in, he was so much absorbed in his own feelings, and so penetrated with sorrow, that he threw his eyes over the accustomed spot in the most melancholy manner, with the expectation of beholding, as he thought, only the vacant space that had been occupied by the palace. But when he found the void filled up, he conjectured that it was only a mist. He then looked with greater attention, and could not at last doubt but it was the palace of Aladdin which he saw. Chagrin and sorrow were succeeded by the most delightful sensations of joy. He hastened back to his apartment, and instantly ordered them to saddle and bring him a horse. It was no sooner brought than he mounted it and set out, thinking he could not arrive soon enough at Aladdin's palace.

Aladdin, who had conjectured what might be the consequence, had risen at daybreak; and, as soon as he had dressed himself in one of his most magnificent robes, he went up to the saloon of twenty-four windows, from which he perceived the sultan as he was coming along. He then descended, and was exactly in time to receive him at the bottom of the grand staircase, and assist him in dismounting. "Aladdin," cried the sultan, "I cannot speak to you till I have seen and embraced my daughter."

He then conducted the sultan to the apartment of the princess Badroul Boudour, whom Aladdin had informed when he got up that she was no longer in Africa, but in Cathay, at the capital of the sultan, her father, and close to his palace. She had just finished dressing. The sultan eagerly embraced her, bathing her face with his tears, while the princess on her part showed the greatest marks of delight at again beholding him. For some time the sultan could not utter a syllable, so much was he affected at finding his daughter after having lamented her loss as inevitable, while the princess shed tears of joy at the sight of him. "My dear daughter," exclaimed the sultan, at length recovering his speech, "I would fain believe that the joy you feel at again seeing me makes you appear so little changed as though not even an unpleasant circumstance had happened to you. I am sure, however, that you must have suffered a great deal. No one can have been suddenly transported as you have been, and with a whole palace at the same time, without the greatest alarm and most dreadful feelings. Relate to me, I beg of you, everything as it happened, and do not conceal the least circumstance."

The princess felt a pleasure in giving the sultan all the satisfaction he wished. "Sire," said she, "if I appear so little altered, I beg your majesty to consider that my expectations were raised so long ago as yesterday morning by the presence of my dear husband and liberator, Aladdin, whom I had till then regarded and lamented as forever lost to me, and that the happiness I experienced in again embracing him restored me nearly to my former self. Strictly speaking, my whole sorrow arose from finding myself torn from your majesty and my dear husband; not only out of my affection for him, but from the anxiety I suffered for fear of the dreadful effects of your majesty's rage, to which I did not doubt that he would be exposed, however innocent he might be; and no one could be more so. I have suffered less from the insolence of my ravisher, who continually held a conversation that gave me pain, but which I as often put an end to by the ascendency I knew how to maintain over him. I was not also under more restraint than I am at present. Aladdin himself had not the least concern in my removal: I was alone the cause, although the innocent one."

In order to convince the sultan that she spoke the truth, she gave him a detailed account of how the African magician had disguised himself like a seller of lamps, and offered to change new ones for old, and of the joke she amused herself with in changing Aladdin's lamp, the important and secret qualities of which she was ignorant of; of the instant removal of the palace and herself in consequence of this exchange, and their being transported into Africa, with the magician himself, whom two of her women, and also the eunuch who had made the exchange, recollected, when he had the audacity to come and present himself before her the first time after his daring enterprise, and of the proposal he made to marry her. She then informed him of the persecution she continued to suffer until the arrival of Aladdin; of the measures which they mutually took to get the lamp, which the magician constantly carried about him; in what manner they succeeded, particularly by her having the courage to dissemble her feelings and invite him to sup with her; with everything that passed till she presented the goblet to him in which she had privately put the powder Aladdin had given her. "With respect to what remains," added she, "I leave to Aladdin to inform you of it."

The latter had but little to add to this account. "When they opened the private door," he said, "I immediately went up to the saloon of twenty-four windows, and saw the traitor lying dead on the sofa, from the strength of the powder. As it was not proper for the princess to remain there any longer, I requested her to go to her apartment with her women and eunuchs. When I was alone, after taking the lamp out of the magician's bosom, I made use of the same secret he had done to remove the palace and steal away the princess. I have brought the palace back to its place, and have had the happiness of restoring the princess to your majesty, as you commanded me. I have not deceived your majesty in this account; and if you will take the trouble to go up to the saloon, you will see the magician punished as he deserved."

In order to be more fully convinced, the sultan rose and went up; and when he had seen the dead body of the magician, whose face was already become livid by the strength of the poison, he embraced Aladdin with the greatest tenderness. "Do not think ill of me, my son," cried he, "for having used you in the manner I have done; paternal affection forced me to do so, and I deserve to be pardoned for the excess to which it carried me." "Sire," replied Aladdin, "I have not the least reason to complain of your majesty's conduct: you have done only what was your duty. This magician, this infamous wretch, the most detestable of men, was the sole cause of my disgrace. When your majesty shall have leisure, I will give you an account of another piece of treachery which he was guilty of towards me, not less infamous than this, from which the peculiar providence of God has preserved me." "I will take care to find an opportunity," said the sultan, "and that very soon. But let us now only think of making ourselves happy, and having this odious object removed."

Aladdin ordered the magician's body to be thrown away, that it might serve for the beasts and birds to prey upon. In the mean time the sultan, after having commanded the drums, trumpets, tymbals, and other instruments, to announce a public rejoicing, had a festival proclaimed, of ten days' continuance, in honor of the return of the princess Badroul Boudour, of Aladdin, and his palace.

It was in this manner that Aladdin a second time escaped an almost inevitable death; but even this was not the last: he was in danger a third time, the circumstances attending which will now be related.

The African magician had a younger brother, who was not inferior to him in his knowledge of magic; and it may be said that he surpassed him in wicked intentions and diabolical machinations. As they did not always live together, nor even in the same city, one sometimes being at the eastern extremity, while the other travelled in the most western part of the world, they did not fail once every year to inform themselves, by means of their knowledge of geomancy, in what part of the world the other was, how he was going on, and whether either wanted the assistance of the other.

Some time after the African magician had failed in his attempt against Aladdin, his younger brother, who had not received any intelligence of him for a year, and who was not in Africa, wished to know where he was, whether he was well, and what he was about. Into whatever place he travelled, he never went without his square geomantic box, as well as his brother. He took, then, this box, and having arranged the sand, he cast the points, drew the figures, and formed his horoscope. In examining each part, he discovered that his brother was no longer alive, that he had been poisoned, and that his death was sudden. On searching further, he found that this took place in a capital situated in such a particular part of Cathay; and that he by whom he had been poisoned was a man of low birth, but was married to a princess, the daughter of the sultan.

When the magician was thus apprised of the melancholy fate of his brother, he did not waste his time in useless regrets, which could not again restore him to life; but he took the instant resolution to avenge his death: he mounted his horse, and directly began his journey towards Cathay. He traversed plains, rivers, mountains, and deserts; and after a long journey of almost incredible fatigue and difficulty, he at length reached Cathay, and in a short time afterwards arrived at the capital which his experiment in geomancy had pointed out. Certain of not being deceived, nor of having mistaken one kingdom for another, he took up his abode there.

The very next morning the magician went out, and in walking through the city, not so much for the purpose of seeing its beauties, which did not at all interest him, as with the intention of planning his measures in order to put his pernicious design into execution, he introduced himself into the most frequented places, and was very attentive to the conversation that passed. At a place where many people spent their time in playing a variety of games, and where, while some are playing, others entertain themselves with the news of the day, or with talking over their own private affairs, he observed that they spoke much of and highly praised the virtues and piety of a woman called Fatima, who led a retired life, and even of the miracles she performed. As he thought that this woman might perhaps be in some way useful in the business he was about, he took one of the persons aside, and begged him to give a more particular account of this holy woman, and what sort of miracles she performed.

"What," exclaimed this man, "have you never seen nor even heard of her? She is the admiration of the whole city, by her fasting and austere life, and by the good example she sets. Except on Mondays and Fridays, she never leaves her hermitage; but on these days she comes into the city, and she does an infinite deal of good, for there is no one who is afflicted even with a pain in the head, whom she does not cure by laying her hands upon them."

The magician did not want to know more on this subject; he only inquired of the same person in what quarter of the city the hermitage of this holy woman was. He informed him: upon which, after first forming the horrible design about to be mentioned, and that he might be the more sure of its success, he observed all her conduct the first time she went out after this inquiry, and did not lose sight of her the whole day, till she returned in the evening to her cell. When he had accurately remarked the spot, he returned to one of those places where, as has been said, a certain warm liquor is prepared and sold, and where if you choose you may pass the night, particularly during the hot weather, when the inhabitants of Cathay prefer sleeping upon a mat rather than a bed.

The magician having first paid the owner for what he had, which did not amount to much, went out about midnight, and took the road to the hermitage of Fatima, the holy woman, the name by which she was distinguished throughout the city. He had no difficulty in opening the door, as it was only fastened by a latch. As soon as he entered, he shut it again without making any noise. He then perceived Fatima, by the light of the moon, lying almost in the open air, upon a couch with a ragged mat, close to the side of her cell. He approached, and after taking out a poniard he had by his side, he awoke her.

On opening her eyes, poor Fatima was very much astonished at seeing a man on the point of plunging a poniard into her. Holding the point of the dagger against her breast, ready in an instant to plunge it into her heart, "If you cry out," said he, "or make the least noise, I will murder you. Get up, and do what I bid you." Fatima, who always slept in her clothes, got up, trembling with fear. "Fear nothing," said the magician, "I only want your habit; give it me, and take mine." When this was done, and the magician was dressed in Fatima's clothes, he said to her, "Paint my face like yours, so that I shall resemble you, and the color will not come off." As he saw that she still trembled, he added, in order to give her courage, and that she might do what he wanted of her the better, "Fear nothing, I tell you again; I swear, in the name of God, that I will spare your life." Fatima then conducted him into the interior of her cell, lighted her lamp, and taking a certain liquid in a basin, with a pencil, she rubbed it over his face; assuring him it would not change, and that there was no difference between her color and his. She then put upon him her own head-dress, with a veil, and instructed him how she concealed her face with it in walking through the city. She finished by hanging a large necklace or chaplet round his neck, which came down nearly to his waist; she then put the stick she was accustomed to walk with into his hand, and giving him a mirror, "Look," she said, "and you will find that you cannot possibly resemble me more." The magician found everything as he wished; but he did not keep the oath he had so solemnly taken in her presence. But that no one might see the blood, which would fall if he stabbed her with his poniard, he strangled her, and when he found that she was dead, he drew the body by the feet to the cistern of the hermitage, and threw it in.

The magician, thus disguised like the holy woman, passed the remainder of the night in the hermitage, after having defiled it by so detestable a murder. Very early the next morning, although it was not the usual day for Fatima's appearance in the city, he did not hesitate to go out, because he was very well aware that no one would ask him about it, or if they did, he might easily answer the question. As the first thing he did on his arrival in the city had been to inspect the palace of Aladdin, and as it was there he meant to put his scheme in execution, he took the road towards it.

As soon as the people saw the holy woman, as every one imagined him to be, the magician was surrounded by a great crowd of people. Some recommended themselves to his prayers, others kissed his hand; some, still more respectful, kissed the hem of his robe; while others, either because they had the headache, or wished to be preserved from it, bent down before him, that he might lay his hands upon them; he did so, muttering at the same time a sort of prayer. In short, he so well imitated the holy woman, that every one was deceived, and took him for her. After stopping very often to satisfy these people, who, in fact, received neither good nor harm from this imposition of hands, he at last arrived in the square before Aladdin's palace, where, as the crowd increased, the difficulty to get near him was also greater. The strongest and most zealous beat off the crowd to get a place for themselves, and hence several quarrels arose, the noise of which reached the ears of the princess Badroul Boudour, who was sitting in the saloon with twenty-four windows.

The princess demanded the occasion of the noise; and as no person could inform her, she ordered some one to go and see, and bring her an account. One of her women, however, looked through the lattice, and told her that it arose from a crowd of people, who were collected round the holy woman to be cured of their maladies by the laying of her hands upon them.

The princess, who for some time had heard every one speak in praise of this holy woman, but who had never yet beheld her, felt a desire to see and converse with her. Having mentioned something to this effect, the chief of the eunuchs, who was present, said that if she wished it, he was sure he could get her to come, and that she had only to give her orders. The princess consented to it, and he instantly despatched four eunuchs, with an order to bring back this pretended old woman with them.

As soon as the eunuchs were observed to issue from the gate of the palace, and make towards the holy woman, or rather the magician disguised as such, the crowd began to disperse, and when he was thus more at liberty, and saw that they were coming towards him, he went part of the way to meet them, and with the greater glee, as he saw that his cunning scheme was in a prosperous state. One of the eunuchs addressed him in these words: "Holy woman, the princess wishes to see you; follow us." "The princess honors me very much," replied the pretended Fatima. "I am ready to obey her commands." And he then followed the eunuchs, who immediately went back to the palace.

When the magician, clothed in this sanctified dress, but with a heart the most diabolical, was introduced into the saloon with twenty-four windows, and perceived the princess, he began a prayer containing a long catalogue of exhortations to piety, and wishes for her prosperity, and the accomplishment of everything she could desire. He then displayed all his hypocritical and deceitful rhetoric, in order to insinuate himself, under the cloak of great piety, into the good opinion of the princess. And in this it was so much the easier for him to succeed, as the princess, who was naturally of the best disposition, was persuaded that all the world were at least as good as herself; particularly all those who professed to serve God in a retired life.

When the false Fatima had finished her long harangue, "My good mother," replied the princess, "I am much obliged to you for your kind prayers; I have the greatest confidence in them, and trust God will hear them. Approach, and sit down near me." The pretended Fatima sat down with the greatest appearance of modesty; and the princess continued: "My good mother, I have a request to make to you, which you must not refuse me; and that is that you come and live with me, that I may have you constantly to converse with, and may learn from your advice and good example how I ought to serve God."

"Princess," replied the false Fatima, "I entreat you not to require my compliance in that to which I cannot agree without breaking in upon my prayers and devotions." "Do not let that give you any pain," resumed the princess. "I have many apartments which are not occupied; you shall choose that which you like best," and you may attend to your devotions with as much liberty there as if you were in your own hermitage."

The magician, who had no other object than to introduce himself into Aladdin's palace, where it would be much easier for him to execute the wicked design he meditated by remaining under the auspices and protection of the princess than if he were obliged to go to and fro from the palace to the hermitage, did not make much difficulty in acceding to the obliging offer of Badroul Boudour. "Princess," he replied, "whatever resolution a poor and miserable woman like myself may have made to renounce the world, its pomps and vanities, I nevertheless dare not resist either the wish or the command of so pious and charitable a princess."

Upon this answer the princess rose, and said to the magician: "Come with me, that I may show you all the apartments that are unoccupied; you may then make your choice." He followed the princess through all the apartments she showed him, which were very large, and handsomely furnished. He chose the one which appeared to be the least so, saying at the same time that it was much too good for him, and that he only made choice of it to oblige her.

The princess wished to take this impostor back with her to the saloon with twenty-four windows, to dine with her; but as it was necessary in the act of eating to uncover his face, which he had hitherto kept concealed by the veil, and as he was afraid she might not then suppose him to be Fatima, the holy woman, he begged her so earnestly to excuse him, saying that he never ate anything but bread and dried fruits, and to permit him to take his trifling meal in his own apartment, that she readily complied with his wishes. "My good mother," she said, "you are quite at liberty; do as you would in the hermitage; I will order them to carry you in some food; but remember that I shall expect you as soon as you have finished your repast."

The princess then dined, and the false Fatima did not fail to return to her as soon as she was informed by an eunuch, whom she ordered to acquaint her when she rose from table. "My good mother," said the princess, "I am delighted at enjoying the society of such a holy woman as you are, and who will, by your presence, bring down blessings upon the whole palace. And now I mention this palace, pray tell me how you like it? But before I show you other portions, tell me how you like this saloon."

At this inquiry the pretended Fatima who — in order to act her part with more appearance of truth — had till now kept her head cast down towards the ground, at length raised it, and looked at everything in the saloon from one end to the other; and when she had thoroughly examined it, she said: "Indeed, princess, this saloon is truly beautiful and worthy of admiration. But as far as a recluse can judge, who knows nothing of what is reckoned beautiful by the world in general, I think only one thing is wanting." "What is that, my good mother?" inquired Badroul Boudour; "I entreat you to tell it me. For my part, I thought, and had also heard it said, that nothing was wanting; but whatever may be deficient I will have supplied."

"Pardon me this liberty, princess," replied the still-dissembling magician; "my opinion, if it can be of any value, is, that if the egg of a roc were suspended from the centre of the dome, this saloon would not have its equal in either of the four quarters of the globe, and your palace would be the whole wonder of the universe."

"My good mother," resumed the princess, "what kind of bird is a roc, and where could the egg of one be found?" "Princess," answered the feigned Fatima, "the roc is a bird of prodigious size, which inhabits the summit of Mount Caucasus, and the architect who designed your palace can procure you one."

After having thanked the pretended Fatima for her kind information and good advice, as she deemed it, the princess Badroul Boudour continued the conversation upon various other subjects; but she by no means forgot the egg of the roc, of which she fully intended to inform Aladdin when he returned from hunting. He had already been absent six days, and the magician, who was well aware of this circumstance, wished to take every advantage of his absence. Aladdin returned on the same evening, after the false Fatima had taken leave of the princess and retired to the apartment allotted to her. As soon as he entered the palace, he went to the apartment of the princess, to which she had already retired. He saluted and embraced her, but she seemed to him to receive him with rather less affection than usual. "I do not find you, my princess," said he, "in your usual good spirits. Has anything happened during my absence that has displeased or vexed you? Do not, in the name of God, conceal it from me, for there is nothing in my power that I will not do to endeavor to dispel it." "It is a mere trifle," replied the princess, "and it really gives me so little anxiety that I did not suppose it would be so apparent in my face and manner that you could have perceived it. But since you have observed some alteration in me, which I by no means intended, I will not conceal the cause, inconsiderable as it is.

"I thought, as well as you did," the princess went on, "that our palace was the most superb, the most beautiful, and most ornamented of any in the whole world. I will tell you, however, what has come into my head after having thoroughly examined the saloon with twenty-four windows. Do not you think with me that if the egg of a roc were suspended from the centre of the dome we should have nothing to wish for?" "It is enough, princess," replied Aladdin, "that you think the want of a roc's egg is a defect. You shall find, by the diligence with which I will repair it, that there is nothing I will not do for love of you.

Aladdin instantly left the princess and went up to the saloon with twenty-four windows; and then, taking the lamp, which he now always carried about him since the danger he had experienced from the neglect of that precaution, out of his bosom, he rubbed it. The genie immediately appeared before him. "Genie," said Aladdin, "there requires the egg of a roc to be suspended from the centre of this dome in order to make it perfect; I command you, in the name of the lamp which I hold, to get this defect rectified."

Aladdin had scarcely pronounced these words before the genie uttered so loud and dreadful a scream that the very room shook, and Aladdin trembled so violently that he was ready to fall. "What! wretch," exclaimed the genie, in a voice that would have made the most courageous man tremble, "is it not enough that I and my companions have done everything thou hast chosen to command, but that thou repayest our services by an ingratitude that is unequalled, and commandest me to bring thee my master and hang him up in the midst of this vaulted dome? Thou art deserving, for this crime, of being instantly torn to atoms, with thy wife and palace with thee. But thou art fortunate that the request did not originate with thee, and that the command is not in any way thine. Learn who is the true author. It is no other than the brother of thy enemy, the African magician, whom thou hast destroyed, as he deserved. He is in thy palace, disguised under the appearance of Fatima, the holy woman, whom he has murdered; and it is he who has suggested the idea to thy wife to make this horrible and destructive request. His design is to kill thee; therefore take care of thyself." As the genie said this, he vanished.

Aladdin lost not a syllable of the words of the genie. He had before heard of the holy woman Fatima, and was not ignorant of the manner in which she could cure a pain in the head, at least, as they pretended. He then returned to the apartment of the princess, but did not mention what had happened to him. He sat down, and, holding his hand up to his forehead, complained of a violent pain that had suddenly seized his head. The princess directly ordered the holy woman to be called, and in the mean time related to Aladdin the manner in which she had induced her to come to the palace, where she had given her an apartment.

The pretended Fatima came; and, as soon as she entered, Aladdin said to her, "I am very happy, my good mother, to see you, and it is for my advantage to have you here just now. I am tormented with a violent headache, which has suddenly attacked me. I request your assistance; and from the reliance I place on your good prayers, I hope you will not refuse me the favor which you grant to all who are thus afflicted." He then bent his head forward, and the false Fatima advanced, putting, at the same time, her hand upon a poniard which was concealed in her girdle, under her robe. Aladdin, who watched what she did, seized her hand before she could draw it, and piercing her to the heart with her own weapon, he threw her dead upon the floor.

"What have you done, my dear husband!" exclaimed the princess, in the greatest surprise; "you have killed the holy woman." "No, no, my princess," answered Aladdin, without the least emotion; "I have not killed Fatima, but a villain who was going to assassinate me, if I had not prevented him. It is this wretch, whom you behold," added he, showing his face, "who has strangled Fatima, whom you thought I had destroyed, and therefore regretted, and who has disguised himself in her clothes in order to murder me. And to convince you still further, I must inform you that he is the brother of the African magician who carried you off." Aladdin then related to her in what manner he had learnt these particulars, and he then ordered the body to be removed.

It was in this manner that Aladdin was delivered from the persecution of the two magicians. A few years after, the sultan, being very old, died. As he left no male issue, the princess Badroul Boudour, as his legitimate heir, succeeded to the throne, and, of course, transferred the supreme power to Aladdin. They reigned together many years, and left an illustrious and numerous progeny.

SINDBAD THE SAILOR.

IN the reign of the caliph Haroun Alraschid, there lived in Bagdad a poor porter, who was named Hindbad. One day, during the excessive heat of summer, he was carrying a heavy load from one extremity of the city to the other; and, being much fatigued by the length of the way he had already come, and having still much ground to traverse, he arrived in a street where the pavement was sprinkled with rose-water, and a gentle breeze refreshed the air. Delighted with this cool and pleasant situation, he placed his load on the ground, and took his station near a large mansion. The delicious scent of aloes and frankincense, issuing from the windows and mixing with the rose-water, perfumed the air, together with a charming concert within, which was accompanied by the melody of the nightingales and other birds peculiar to the climate of Bagdad; and the smell of different sorts of viands led him to suppose that some grand feast was given there. He wished to know whose residence it was; for, not having frequent occasion to pass that way, he was unacquainted with the names of the inhabitants. To satisfy his curiosity, therefore, he approached some servants magnificently dressed, who were standing at the door, and inquired who was the master of that mansion. "What," replied the servant, "are you an inhabitant of Bagdad, and do not know that this is the residence of Sindbad, the sailor, that famous voyager who has sailed over all the seas under the sun?" The porter, who had heard of the immense riches of Sindbad, could not help comparing his situation, which appeared so enviable, with his own, which was so deplorable; and, distressed by the reflection, he raised his eyes to heaven, and exclaimed, in a loud voice, "Almighty Creator of all things, be pleased to consider the difference between Sindbad and myself; I daily suffer a thousand ills, and find the greatest difficulty to supply my wretched family with bad barley bread, whilst the fortunate Sindbad expends his riches with profusion, and enjoys every pleasure. What has he done to obtain so happy a destiny, or I to merit one so rigorous?" Saying this, he struck the ground with his foot as if entirely given up to despair, when, still musing on his fate, a servant came towards him from the house, and, taking him by the arm, said: "Come, follow me; my master, Sindbad, wishes to speak with you."

It may easily be imagined that Hindbad was not a little surprised at the compliment that was paid him. After the words he had uttered, he began to fear that Sindbad had sent for him in order to reprimand him, and therefore he tried to excuse himself from going, saying that he could not leave his load in the middle of the street; but the servant, assuring him that it should be taken care of, pressed him so much to go that the porter could no longer refuse.

He led him into a spacious room, where a number of persons were seated round a table covered with all kinds of delicate viands. In the principal seat was a grave and venerable personage, whose long white beard hung down to his breast, behind whom were standing a crowd of officers and servants to wait on him. This person was Sindbad. The porter, quite confused by the number of the company and the magnificence of the entertainment, made his obeisance with fear and trembling. Sindbad desired him to approach, and, seating him at his right hand, helped him with his own hands to the choicest dishes, and gave him some excellent wine, with which the sideboard was plentifully stocked, to drink.

Towards the end of the repast, Sindbad, perceiving that his guests had done eating, began to speak, and, addressing Hindbad by the title of brother, according to the custom amongst the Arabians when they converse familiarly, he inquired his name and profession. "My name, sir," he replied, "is Hindbad." "I am rejoiced at your presence," replied his entertainer, "and my pleasure is shared by all who are now assembled; but I sent for you hither to learn from your own lips what it was you said just now in the street"; for Sindbad, before he went to dinner, had heard from the window the complaint of the porter, and that was the reason he sent for him. At this request Hindbad hung down his head in confusion, and replied, "Sir, I must confess that my fatigue had put me out of humor, and caused me to utter some indiscreet words, for which I entreat your pardon." "Nay, do not imagine," resumed Sindbad, "that I am so unjust as to harbor resentment, or wish to reproach you on that account. I feel for your situation, and pity you heartily; I would undeceive you, however, on one point respecting myself, since you seem to be in error. You, no doubt, imagine that the riches and comforts I enjoy have been got without labor or trouble; this is the mistake I desire to rectify. To arrive at the state in which you see me, I have endured, for many years, much mental as well as bodily suffering, of such a description as you can have no conception of. Yes, gentlemen," continued he, addressing himself to the whole company, "my sufferings, I assure you, have been sufficiently great and extraordinary to deprive the most avaricious miser of his love of riches. You may have heard a confused account of my adventures in the seven voyages I have made on different seas; now that an opportunity offers, I will, with your leave, relate the dangers I have encountered, which I think will not be uninteresting to you."

As it was chiefly on the porter's account that Sindbad was going to relate his history, before he began it he gave orders that his burden, which had been left in the street, should be brought in; which done, he proceeded in these words:—

THE FIRST VOYAGE OF SINDBAD THE SAILOR.

I DISSIPATED the greatest part of my paternal inheritance in youthful debaucheries; but, seeing my folly, I at length became convinced that riches applied to such purposes as I had employed them in were of little avail; and I reflected, moreover, that time properly husbanded was of greater value than gold, nothing being more deplorable than an old age of poverty. I remembered the words of the wise Solomon, often repeated to me by my father, that it is better to be in the grave than poor. Feeling the truth of all these reflections, I resolved to collect the fragments of my patrimony, and publicly to dispose of all my goods. I consulted those who appeared best able to give me advice; and, in short, I determined to employ as profitably as possible the small sum I had remaining. No sooner was this resolution formed than I put it into execution. I repaired to Balsora, where I embarked with several merchants in a vessel equipped at our joint expense.

We set sail, and steered by the Persian Gulf, which washes the coast of Arabia Felix on the right and that of Persia on the left towards the East Indies, and is commonly supposed in the widest part to be seventy leagues in breadth; beyond this gulf the Western Sea, or Indian Ocean, is very spacious, being bounded by the coast of Abyssinia, extending in length four thousand five hundred leagues to the island of Vakvak. I was rather incommoded at first with what is termed sea-sickness, but I soon recovered my health, and from that period the same malady has never recurred. In the course of our voyage we touched at several islands, selling and exchanging our merchandise. One day, when in full sail, we were unexpectedly becalmed before a small island appearing just above the water, and which, from its verdure, resembled a beautiful meadow. The captain ordered the crew to lower the sails, and gave permission to all who wished it to go ashore, an opportunity which I embraced among the first. But during the time we were eating and drinking and regaling ourselves, by way of relaxation from the fatigues we had endured at sea, the island suddenly trembled, and we felt a severe shock.

Those who were in the ship, perceiving the earthquake in the island, called to us to re-embark as speedily as possible, for that what we supposed to be an island was the back of an enormous whale, and that unless we acted upon their injunctions we should all assuredly perish. The most active of the party at once jumped into the boat, while others threw themselves into the water to swim to the ship; as for me, I had not been able to quit the island, or, more properly speaking, the whale, ere it plunged into the sea. I seized hold of a piece of wood which had been brought to make a fire with, and was the only thing within my reach which offered the remotest chance of escape.

Meantime the captain, willing to avail himself of a fair breeze which had just sprung up, hoisted sail with those who had reached his vessel, and put to sea, leaving me to the mercy of the waves. In this situation I remained the whole of that day and the following night; and when daylight appeared the next morning, I had neither strength nor hope left. At length, when I was beginning to sink, a breaker happily cast me upon an unknown island. The shore was high and steep, and on recovering from the stupor into which I had been thrown by pain and exhaustion, I should have found great difficulty in landing, had not a branch of a tree, which fortune seemed to have furnished for my preservation, assisted me. I threw myself on the ground, where I continued more than half dead till the sun arose.

Although extremely enfeebled, I tried to creep along in search of some herbs or fruit to satisfy my hunger; and having found some, I had next the good luck to light upon a stream of excellent water, which contributed not a little to refresh me. I soon recovered sufficient strength to enable me to explore the island; and proceeding a short distance beyond the rocky boundary of the coast, I entered a beautful plain, where I perceived at some distance a horse grazing. I bent my steps that way, trembling between fear and joy, for I could not yet ascertain whether I was advancing to safety or about to incur further danger. As I approached the steed, I remarked that it was a mare of exceeding beauty, and tied to a stake. Whilst I was admiring her, however, I heard the voice of a man under-ground, who shortly after appeared, and, coming to me, asked civilly who I was. I recounted to him my adventure, when he took me by the hand and led me into a cave in which were some other persons, who appeared to be not less astonished to see me than I was to find them there.

I ate of the food which they offered me; and having asked what they did in a place which appeared so barren, they replied that they were grooms to Mihrage, the sovereign of the isle, and that they came at the same period every year with some mares belonging to the king, for the purpose of procuring a breed between them and a sea-horse which came on shore at that spot. As soon as the mares were with foal they carried them back, and the sea-colts thus obtained were set apart for the king's use. "To-morrow," said they, "is the day fixed for our departure, and had you been one day later you must certainly have perished, since the city where we dwell is so far off that it would have been impossible for you to reach it without a guide."

Whilst they were talking to me the horse rose out of the sea, as they had described, and immediately proceeded towards the mares. He would afterwards have torn them to pieces, but the grooms began to make such a noise that he let go his prey and again plunged into the ocean.

The following day they returned with the mares to the capital of the island, whither I also accompanied them. On our arrival, King Mihrage, to whom I was presented, asked me who I was, and by what chance I had reached his dominions; and when I had satisfied his curiosity, he expressed pity at my misfortune. At the same time he gave orders that I should be taken care of, and be furnished with everything I might want; which directions were executed in a manner which proved the king's generosity as well as the obedience of his officers.

Being a merchant, I associated chiefly with persons of my own profession. I sought in particular such as were foreigners, hoping to hear some intelligence from Bagdad, and, if possible, to meet with a person in whose company I might return; for the capital of King Mihrage is situated on the sea-coast, and has a beautiful port, where vessels from all parts of the world daily arrive. I also sought the society of the Indian sages, in whose conversation I found great pleasure; but that did not prevent me from attending at court very regularly, nor from conversing with governors, and even with kings, who were about the person of Mihrage, being less powerful than he, and his tributaries, each of whom asked me a thousand questions about my country, which I, being scarcely less inquisitive about the laws and customs and whatever appeared to merit my curiosity in their different states, was not slow to answer.

In the dominions of King Mihrage is an island called Cassel. I had been told that in that island was heard every night the sound of tymbals, which had given rise to the sailors' opinion that Degial had chosen that spot for his residence. I felt a great desire to witness some of the wonders of which I had heard such extraordinary rumors; and during my voyage which I undertook for that purpose, I saw some fish a hundred and even two hundred cubits in length, which cause much fear to the mariners, but do no harm; they are so timid, indeed, as to be frightened away by beating on a board. I remarked also some other fish that were not above a cubit long, and whose heads resembled those of owls.

After my return, as I was standing one day near the port, I saw a ship come towards the land; and, having cast anchor, the sailors began to unload its cargo, and the merchants to whom all the various goods belonged took them away to their warehouses. Happening to cast my eyes on some of the packages, I saw my name written, and, on attentively examining them, I concluded them to be the same with which I had embarked in the ship that brought me from Balsora. I also remembered the captain, but as I was persuaded he thought me dead, I went up to him, and asked him to whom those parcels belonged. "I had on board with me," replied he, "a merchant of Bagdad, named Sindbad; one day, when we were near an island, — or at least what appeared to be such, though it was no other than an enormous whale which had fallen asleep on the surface of the water, — he, with other passengers, went ashore; and kindling a fire on the back of the fish, to cook the provisions they had carried with them, the supposed island began to move, and at last sank into the sea. The greater number of the persons who were on it were drowned, and along with them the unfortunate Sindbad. These parcels belonged to him, and I have resolved to sell them, that, should I meet with any of his family, I may be able to return them the profit I shall have made of the principal." "Captain," said I, when he had concluded, "I am that Sindbad whom you suppose dead; these parcels are therefore my merchandise."

When the captain of the vessel heard me speak thus, he exclaimed: "Great God! who shall I trust? There is no longer truth in man. I with my own eyes saw Sindbad perish; the passengers I had on board were also witnesses of it; and you have the assurance to say that you are the same Sindbad? At first sight I took you to be a man of probity and honor, and yet you assert an impious falsehood in order to possess yourself of property which cannot belong to you." "Have patience," replied I, "and listen to what I have to say." "Well," said he, "what have you to say? Speak, and I will attend." I then related in what manner I had been saved, and by what accident I had met with King Mihrage's grooms, who had brought me to his court.

He was at first rather staggered at what I told him, but soon became convinced that I was not an impostor; for some people who just then arrived from his ship knew me, and congratulated me on my fortunate escape. At last, recollecting me himself, he embraced me, and said, "Heaven be praised that you have survived so great a danger! Here are your goods; take them and do with them what you please." I thanked him, and praising his honorable conduct, begged him, by way of recompense, to accept part of my recovered merchandise; which, however, he persisted in refusing.

I selected the most precious and valuable things in my bales as presents for King Mihrage, who, having been informed of my misfortunes, asked me where I had gotten such rare curiosities. I related to him the manner in which my property had been restored, and he expressed his joy on the occasion; and, accepting my presents, gave me others of far greater value. After that I took my leave of him, and re-embarked in the same vessel, having first exchanged what merchandise remained for that of the country, consisting of aloes and sandal-wood, camphor, nutmegs, cloves, pepper, and ginger, in order to trade with in other ports. We touched at several islands, and at last landed at Balsora, whence I came hither, having realized about a hundred thousand sequins. My return to my family was hailed by them with the joy which a true and sincere friendship inspires. I purchased slaves of both sexes, and bought a magnificent house and grounds. Having thus established myself, I determined to forget the hardships I had endured, and to enjoy the pleasures of life.

Sindbad here ceased, and ordered the musicians to go on with their concert, which he had interrupted by the recital of his history. The company continued to eat and drink till night approached; and, when it was time to retire, Sindbad ordered a purse containing a hundred sequins to be brought him, and giving it to the porter, he said, "Take this, Hindbad; return to your home, and come again to-morrow to hear the continuation of my adventures." The porter retired, quite confounded at the honor conferred on him and the present he had received. The account he gave of this occurrence to his wife and children rejoiced them very much, and they did not fail to return thanks to Providence for the bounties bestowed on them through Sindbad's means.

On the following day, Hindbad dressed himself in his best clothes and returned to the house of his patron, who again received him with smiling looks and a friendly air. As soon as all the guests were arrived, the table was served, and they sat down to eat. When the repast was finished, Sindbad thus addressed his guests: "Gentlemen, I request you to listen to me while I relate the adventures of my second voyage. They are more worthy of your attention than were those of the first." The company were silent, and Sindbad began as follows: —

THE SECOND VOYAGE OF SINDBAD THE SAILOR.

After my first voyage I had resolved, as I told you yesterday, to pass the rest of my days in tranquillity at Bagdad. But soon growing weary of an idle life, the desire of seeing foreign countries and engaging in commerce by sea returned. I therefore bought such merchandise as I thought most likely to succeed in the traffic I meditated, and set off a second time with some merchants whose probity I could rely on. We embarked in a good vessel, and recommending ourselves to the care of the Almighty, set out on our voyage.

We went from island to island, making some very advantageous exchanges; till one day, landing on one which was covered with a variety of fruit trees, we found it so deserted that we were unable to discover any habitation or trace of a human being. We walked in the meadows and along the brooks that watered them, and whilst some of my companions were amusing themselves with gathering fruit and flowers, I took out some of the wine and provisions I had brought with me, and seated myself by a little stream under some trees which afforded a delightful shade. I made a good meal of the provisions I had with me, and having satisfied my hunger, sleep gradually stole over my senses. I cannot say how long I slept, but when I awoke, I saw that the ship had quitted her anchorage. I was much surprised at this circumstance, and got up to seek for my companions, but they were all gone; and I could only perceive the vessel in full sail, at a great distance; and it soon vanished entirely from my sight.

You may imagine the reflections that occurred to me in this dismal state. I thought I should have died with grief; I groaned and cried aloud, beating my head, and throwing myself on the ground, where I remained a long time, overwhelmed with conflicting thoughts, each more distressing than the other, and utterly confounded. A thousand times I reproached myself for my folly in not being contented with my first voyage, which ought to have satisfied my desire of seeking adventures; but all my regrets were unavailing, and my repentance came too late. At length I resigned myself to the will of Heaven; and not knowing what would become of me, I ascended a high tree, and looked on all sides to see if I could not discover some object that might inspire me with hope. Casting my eyes toward the sea, I could discern nothing but water and sky; but perceiving something white on the land side, I descended from the tree, and taking with me the remainder of my provisions, I walked towards the object, which, however, was so distant that I could not distinguish what it was. As I approached, I perceived it to be a large white ball of prodigious size, and when I got near enough to touch it, I found it was soft. I walked round it to see if there was an opening, but could find none, and it appeared so even that it was impossible to climb it. The circumference might be about fifty paces.

It was then near sunset; and the air grew suddenly dark, as if obscured by a thick cloud. I was surprised at this change, but much more so when I perceived it to be occasioned by a bird of extraordinary size, which was flying towards me. In my youth I had heard sailors speak of a bird called a roc; and I conceived that the great white ball which had drawn my attention must be the egg of this bird; nor was I mistaken; for shortly after it lighted on the spot, and assumed the attitude of a sitting bird. When I saw it coming I drew near to the egg, so that I had one of the claws of the bird close by me; this claw was as big as the trunk of a large tree. In my despair I tied myself to the talon with the linen of my turban, in hopes that the roc, when it took its flight next morning, would carry me with it out of the desert island. My project succeeded, for at daybreak the roc flew away, and carried me to such a height that I could not distinguish the earth, and after some time descended with such rapidity that I almost lost my senses. When the roc had alighted, I quickly untied the knot that confined me to its foot, and had scarcely loosed myself, when it darted on a serpent of immeasurable length, and seizing it in its beak, flew away.

The place in which the roc left me was a deep valley, surrounded on all sides by mountains, of such a height that the tops of them were lost in the clouds, and so steep that there was no possibility of climbing them. This embarrassed me afresh: when I compared it with the island I had left, I soon found that I had no reason to be satisfied with my change of situation.

In walking along this valley I remarked that it was strewn with diamonds, some of which were of an astonishing size. For some time I amused myself with examining them, but I soon perceived from afar some objects which converted my sensations of pleasure into fear; these were a great number of serpents, so long and large that the smallest of them would have swallowed an elephant with ease. They hid themselves in caves during the day on account of the roc, their mortal enemy, and only came out during the night. I passed the day, therefore, in walking about the valley, resting myself occasionally where an opportunity offered, and when the sun set, I retired into a small cave, where I thought I should be in safety. I closed the entrance, which was low and narrow, with a stone large enough to secure me from the serpents, but which yet admitted a glimmering of light. I supped on part of my provisions, during which I heard the fearful hissings of the serpents, which now began to make their appearance. These sounds continued during the night, and, as you may suppose, struck me with great apprehension. On the reappearance of day, the serpents retired; but with such awe had they inspired me that I left my cave with trembling, and though I walked upon a path of diamonds, I may truly say it was without feeling the least desire for them. At last I sat down; and, after having made another hearty meal on my provisions, notwithstanding the agitation I was in, as I had not closed my eyes during the whole night, I fell asleep. I had scarcely begun to doze, when something falling, with a dull heavy sound, awoke me. It was a large piece of fresh meat, and on looking up, I saw a number of similar pieces rolling down the rocks from above.

I had always supposed the accounts which I had heard related by seamen and others of the valley of diamonds, and of the means by which merchants procured them, to be fictitious; but I now knew it to be true. The method adopted is this: the merchants go to the mountains which surround the valley about the time that the eagles hatch their young. They cut large pieces of meat, which they throw into the valley; and to these the diamonds, on which they fall, adhere. The eagles, which are larger and stronger in that country than in any other, seize these pieces of meat to carry them to their young at the top of the rocks. The merchants then run to their nests, and by various noises oblige the eagles to retreat; they then take the diamonds that have stuck to the pieces of meat, which, as the valley is inaccessible on every side, they could not otherwise procure. I had supposed it impossible ever to leave this valley, and began to look upon it as my tomb; but this sight changed my opinion, and turned my thoughts to some device for the preservation of my life. Having conceived a project of rescue, I began to collect the largest diamonds I could find, and with them filled the leathern bag in which I carried my provisions; next I took one of the largest pieces of meat, and tied it tight round me with the linen of my turban; and in this state I laid myself on the ground, having first fastened my leathern bag around my body.

I had not lain long before the eagles began to descend, and each seizing a piece of meat flew away with it. One of the strongest, having darted on the piece to which I had attached myself, carried me up with it to its nest; and when the merchants by their cries had frightened away the eagles, and obliged them to quit their prey, one of them approached me. On seeing me, however, he was seized with apprehension, but soon recovering from his fear, instead of inquiring by what means I came there, began to quarrel with me for trespassing on what he considered his property. "You will speak to me with pity instead of anger," said I, "when you learn by what means I reached this place. Console yourself, for I have diamonds enough for you and myself, of more value than those of all the other merchants added together; I have myself chosen a number of the finest from the bottom of the valley, and have them here in this bag." On saying this I showed him the bag, and had scarcely finished speaking, when the other merchants, perceiving me, flocked round me with great astonishment, which I augmented not a little by the recital of my history. They were all no less surprised at the stratagem I had conceived to save myself than at my courage in putting it in execution.

Having conducted me to the place where they lived together, I showed them my diamonds, upon seeing which they all expressed their admiration, and declared they had never seen any equal to them either in size or quality. I entreated the merchant to whom the nest belonged into which I had been transported, for each merchant has his own, to chose for himself as many as he pleased. He contented himself with taking only one, and that, too, of the smallest size. I pressed him to take more, and not be afraid of depriving me. "No," replied he, "I am perfectly satisfied with this, which is sufficiently valuable to spare me the trouble of making any more voyages to complete my little fortune."

I passed the night with these merchants, to whom I recounted my history a second time, for the satisfaction of those who had not heard it before; and when I reflected on the perils I had gone through, I could scarcely moderate my joy; it appeared to me as if the security in which I then found myself was merely a dream, and I could not for a time believe that I had nothing more to fear.

The merchants had been for some days in that spot, and as they now appeared to be contented with the diamonds they had collected, we set off on the following day together, travelling over high mountains, where there were a great number of prodigious serpents, which, however, we had the good fortune entirely to avoid. We reached the nearest port in safety, and thence embarked for the island of Roha, which produces the camphor-tree, the foliage of which is so large and thick that a hundred men may be shaded by it with ease. The gum which forms the camphor runs out at a wound made at the top of the trunk, and is received into a vase, where it acquires consistency, and assumes the form in which it is disposed of as a drug. The juice being thus extracted, the tree withers and dies.

The rhinoceros, too, which is a smaller animal than the elephant, though larger than the buffalo, is a native of this island. On its nose it has a horn about a cubit in length, and cut through the middle from one extremity to the other, on which are some white lines, which represent the figure of a man. The rhinoceros fights with the elephant, and piercing him in his belly with his horn, carries him off on his head; but as the fat and blood of the elephant run down on his eyes and blind him, he falls to the ground; and what will astonish you, the roc comes and seizes them both in its claws, and carries them off together to feed its young.

I will pass over several other peculiarities related of this island, lest I should tire you. Exchanging, therefore, some of my diamonds for other merchandise, I went thence to more distant islands, and at last, after having touched at several ports, reached Balsora, whence I again returned to Bagdad. Afterwards I distributed much money amongst the poor, and enjoyed with credit and honor the rest of my immense riches, which I had acquired with so much labor and difficulty.

Sindbad, having completed the relation of his second voyage, again ordered a hundred sequins to be given to Hindbad, whom he once more invited to come on the morrow to hear the history of the third.

The guests returned home, and on the following day repaired at the same hour to the house of Sindbad, where the porter, who had almost forgotten his misery, also made his appearance. They sat down to table, and when the meal was ended Sindbad requested the company to give him their attention while he should detail the adventures of his third voyage.

THE THIRD VOYAGE OF SINDBAD THE SAILOR.

THE comfortable life into which I had settled soon obliterated the remembrance of the dangers I had experienced in my two voyages; and as I was in the prime of life, I grew tired of passing my days in slothful repose; and, banishing all thoughts of the perils I might encounter, I once more quitted Bagdad, with some rich merchandise of the country, which I conveyed to Balsora. There I embarked with other merchants, bound for a long voyage, during which we touched at several ports, and transacted very advantageous commercial business.

One day, when we were in the open sea, we were overtaken by a violent tempest, which continued for several days, and drove us near an island, which the captain would gladly have been excused from touching at, but we were under the necessity of casting anchor there. When the sails were furled, the captain told us that this, as well as some of the neighboring isles, was inhabited by savages, who would attack us, and that although they were but dwarfs, we must not attempt to make any resistance; for, as their number was inconceivable, if we should happen to kill one, they would infest us like locusts, and destroy us. This account put the whole crew in terrible consternation, and we were too soon convinced that the captain had spoken the truth. We saw coming towards us an innumerable multitude of hideous savages about two feet high, and entirely covered with red hair. Throwing themselves into the sea, they swam to the ship, which they soon completely encompassed, and as they approached they spoke to us, but we could not understand their language. On reaching the vessel, they clambered up the sides with so much swiftness and agility that their feet scarcely seemed to touch them ere they were upon deck.

You may imagine the situation we were in, not daring to defend ourselves, nor even to speak to them, to endeavor to avert the impending danger. They unfurled the sails, cut the cable from the anchor, and after dragging the ship to shore, obliged us to disembark: after this they conveyed us to another island whence they had come. All voyagers carefully avoided this island, for the dismal reason you are going to hear; but our ill-fortune having led us there, we were obliged to submit.

Leaving the shore and advancing farther into the island, we found some fruits and herbs, of which we ate, to prolong our lives as much as possible, for we all expected to be sacrificed. As we walked we perceived at some distance a large edifice, towards which we bent our way. It was a large and high palace, with a folding door of ebony, which we opened. We entered the court-yard, and facing us saw a vast apartment with a vestibule, on one side of which was a heap of human bones, and on the opposite one a number of spits for roasting. We trembled at this spectacle; and as we were fatigued with walking, our legs failed us, and we fell on the earth, where we remained a considerable time unable to move from fear.

The sun was setting, and while we were in the piteous state I have described, the door of the apartment suddenly opened with a loud noise, and a hideous black man, as tall as a palm-tree, came forward. In the middle of his forehead, one eye, red and fiery as a burning coal, stood alone; his front teeth were long and sharp, and projected from his mouth, which was as wide as that of a horse, with the under lip hanging on his breast; his ears resembled those of an elephant, and covered his shoulders; and his long and curved nails were like the talons of an immense bird. At the sight of this frightful being we all fainted, and remained a long time like dead men.

At last our senses returned, and we saw him seated under the vestibule examining us with his piercing eye. When he had viewed us well, he advanced towards us, and extending his hand to me, he took me up by the hair, and turned me round all ways to examine me, as a butcher would the head of a sheep. After having well considered the matter, he released me, finding me so meagre and little more than skin and bones. He took up each of the others in their turn, and inspected them in the same manner, and the captain, being the fattest of the party, was held up in one hand, as I should hold a sparrow, while the monster with the other ran a spit through his body. Then kindling a large fire, he roasted and ate him for his supper, in the apartment whither he retired. Having finished his repast, he returned to the vestibule, where he laid down to sleep, and snored louder than thunder. As may be readily conceived, we passed the night in the most agonizing suspense; and when daylight returned the ogre awoke and went abroad, leaving us in the palace.

When we supposed him at some distance, we gave vent to our lamentations, for the fear of disturbing the ogre had kept us silent during the night. The palace resounded with groans. Although we amounted to a considerable number, and had but one common enemy, yet the idea of delivering ourselves by his death never occurred. This enterprise, however difficult to accomplish, was nevertheless the first we ought to have attempted.

We deliberated on various methods, but could not determine on any; and submitting ourselves to the will of God, we passed the day in walking over the island, and eating what plants and fruit we could meet with, as on the preceding one. Towards evening we sought for some sheltered place in which to pass the night, but finding none, were obliged to return to the palace.

The ogre did not fail to return to sup on one of our companions, after which he again fell asleep and snored till daybreak, when he arose and went out as before. Our situation appeared to be so helpless that some of my comrades were on the point of throwing themselves into the sea rather than be sacrificed in so dreadful a manner, and advised the rest to follow their example; but one of the company thus addressed them: "We are forbidden," said he, "to kill ourselves; and even were that permitted, would it not be more rational to endeavor to destroy the barbarous monster who has destined us to such a cruel death?"

As I had already formed a project of that nature, I now communicated it to my fellow-sufferers, who approved of it. "My friends," said I, "you know that there is a great deal of wood on the sea-shore; if you will take my advice, we can make some rafts, and when they are finished we will leave them in a proper place till we can find an opportunity to make use of them. In the mean time we can put into execution the design I proposed to you to deliver ourselves from the ogre; if it succeeds, we may wait here with patience till some vessel passes, by means of which we may quit this fatal isle; if, on the contrary, we miss our aim, we shall have recourse to our rafts, and put to sea. I own that, in exposing ourselves to the fury of the waves on such fragile barks, we run a great hazard of losing our lives; but if we are destined to perish, is it not preferable to meet with a watery grave than to be buried in the entrails of the monster who has already devoured two of our companions?" My advice was approved by all, and we immediately built some rafts, large enough to contain three persons on each.

We returned to the palace towards evening, and the ogre arrived a short time after us. Again one of our party was sacrificed to his inhuman appetite. But we were soon revenged of his cruelty: after he had finished his horrible meal, he as usual laid himself down to sleep; and as soon as we heard him snore, nine of the most courageous of us, and myself, took each a spit, and heating the points red-hot, thrust them into his eye, and blinded him.

The pain which he suffered made him groan hideously; he suddenly raised himself, and extended his arms on all sides to seize some one, and sacrifice him to his rage; but, fortunately, we had time to get to some distance from him, and to throw ourselves on the ground in places where he could not set his feet on us. After having sought us in vain, he at last found the door, and went out bellowing with pain.

We quitted the palace immediately after the ogre, and repaired to the shore, in that part where our rafts lay. We set them afloat, and waited till daybreak to board them, in case we should see the ogre approach with some guide to lead him to us; but we hoped that, if he did not make his appearance by that time, and if his cries and groans, which resounded through the air, were discontinued, we might suppose him dead; and in that case we proposed remaining in the island till some safer conveyance should offer. The sun, however, had scarcely risen above the horizon, when we perceived our cruel enemy, accompanied by two ogres of nearly his own size, who conducted him, and a great number of others, walking with quick steps before him.

At this sight we ran precipitately to our rafts, and rowed away as fast as possible. The ogres, seeing this, provided themselves with large stones, hastened to the shore, and even ventured up to their middles in the sea, to throw them at us, which they did so adroitly as to sink all the rafts excepting that which I was upon, so that myself and two companions were the only persons who escaped, our unfortunate brethren being all drowned.

As we rowed with all our strength, we soon got out of reach of the stones. When we were in the open sea we became the sport of wind and wave, and, passing that day and night in the most cruel suspense, on the morrow we had the good fortune to be thrown on an island, where we landed with great joy. We found some excellent fruits, which served to re-establish our exhausted strength.

At night we slept on the sea-shore; but were awakened by the noise which the scales of an immense serpent, long as a palm-tree, made on the ground. It was so near to us, that it devoured one of my companions, notwithstanding the efforts he made to extricate himself; for the serpent shook him several times, and then, crushing him on the earth, quickly swallowed him.

My other comrade and myself immediately took to flight; and when we had gone some distance, we heard a noise which made us suppose that the serpent was vomiting the bones of the unhappy man it had destroyed. On the following day we perceived our suspicions to have been well founded. "O God," I then exclaimed, "to what are we exposed? Yesterday we were rejoicing at our escape from the cruelty of an ogre and the fury of the waves, and to-day we have again to encounter a peril not less imminent."

As we walked along, we remarked a large and high tree, on which, for safety, we proposed to pass the following night. We ate some fruit, as on the preceding day, and at the approach of night we climbed into the tree. We soon heard the serpent, which came hissing to the foot of the tree; it raised itself against the trunk, and meeting with my companion, who was lower than I was, it swallowed him and retired.

I remained on the tree till daybreak, when I descended, more dead than alive; indeed, I could only expect to meet with the same fate. This idea chilled me with horror, and I advanced some paces to throw myself into the sea; but as life is desirable as long as it will last, I resisted the first impulse of my despair, and submitted to the will of God, who disposes of our lives as is best for us.

I collected a great quantity of small wood and furze, and, tying it in fagots, put it round the tree in a large circle, and tied some across the top, to cover my head. This being done, when the evening came on I enclosed myself within the circle; having the dismal consolation that I had done all in my power to preserve my life. The serpent did not fail to return for the purpose of devouring me, but he could not succeed on account of the rampart I had formed. The whole night he was besieging me as a cat would a mouse; at last day returned, and he retired; but I did not venture out of my fortress till the sun was high in the heavens.

I was so fatigued with watching, as well as with the exertion of forming my retreat, and had suffered so much from his pestilential breath, that death appeared preferable to a repetition of such horrors. I again ran to the sea, with the intention of putting an end to my existence; but God pitied my condition, and at the moment that I was going to throw myself in, I perceived a vessel at a distance. I cried with all my strength, and unfolded my turban to attract the attention of those on board. This had the desired effect, I was seen by the crew, and the captain sent a boat for me.

As soon as I was on board, the merchants and seamen were eager to learn by what chance I had reached that desert island; and after I had related to them all that happened, the eldest of them told me that they had often heard of the ogres who lived there; that they were anthropophagi, and devoured their own kind. With regard to the serpents, they added that there were many in the island, hiding themselves in the day and appearing at night.

After they had expressed their joy at my fortunate escape from so many perils, they pressed me to take something to eat; and the captain, observing that my dress was much torn, had the generosity to give me one of his.

We remained a considerable time at sea, and touched at several islands. At length we landed on that of Salahat, where the sandal-wood is cultivated, which is much used in medicine, and where the merchants unloaded their goods. One day the captain called me to him, and said: "Brother, I have in my possession some goods which belonged to a merchant who was for some time on board my ship. As this merchant is dead, I am going to have them valued, that I may render an account of them to his heirs, should I ever meet with them." The bales he was speaking of were already on deck. He showed them to me, saying, "These are the goods in question; I wish you to take charge of them, and negotiate them, receiving the usual commission for your trouble." I consented, and thanked him for the opportunity of employing myself.

The writer of the ship registered all the bales, with the names of the merchants to whom they belonged; and when he asked the captain by what name he should register those destined for my charge, the captain replied, "By the name of Sindbad the Sailor." I could not hear my own name without emotion; and looking intently at the captain, I recognized him to be the very same person who, in my second voyage, had left me on the island, where I had fallen asleep by the side of a brook, and who had put to sea without waiting for me. I did not at first recollect him, so much was he changed from the time I had seen him. As he thought me dead, it is not to be wondered at that he did not recognize me. "Captain," said I to him, "was the merchant to whom these things belonged called Sindbad?" "Yes," returned he, "that was his name; he was from Bagdad, and embarked on board my vessel at Balsora. One day, when we went ashore on an island for fresh water, I know not by what mistake, he was left behind; none of the crew perceived it till four hours after, when the wind blew so fresh against us that it was impossible to return." "You believe him to be dead?" resumed I. "Most assuredly," replied the captain. "Well, then," said I, "open your eyes, and know that the same Sindbad whom you left in the desert island is now before you. I fell asleep on the banks of a little stream, and when I awoke I perceived that the ship was gone."

At these words the captain fixed his eyes on me, and after having examined me very attentively, at last recollected me. "God be praised!" cried he, embracing me; "I am delighted that fortune has given me an opportunity of repairing my fault. Here are your goods, which I have preserved with care, and always had valued at every port I stopped at. I return them to you, with the profit I have made on them." I received them with the gratitude which such an action demanded.

From the island of Salahat we went to another, where I furnished myself with cloves, cinnamon, and other spices. When we had sailed some distance from it, we perceived an immense tortoise that was twenty cubits in length and breadth. We also saw a fish that had milk like a cow; its skin is so hard, that bucklers are frequently made of it. I saw one of the make and color of a camel. At length, after a long voyage, we arrived at Balsora, from whence I came to Bagdad with so much wealth that I did not know the amount of it. I gave a great deal to the poor, and made considerable additions to my landed estates.

Sindbad thus finished the history of his third voyage; and again gave Hindbad a hundred sequins, inviting him to the usual repast on the morrow, when he should hear the account of the fourth voyage. Hindbad and the other guests retired, and the following day returned at the same hour. After the dinner was over, Sindbad continued the relation of his adventures.

THE FOURTH VOYAGE OF SINDBAD THE SAILOR.

The pleasures and dissipations I entered into after my third voyage had not sufficient charms to deter me from venturing on the sea again. I gave way to my love for traffic and novelty; and having settled my affairs, and furnished myself with the merchandise suited to the places I intended to visit, I set out, and travelled towards Persia, some of the provinces of which I traversed, and at last reached a port, where I embarked. We set sail and touched at several Oriental islands, but one day, while tacking, we were surprised by a sudden squall of wind, which obliged the captain to lower the sails. All our precautions, however, were fruitless; the manœuvre did not succeed; the vessel becoming ungovernable, was driven on a sand-bank and went to pieces, and a great number of the crew, as well as the cargo, perished.

I had the good fortune, with some other merchants and seamen, to get hold of a plank; on which we were all carried by the strength of the current towards an island that lay before us. We found some fruits and fresh water, which re-established our strength, and we laid down to sleep without seeking any farther; the grief we felt at our misfortunes rendering us careless of our fate. When the sun was risen, we left the shore, and advancing into the island, perceived some habitations, towards which we bent our way. When we drew near, a great number of blacks came out, and seizing us, allotted us between them, and then conducted us to their houses.

Five of my comrades and myself were taken to the same place. They made us sit down, and then offered us a certain herb, inviting us by signs to eat of it. My companions, without considering that they who gave it us did not eat of it, only consulted their appetites, and devoured it with avidity. I, who had a sort of presentiment that it was for no good purpose, refused even to taste it; and it was well I did, for a short time after I perceived that my companions were intoxicated, and did not know what they said. They then served us with some rice dressed with the oil of the cocoa-nut, and my comrades not being sensible of what they did, ate it ravenously. I ate some also, but very little.

The blacks had presented the herb first to affect our heads, and thus banish the sorrow which our miserable situation would create, and the rice was given to fatten us. As they were anthropophagi, they designed to feast on us when we were in good condition. My poor companions fell victims to their barbarous custom, because they had lost their senses, and could not foresee their destiny. But for me, instead of fattening as the others had done, I grew thinner every day. The fear of death, which constantly haunted me, turned the aliments I took to poison, and I fell into a state of languor, which was in the end very beneficial; for the blacks, having eaten my comrades, were content to let me remain till I was better worth picking.

In the mean time I was allowed a great deal of liberty, and my actions were scarcely observed. This one day afforded me an opportunity of quitting the habitation of the blacks, and escaping. An old man, who saw and guessed my intention, called me to return, but I only quickened my pace, and soon got out of his sight. This old man was the only person in the place; all the other blacks had absented themselves, and were not to return till evening, as was their frequent custom. Being therefore certain that they would be too late to come in search of me when they returned home, I continued my flight till evening, when I stopped to take a little rest and satisfy my hunger. I soon proceeded, and walked without intermission for seven days; taking care to avoid those places which appeared inhabited, and living on cocoa-nuts, which furnished me with drink as well as food.

On the eighth day I came to the sea-shore, where I saw some white people like myself employed in gathering pepper, of which in that country there was great abundance. Such an occupation was a good omen to me, and I approached them without fear of danger. They came towards me as soon as they perceived me, and asked me in Arabic whence I came.

Delighted to hear my native language once more, I readily complied with their request, and related to them the manner in which I had been shipwrecked and got to that island, where I had fallen into the hands of the blacks. "But these blacks," said they, "eat men; by what miracle, then, could you escape their cruelty?" I gave them the same account which you have heard, at which they were very much surprised. I remained with them until they had collected as much pepper as they chose, when they made me embark with them, and we soon reached the island from which they had come. They presented me to their king, who was a good prince. He listened to the recital of my adventures, which astonished him; and he ordered me new clothing, and desired that I might be taken care of. The island was very populous, and abounded in all sorts of articles of commerce, a flourishing trade being carried on in the town where the king resided. This agreeable retreat began to console me for my misfortunes, and the kindness of the generous prince made me completely happy. Indeed, I appeared to be his greatest favorite; and consequently all ranks of people endeavored to please me, so that I was considered in the light of a native rather than a stranger.

I remarked one thing which appeared to me very singular. Every person, the king not excepted, rode on horseback without either bridle or stirrups. One day I took the liberty to ask his majesty why such things were excluded, and from his replies it was quite evident that he was entirely ignorant of what I meant.

I immediately went to a workman and gave him a model to make a saddle-tree from; which, on being finished, I covered with leather, richly embroidered in gold, and stuffed with hair. I then applied to a locksmith, who made me a bit and some stirrups according to the patterns which I gave him.

When these things were completed I presented them to the king, and tried them on one of his horses; the prince then mounted it, and was so pleased with the invention that he testified his approbation by making me considerable presents. I was then obliged to make several saddles for his ministers and the principal officers of his household, who all rewarded me with very rich and handsome presents. I also made some for the most respectable inhabitants of the town, by which I obtained great reputation and credit.

As I constantly attended at court, the king said to me one day, "Sindbad, I love you, and I know that all my subjects who have any knowledge of you follow my example, and entertain a high regard and esteem for you. I have one request to make, which you must not deny me." "Sire," replied I, "there is nothing that your majesty can command which I will not undertake, to prove my obedience to your orders. Your power over me is absolute." "I wish you to marry," resumed the prince, "that you may have a more tender tie to attach you to my dominions, and prevent your returning to your native country." As I did not dare to refuse the king's offer, I was shortly afterwards married to a lady of his court, who was noble, beautiful, rich, and accomplished. After the ceremony of the nuptials, I took up my abode in the house of my wife, and lived with her for some time in perfect harmony. Nevertheless, I was discontented with my situation, and designed to make my escape the first convenient opportunity, in order to return to Bagdad, which the splendid establishment I was then in possession of could not obliterate from my mind.

These were my sentiments when the wife of one of my neighbors, with whom I was very intimate, fell sick and died. I went to console him, and finding him in the deepest affliction, "May God preserve you," said I to him, "and grant you a long life." "Alas!" replied he, "how can I obtain what you wish? I have only one hour to live." "O," resumed I, "do not suffer such dismal ideas to take possession of your mind; I hope that will not be the case, and that I shall enjoy your friendship yet for many years." "I wish with all my heart," said he, "that your life may be of long duration; but for me, the die is cast, and this day I shall be buried with my wife; such is the custom which our ancestors have established in this island, and which is still inviolably observed; the husband is interred alive with his deceased wife, or the living wife with the dead husband; nothing can save me, as all submit to this law."

Whilst he was relating to me this singular species of barbarity, which filled me with the greatest terror, his relations, friends, and neighbors arrived to be present at the funeral. They dressed the corpse of the woman in the richest attire, as on the day of her nuptials, and decorated her with all her jewels. Then they placed her uncovered on a bier, and the procession set out. The husband, dressed in mourning, went immediately after the body of his wife, and the rest followed. They bent their course towards a high mountain, and when they were arrived, a large stone which covered the mouth of a cavern was raised, and the body let down into it without any of the ornaments being taken off. After that the husband took his leave of his relations and friends, and without offering the least resistance, suffered himself to be placed on a bier, with a jug of water and seven small loaves by his side, and let down as his wife had been. This mountain extended a great way, and served as a boundary to the ocean, and the cavern was very deep. When the ceremony was completed, the stone was replaced and the company retired. I need scarcely add, gentlemen, that I was greatly affected at this ceremony. None of the rest, however, who were present, appeared to feel it, probably from being habituated to the repetition of the same kind of scene. So great was the detestation and horror with which I regarded the custom, that I could not forbear to express to the king my sentiments on it. "Sire," said I, "the strange custom which subsists in your dominions, of interring the living with the dead, inspires me with feelings both of astonishment and disgust; I have visited many nations, but in the whole course of my travels I never heard of so cruel and unjust a law." "What can I do, Sindbad?" replied the king; "it is a law common to all ranks, and even I must submit to its decree; I shall be interred alive with the queen, my consort, if I happen to survive her." "Sire," resumed I, "will your majesty allow me to ask if foreigners are obliged to observe this custom?" "Certainly," said the king, smiling, as he guessed the motive of my question; "none are exempt from its operation who marry in the island."

I returned home perplexed in thought and sorrowful at this reply. The fear that my wife might die first, and that I should be interred with her, was a reflection of the most distressing nature. Yet how was the evil to be remedied? The only suggestions that occurred to me were to have patience and submit to the will of God. Nevertheless, I trembled at the slightest indisposition of my wife, and alas! I soon had good reason to fear; she was taken dangerously ill, and died in a few days. Judge how my mind was disturbed at the prospect immediately before me. To be interred alive did not appear to be a more desirable end than that of being devoured by the anthropophagi; yet I was obliged to comply. The king, accompanied by his whole court, promised to honor the procession with his presence; and the principal inhabitants of the city also, out of respect to me, signified their intention to be present at my interment.

When all was in readiness for the ceremony, the corpse of my wife, decorated with her jewels, and in her most magnificent dress, was placed on a bier, and the procession set out. Being the second personage in this tragedy, I followed the body of my wife, my eyes bathed in tears, and deploring my miserable destiny. Before we arrived at the mountain I wished to make trial of the compassion of the spectators; accordingly, I addressed myself first to the king, then to those who were near me, and bowing to the ground to kiss the hem of their garments, I entreated them to have pity on me. "Consider," said I, "that I am a stranger who ought not to be subjected to so rigorous a law, and that I have another wife and children in my own country." I pronounced these words in an affecting tone, but no one seemed moved; on the contrary, they hastened to lower the corpse into the cavern, and soon after I also was let down on another bier with a jug of water and seven loaves. At last, the fatal ceremony being completed, they replaced the stone over the mouth of the cave, notwithstanding the excess of my grief and my piteous lamentation.

As I approached the bottom I discovered by the little light that shone from above the shape of this subterraneous abode. It was a vast chamber, which I judged to be about fifty cubits deep. I soon smelt an insupportable stench arising from the carcasses that were spread around. I even fancied that I heard the last sighs of some who had lately fallen victims to this inhuman law No sooner had I reached the bottom than I left the bier, and, stopping my nostrils, went to a distance from the dead bodies, where I threw myself on the ground and remained for a long time bathed in tears; then, reflecting on my cruel fate, "It is true," said I, "that God disposes of us as seems best to his all-seeing providence; but, unhappy Sindbad, is it not your own fault that you are now brought to this singular death? Would to Heaven I had perished in one of the dreadful wrecks from which I have been saved! I should not now have had to languish in this miserable abode of lingering death. And my accursed avarice has brought it all upon myself! Wretch that I am! I ought to have remained with my family and enjoyed peaceably the fruits of my former labors."

Such were the useless expressions of rage and despair with which I made the cavern re-echo. I beat my head and breast, and gave way to the most violent grief. Nevertheless, I confess to you, that, instead of calling on death to release me from this habitation of despair, the love of life still glowed within me and induced me to seek for the means of prolonging my days. I felt my way to the bier on which I had been placed, and, notwithstanding the intense obscurity which prevailed, I found my bread and water and ate of it. When my eyes had become more accustomed to the gloom, I was enabled to perceive that the cave was more spacious and contained more bodies than I had at first supposed. I subsisted for some days on my provisions, but as soon as they were exhausted I prepared to die. I had just become resigned to my fate when I heard the stone above raised, and a corpse and another living person were let down. The deceased was a man. It is natural to have recourse to violent methods when reduced to the last extremity. While the woman was descending, I approached the spot where her bier was to be placed, and when I perceived the aperture above to be closed, I gave the unhappy female two or three heavy blows on the head with a large bone, which stunned, or, more properly speaking, killed her; but I only committed this inhuman action to obtain the bread and water which had been allowed her. I had now provisions for some days, and before they were entirely expended a dead woman and her living husband were let down. I killed the man in a similar manner, and at that time there happened, fortunately for me, a mortality in the city, with every victim to which I obtained, in the way described, a fresh supply of food.

One day, when I had just put an end to an unfortunate woman, I heard sounds like those of breathing, and a footstep. I advanced to the part whence the sound proceeded, and hearing a louder breathing at my approach, fancied I saw something fleeing from me. I followed this shadow, which occasionally stopped, and then again retreated, panting as I drew near. I pursued it so long, and went so far, that at last I perceived a small speck of light resembling a star. I continued to walk towards this light, sometimes losing it, as obstacles arose to preclude my vision, but always recovering it again, till I had arrived at an opening in the rock large enough to allow me to pass.

At this discovery I stopped for some time to recover from the violent emotion occasioned by my walking quick; then passing through the crevice, found myself on the sea-shore. You may imagine the excess of my joy; it was so great that I could scarcely be satisfied that my imagination did not deceive me. When I became convinced that it was a reality, and that my senses were still sound, I perceived that the thing which I had heard pant, and had followed, was an animal that lived in the sea, and was in the habit of going into the cave to devour the dead bodies.

I examined the mountain, and observed that it stood between the city and the sea, without any communication between them, for it was so steep as to be inaccessible. I prostrated myself on the shore to thank God for the mercy he had shown me, and then returned to the cave to get some bread, which I brought out and ate with much better appetite than I had enjoyed since my interment in that gloomy mansion.

I returned again to collect, as well as I could, by feeling on the different biers, all the diamonds, rubies, pearls, golden bracelets, and in short everything of value that I could find, all of which I brought to the shore. I tied them up in several packets with the cords which had served to let down the biers, and of which there was a great quantity. I left them in a convenient place till a proper opportunity should offer, without fear of their being spoiled by the rain, for it was not the season for wet weather.

At the end of two or three days I perceived a vessel just sailing out of the harbor, and passing by the spot where I was, I made signs with the linen of my turban, and cried aloud with all my strength. They heard me on board, and despatched a boat to fetch me. When the sailors inquired by what misfortune I had got into that place, I replied that I had been wrecked two days since on that shore, with all my merchandise. Fortunately for me these people did not consider whether my story was probable, but, satisfied with my answer, they took me on board with my bales.

When we had reached the vessel the captain, happy at having been instrumental to my safety, and occupied with the management of the ship, believed, without any difficulty, the tale of the wreck, to convince him of which I offered him some precious stones, but he refused them.

We passed several islands, amongst others the island of Bells, distant about ten days' sail from that of Serendib, sailing with a fair wind, and six days' from the island of Kela, where we landed. Here there were some lead mines, some Indian canes, and excellent camphor.

The king of the isle of Kela is very rich and powerful. His authority extends over the island of Bells, which is two days' journey in extent; the inhabitants are still so uncivilized as to eat human flesh. After we had made an advantageous traffic in this island, we again set sail, and touched at several ports. At length I arrived happily at Bagdad with immense riches, of which it is needless to give you a detail. To evince my gratitude to Heaven for the mercies shown me, I spent a great deal in charity, some for the support of mosques, and some for the subsistence of the poor. I then entirely gave myself up to the society of my relations and friends, and passed my time in feasting and entertainments.

Sindbad here concluded the relation of his fourth voyage, which occasioned still more surprise in his audience than the three preceding ones had done. He repeated his present of a hundred sequins to Hindbad, whom he requested, with the rest of the company, to return the following day to dine, and hear the detail of his fifth voyage. Hindbad and the others took their leave and retired. The next day, when all were assembled, they sat down to table, and when the repast was over, Sindbad began the account of his fifth voyage as follows: —

THE FIFTH VOYAGE OF SINDBAD THE SAILOR.

THE pleasures I enjoyed soon made me forget the pains I had endured; yet they were not sufficiently attractive to prevent my forming the resolution of venturing a fifth time on the sea. I again provided myself with merchandise, packed it, and sent it by land-carriage to the nearest seaport, where, unwilling to trust any more to a captain, and wishing to have a vessel of my own, I built and equipped one at my own expense. As soon as it was finished I loaded it and embarked; and as I had not sufficient cargo to fill it myself, I received several merchants of different nations with their goods.

We hoisted our sails the first fair wind, and put to sea. After sailing a considerable time, the first place we stopped at was a desert island, where we found the egg of a roc as large as that I spoke of on a former occasion; it contained a small roc which was just ready to leave the shell, its beak having begun to make its appearance. The merchants who were with me broke the egg with hatchets, and cut out the young roc, bit by bit, and roasted it. I had seriously advised them not to touch the egg, but they would not attend to me.

They had scarcely finished their meal, when two immense clouds appeared in the air at a considerable distance from us. The captain, whom I had hired to have the care of the vessel, knowing by experience what it was, cried out that it was the father and mother of the young roc, and warned us to re-embark as quickly as possible to avoid the danger which threatened us. We took his advice, and set sail immediately.

The two rocs approached, uttering the most frightful screams, which they redoubled on finding the state of their egg, and that the young one was no more. Designing to revenge themselves, they flew away towards the part whence they came, and disappeared for some time, during which we used all diligence to sail away and prevent what nevertheless befell us.

They returned, and we perceived that they each had an enormous piece of rock in their claws. When they were exactly over our ship they stopped, and, suspending themselves in the air, one of them let fall the piece of rock he held. By the address of the pilot, who suddenly turned the vessel, it did not tumble on us, but fell close to us into the sea, in which it made such a chasm that we could almost see the bottom. The other bird, unfortunately for us, let his piece of rock fall so immediately on the ship that it split into a thousand pieces. The sailors and passengers were all either crushed to death or drowned. I was myself under water for some time, but, rising again to the surface, I had the good fortune to seize a piece of the wreck. Thus, swimming sometimes with one hand and sometimes with the other, still holding what I had fixed myself to, and having both the wind and current in my favor, I at length reached an island, where the shore was very steep. I nevertheless overcame this difficulty, and got on land.

I seated myself on the grass to rest from my fatigue, after which I arose and advanced into the island, to reconnoitre the ground. It seemed to be a delicious garden; wherever I turned my eyes I saw beautiful trees, some loaded with green, others with ripe fruits, and transparent streams meandering between them. I ate of the fruits, which I found to be excellent, and quenched my thirst at the inviting brooks.

Night being arrived, I lay down in a convenient spot; my sleep was continually interrupted by the fear of being alone in such a desert place, so that I employed the greater part of the night in lamenting and reproaching myself for the imprudence of venturing from home when I had everything to make me comfortable there. These reflections led me so far that I began to form a project against my life, but day returning with its cheerful light dissipated my gloomy ideas. I arose and walked among the trees, though not without some degree of apprehension.

When I had advanced a little way in the island, I perceived an old man, who appeared much broken down. He was seated on the bank of a little rivulet; at first I supposed he might be, like myself, shipwrecked. I approached and saluted him, to which he made no other return than a slight inclination of the head. I asked him what he was doing, but, instead of replying, he made signs to me to take him on my shoulders and cross the brook, making me understand that he wanted to gather some fruit.

I supposed he wished me to render him this piece of service; so, taking him on my back, I forded the stream. When I had reached the other side I stooped and desired him to alight, instead of which (I cannot help laughing whenever I think of it) this old man, who appeared to me so decrepit, nimbly threw his legs, which I then saw were covered with a skin like a cow's, over my neck, and seated himself fast on my shoulders, at the same time squeezing my throat so violently that I expected to be strangled; this alarmed me so much that I fainted away.

Notwithstanding my situation, the old man kept his place on my neck; he only loosened his hold sufficiently to allow me to breathe. When I was a little recovered he pushed one of his feet against my stomach and, kicking my side with the other, obliged me to get up. He then made me walk under some trees, and forced me to gather and eat the fruit we met with. He never quitted his hold during the day, and when I wished to rest at night he placed himself on the ground with me, always fixed to my neck. He never failed to awaken me in the morning, which he effected by pushing me, and then he made me get up and walk, kicking me all the time. Conceive, gentlemen, the plague of bearing this burthen, without the possibility of getting rid of it!

One day, having found on the ground several dried gourds which had fallen from the tree that bore them, I took a pretty large one, and, after having cleared it well, squeezed into it the juice of several bunches of grapes, which the island produced in great abundance. When I had filled the gourd, I placed it in a particular spot, and some days after returned with the old man, when, tasting the contents, I found it to be converted into excellent wine, which for a short time made me forget the ills that oppressed me. It gave me new vigor, and raised my spirits so high that I began to sing and dance as I went along.

The old man, perceiving the effect this draught had taken on my spirits, made signs to me to let him taste; I gave him the gourd, and the liquor pleased his palate so well that he drank it to the last drop. There was enough to inebriate him, and the fumes of the wine very soon rose into his head: he then began to sing after his manner, and to stagger on my shoulders. The blows he gave himself made him return what he had on his stomach, and his legs loosened by degrees; so that, finding he no longer held me tight, I threw him on the ground, where he remained motionless; I then took a large stone and crushed him to death.

Much rejoiced at having so effectually got rid of this old man, I walked towards the seashore, where I met some people who belonged to a vessel which had anchored there to get fresh water. They were much astonished at seeing me, and at the account of my adventure. "You had fallen," said they, "into the hands of the Old Man of the Sea, and you are the first whom he has not strangled; he never left those he had once mastered till he had put an end to their existence; and this island is famous for the number of persons he has killed. The sailors and merchants who land here never dare approach, excepting in a strong body."

Having informed me of this, they took me to their ship; and when I related what had befallen me the captain received me with the greatest politeness. He set sail, and in a few days we landed at the port of a large city, where the houses were built of stone.

One of the merchants of the ship, having contracted a friendship for me, entreated me to accompany him, and conducted me to the lodging destined for foreign merchants. He gave me a large sack, and then introduced me to some people belonging to the city, who were also furnished with sacks; then, having desired them to take me with them to gather cocoa, "Go," said he, "follow them and do as they do; and do not stray from them, for if you do so your life will be in danger." He gave me provisions for the day, and I set off with them.

We arrived at a large forest of tall, straight trees, the trunks of which were so smooth that it was impossible to climb up to the branches where the fruit grew. They were all cocoa-trees, and we wanted to knock down the fruit and fill our sacks. On entering the forest we saw an amazing number of monkeys, of all sizes, which fled at our approach and ran up the trees with surprising agility. The merchants I was with collected some stones and threw them with great force at the monkeys, which had reached some of the highest branches. I did the same, and soon perceived that these animals were aware of our design; they gathered the cocoa-nuts and threw them down at us, with gestures that plainly showed their anger and animosity. We picked up the cocoa-nuts, and at intervals threw up stones to irritate the monkeys. By this contrivance we filled our sacks with the fruit: a thing utterly impracticable by any other method.

When we had got a sufficient quantity, we returned to the city, where the merchant who had sent me to the forest gave me the value of the cocoa-nuts I had collected. "Continue to do the same every day," said he, "till you have amassed sufficient money to convey you to your own country." I thanked him for the good advice he gave me; by degrees I collected a quantity of cocoa-nuts, and sold them for a considerable sum.

The vessel in which I came had sailed with the merchants, who had loaded it with the cocoa-nuts they had purchased. I waited for the arrival of another, which shortly after came into harbor for a similar lading. I sent on board all the cocoa-nuts which belonged to me, and when it was ready to sail I took leave of the merchant, to whom I was under so many obligations. As he had not yet been able to settle his affairs, he could not embark with me.

We set sail and steered towards the island where pepper grows in such abundance. From thence we made for the island of Comari, where the best species of the aloe grows, and whose inhabitants submit themselves to a law not to drink wine or suffer any kind of debauchery. In these two islands I exchanged all my cocoa-nuts for pepper and aloe-wood; and I then engaged myself with the other merchants in a pearl-fishery, in which I employed many divers on my own account. By these means I collected a great number of very large and perfect ones, with which I joyfully put to sea and arrived safely at Balsora, whence I returned to Bagdad, where I sold the pepper, aloes, and pearls, which I brought with me, for a large sum.

I bestowed a tenth part of my profit in charity, as I had done on my return from every former voyage, and endeavored to recover from my fatigues by every kind of diversion.

Having concluded this narrative, Sindbad gave a hundred sequins to Hindbad, who retired with all the other guests. The same party returned to the rich Sindbad the next day; and having regaled them in the same manner as on the preceding days, he requested silence, and began the account of his sixth voyage in the following manner.

THE SIXTH VOYAGE OF SINDBAD THE SAILOR.

You are, no doubt, gentlemen, surprised how I could be tempted again to expose myself to the caprice of fortune, after having undergone so many perils in my other voyages. I am astonished myself, when I think of it. It was fate alone that dragged me, at the expiration of a year, to venture myself a sixth time on the unstable sea, notwithstanding the tears and entreaties of my relations and friends, who did all in their power to persuade me to stay.

Instead of taking the route of the Persian Gulf, I passed again through some of the provinces of Persia and the Indies, and arrived at a seaport, where I embarked in a good ship, with a captain who was determined to make a long voyage. Long, indeed, it proved; but at the same time so unfortunate that the captain and pilot lost their way and did not know how to steer. They at length got right again, but we had no reason to rejoice on the occasion, for the captain astonished us all by suddenly quitting his post and uttering the most lamentable cries. He threw his turban on the floor, tore his beard, and beat his head, as if his senses were distracted. We asked what occasioned these signs of affliction. "I must announce to you," said he, "that we are in the greatest peril. A rapid current carries the ship, and we shall probably all perish in less than a quarter of an hour. Pray God to deliver us from this imminent danger, for unless he takes pity on us nothing can save us." He then gave orders for setting the sails, but the ropes broke in the attempt, and at last it became impossible to manage the ship; it was suffered to go free with the current, and was dashed against the foot of a rock, where it split and went to pieces; we had, however, time to provide for our own safety and secure part of our provisions, as well as the most valuable part of the lading.

This being effected, the captain said: "God's will be done. Here may we dig our graves, and bid each other an eternal farewell; for we are in so desolate a place that none who were ever cast upon this shore returned to their own homes." This speech increased our affliction, and, with tears in our eyes, we embraced each other, deploring our wretched fate.

The mountain, at the foot of which we then were, formed one side of a large and long island. The beach was covered with fragments of vessels which had been wrecked on the inhospitable coast, and by the infinity of bones which everywhere met the eye, we were convinced of the dreadful certainty that many lives had been lost in this spot. It is almost incredible what quantities of merchandise of every sort were strewn upon the shore; all of which served to increase our despair.

In every other part of the world it is common for rivers to discharge themselves into the sea; but, in the island upon which we had been cast, a large river of fresh water takes its course from the sea and runs along the coast through a dark cave, the opening of which is extremely high and wide. What is most remarkable, however, is, that the mountain is composed of rubies, crystals, and other precious stones. Here, too, a kind of pitch, or bitumen, distils from the rocks into the sea, and the fishes, eating it, return it again in the form of ambergris, which the waves leave on the shore. The trees are principally aloes, and are equal in beauty and value to those of Comari.

To complete the description of this place, which may be termed a whirlpool, as nothing that once enters it ever returns, it is impossible that a ship can avoid being dragged thither if it comes within a certain distance. If a sea-breeze blow, it assists the current, there is no remedy; and if the wind come from the land, the high mountain impedes its effect, and causes a calm, which allows the current full force, and then it whirls the ship against the shore and dashes it to pieces, as ours was. In addition to this, the mountain is so steep that it is impossible to reach the summit, or, in fact, to escape by any means.

We remained on the shore, distracted with apprehension and expecting to die. We had divided our provision equally, so that each individual might live a longer or shorter time, according to the consumption he made of his portion.

They who died first were buried by the others. I had the office of burying my last companion; for besides managing what provisions were allowed me with more care than the rest, I had also a store which I had kept concealed from my comrades. Nevertheless, at the time I buried the last I had so little left that I imagined I must soon follow him; upon which I dug a grave and resolved to throw myself into it and die there, since no one remained to perform the last duties to my remains. I must confess, however, that whilst I was thus employed I could not avoid reproaching myself as the sole cause of my misfortunes, and most heartily repented of this last voyage. But I was not satisfied with reproaches only; I bit my hands in despair, and was near putting an end to my existence.

But God still had compassion on me, and inspired me with the thought of going to the river which lost itself in the hollow of the cave. I examined it with great attention; and it occurred to me, that as the river ran under ground, it must in its course come out to daylight again, so that if I should construct a raft and place myself upon it, the current of the water would probably bring me to some inhabited country; and even should I perish, it would be but changing the manner of my death; while, on the contrary, if I got safely out of this fatal place, I should not only avoid the cruel death by which my companions perished, but might also meet with some fresh opportunity of enriching myself. "Who knows," I said to myself, "that fortune does not await me on my arrival out of this frightful cavern, to recompense me for all the losses I have sustained?"

I worked at my raft with fresh vigor after these reflections, making it of thick pieces of wood and great cables, of which there was an abundance on the beach; I tied them closely together, and formed a strong float. When it was completed, I placed on it a cargo of rubies, emeralds, ambergris, crystal, and also some gold and silver stuffs Having placed all these things in a proper equilibrium, and fastened them to the planks, I embarked on my raft, taking with me two poles which I designed to use for oars, and, trusting to the current, resigned myself to the will of God.

As soon as I was under the vault of the cavern I lost the light of day; and the current carried me on without my being able to discern its course. I rowed for some days in this obscurity, without ever perceiving the least ray of light. At one time the vault of the cavern was so low that it almost knocked my head, which rendered me very careful to avoid the danger again. During this time I consumed no more of my provisions than was absolutely necessary to sustain nature; but, however frugal I might be, I consumed them all. I then fell into a sweet sleep. I cannot tell whether I slept long, but when I awoke I was surprised to find myself in an open country, near a bank of the river, to which my raft was fastened, and in the midst of a large concourse of blacks. I rose as soon as I perceived them, and saluted them; they spoke to me, but I could not understand their language.

At this moment I felt so transported with joy that I could scarcely believe myself awake. Being at length convinced that it was not a dream, I exclaimed in the words of the Koran: "Invoke the Almighty, and he will come to thy assistance; thou needest not care for aught besides. Close thine eye, and, while thou sleepest, God will change thy fortune from bad to good."

One of the blacks, who understood Arabic, having heard me pronounce these words, advanced towards me and spoke as follows. "Brother," said he, "be not surprised at seeing us; we live in this country, and came hither to-day to water our fields from this river which flows from the neighboring mountain through canals cut in the earth to admit its passage.

"We observed that the current bore something along, and we immediately ran to the bank to see what it was, and perceived this raft; one of us instantly swam to it and conducted it to shore. We fastened it, as you see, and were waiting for you to awake. We entreat you to relate to us your history, which must be very extraordinary; tell us how you could venture on this river, and whence you come." I first requested him to give me some food; after which I promised to satisfy their curiosity.

They produced several kinds of meat, and when I had satisfied my hunger I related to them all that had happened to me, which they appeared to listen to with great admiration. As soon as I had finished my history, their interpreter told me that I had astonished them with my relation, and I must go myself to the king to recount my adventures: for they were of too extraordinary a nature to be repeated by any one but him to whom they had happened. I replied that I was ready to do anything they wished. The blacks then sent for a horse, which arrived shortly after; they placed me on it, and whilst some walked by my side to conduct me, others, who had hauled the raft out of the water, carried it on their shoulders with the bales of rubies, and followed me.

We went together to the city of Serendib, for this was the name of the island, and the blacks presented me to their king. I approached the throne whereon he was seated, and saluted him as it is usual to accost the kings of India; that is to say, I prostrated myself at his feet, and kissed the earth. The prince made me rise, and, receiving me with an affable air, he placed me by his side. He first asked me my name; I replied that I was called Sindbad, and surnamed the Sailor from having made several voyages; and added that I was a citizen of Bagdad. "But," replied he, "how, then, came you into my dominions, and whence are you arrived?"

I concealed nothing from the king, and related to him what you have just heard; he was so pleased with it that he ordered the history of my adventures to be written in letters of gold, that it might be preserved amongst the archives of his kingdom. The raft was then produced, and the bales were opened in his presence. He admired the aloe-wood and ambergris, but above all the rubies and emeralds, as he had none in his treasury equal to them in value.

Perceiving that he examined the precious stones with pleasure, and that he looked repeatedly at the rarest of them, I prostrated myself before him, and took the liberty of saying: "Sire, not only my person is at your command, but the cargo of my raft also, if your majesty will do me the honor of accepting it, and disposing of it as you think fit." He smiled, and replied that he did not desire anything which belonged to me; for as God had given it me I ought not to be deprived of it; that instead of diminishing my riches, he would add to them; and that, when I left his dominions, I should carry with me proofs of his liberality. I could only reply to this by praying for his prosperity, and by praising his generosity.

He ordered one of his officers to attend me, and gave me servants to wait upon me at his own expense. The officers faithfully fulfilled the charge they were intrusted with, and conveyed all the bales to the place destined for my lodging.

I went every day at certain hours to pay my court to the king, and employed the rest of the time in seeing the city and whatever was most worthy of my attention.

The island of Serendib is situated exactly under the equinoctial line, so that the days and nights are of equal length. It is eighty parasangs long, and as many in breadth. The principal town is situated at the extremity of a beautiful valley formed by a mountain, which is in the middle of the island, and which is by far the highest in the world; it is discernible at sea within three days' navigation of it. Rubies and many sorts of minerals are found in it, and most of the rocks are formed of emery, which is a sort of metallic stone used in the cutting of precious stones.

All kinds of rare and curious plants and trees, particularly the cedar and cocoa trees, grow here in great abundance, and there are pearl-fisheries on the coast at the mouth of the rivers; some of its valleys, too, produce diamonds. I made a devotional journey up the mountain, to the spot where Adam was placed on his banishment from Paradise, and had the curiosity to ascend to the summit.

When I came back to the city, I entreated the king to grant me permission to return to my native country, which he did in the most obliging and honorable manner. He compelled me to receive a rich present, which was taken from his treasury; and when I went to take my leave, he deposited in my care another still more considerable than the first, and at the same time gave me a letter for the Commander of the Believers, our sovereign lord, saying, "I beg you to present, from me this letter and this present to the caliph Haroun Alraschid, and to assure him of my friendship." I took the present and the letter with the greatest respect, and promised his majesty to execute the orders with which he was pleased to honor me with the greatest punctuality. Before I embarked the king sent for the captain and the merchants with whom I was to sail, and charged them to pay me all possible attention.

The letter of the king of Serendib was written on the skin of a certain animal, highly prized in that country on account of its rareness. The color of it approaches to yellow. The letter itself was in characters of azure, and contained the following words in the Indian language: —

"The king of the Indies — who, in his journeys, is preceded by a thousand elephants, and whose residence is a palace the roof of which glitters with the lustre of a hundred thousand rubies, and who possesses in his treasury twenty thousand crowns enriched with diamonds — to the caliph Abdallah Haroun Alraschid:

"Although the present that we send you be inconsiderable, yet receive it as a brother and a friend, in consideration of the friendship we bear you in our heart; and we feel happy in having an opportunity of testifying it to you. We ask the same share in your affections; as we hope we deserve it; being of a rank equal to that you hold. We salute you as a brother. Farewell."

The present consisted of several items, — first, a vase made of one single ruby, pierced and worked into a cup of half a foot in height and an inch thick, filled with fine round pearls, all weighing half a drachm each: second, the skin of a serpent, which had scales as large as a common piece of money, the peculiar property of which was to preserve those who lay on it from all disease; third, fifty thousand drachms of the most exquisite aloe-wood, with thirty grains of camphor as large as pistachio nuts; and lastly a female slave of the most enchanting beauty, whose clothes were covered with jewels.

The ship set sail, and after a long though fortunate voyage we landed at Balsora, whence I returned to Bagdad. The first thing I did after my arrival was to execute the commission I had been intrusted with. I took the letter of the king of Serendib, and presented myself at the gate of the Commander of the Faithful, followed by the beautiful slave and some of my family, who carried the presents which had been committed to my care. I mentioned the reason of my appearance there, and was immediately conducted before the throne of the caliph. I prostrated myself at his feet, and after having made a short speech, gave him the letter and the present. When he had read the contents, he inquired of me whether it was true that the king of Serendib was as rich and powerful as he reported himself to be in his letter. I prostrated myself a second time, and when I arose, "Commander of the Faithful," said I, "I can assure your majesty that he does not exaggerate his riches and grandeur; I have been witness to it. Nothing can excite greater admiration than the magnificence of his palace. When this prince wishes to appear in public, a throne is prepared for him on the back of an elephant; on this he sits, and proceeds between two files composed of his ministers, favorites, and others belonging to the court. Before him, on the same elephant, sits an officer with a golden lance in his hand, and behind the throne another stands with a pillar of gold, on the top of which is placed an emerald about half a foot long and an inch thick. He is preceded by a guard of a thousand men, habited in silk and gold stuffs, and mounted on elephants richly caparisoned.

"While the king is on his march, the officer who sits before him on the elephant from time to time cries with a loud voice: 'This is the great monarch, the powerful and magnanimous sultan of the Indies, whose palace is covered with a hundred thousand rubies, and who possesses twenty thousand diamond crowns. This is the crowned monarch, greater than ever was Solyma or the great Mihrage.'

"After he has pronounced these words, the officer who is behind the throne cries in his turn: 'This monarch, who is so great and powerful must die, must die, must die.' The first officer then replies: 'Hail to Him who lives and dies not!'

"The king of Serendib is so just that there are no judges in his capital nor in any other part of his dominions; his people do not want any. They know and observe with exactness the true principles of justice, and never deviate from their duty; therefore tribunals and magistrates would be useless amongst them." The caliph was satisfied with my discourse, and said: "The wisdom of this king appears in his letter; and after what you have told me, I must confess that such wisdom is worthy of such subjects, and such subjects worthy of it." At these words he dismissed me with a rich present.

Sindbad here finished his discourse, and his visitors retired; but Hindbad, as usual, received his hundred sequins. They returned the following day, and Sindbad began the relation of his seventh and last voyage in these terms: —

SEVENTH VOYAGE OF SINDBAD THE SAILOR.

On my return from my sixth voyage, I absolutely relinquished all thoughts of ever venturing again on the seas. I was now arrived at an age which required rest, and, besides this, I had sworn nevermore to expose myself to the perils I had so often experienced: I prepared, therefore, to enjoy my life in quiet and repose.

One day, when I was regaling a number of friends, one of my servants came to tell me that an officer of the caliph wanted to speak to me. I got up from the table, and went to him. "The caliph," said he, "has ordered me to acquaint you that he wishes to see you." I followed the officer to the palace, and he presented me to the prince, whom I saluted by prostrating myself at his feet. "Sindbad," said he, "I am in want of you; you must do me a service, and go once more to the king of Serendib with my answer and presents; it is but right that I should return him the civility he has shown me."

This order of the caliph was a thunderbolt to me. "Commander of the Faithful," replied I, "I am ready to execute anything that your majesty may desire: but I humbly entreat you to consider that I am worn down with the unspeakable fatigues I have undergone; I have even made a vow never to leave Bagdad." I then took occasion to recount the long detail of my adventures, which he had the patience to listen to attentively. When I had done speaking, "I confess," said he, "that these are extraordinary adventures; nevertheless, they must not prevent you making the voyage I propose, for my sake; it is only to the island of Serendib; execute the commission I intrust you with, and then you will be at liberty to return. But you must go; for you must be sensible that it would be highly indecorous, as well as derogatory to my dignity, to be under obligations to the king of that island."

As I plainly saw that the caliph had resolved on my going, I signified to him that I was ready to obey his commands. He seemed much pleased, and ordered me a thousand sequins to pay the expenses of the voyage.

In a few days I was prepared for my departure; and as soon as I had received the presents of the caliph, together with a letter written with his own hand, I set off and took the route of Balsora, from whence I embarked. After a pleasant voyage, I arrived at the island of Serendib. I immediately acquainted the ministers with the commission I was come upon, and begged them to procure me an audience as soon as possible. They did not fail to attend to my wishes, and conducted me to the palace. I saluted the king by prostrating myself according to the usual custom.

This prince immediately recollected me, and evinced great joy at my return. "Welcome, Sindbad," said he; "I assure you I have often thought of you since your departure. Blessed be this day, in which I see you again." I returned the compliment, and, after thanking him for his kindness, delivered the letter and present of the caliph, which he received with every mark of satisfaction and respect.

The caliph had sent him a complete bed of gold tissue, estimated at a thousand sequins; fifty robes of a very rich stuff, a hundred more of white linen, the finest that could be procured from Cairo, Suez, Cufa, and Alexandria; another bed of crimson, and also a third of a different make. A vase of agate, greater in width than in depth, of the thickness of a finger, on the sides of which was sculptured, in bas-relief, a man kneeling on the ground with a bow and arrow in his hand, which he was going to let fly at a lion; and besides these he sent him a richly ornamented table, which was supposed from tradition to have belonged to Solomon. The letter of the caliph was written in these terms: —

"Health, in the name of the sovereign who directeth in the right road, to the powerful and happy sultan, from Abdallah Haroun Alraschid, whom God has placed on the seat of honor, after his ancestors of happy memory:

"We have received your letter with joy, and send you this, emanating from the council of our porte, the garden of superior minds. We hope that in casting your eyes over it you will perceive our good intention, and think it agreeable. Adieu."

The king of Serendib was rejoiced to find that the caliph returned a testimony of his friendship. Soon after this audience I requested another to take my leave, but had some difficulty in obtaining it. At length, however, I succeeded, and the king, at my departure, ordered me a very handsome present. I re-embarked immediately, intending to return to Bagdad; but had not the good fortune to arrive so soon as I expected, for God had disposed it otherwise.

Three or four days after we had set sail we were attacked by corsairs, who easily made themselves masters of our vessel, as we were not in a state for defence. Some persons in the ship attempted to make resistance, but it cost them their lives. All who had the prudence not to oppose the intention of the corsairs, among whom my destiny was cast, were made slaves. After they had stripped us and substituted bad clothes for our own, they bent their course towards a large distant island, where, on their arrival, they sold us.

I was purchased by a rich merchant, who conducted me to his house, gave me food to eat, and clothed me as a slave. Some days after, as he had not been well informed who I was, he asked me if I knew any trade. I replied that I was not an artisan, but a merchant by profession, and that the corsairs, who had sold me, had taken from me all I possessed. "But tell me," said he, "do you think you could shoot with a bow and arrow?" I informed him that it had been one of my youthful sports, and that I had not entirely forgotten it. He then gave me a bow and some arrows, and causing me to mount behind him upon an elephant, he took me to a vast forest at a distance of several hours' journey from the city. After proceeding a great way, we reached a spot where he wished to stop; when, bidding me alight, he showed me a large tree. "Ascend this tree," said he, "and shoot at the elephants that pass under it, for there are a prodigious number in this forest: if one should fall, come quickly and acquaint me of it." Having said this, he left me some provisions, and returned to the city, while I remained in the tree on the watch the whole night.

I did not perceive any during that time, but the next day, as soon as the sun had risen, a great number made their appearance. I shot many arrows at them, and at last one fell. The others immediately retired, and left me at liberty to go and inform my master of my success. To reward me for this good intelligence he regaled me with an excellent repast, and praised my address. We then returned together to the forest, where we dug a pit to bury the elephant I had killed. It was my master's intention to let it rot in the earth, and afterwards to take possession of its teeth for commerce.

I pursued this occupation for two months, and scarcely a day passed in which I did not kill an elephant. I did not, however, always place myself on the same tree, but sometimes ascended one, sometimes another; till one morning, when I was waiting for a troop of elephants to pass, I perceived, to my great astonishment, that, instead of traversing the forest as usual, they stopped and came towards me with a terrible noise, and in such numbers that the ground was covered with them and trembled under their footsteps. They approached the tree in which I had stationed myself, and, surrounding it, they all extended their trunks and fixed their eyes upon me. At this surprising spectacle I remained motionless, and was so agitated by fright that my bow and arrows fell from my hands.

Nor were my fears groundless. After the elephants had viewed me for some time, one of the largest twisted his trunk round the body of the tree, and shook it with so much violence that he tore it up by the roots and threw it on the ground. I fell with the tree; but the animal took me up with his trunk, and placing me on his shoulders, where I remained more dead than alive, he put himself at the head of his companions, who followed him in a troop, and carried me to a spot whence, having set me down, he and the rest retired.

Conceive my situation! I for a time thought it a dream. At length, having been seated some time, and seeing no other elephants, I arose and perceived that I was on a little hill of some breadth, entirely covered with the bones and teeth of elephants. This sight filled my mind with a variety of reflections. It occurred to me that I had been brought to this spot through the fine instinct and superior sagacity of these animals, to teach me that this was their cemetery, or place of burial, and that I might safely desist from destroying them merely for the sake of possessing their teeth, as here I could obtain plenty without such necessity. I did not stay long on the hill, but turned my steps towards the city, and did not meet any elephants, they having entered farther into the forest.

As soon as my master saw me, "Ah, poor Sindbad!" exclaimed he, "I was in pain to know what had become of you. I have been to the forest and found a tree newly torn up by the roots, and a bow and arrows on the ground; after having sought you everywhere in vain, I despaired of seeing you again. Pray, relate to me what has happened to you, and by what good fortune you are still alive." I satisfied his curiosity, and on the following day, having accompanied me to the hill, he was with great joy convinced of the truth of my history. We loaded the elephant on which we had come with as many teeth as he could carry, and when we returned, he thus addressed me: "Brother, — for after the discovery you have imparted to me, and which cannot fail to enrich me, I will no longer treat you as a slave, — may God pour on you all sorts of blessings and prosperity! In his presence I here give you your liberty. I have hitherto concealed from you what I am now going to relate. The elephants of our forest destroy annually an infinite number of slaves, whom we send in search of ivory. Whatever advice we give them, they are sure, sooner or later, to lose their lives by the wiles of these animals. God has delivered you from their fury, and has conferred this mercy on you alone. It is a sign that he cherishes you, and that he has ordained you to remain in the world to be of use to mankind. You have procured me a surprising advantage; we have not hitherto been able to get ivory without risking the lives of our slaves, and now our whole city will be enriched by your means. Do not suppose that I think I have sufficiently recompensed you by giving you liberty; I intend to add to it considerable presents."

To this obliging discourse I replied: "Master, God preserve you; the liberty you grant me acquits you of all obligation towards me; and the only recompense which I desire for the service I have had the good fortune to render to you and the inhabitants of your city, is permission to return to my own country." "Well," resumed he, "the monsoon will soon bring us the vessels which trade hither for ivory. I will then send you away with the means of paying your expenses home." I again thanked him, both for the liberty he had given me and the good-will he exhibited towards me; and afterwards continued to abide with him till the season of the monsoon, in the interim making frequent excursions to the hill, and filling his magazines with ivory. The other merchants in the city did not fail to do the same, for the secret soon became noised abroad.

The ships at length arrived, and my master, having chosen that in which he wished me to embark, loaded it with ivory, placing the half of it to my account. He did not omit an abundance of provisions for my voyage, and pressed me to accept some rare curiosities of that country besides. I thanked him with unfeigned gratitude for all the obligations he had conferred upon me, and embarked. We then set sail, and as the adventure which had procured me liberty was a very extraordinary one, it was always present to my mind.

We touched at several islands to procure refreshments. Our vessel having sailed from a port of the Indian continent, we went there to land; and, fearful of the dangers of the sea to Balsora, I landed the goods that belonged to me, and resolved to continue my journey by land. I sold my ivory for a large sum of money, and purchased a variety of curious things for presents: when I was equipped, I joined a caravan of merchants; but, from remaining a long time on the road, I suffered a good deal, which, however, I bore with patience, consoling myself with the reflection that I had neither tempests nor corsairs nor serpents, such as I had before encountered, to fear.

All my fatigues being at last concluded, I arrived happily at Bagdad, and went immediately to present myself to the caliph, and give him an account of my embassy. This prince told me that my long absence had occasioned him some uneasiness, but that he had always hoped God would not forsake me.

When I related the adventure of the elephants, he appeared much surprised, and would have disbelieved it, had not my sincerity been well known to him. He thought this, as well as the other histories I had detailed to him, so curious, that he ordered his secretary to write it in letters of gold, to be preserved in his treasury. I retired, satisfied with the presents and honors he conferred on me, and then resigned myself entirely to my family, my relations, and friends.

Sindbad thus concluded the recital of his seventh and last voyage; and, addressing himself to Hindbad, "Well, my friend," said he, "have you ever heard of one who has suffered more than I have, or been in so many trying situations? Is it not just that, after so many troubles, I should enjoy an agreeable and quiet life?" As he finished these words Hindbad, approaching him, kissed his hand, and said: "I must confess, sir, that you have encountered frightful perils; my afflictions are not to be compared to yours. If I feel them heavily during the period of suffering, I console myself with the small profit which they produce. You not only deserve a quiet life, but are worthy of all the riches you possess, since you make so good a use of them, and are so generous. May you therefore continue to live happily till the hour of your death."

Sindbad ordered him to have another hundred sequins, admitted him to his friendship, told him to quit the profession of a porter, and continue to eat at his table, for that he should all his life have reason to remember Sindbad the Sailor.

ALI BABA AND THE FORTY THIEVES.

IN a certain town of Persia there lived two brothers, one of whom was called Cassim and the other Ali Baba. Their father at his death left them but a moderate fortune, which they divided equally between them. It might therefore naturally be conjectured that their riches would be the same; chance, however, ordered it otherwise.

Cassim married a woman who, very soon after her nuptials, became heiress to a very well furnished shop, a warehouse filled with good merchandise, and some considerable property in land; and he thus found himself on a sudden quite at his ease, and become one of the richest merchants in the town.

Ali Baba, on the other hand, who had taken a wife in no better circumstances than himself, lived in a very poor house, and had no other means of gaining his livelihood and supporting his wife and children than by going to cut wood in a neighboring forest, and carrying it about the town on three asses, which formed the whole of his capital, to sell.

Ali Baba went one day to the forest, and had nearly finished cutting as much wood as his asses could carry, when he perceived a thick column of dust rising in the air, which appeared to come from the right of the spot where he was, and to be advancing towards him. He looked at it very attentively, and was able to distinguish a numerous company of horsemen, who were approaching at a quick pace.

Although that part of the country was never spoken of as being infested with robbers, Ali Baba nevertheless conjectured that these men were of that denomination. Without, therefore, at all considering what might become of his asses, his first and only care was to save himself. He instantly climbed up into a large tree, the branches of which, at a very little height from the ground, spread out so close and thick that they were separated only in one small space. He placed himself, therefore, in the midst of these, with the greatest assurance of security, as he could see everything that passed without being observed. The tree itself also grew at the foot of a sort of isolated rock, considerably higher than the tree, and so steep that it could not be easily ascended.

The men, who appeared stout, powerful, and well mounted, came up to the very rock, and alighted. Ali Baba counted forty of them, and was very sure, both from their appearance and mode of equipment, that they were robbers. Nor was he wrong in his conjecture, for they were in fact banditti who, without committing any depredations in the neighborhood, carried on their system of plunder at a considerable distance, and had only their place of rendezvous in that spot; and what he almost immediately saw them do confirmed him in this opinion. Each horseman took the bridle off his horse, and hung over its head a bag filled with barley, which he had brought with him; and having all fastened their horses to something, they took their travelling-bags, which appeared so heavy that Ali Baba thought they were filled with gold and silver.

The robber who was nearest to him, and whom Ali Baba took for their captain, came with his bag on his shoulder close to the rock, at the very spot where the tree was in which he had concealed himself. After the robber had made his way among some bushes and shrubs that grew there, he very distinctly pronounced these words, "OPEN, SESAME," which Ali Baba heard as distinctly as they were uttered. The captain of the band had no sooner spoken them than a door immediately opened; and after having made all his men pass before him and go in through the door, he entered also, and the door closed.

The robbers continued within the rock for a considerable time; and Ali Baba was compelled to remain on the tree, and wait with patience for their departure, as he was afraid if he left his present situation and endeavored to save himself by flight, either some or all of them might come out. He was nevertheless strongly tempted to creep down, seize two of their horses, mount one and lead the other by the bridle, and thus, driving his three asses before him, gain the town. The uncertainty, however, of success made him follow the safer mode.

At length the door opened, and the forty robbers came out; the captain, contrary to what he did when they entered, made his appearance first. After he had seen all his troop pass out before him, Ali Baba heard him pronounce these words, "SHUT, SESAME." Each man then returned to his horse, put on its bridle, fastened his bag, and mounted. When the captain saw that they were all ready to proceed, he put himself at their head, and they departed the same way they came.

Ali Baba did not immediately come down from the tree, because he thought that they might have forgotten something, and be obliged to come back, and that he should thus get into some scrape. He followed them with his eyes as far as he could, nor did he, in order to be more secure, come down till a considerable time after he had lost sight of them. As he recollected the words the captain of the robbers made use of to open and shut the door, he had the curiosity to try if the same effect would be produced by his pronouncing them. He made his way, therefore, through the bushes, and perceived the door which they concealed. He went up to it, and called out, "Open, Sesame," when the door instantly flew wide open!

Ali Baba expected to find only a dark and obscure cave, and was much astonished at seeing a large, spacious, well-lighted, and vaulted room, dug out of the rock, and higher than a man could reach. It received its light from the top of the rock, cut out in a similar manner. He observed in it a large quantity of provisions, numerous bales of rich merchandise piled up, silk stuffs and brocades, rich and valuable carpets, and, besides all this, great quantities of money, both silver and gold, some in heaps, and some in large leathern bags placed one on another. At the sight of all these things, it seemed to him that this cave had been used, not only for years, but for centuries, as a retreat for robbers who had regularly succeeded each other.

Ali Baba did not hesitate long as to the plan he should pursue. He went into the cave, and as soon as he was there the door shut; but as he knew the secret by which to open it, this gave him no sort of uneasiness. He paid no attention to the silver, but made directly for the gold coin and particularly that which was in the bags. He took up, at several times, as much as he could carry, and when he had got together what he thought sufficient for loading his three asses, he went and collected them, as they had each strayed to some distance. He then brought them as close as he could to the rock and loaded them, and, in order to conceal the sacks, he so covered the whole with wood, that no one could perceive anything else. When he had finished all this, he went up to the door, and had no sooner pronounced the words "Shut, Sesame," than it closed; for although it shut of itself every time he went in, it remained open on coming out, but by command.

This being done, Ali Baba took the road to the town; and when he got to his own house, he drove his asses into a small court, and shut the gate with great care. He threw down the small quantity of wood that covered the bags, and carried the latter into his house, where he laid them down in a regular manner before his wife, who was sitting upon a sofa.

His wife felt the sacks to know their contents; and when she found them to be full of money, she suspected her husband of having stolen them, so that when he brought them all before her, she could not help saying: "Ali Baba, is it possible that you should —" He immediately interrupted her: "Peace, my dear wife," exclaimed he, "do not alarm yourself; I am not a thief, unless that title be attached to those who take from thieves. You will change your bad opinion of me when I shall have told you my good fortune." He emptied the sacks, the contents of which formed a great heap of gold that quite dazzled his wife's eyes; and, when he had done, he related his whole adventure, from beginning to end; and, as he concluded, he, above all things, conjured her to keep it secret.

His wife, recovering from her alarm, began to rejoice with Ali Baba on the fortunate circumstance which had befallen them; and was going to count over the money that lay before her, piece by piece. "What are you going to do?" said he; "you are very foolish, wife; you would never have done counting. I will immediately dig a pit to bury it in; we have no time to lose." "It is proper, though," replied the wife, "that we should know nearly what quantity there may be. I will borrow a small measure in the neighborhood; and, whilst you are digging the pit, I will ascertain how much there is." "What you want to do, wife," replied Ali Baba, "is of no use; and if you will take my advice, you will give up the intention. However, do as you please, only remember not to betray the secret."

In order to satisfy herself, the wife of Ali Baba set off and went to her brother-in-law, Cassim, who lived a short distance from her house. Cassim was from home, so she addressed herself to his wife, whom she begged to lend her a measure for a few minutes. She inquired if she wanted a large or a small one, to which Ali Baba's wife replied that a small one would suit her. "That I will, with pleasure," said the sister-in-law; "wait a moment and I will bring it you." She went to seek a measure, but, being acquainted with the poverty of Ali Baba, she was curious to know what sort of grain his wife wanted to measure; she, therefore, thought of putting some tallow under the measure, which she did, without its being perceptible. She returned with it, and, presenting it to the wife of Ali Baba, apologized for having made her wait so long, with the excuse that she had some difficulty to find it.

The wife of Ali Baba returned home, and, placing the measure on the heap of gold, filled and then emptied it at a little distance on the sofa, till she had measured the whole; her husband having by this time dug the pit for its reception, she informed him how many measures there were, with which they were both very well contented. While Ali Baba was burying the gold, his wife, to prove her diligence and punctuality, went back with the measure to her sister-in-law, but without observing that a piece of gold had stuck to the bottom of it. "Here, sister," said she, on returning it, "you see I have not kept your measure long; I am much obliged to you for lending it me."

The wife of Ali Baba had scarcely turned her back, when Cassim's wife looked at the bottom of the measure and was inexpressibly astonished to see a piece of gold sticking to it. Envy instantly took possession of her breast. "What," said she to herself, "Ali Baba measures his gold! and where can that miserable wretch have got it?" Her husband, Cassim, as was before mentioned, was from home; he had gone, as usual, to his shop, from whence he would not return till evening. The time of his absence appeared an age to her, she was in such a state of impatience to acquaint him with a circumstance which, she concluded, would surprise him as much as it had done her.

On his return home, his wife said to him, "Cassim, you think you are rich, but you are deceived; Ali Baba has infinitely more wealth than you are possessed of; he does not count his money as you do; he measures it." Cassim demanded an explanation of this enigma; and she unravelled it by acquainting him with the expedient she had used to make this discovery, and showing him the piece of money she had found adhering to the bottom of the measure, a coin so ancient that the name of the prince which was engraven on it was unknown to her.

Far from feeling any satisfaction at the good fortune which his brother had met with, to relieve him from poverty, Cassim conceived an implacable jealousy in consequence. He passed almost the whole night without closing his eyes. The next morning, before sunrise, he went to him. He did not treat him as a brother; that endearing appellation had been forgotten since his marriage with the rich widow. "Ali Baba," said he, addressing him, "you are very reserved in your affairs; you pretend to be poor and miserable, and a beggar, and yet you measure your money." "Brother," replied Ali Baba, "I do not understand your meaning; pray explain yourself." "Do not pretend ignorance," resumed Cassim, showing him the piece of gold his wife had given him; "how many pieces," added he, "have you like this, that my wife found sticking to the bottom of the measure which yours borrowed of her yesterday?"

From this speech, Ali Baba soon conjectured that Cassim, and his wife also, in consequence of his own wife's obstinacy, were already acquainted with what he was so interested to conceal from them; but the discovery was made, and nothing could now be done to remedy the evil. Without showing the least signs of surprise or vexation, he frankly owned to his brother the whole affair, and told him by what chance he had found the retreat of the thieves, and where it was situated; and he offered, if he would agree to keep it secret, to share the treasure with him.

"This I certainly expect," replied Cassim, in a haughty tone; and added, "but I desire to know also the precise spot where this treasure lies concealed; the marks and signs which may lead to it and enable me to visit the place myself, should I feel myself inclined; otherwise, I will go and inform the officer of the police of it. If you refuse to comply, you will not only be deprived of all hope of obtaining any more, but you will even lose that which you have already taken; and I, instead, shall receive my portion for having informed against you."

Ali Baba, led more by his natural goodness of heart than intimidated by the insolent menaces of a cruel brother, gave him all the information he desired, and even told him the words he must pronounce both on entering the cave and on quitting it. Cassim made no further inquiries of Ali Baba, but left him with the determination to prevent him from deriving any further benefit from the treasure he had discovered. Full of the hope of possessing himself of the whole, he set off the next morning, before break of day, with ten mules laden with large hampers which he proposed to fill, still indulging the prospect of taking a much larger number in a second expedition, according to the sums he might find in the cave. He took the road which Ali Baba had pointed out, and arrived at the rock and the tree which, from description, he knew to be the same that had concealed his brother. He looked for the door, and soon discovered it; and, to cause it to open, pronounced the words, "Open, Sesame"; the door obeyed, he entered, and it immediately afterwards closed. Examining the cave, he was in the utmost astonishment to see much more riches than the description of Ali Baba had led him to expect, and his admiration increased as he examined each thing separately. Avaricious as he was, and fond of money, he could have passed the whole day in feasting his eyes with the sight of so much gold; but he reflected that he was come to take away and load his ten mules with as much as he could amass; he took up a number of sacks, and, coming to the door, his mind filled with a multitude of ideas, far removed from that which was of most consequence to him, he found that he had forgotten the important words, and instead of pronouncing "Sesame," he said, "Open, barley." * He was struck with astonishment on perceiving that the door, instead of flying open, remained closed. He named various other kinds of grain; all but the right were called upon, and the door did not move.

Cassim was not prepared for an adventure of this nature; in the imminent danger in which he beheld himself, fear took entire possession of his mind; the more he endeavored to recollect the word "Sesame," the more was his memory confused, and he remained as totally ignorant of it as if he had never heard the word mentioned. He threw the sacks he had collected on the ground, and paced with hasty steps backward and forward in the cave; the riches which surrounded him had no longer charms for his imagination.

But let us leave Cassim to deplore his own fate, for he does not deserve our compassion.

The robbers returned to their cave towards noon; and when they were within a short distance of it, and saw the mules belonging to Cassim laden with hampers, standing about the rock, they were a good deal surprised at such a novelty. They immediately advanced at full speed, and drove away the ten mules, which Cassim had neglected to fasten, and which, therefore, soon took flight, and dispersed in the forest, so as to get quite out of sight. The robbers did not give themselves the trouble to run after the mules; for their chief object was to discover him to whom they belonged. While some were employed in examining the exterior recesses of the rock, the captain, with the others, alighted, and, with their sabres in their hands, went towards the door, pronounced the words, and it opened.

Cassim, who, from the inside of the cave, heard the noise of horses trampling on the ground, did not doubt that the robbers were arrived, and that his death was inevitable. Resolved, however, to attempt one effort to escape and reach some place of safety, he placed himself near the door, ready to run out as soon as it should open. The word "Sesame," which he had in vain endeavored to recall to his remembrance, was scarcely pronounced than it opened, and he rushed out with such violence that he threw the captain on the ground. He did not, however, avoid the other thieves, who, having their sabres drawn, cut him to pieces on the spot.

The first care which occupied the robbers after this execution was to enter the cave. They found the sacks near the door, which Cassim, after having filled them with gold, had removed there for the convenience of loading his mules. These they put in their places again, without observing the deficiency of those which Ali Baba had previously carried away. Deliberating and consulting on this event, they could easily account for Cassim's not having been able to effect his escape; but they could not in any way imagine how he had been able to enter the cave. They conceived that he might have descended from the top of the cave, but the opening, which admitted the light, was so high, and the summit of the rock was so inaccessible on the outside, besides that there were no traces of his having adopted this mode, that they all agreed it was beyond their conjecture. They could not suppose he had entered by the door, unless he had been acquainted with the secret which caused it to open; but they felt quite secure that they alone were possessed of this secret, as they were ignorant of having been overheard by Ali Baba, who was now acquainted with it.

But as the manner in which this circumstance had happened was impenetrable, and their united riches were no longer in safety, they agreed to divide the carcass of Cassim into four quarters, and place them in the cave, near the door, two quarters on one side and two on the other, to frighten away any one who might have the boldness to hazard a similar enterprise; resolving themselves not to return to the cave for some time, until the stench from the corpse should be subsided. This determination formed, they put it in execution; and when they had nothing further to detain them, they left their place of retreat well secured, mounted their horses, and set off to scour the country in such roads as were most frequented by caravans, which afforded them favorable opportunities of exercising their accustomed dexterity in plunder.

The wife of Cassim, in the mean time, was in the greatest uneasiness when she observed night approach, and yet her husband did not return. She went in the utmost alarm to Ali Baba, and said to him, "Brother, you, I believe, are not ignorant that Cassim is gone to the forest, and for what purpose; he is not yet come back, and the night is already advancing; I fear that some accident may have befallen him."

Ali Baba suspected his brother's intention, after the conversation he had held with him; and for this reason he had desisted from visiting the forest on that day, that he might not offend him. However, without uttering any reproaches that could have given either her or her husband, had he been still living, the slightest offence, he replied, that she need not yet feel any uneasiness concerning him, for that Cassim most probably thought it prudent not to return to the city until the night was considerably advanced. The wife of Cassim felt satisfied with this reason, and was more easily persuaded of its truth, as she considered how important it was that her husband should use the greatest secrecy for the accomplishment of his purpose. She returned to her house, and waited patiently till midnight; but after that hour her fears redoubled, and were attended with still greater grief, as she could not proclaim it, nor even relieve it by cries, the cause of which she saw the necessity of concealing from the neighborhood. She then began to repent of the silly curiosity which, instigated by the most blamable envy, had induced her to endeavor to penetrate into the private affairs of her brother and sister in law. The night was spent in weeping, and, at break of day she ran to them, and announced the cause of her early visit, less by her words than by her tears.

Ali Baba did not wait for his sister's entreaties to go and seek for Cassim. He immediately set off with his three asses, advising her first to moderate her affliction, and went to the forest. As he drew near the rock, he was much astonished on observing that blood had been shed near the door; and not having in his way met either his brother or the ten mules he conceived no favorable omen. He reached the door, and on pronouncing the words it opened. He was struck with horror when he distinguished the body of his brother cut into four quarters; yet he did not hesitate on the course he was to pursue in rendering the last act of duty to his brother's remains, notwithstanding the small share of fraternal affection he had received from him during his life. He found materials in the cave to wrap up the body, and making two packets of the four quarters, he placed them on one of his asses, covering them with sticks to conceal them. The other two asses he expeditiously loaded with sacks of gold, putting wood over them as on the preceding occasion; and having finished all he had to do, and commanded the door to close, he took the road to the city, using the precaution to wait at the entrance of the forest, until night was closed, that he might return without being observed. When he got home, he left the two asses that were laden with gold, desiring his wife to take care to unload them; and, having in a few words acquainted her with what had happened to Cassim, he led the other ass to his sister-in-law.

Ali Baba knocked at the door, which was opened to him by Morgiana. This Morgiana was a female slave, crafty, cunning, and fruitful in inventions to forward the success of the most difficult enterprise, in which character Ali Baba knew her well. When he had entered the court, he took off the wood and the two packages from the ass, and taking the slave aside, "Morgiana," said he, "the first thing I have to request of you is inviolable secrecy; you will soon see how necessary it is, not only to me but to your mistress; these two packets contain the body of your master; and we must endeavor to bury him as if he had died a natural death; let me speak to your mistress, and be particularly attentive to what I shall say to her."

Morgiana went to acquaint her mistress, and Ali Baba followed her. "Well, brother," inquired his sister-in-law in an impatient tone, "what news do you bring of my husband? Alas! I perceive no traces of consolation in your countenance." "Sister," replied Ali Baba, "I cannot answer you, unless you will first promise to listen to me from the beginning to the end of my story without interruption. It is of no less importance to you than to me, under the present circumstances, to preserve the greatest secrecy; it is absolutely necessary, for your repose and security." "Ah!" cried the sister, without elevating her voice, "this preamble convinces me that my husband is no more; but, at the same time, I feel the necessity of the secrecy you recommend, whatever violence it may do my feelings: speak, I conjure you."

Ali Baba then related to her all that had happened during his journey, until his arrival with the body of Cassim. "Sister," added he, "here is a new cause of affliction for you, the more distressing as it was unexpected; although the evil is without remedy, if, nevertheless, anything can afford you consolation, I offer to join the small property God has granted me to yours by marrying you; I can assure you, my wife will not be jealous, and you will live comfortably together. If this proposal meets your approbation, we must contrive to bury my brother as if he had died a natural death; and this is a trust which I think you may safely repose in Morgiana, and I will, on my part, contribute all in my power to assist her."

The widow of Cassim reflected that she could not do better than consent to this offer; for he possessed greater riches than she was left with, and besides, by the discovery of the treasure, might increase them considerably. She did not, therefore, refuse his proposal; she, on the contrary, regarded it as a reasonable motive for consolation. She wiped away her tears, which had begun to flow abundantly, and suppressed those mournful cries which women usually utter on the death of their husbands, and thereby sufficiently testified to Ali Baba that she accepted his offer.

Ali Baba left the abode of Cassim in this disposition of mind, and after having strongly recommended to Morgiana to acquit herself properly in the part she was to perform, he returned home with his ass.

Morgiana did not belie her character for cunning. She went out with Ali Baba, and repaired to an apothecary who lived in the neighborhood; she knocked at the shop door, and when it was opened asked for a particular kind of lozenge, of great efficacy in dangerous disorders. The apothecary gave her as much as the money she offered would pay for, asking who was ill in her master's family. "Ah!" exclaimed she, with a deep sigh, "it is my worthy master, Cassim himself. No one can understand his complaint; he can neither speak nor eat." Saying this, she went away with the lozenges, which, in fact, Cassim was no longer in need of.

On the following day Morgiana again went to the same apothecary, and, with tears in her eyes, inquired for an essence, which it was customary only to administer when the patient was reduced to the last extremity, and when no hopes were entertained of life but what the properties of this essence might create. "Alas!" cried she, as she received it from the hands of the apothecary, apparently in the deepest affliction, "I fear this remedy will not be of more use than the lozenges. I shall lose a good master!"

On the other hand, as Ali Baba and his wife were seen going backwards and forwards to the house of Cassim in the course of the day, no one was surprised, towards evening, on hearing the piercing cries of his widow and Morgiana, which announced the death of Cassim. At a very early hour the next morning, when day began to appear, Morgiana knowing that a good old cobbler lived near, who was one of the first to open his shop, went out in search of him. Coming up to him, she wished him a good day, and put a piece of gold into his hand.

Baba Mustapha, known to all the world by this name, was naturally of a gay turn, and had always something laughable to say; examining the piece of money, as it was yet scarcely daylight, and seeing that it was gold, "A good hansel," said he, "what's to be done? I am ready to do what I am bid.' "Baba Mustapha," said Morgiana to him, "take all you want for sewing, and come directly with me; on this condition, though, that you let me put a bandage over your eyes when we have got to a certain place." At these words Baba Mustapha began to make difficulties. "Ho, ho," said he, "you want me to do something against my conscience or my honor?" Then, putting another piece of gold into his hand, "God forbid," said Morgiana, "that I should require you to do anything that would stain your honor; only come with me, and fear nothing."

Baba Mustapha suffered himself to be led by the slave, who, when they had reached the place she had mentioned, bound a handkerchief over his eyes, and conducted him to her deceased master's; nor did she remove the bandage until he was in the chamber where the body was deposited, each quarter in its proper place. Then, taking it off, "Baba Mustapha," said she, "I have brought you here, that you might sew these pieces together. Lose no time, and when you have done I will give you another piece of gold."

When Baba Mustapha had finished his job, Morgiana bound his eyes again before he left the chamber, and having given him the third piece of money, according to her promise, and earnestly admonished him to preserve secrecy, she conducted him to the place where she had first put on the handkerchief; and having again taken it off, she left him to return to his house, following him, however, with her eyes, until he was out of sight, lest he should have the curiosity to return and watch her movements.

Morgiana had heated some water to wash the body of Cassim; and Ali Baba, who entered just as she returned, washed it, perfumed it with incense, and wrapped it in the burying clothes with the accustomed ceremonies. The undertaker also brought the coffin, which Ali Baba had taken care to order. That he might not observe anything particular, Morgiana took the coffin at the door, and, having paid him and sent him away, she assisted Ali Baba to put the body into it. When he had nailed down the boards which covered it, she went to the mosque to give notice that everything was ready for the funeral. The people belonging to the mosque, whose office it is to wash the bodies of the dead, offered to perform the usual function; but she told them that all was done and ready.

Morgiana was scarcely returned, when the Imaun and the other ministers of the mosque arrived. Four of the neighbors took the coffin on their shoulders and carried it to the cemetery, following the Imaun, who repeated prayers as he went along. Morgiana, as slave to the deceased, went next, with her head uncovered, bathed in tears, and uttering the most piteous cries, from time to time beating her breast and tearing her hair: Ali Baba closed the procession, accompanied by some of the neighbors, who occasionally relieved each other in carrying the coffin until they reached the cemetery.

As for the widow of Cassim, she remained at home, to lament and weep with the women of the neighborhood, who, according to the usual custom, repaired to her house during the ceremony of the burial, and, joining their cries to hers, filled the air with sounds of woe. In this manner the fatal end of Cassim was so well dissembled and concealed by Ali Baba, his wife, the widow of Cassim, and Morgiana, that no one in the city had the least suspicion of the fact.

Three or four days after the interment of Cassim, Ali Baba removed the few goods he was possessed of, together with the money he had taken from the robbers' store, which he conveyed by night into the house of the widow of Cassim, in order to establish himself there, which proclaimed his recent marriage with his sister-in-law; and as such marriages are by no means extraordinary in the Mussulman religion, no one showed any marks of surprise on the occasion.

Ali Baba had a son, who had lately ended an apprenticeship with a merchant of considerable repute, and who had always bestowed the highest commendations on his conduct; to this son he gave the shop of Cassim, with a further promise that if he continued to behave with prudence, he should, erelong, marry him advantageously, considering his situation in life.

But let us now leave Ali Baba to enjoy the first dawn of his good fortune, and return to the forty thieves. They came back to their retreat in the forest when the time they had agreed to be absent had expired; but their astonishment was indescribable when they found the body of Cassim gone, and it was greatly increased on perceiving a visible diminution of their treasure. "We are discovered," said the captain, "and lost beyond recovery, if we are not very careful, and take immediate measures to remedy the evil; we shall by insensible degrees lose all these riches, which our predecessors as well as ourselves have amassed with so much trouble and fatigue. All that we can at present judge of the loss we have sustained is, that the thief whom we fortunately surprised at the moment when he was going to make his escape knew the secret of opening the door. But he was not the only one who possessed it; another must have the same knowledge. His body being removed and our treasure diminished are incontestable proofs of the fact. And, as we have no reason to suppose that more than two people are acquainted with the secret, having destroyed one, we must not suffer the other to escape. What say you, my brave men? are you not of my opinion?"

This proposal of the captain was thought so reasonable and proper by the whole troop, that they all approved it, and agreed that it would be advisable to relinquish every other enterprise, and occupy themselves solely with this, which they should not abandon until they had detected the thief.

"I expected no less, from your known courage and bravery," resumed the captain, "but the first thing to be done is, that one of you, who is bold, courageous, and possessed of some address, should go to the city without arms, and in the dress of a traveller and stranger, and employ all his art to discover if the singular death we inflicted on the culprit, whom we destroyed as he deserved, is the common topic of conversation, who he was, and where he lived. This it is absolutely necessary we should be acquainted with, that we may not do anything of which we may have to repent, by making ourselves known in a country where we have been so long forgotten, and where it is so much our interest to remain so. But, in order to inspire him who shall undertake this commission with ardor, and to prevent his bringing us a false report, which might occasion our total ruin, I propose, that if he fail in the mission with which he is intrusted, he shall submit to the penalty of death."

Without waiting for the rest to give their opinions, one of the robbers said, "I willingly submit, and glory in exposing my life for the execution of such a commission. If I fail in the attempt, you will at least remember my courage and good-will in my offer to serve the whole troop."

This robber, after having received the commendation of the captain and his companions, disguised himself in such a way that no one could have suspected him to be what he in reality was. He set off at night, and managed so well that he entered the city just as day was beginning to appear. He went towards the square, where he saw only one shop open, which was that of Baba Mustapha, a poor shoemaker.

Baba Mustapha was seated on his stool, with his awl in his hand, ready to begin his work. The robber went up to him, and wished him a good morning, and perceiving him to be advanced in years, "My good man," said he, "you rise betimes to your work; it is scarcely possible that you can see clearly at this hour, so old as you are; and even if it were broad day, I doubt whether your eyes are good enough to permit you to sew."

"Whoever you are," replied Baba Mustapha, "you do not know much of me. Notwithstanding my age, I have excellent eyes: and so you would have said had you known that not long since I sewed up a dead body in a place where there was not more light than we have now."

The robber felt great satisfaction at having on his arrival addressed himself to a man who immediately gave him, of his own accord, that intelligence which, he did not doubt, was the very same he was in search of. "A dead body!" replied he, with feigned astonishment, to induce the other to proceed, "why sew up a dead body? I suppose you mean that you sewed the shroud in which he was buried?" "No, no," said Baba Mustapha, "I know what I say; you want me to tell you more about it, but you shall not know another syllable."

The robber wanted no further proof to be fully persuaded that he was in a good train to discover what he was in search of. He drew out a piece of gold, and, putting it into Baba Mustapha's hand, he said, "I have no desire to become acquainted with your secret, although I can assure you I should not divulge it, even if you had intrusted me with it; the only thing which I entreat of you is to have the goodness to direct me, or to come with me, and show me the house where you sewed up the dead body."

"Should I even feel myself inclined to grant your request," replied Baba Mustapha, holding the piece of money in his hand, ready to return it, "I assure you that I could not do it, and this you may take my word for. And I will tell you the reason; they took me to a particular place, and there they bound my eyes and led me to the house; and when I had finished what I had to do, I was conducted back to the same place in the same manner. You see, therefore, how impossible it is that I should be of any service to you." "But at least," resumed the robber, "you must remember nearly the way you went after your eyes were bound; pray come with me; I will put a bandage over your eyes at that place, and we will walk together along the same streets, and follow the same turnings, which you will probably recollect to have gone over before; and, as all trouble deserves a reward, here is another piece of gold; come, grant me this favor." Saying these words, he put another piece of money into his hand.

The two pieces of gold tempted Baba Mustapha; he looked at them in his hand for some time without saying a word, consulting within himself what he should do. At length he drew his purse from his bosom, and putting them in it, "I cannot positively assure you," said he, "that I remember exactly the way they took me; but since you will have it so, come along; I will do my best to remember it."

To the great satisfaction of the robber, Baba Mustapha rose to go with him, and without shutting up his shop, in which there was nothing of consequence to lose, he conducted the robber to the spot where Morgiana had put the bandage over his eyes. When they were arrived, "This is the place," said he, "where my eyes were bound, and I was turned the way you see me." The robber, who had his handkerchief ready, tied it over his eyes, and walked by his side, partly leading him, and partly being conducted by him, till he stopped.

Baba Mustapha then said, "I think I did not go farther than this"; and he was, in fact, exactly before the house which formerly belonged to Cassim, and where Ali Baba now resided. Before he took the bandage from his eyes, the robber quickly made a mark on the door with some chalk he had for the purpose; and when he had taken it off, he asked him if he knew to whom the house belonged. Baba Mustapha replied that he did not live in that division of the town, and therefore could not give any information respecting it. As the robber found he could gain no further intelligence from Baba Mustapha, he thanked him for the trouble he had taken; and when he left him to return to his shop, he took the road to the forest, where, he was persuaded, he should be well received.

Soon after the robber and Baba Mustapha had separated, Morgiana had occasion to go out on some errand, and when she returned, she observed the mark which the robber had made on the door of Ali Baba's house. She stopped to consider it. "What can this mark signify?" thought she; "has any one a spite against my master, or has it been done only for diversion? Be the motive what it may, it will be well to use precautions against the worst that may happen." She therefore took some chalk, and as several of the doors both above and below her master's were alike, she marked them in the same manner, and then went in without saying anything of what she had done, either to her master or mistress.

The robber in the mean time had arrived at the forest, where he rejoined his companions at an early hour. He related the success of his journey, dwelling much on the good fortune that had befriended him in discovering so soon the very man who could give him the best information on the subject of his errand, and which no one but him could have acquainted him with. They all listened to him with great satisfaction; and the captain, after praising his diligence, thus addressed the party: "Comrades," said he, "we have no time to lose; let us arm ourselves, yet conceal our weapons, and depart; and when we have entered the city, which, not to create suspicion, we had best do separately, let us all assemble in the great square, some on one side of it, some on the other, and I will go and find out the house with our companion who has brought us this good news, by which I shall be able to judge what method will be most advantageous."

The robbers all applauded their captain's proposal, and they were soon equipped for their departure. They went in small parties of two or three; and, walking a short distance from each other, they entered the city without occasioning any suspicion. The captain, and he who had been there in the morning, were the last to enter it, and the latter conducted the captain to the street in which he had marked the house of Ali Baba. When they reached the first house that had been marked by Morgiana, he pointed it out, saying that was the one. But as they continued walking on without stopping, that they might not raise suspicion, the captain perceived that the next door was marked exactly in the same manner, which he observed to his guide, and inquired whether this was the house, or that they had passed? His guide was quite confused, and knew not what to answer; and his embarrassment increased when, on proceeding with the captain, he found that four or five doors successively had the same mark. He assured the captain, with an oath, that he had marked but one. "I cannot conceive," added he, "who can have imitated my mark with so much exactness; but I confess that I cannot now distinguish that which I had marked."

The captain, who found that his design did not succeed, returned to the great square, where he told the first of his people whom he met to acquaint the rest that they had lost their labor, and made a fruitless expedition, and that now nothing remained but to return to their place of retreat. He set the example, and they all followed in the same order they came.

When the troop had reassembled in the forest, the captain explained to them the reason of his having ordered them to return. The conductor was unanimously declared deserving of death, and he joined in his own condemnation, owning that he should have been more cautious in taking his measures; and he presented his head with firmness to him who advanced to sever it from his body.

As it was necessary for the safety and preservation of the whole band that so great an injury should not pass off unrevenged, another robber, who flattered himself with hopes of better success than he who had just been punished, presented himself, and requested the preference. It was granted him. He went to the city, corrupted Baba Mustapha by the same artifice that the first had used, and he led him to the house of Ali Baba with his eyes bound.

The thief marked it with red, in a place where it would be less discernible, thinking that would be a sure method of distinguishing it from those that were marked with white. But a short time after Morgiana went out as on the preceding day, and on her return the red mark did not escape her piercing eye. She reasoned as before, and did not fail to make a similar red mark on the neighboring doors.

The robber, when he returned to his companions in the forest, boasted of the precautions he had taken, which he declared to be infallible, to distinguish the house of Ali Baba from the others. The captain and the rest thought, with him, that success was sure. They repaired to the city in the same order, and with as much care as before, armed also in the same way, ready to execute the blow they had meditated; the captain and the robber went immediately to the street where Ali Baba resided; but the same difficulty occurred as on the former occasion. The captain was irritated, and the robber in as great consternation as he who had preceded him in the same business.

Thus was the captain obliged to return again with his comrades, as little satisfied with his expedition as he had been on the preceding one. The robber who was the author of the disappointment underwent the punishment to which he had before voluntarily submitted himself.

The captain, seeing his troop diminished by two brave associates, feared it might still decrease if he continued to trust to others the discovery of the house where Ali Baba resided. Their example convinced him that they did not excel in affairs that depended on the head so greatly as in those in which strength of arm was required. He therefore undertook the business himself; he went to the city, and with the assistance of Baba Mustapha, who was ready to perform the same service for him which he had done for the other two, he found the house of Ali Baba; but not choosing to amuse himself in making marks on it, which had hitherto proved so fallacious, he examined it so thoroughly, by looking at it attentively and passing before it several times, that at last he was certain he could not mistake it.

The captain, satisfied of having secured the object of his journey, returned to the forest, and when he had reached the cave where the rest of the robbers were waiting his return, "Comrades," said he, "nothing now can prevent our taking full revenge for the injury that has been done us. I know with certainty the house of the culprit, and on the road I have meditated a way of making him feel our revenge so privately that no one shall be able to discover the place of our retreat, any more than that where our treasure is deposited; for this must be our principal object in our enterprise, otherwise, instead of being serviceable, it will only prove fatal to us all. To obtain this end, this is what I conceived: and when I have explained the plan to you, if any one can propose a better expedient, let him communicate it." He then told them in what manner he intended to conduct the affair, and as they all gave their approbation, he ordered them to divide into small parties, and go into the neighboring towns and villages, and buy nineteen mules and thirty-eight large leathern jars, to carry oil, one of which must be full, and all the others empty.

In the course of two or three days the robbers completed their purchase; and as the empty jars were rather too narrow at the mouth for the purpose he intended, the captain had them enlarged. Then having made one of his men enter each jar, armed as he thought necessary, he closed them so as to appear full of oil, leaving, however, a part open to admit air for them to breathe; and, the better to carry on the deception, he rubbed the outside of the jars with oil, which he took from the full one.

Things being thus disposed, the mules were laden with the thirty-seven robbers, each concealed in a jar, and the jar that was filled with oil; when their captain, as conductor, took the road to the city at the hour that had been agreed, and arrived about an hour after sunset, as he proposed. He went straight to the house of Ali Baba, intending to knock and request admission for the night for himself and his mules. He was, however, spared the trouble of knocking; he found Ali Baba at the door, enjoying the fresh air after supper. He stopped his mules, and addressing himself to Ali Baba, "Sir," said he, "I have brought the oil which you see from a great distance, to sell it to-morrow at the market; and at this late hour I do not know where to go to pass the night; if it would not occasion you much inconvenience, do me the favor to take me in for the night; you will confer a great obligation on me."

Although Ali Baba had seen the man who now spoke to him in the forest, and had even heard his voice, yet he had no idea that this was the captain of the forty robbers disguised as an oil-merchant. "You are welcome; come in," said he; and immediately made room for him and his mules to go in. At the same time, Ali Baba called a slave, and ordered him, when the mules were unladen, to put them under cover in the stable, and give them some hay and corn. He also took the trouble of going into the kitchen, to desire Morgiana to get a supper quickly for a guest who was just arrived, and to prepare him a chamber and bed.

Ali Baba did more to receive his guest with all possible civility; observing that, after he had unladen his mules, and they were taken into the stables as he had commanded, that he was seeking for a place to pass the night in, he went to him to beg him to come into the room where he received company, saying that he could not suffer him to think of passing the night in the court. The captain of the robbers endeavored to excuse himself from accepting the invitation under the pretence of not giving trouble, but in reality that he might have an opportunity of executing what he meditated with more ease; and it was not until Ali Baba had used the most urgent persuasions that he complied with his civility.

Ali Baba remained with his perfidious guest, who sought his life in return for his hospitality, until Morgiana had served the supper, and he conversed with him on various subjects which he thought might amuse him, and did not leave him till he had finished the repast he had provided. He then said, "You are at liberty to do as you please; you have only to ask for whatever you may want, and everything I have is at your service."

The captain of the robbers rose with Ali Baba, and accompanied him to the door, and while the latter went into the kitchen to speak to Morgiana, he went into the court with the pretext of going to the stables to see after his mules.

Ali Baba, having again enjoined Morgiana to be attentive to his guest, and to observe that he wanted nothing, added, "I give you notice that to-morrow, before daybreak, I shall go to the bath. Take care that my bathing-linen is ready, and give it to Abdalla (this was the name of the slave), and make me some good broth to take when I return." After giving these orders, he went to bed.

The captain of the robbers, in the mean time, on leaving the stable, went to give his people the necessary orders for what they were to do. Beginning from the first jar, and going through the whole number, he said to each, "When I shall throw some pebbles from the chamber where I am to be lodged to-night, do not fail to rip open the jar from top to bottom with the knife you are furnished with, and to come out; I shall be with you immediately after." The knives he spoke of were pointed and sharpened for the purpose. This being done, he returned, and when he got to the kitchen door, Morgiana took a light, and conducted him to the chamber she had prepared for him, and there left him, first asking if he were in want of anything more. Not to create any suspicion, he put out the light a short time after, and lay down in his clothes, to be ready to rise as soon as he had taken his first sleep.

Morgiana did not forget Ali Baba's orders; she prepared his linen for the bath, and gave it to Abdalla, who was not yet gone to bed, and put the pot on the fire to make the broth; but while she was skimming it, the lamp went out. There was no more oil in the house, and she had not any candle. She knew not what to do. She wanted a light to see to skim the pot, and mentioned her disaster to Abdalla. "Why are you so much disturbed at it?" said he. "Go and take some oil out of one of the jars in the court."

Morgiana thanked Abdalla for the hint, and while he retired to bed in the next room to Ali Baba, that he might be ready to go with him to the bath, she took the oil cruse, and went into the court. As she drew near to the first jar that presented itself, the thief who was concealed within said in a low voice, "Is it time?"

Although he had spoken softly, Morgiana was nevertheless struck with the sound, which she heard the more distinctly as the captain, when he had unladen his mules, had opened all the jars, and this amongst the rest, to give a little air to his men, who, though not absolutely deprived of breathing room, were nevertheless in an uneasy situation.

Any other slave except Morgiana, in the first moment of surprise at finding a man in the jar instead of some oil, as she expected, would have screamed, and made a great uproar, which might have created irremediable misfortunes. But Morgiana was superior to those usually in her station; she was instantly aware of the importance of secrecy in the affair, and the extreme danger in which Ali Baba and his family, as well as herself, were; and also of the urgent necessity of devising a speedy remedy that should be executed with privacy. Her quick imagination soon conceived the means. She collected her thoughts, and, without showing any emotion, she assumed the manner of the captain, and answered, "Not yet, but presently" She approached the next jar, and the same question was asked her, she went on to them all in succession, making the same answer to the same question, till she came to the last, which was full of oil.

Morgiana by this means discovered that her master, who supposed he was giving a night's lodging to an oil merchant only, had afforded shelter to thirty-eight robbers, including the pretended merchant, their captain. She quickly filled her cruse from the last jar, and returned into the kitchen; and after having put some oil in her lamp, and lighted it, she took a large kettle and went again into the court, to fill it with oil from the jar. This done, she brought it back again, put it over the fire, and made a great blaze under it with a quantity of wood; for the sooner the oil boiled, the sooner her plan, which was for the welfare of the whole family, would be executed; and it required the utmost despatch. At length the oil boiled. She took the kettle, and poured into each jar, from the first to the last, sufficient boiling oil to scald the robbers, and deprive them of life, which she effected to her wishes.

This act, so worthy of the intrepidity of Morgiana, being performed without noise or disturbance to any one, exactly as she had conceived it, she returned to the kitchen with the empty kettle, and shut the door. She put out the large fire she had made up for this purpose, and only left enough to finish boiling the broth for Ali Baba. She then blew out the lamp, and remained perfectly silent, determined not to go to bed until she had observed, as well as the obscurity of night would allow her to distinguish, what would ensue from a window of the kitchen which overlooked the court.

Morgiana had scarcely waited a quarter of an hour, when the captain of the robbers got up, and, opening the window, looked out; all was dark, and a profound silence reigned; he gave the signal by throwing the pebbles, many of which fell on the jars, as the sound plainly proved. He listened, but heard nothing that could lead him to suppose his men obeyed the summons. He became uneasy at this delay, and threw some pebbles down a second, and even a third time. They all struck the jars, yet nothing appeared to indicate that they were attended to; he was at a loss to account for this mystery. He descended into the court in the utmost alarm, with as little noise as possible; and approaching the first jar, as he was going to ask if the robber contained in it, and whom he supposed still living, was asleep, he smelt a strong scent of hot and burning oil, issuing from the jar, by which he suspected his enterprise against Ali Baba — to destroy him, pillage his house, and carry off, if possible, all the money which he had taken from him and the community — had failed. He proceeded to the next jar, and to all in succession, and discovered that all his men had shared the same fate, and by the diminution of the oil in that which he had brought full, he guessed the means that had been used to deprive him of the assistance he expected. Mortified at having thus missed his aim, he jumped over the garden gate, which led out of the court; and, going from one garden to another by getting over the walls, succeeded in making his escape.

When Morgiana perceived that all was silent, and that the captain of the thieves did not return, she concluded he had decamped, as he did, instead of attempting to escape by the house door, which was fastened with double bolts. Fully satisfied and overjoyed at having so well succeeded in securing the safety of the whole family, she at length retired to bed, and soon fell asleep.

Ali Baba went out before daybreak, and repaired to the bath, followed by his slave, totally ignorant of the surprising event which had taken place in his house during his sleep; for Morgiana had not thought it necessary to wake him, particularly as she had no time to lose while she was engaged in her perilous enterprise; and it was useless to interrupt his repose after she had averted the danger.

When he returned from the bath, the sun being risen, Ali Baba was surprised to see the jars of oil still in their places, and that the merchant had not taken them to the market with his mules; he inquired the reason of Morgiana, who let him in, and who had left everything in its original state, in order to show him the deceit which had been practised on him, and to convince him more sensibly of the effort she had made for his preservation.

"My good master," said Morgiana in reply to Ali Baba's question, "may God preserve you and all your family. You will be better informed of what you wish to know, when you shall have seen what I am going to show you, if you will take the trouble to come with me." Ali Baba followed Morgiana, and when she shut the door, she took him to the first jar, and bid him look in and see if it contained oil. He did as she desired; and perceiving a man in the jar, he hastily drew back, uttering a cry of surprise. "Do not be afraid," said she; "the man you see there will not do you any harm; he has attempted it, but he will never hurt either you or any one else again, for he is now a lifeless corpse." "Morgiana!" exclaimed Ali Baba, "what does all this mean? Explain this mystery." "I will explain it," replied Morgiana, "but moderate your astonishment, and do not awaken the curiosity of your neighbors to learn what it is of the utmost importance that you should keep secret and concealed. Look first at all the other jars."

Ali Baba examined all the rest of the jars, one after the other, from the first till he came to the last, which contained the oil; and he remarked that its contents were considerably diminished. He remained motionless with astonishment, sometimes casting his eyes on Morgiana, then looking at the jars, yet without speaking a word, so great was his surprise. At length, as if speech were suddenly restored to him, he said, "And what is become of the merchant?"

"The merchant," replied Morgiana, "is just as much a merchant as I am. I can tell you who he is, and what is become of him. But you will hear the whole history more conveniently in your own chamber, for it is now time, for the sake of your health, that you should take your broth, after coming out of the bath." Whilst Ali Baba went into his room, Morgiana returned to the kitchen to get the broth; and when she brought it, before Ali Baba would take it, he said, "Relate this wonderful history, and satisfy the extreme impatience I feel to know all its circumstances."

Morgiana, in obedience to Ali Baba's request, thus began: "Last night, sir, when you had retired to go to bed, I prepared your linen for the bath, as you had desired, and gave it in charge to Abdalla. After that, I put the pot on the fire, to make your broth; and as I was skimming it, the lamp, for want of oil, suddenly went out, and there was not a drop in the cruse. I searched for some ends of candles, but could not find one. Abdalla, seeing me puzzled, reminded me of the jars full of oil which were in the court, for thus he, as well as I, supposed them to be, and so, no doubt, did you. I took my cruse, and went to the first jar; but as I approached it, I heard a voice within it, saying, 'Is it time?' I did not feel terrified, but instantly conceiving the treachery intended by the feigned merchant, I replied, without hesitation, 'Not yet, but presently.' I passed on to the next jar, and another voice asked me the same question, to which I made the same answer. I went to all the jars, one after the other, to the same inquiry making the same reply, and did not find any oil till I came to the last, from which I filled my cruse.

"When I reflected that there were thirty-seven robbers in your court, who only waited for the signal or order of their chief, to whom, supposing him to be a merchant, you had given so hospitable a reception, and on whose account you put the whole family in such bustle, I lost no time, but brought in the cruse, and lighted my lamp; then, taking the largest kettle in the kitchen, I went to fill it with oil. I placed it on the fire, and when it boiled I poured some into each of the jars which contained the robbers, as much as I thought sufficient to prevent their putting in execution the pernicious design which had brought them hither.

"The affair being thus terminated in the way I had meditated, I returned into the kitchen, and extinguished my lamp, and placed myself at the window to watch quietly what method the pretended oil-merchant would adopt.

"After some time, I heard him throw from his window some little pebbles, as a signal, which fell on the jars. He threw some a second, and also a third time, and as he neither heard nor saw anything stirring, he came down, and I observed him go to every jar, till he came to the last; after which the darkness of the night prevented my being able to distinguish his movements. I still continued, however, to observe; but as I found he did not return, I concluded that he had escaped by way of the garden, mortified at his bad success. Persuaded, therefore, that the family were now safe, I went to bed."

As she finished this narrative, Morgiana added, "This is the detail you required of me; and I am convinced that it is the conclusion of a scheme of which I observed the beginning two or three days ago, but of which I did not think it necessary to trouble you with an account. One morning, as I returned from the city at an early hour, I perceived the street door to be marked with white, and on the following day with red near the white mark; each time, without knowing for what purpose these marks were made, I made the same kind of mark, and in the same part, on the doors of three or four of our neighbors, both above and below this house. If you connect that with what has happened, you will find that the whole is a machination contrived by the robbers of the forest, whose troop, I know not wherefore, seems to be diminished by two. But, be that as it may, it is now reduced to three at most. This proves that they had determined on your death, and you will do right to be on your guard against them, so long as you are certain that one still remains. On my part, I will do all in my power towards your preservation, which, indeed, I consider my duty."

When Morgiana ceased speaking, Ali Baba, penetrated with gratitude for the great obligation he owed her, replied, "I will recompense you as you deserve before I die. I owe my life to you, and to give you an immediate proof of my feelings on the occasion, I from this moment give you your liberty, and will soon reward you in a more ample manner. I am persuaded, as well as yourself, that the forty robbers laid this snare for me; God, through your means, has delivered me from the danger; I hope he will continue to protect me from their malice, and that, by averting destruction from my head, he will make it recoil with greater certainty on them, and thus deliver the world from so cursed a persecution. What we have now to do, is to use the utmost despatch in burying the bodies of the robbers, yet with so much secrecy that no one can entertain the slightest suspicion of their fate; and for this purpose I will instantly go to work with Abdalla."

Ali Baba's garden was of considerable length, and terminated by large trees. He went without delay, with his slave, to dig a ditch or grave under these trees, of sufficient length and breadth to contain the bodies. The ground was soft and easy to remove, so that they were not long in completing their work. They took the bodies out of the jars, and set apart the arms with which the robbers had furnished themselves. They then carried the bodies to the bottom of the garden, and placed them in the grave, and after having covered them with the earth they had previously removed, they spread about what remained, to make the surface of the ground appear even as it was before. Ali Baba carefully concealed the oil jars and the arms; and as for the mules, which he was not then in want of, he sent them to the market at different times, where he disposed of them by means of his slave.

Whilst Ali Baba was taking these precautions to prevent its being publicly known by what means he had become so rich in so short a space of time, the captain of the forty robbers had returned to the forest, mortified beyond measure; and in the agitation, or rather confusion, which he experienced at having met with such bad success, so contrary to what he had promised himself, he had reached the cavern without coming to any resolution as to what he should or should not do respecting Ali Baba.

The dismal solitude of this gloomy habitation appeared to him insupportable. "Brave companions," cried he, "partners of my labors and my pains, where are ye? What can I accomplish without your assistance? Did I select and assemble you only to see you perish all at one moment by a destiny so fatal and so unworthy of your courage? My regret for your loss would not have been so strong had you died with your sabres in your hands, like valiant men. When shall I be able to collect together another troop of intrepid men like you? and, even should I wish it, how could I undertake it, without exposing so much specie, in gold and silver, to the mercy of him who has already enriched himself with a part of this treasure? I cannot, I must not, think of such an enterprise until I have put a period to his existence. What I have not been able to accomplish with such powerful assistance, I will perform alone; and when I shall have secured this immense property from being exposed to pillage, I will endeavor to provide a master and successors for it after my decease, that it may be not only preserved, but augmented to the latest posterity." Having formed this resolution, he felt no embarrassment as to the execution of it; and then, his mind tranquil and filled with the most pleasing hopes, he fell asleep, and passed the rest of the night very quietly.

The next morning the captain of the robbers awoke at an early hour, as he had proposed, and put on a dress suitable to the design he meditated, and repaired to the city, where he took a lodging in a khan. As he supposed that what had happened in the house of Ali Baba might have become generally known, he asked the host if there were any news stirring; in reply to which the host talked on a variety of subjects, but none relating to what the captain wished to be informed of. By this he concluded that the reason why Ali Baba kept the transaction so profoundly secret, was, that he did not wish it to be divulged that he had access to so immense a treasure; and also that he was apprehensive of his life being in danger on this account. This idea excited him to neglect nothing that could hasten his destruction, which he intended to accomplish by means as secret as Ali Baba had adopted towards the robbers.

The captain provided himself with a horse, which he made use of to convey to his lodging several kinds of rich stuffs and fine linens, bringing them from the forest at various times, with all the necessary precautions for keeping the place whence he brought them still concealed. In order to dispose of this merchandise, when he had collected together as much as he thought proper, he sought for a shop. Having found one that would suit him, he hired it of the proprietor, furnished it with his goods, and established himself in it. The shop that was exactly opposite to his was that which had belonged to Cassim, and was now occupied by the son of Ali Baba.

The captain of the robbers, who had assumed the name of Cogia Houssain, did not fail in the proper civilities to the merchants, his neighbors, which, as being lately come, was the usual custom. But the son of Ali Baba being young, and of a pleasing address, and the captain having more frequent occasion to converse with him than with the others, he very soon formed an intimacy with him. This friendship he soon resolved to cultivate with greater assiduity and care when, three or four days after he was settled in his shop, he recognized Ali Baba, who came to see his son, as he was in the constant habit of doing, and, on inquiring of the son after his departure, discovered that he was his father. He now increased his attentions and caresses towards him; he made him several little presents, and also often invited him to his table, where he regaled him very handsomely.

The son of Ali Baba did not choose to receive so many obligations from Cogia Houssain without returning them. But his lodging was small, and he had no convenience for regaling him as he wished. He mentioned his intention to his father; adding, that it was not proper that he should delay any longer to return the favors he had received from Cogia Houssain.

Ali Baba very willingly took the charge of the entertainment. "My son," said he, "to-morrow is Friday; and as it is a day on which the most considerable merchants, such as Cogia Houssain and yourself, keep their shops shut, invite him to take a walk with you after dinner, and as you return direct your course so that you may pass my house, and then beg him to come in. It will be better to manage thus than to invite him in a formal way. I will give orders to Morgiana to prepare a supper and have it ready by the time you come."

On the Friday, Cogia Houssain and the son of Ali Baba met in the afternoon to take their walk together, as had been agreed. On their return, the son of Ali Baba, as if by accident, led Cogia Houssain through the street in which his father lived; and when they had reached the house, he stopped him, and knocked at the door. "This," said he, "is my father's house; he has desired me to procure him the honor of your acquaintance, after what I told him of your friendship for me. I entreat you to add this favor to the many I have already received from you."

Although Cogia Houssain had now reached the object of his desires, which was to gain admission into the house of Ali Baba, and to attempt his life without hazarding his own or creating any suspicion, yet he now endeavored to excuse himself, and pretended to take leave of the son; but, as the slave of Ali Baba opened the door at that moment, the son, in an obliging manner, took him by the hand, and, going in first, drew him forward, and, as it were, forced him to comply, though seemingly against his wishes.

Ali Baba received Cogia Houssain in a friendly manner, and gave him as hearty a welcome as he could desire. He thanked him for his kindness to his son. "The obligation he is under to you," added he, "as well as myself, is so much the more considerable, as he is a young man who has not yet been much in the world, and you have the goodness to condescend to form his manners."

Cogia Houssain did not spare his compliments in return for Ali Baba's assurance that, although his son had not acquired the experience of older men, yet that he was possessed of a portion of good sense, which was of more service to him than experience was to many others.

After a short conversation on other topics of an indifferent nature, Cogia Houssain was going to take his leave, but Ali Baba stopped him. "Where are you going, sir?" said he: "I entreat you to do me the honor of staying to sup with me. The humble meal you will partake of is little worthy of the honor you will confer on it; but, such as it is, I hope you will accept the intention with as much good-will as I offer it."

"Sir," replied Cogia Houssain, "I am fully persuaded of your kindness; and, although I beg you to excuse me if I take my leave without accepting your obliging invitation, yet I entreat you to believe that I refuse you not from incivility or contempt, but because I have a very strong reason, and which I am sure you would approve were it known to you."

"What can this reason be, sir," resumed Ali Baba, "may I take the liberty of asking?" "I do not refuse to tell it," said Cogia Houssain. "It is this: I never eat of any dish that has salt in it;* judge, then, of the figure I should make at your table." "If this be your only reason," replied Ali Baba, "it need not deprive me of the honor of your company at supper, unless you have absolutely determined otherwise. In the first place, the bread which is eaten in my house does not contain any salt; and as for the meat and other dishes, I promise you there shall be none in those which are served before you; I will now go to give orders to that effect; you will, therefore, do me the favor to remain, and I will be with you in an instant."

Ali Baba went into the kitchen, and desired Morgiana not to put any salt to the meat she was going to serve for supper, and also to prepare two or three dishes of those he had ordered without any salt.

Morgiana, who was just going to serve the supper, could not avoid expressing some discontent at this new order, and making some inquiries of Ali Baba. "Who," said she, "is this difficult man, that cannot eat salt? Your supper will be good for nothing if I delay it any later."

"Do not be angry," replied Ali Baba, "he is a good man; do what I desire you."

Morgiana obeyed, but much against her will, and she felt some curiosity to see this man who did not eat salt. When she had finished, and Abdalla had prepared the table, she assisted him in carrying in the dishes. On looking at Cogia Houssain, she instantly recollected him to be the captain of the rob-

* Salt, among Mohammedans, is held sacred. To eat salt with a person is a token of amity no less binding than if ratified by an oath. The robbers of the Arabian Deserts will protect him with whom they have eaten salt, even though a known enemy to their race. And though it is a general maxim among Moslems that faith is not to be kept with infidels, the having partaken salt with one constitutes an indispensable obligation to deal honestly with him. Lord Byron, in his poem of the "Giaour," alludes to the sacred "bread and salt" of the East. To evade the obligation of eating salt with his intended victim, the captain of the robbers feigns a distaste for food flavored with the sacred ingredient.

bers, notwithstanding his disguise; and examining him with attention, she perceived that he had a dagger concealed under his dress. "I am no longer surprised," said she to herself, "that this villain will not eat salt with my master; he is his bitterest enemy, and means to murder him; but I will prevent him from accomplishing his purpose."

When Morgiana had finished serving the dishes and assisting Abdalla, she availed herself of the time while they were at supper, and made the necessary preparations for the execution of an enterprise of the boldest and most intrepid nature; and she had just completed them when Abdalla came to acquaint her that it was time to serve the fruit. She carried it in, and when Abdalla had taken away the supper, she placed it on the table. She then put a small table near Ali Baba, with the wine and three cups, and left the room with Abdalla, as if to go to supper together, and leave Ali Baba, according to custom, at liberty to converse and entertain himself with his guest, and to push the wine about.

Cogia Houssain, or rather the captain of the forty robbers, now thought that a favorable opportunity for revenging himself on Ali Baba, by taking his life, was arrived. "I will make them both intoxicated," thought he; "and then the son, against whom I bear no malice, will not prevent my plunging my dagger into the heart of his father; and I shall escape by way of the garden, as I did before, while the cook and the slave are at their supper, or perhaps asleep in the kitchen."

Instead, however, of going to supper, Morgiana, who had penetrated into the views of the pretended Cogia Houssain, did not allow him time to put his wicked intentions in execution. She dressed herself like a dancer, put on a head-dress suitable to that character, and wore a girdle round her waist of silver gilt, to which she fastened a dagger made of the same metal. Her face was covered by a very handsome mask. When she had thus disguised herself, she said to Abdalla, "Take your tabor, and let us go and entertain our master's guest, who is the friend of his son, as we do sometimes, by our performances."

Abdalla took his tabor, and began to play as he walked before: Morgiana followed him and made a low courtesy with a deliberate air, to attract notice, as if to request permission to perform what she could to amuse the company. Abdalla, perceiving that Ali Baba was going to speak, ceased striking his tabor. "Come in, Morgiana," cried Ali Baba, "Cogia Houssain will judge of your skill, and tell us his opinion; do not, however, suppose, sir," continued he, addressing Cogia Houssain, "that I have been at any expense to procure you this entertainment, for it is only my slave and my cook and housekeeper whom you see. I hope you will find it amusing."

Cogia Houssain did not expect Ali Baba to add this entertainment to the supper he had given him. This made him apprehensive that he should not be able to avail himself of the opportunity he thought now presented itself. But, should that be the case, he still consoled himself with the hopes of meeting with another if he continued the acquaintance with Ali Baba and his son. Therefore, although he would gladly have dispensed with this addition to the entertainment, he nevertheless pretended to be obliged to him, and added, that whatever gave Ali Baba pleasure could not fail of being agreeable to him.

When Abdalla perceived that Ali Baba and Cogia Houssain had ceased speaking, he again began to play on his tabor, singing to it an air for Morgiana to dance to; she, who was equal to any one who practised dancing for their profession, performed her part so admirably that every spectator who had seen her must have been delighted, independent of the present company, of which, perhaps, Cogia Houssain was the least attentive to her excellence.

After having performed several dances with equal grace and agility, she at length drew out the dagger, and, dancing with it in her hand, she surpassed all she had yet done, by her light movements and high leaps, and by the wonderful efforts which she interspersed in the figure; sometimes presenting the dagger as if to strike, and at others holding it to her own bosom, pretending to stab herself.

At length, as if out of breath, she took the tabor from Abdalla with her left hand, and, holding the dagger in her right, she presented the tabor with the hollow part upwards to Ali Baba, in imitation of the dancers by profession, who make use of this practice to excite the liberality of the spectators.

Ali Baba threw a piece of gold into the tabor; Morgiana then presented it to his son, who followed his father's example. Cogia Houssain, who saw that she was advancing towards him for the same purpose, had already taken his purse from his bosom to contribute his present, and was putting his hand into it, when Morgiana, with a courage and fortitude equal to the resolution she had taken, plunged the dagger into his heart so deep that the life-blood streamed from the wound when she withdrew it.

Ali Baba and his son, terrified at this action, uttered a loud cry: "Wretch!" exclaimed Ali Baba, "what hast thou done? Thou hast ruined me and my family forever!"

"What I have done," replied Morgiana, "is not for your ruin, but for your preservation." Then, opening Cogia Houssain's robe to show Ali Baba the poniard which was concealed under it, "See," continued she, "the cruel enemy you had to deal with; examine his countenance attentively, and you will recognize the pretended oil-merchant and the captain of the forty robbers. Do you not recollect that he refused to eat salt with you? Can you require a stronger proof of his malicious intentions? Before I even saw him, from the moment you told me of this peculiarity in your guest, I suspected his design, and you now are convinced that my suspicions were not ill-founded."

Ali Baba, who was now aware of the fresh obligation he owed to Morgiana for having thus preserved his life a second time, embraced her, and said, "Morgiana, I gave you your liberty, and at the same time promised to give you stronger proofs of my gratitude at some future period. This period is now arrived, and I present you to my son as his wife." Then, addressing his son, "I believe you," said he, "to be so dutiful a son that you will not take it amiss if I should bestow Morgiana upon you without previously consulting your inclinations. Your obligation to her is not less than mine. You plainly see that Cogia Houssain only sought your acquaintance in order to insure success in his diabolical treachery; and, had he sacrificed me to his vengeance, you cannot suppose that you would have been spared. You must further consider that, in marrying Morgiana, you connect yourself with the preserver of my family and the support of yours to the end of your days."

His son, far from showing any symptoms of discontent, said that he willingly consented to the marriage, not only because he was desirous of proving his ready obedience to his father's wishes, but also because his inclination already strongly urged him to the union. They then began to prepare for the interment of the captain of the robbers, by the side of his former companions; and this was performed with such secrecy, that the circumstance was not known till the expiration of many years, when no one was any longer interested to keep this memorable history concealed.

A few days after, Ali Baba had the nuptials of his son and Morgiana celebrated with great solemnity, by a sumptuous feast accompanied by dancers, exhibitions, and other customary diversions, and he had the satisfaction to observe that the friends and neighbors he had invited, who did not know the true reason of the marriage, but were not unacquainted with the good qualities of Morgiana, admired his generosity and discrimination.

After the marriage was solemnized, Ali Baba, who had not revisited the cave since he had brought away the body of his brother, Cassim, on one of the three asses, together with the gold with which the other two were laden, lest he should meet with any of the robbers and be surprised by them, still refrained from going, even after the death of the thirty-seven robbers and their captain, as he was ignorant of the fate of the other two, and supposed them to be still alive.

At the expiration of a year, however, finding that no scheme had been attempted to disturb his quiet, he had the curiosity to make a journey to the cave, taking the necessary precautions for his safety. He mounted his horse, and, when he had nearly reached the cave, seeing no traces of either men or horses, he conceived it to be a favorable omen; he dismounted, and, fastening his horse that he might not go astray, he went up to the door and repeated the words, "Open, Sesame," which he had not forgotten. The door opened, and he entered. The state in which everything appeared in the cave led him to judge that no one had been in it from the time that the pretended Cogia Houssain had opened his shop in the city; and he therefore concluded that the whole troop of robbers was totally dispersed or exterminated, and that he was the only person in the whole world who was acquainted with the secret for entering the cave; and consequently that the immense treasure it contained was entirely at his disposal. He had provided himself with a portmanteau, and he filled it with as much gold as his horse could carry, after which he returned to the city.

From that time Ali Baba and his son, whom he took to the cave and taught the secret to enter it, and after them their posterity, who were also intrusted with the important secret, enjoying their riches with moderation, lived in great splendor, and were honored with the most dignified offices in the city
